and it shall be unlawful for any Executive officer in Ireland, except by the direction of the Lord Lieutenant representing Her Majesty, to do or omit to do any such act."—(Viscount Cranborne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, he had listened with careful attention to the speech of the noble Lord, and, recognising as he did his great acuteness generally, he was bound to say that in this instance he had failed to show that acuteness, either in drafting his Amendment or in advancing reasons in support of it. In substance, although not in form, this Amendment was debated in Committee at no inconsiderable length on a Resolution of a cognate character proposed by the hon. Member for the Guildford Division of Surrey. He mentioned that not as challenging the right of the noble Lord to again raise it, but in order to explain that if he did not refer to some of the topics involved in the Amendment, it was because his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had already done so. The fault which he had to find with the noble Lord was that he appeared to assume that there would be an irreconcilable antagonism between the Lord Lieutenant in his capacity as Representative of the Empire and in his character as local Governor; but the Government could not conceive that there would be any such irreconcilable or conflicting position. What had been done by this Bill had been to leave it entirely to the Imperial Executive to determine to what extent, in what form, and under what conditions powers should be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant as representing the Queen. But why, he might ask, in reply to an interjection which fell from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, should not the Lord Lieutenant receive advice from every quarter as long as his responsibility remained? Why should he not be in a position to confer with the Irish Executive even in relation to matters on which the Irish Legislative Body had no legislative powers? His responsibility was untouched, and he would have to exercise that in pursuance of instructions. A great part of the speech of the noble Lord was addressed to showing that under the powers given to the Irish Legislative Body gross oppression might be exercised. Yes; it was true that the wise administration of a bad Act might work less evil than the partisan administration of a good Act, but this Amendment would not touch that point. As to the action of the Chief Secretary in refusing to supply police protection to Sheriffs who were making seizures at night, the law of this country was clear that distresses were not to be made unless within certain defined hours; and his right hon. Friend consequently thought he was justified in refusing the assistance of the police on such occasions when the seizures were made during the prohibited hours. Now he came to the effect of the Amendment. He took it that, although the noble Lord had made some verbal alterations in its form as it appeared on the Paper, the sense was intended to be the same.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Yes.

*SIR C. RUSSELL, continuing, said, it appeared to him that the Amendment was not a workable proposal. It meant that the Lord Lieutenant should not do any act, or omit to do any act, upon the advice of the Irish Executive contrary to Clauses 3 and 4 until he had received Her Majesty's instructions thereupon. That was tantamount to saying that the Lord Lieutenant might, as representing Her Majesty, do such acts if authorised.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: No.

SIR C. RUSSELL: Of course that was not the noble Lord's meaning, but what he did mean was that any matters embraced in Sections 3 and 4, as being excluded from the legislative power of the Irish Legislature, should not be dealt by the Lord Lieutenant, until he had received Her Majesty's instructions. That would be entirely wrong, and foreign to the provisions of the Bill. Let them take, for instance, the question of the extradition of criminals. Was the Lord Lieutenant to be prevented using his power for the arrest of a foreign offender until he could get instructions from London?

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: If the hon. and learned Gentleman rests his reply on these words, I must call his attention to the alteration. In matters of extradition the Lord Lieutenant would, of course, be responsible for his action to the Secretary of State in this House.

SIR C. RUSSELL said, the noble Lord had told them that, so far as meaning went, the alteration of the words of the Amendment did not affect it. It was the same as regards other classes of offences of that kind to which he need not further allude. The broad answer to this Amendment, and to all Amendments of this class, was that the Bill gave to the Imperial Executive complete and unrestricted power to fix the limits and extent of the delegation, and to determine the conditions and circumstances under which the delegated authority should be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant. There was a broad, clear, and distinct line between Imperial and Irish authority; but it was not intended that the Lord Lieutenant should be debarred from using such means as the circumstances of the time might require and the agencies at his command might furnish, although the agencies might be furnished by the Local Authority.

Sir C. Russell

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I have to thank my hon. and learned Friend for having dealt with the question which I put in the early part of the Debate ; but I am not quite sure that my hon. and learned Friend has correctly appreciated the question. He will recollect that it arose out of the discussion as to the powers of the Lord Lieutenant in regard to the appointments of Lieutenants of counties. I understood my hon. and learned Friend to say that the Lord Lieutenant, in making such appointments, must act as the Representative of Her Majesty, and that he must so do because military matters are excluded by Clause 3. My question then was—Must the Lord Lieutenant act as representing Her Majesty in regard to all the matters which are excluded from the purview of the Irish Legislature by Clauses 3 and 4 ? That question has not been answered by my hon. and learned Friend. He said it would be absurd that the Lord Lieutenant should not acquaint himself with the opinions of the Irish Executive, although he is not bound to act on those opinions. But surely that will depend upon the manner and the form in which these opinions are tendered to him. If they tender advice to him as the Ministers, he is constitutionally bound to follow it or to dismiss them. The hon. and learned Member for Louth, as is his wont, misrepresented my question. He ridiculed the idea that the Members of the Irish Executive were not to send a halfpenny postcard to the Lord Lieutenant. I never suggested anything of the kind. It is not the point whether the Lord Lieutenant may acquaint himself privately with the opinions of certain gentlemen as individuals, but whether he is to ask for and accept advice from these gentlemen in their Ministerial capacity. Granting that the Lord Lieutenant may hear in an informal way the opinions of Members of the Irish Executive, is he bound to follow them ? The Attorney General says he is not. But I should like to put it a little more stronger. It is admitted that the Lord Lieutenant is obliged to act at different times in two capacities. He acts in one capacity as a person advised by the Irish Executive, and he acts in the other as representing Her Majesty. In which capacity must he act in dealing with these excluded matters ? In regard to these excluded matters, is he to be compelled, without any choice or discretion of his own, to act as representing Her Majesty ? If he is, in what part of the Bill is it so stated ; and why do the Government object to an Amendment which says so ? The point is already adopted by the Government in accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston. Why do the Government, having accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston with regard to one of the excluded subjects, refuse to accept an Amendment with regard to the others ? The Government have made it perfectly clear that in the matter of the appointment of Lieutenants of counties the Lord Lieutenant is to act as representing Her Majesty. My hon. and learned Friend says that he is also undoubtedly to act as representing Her Majesty in all the other accepted subjects. But why does my hon. and learned Friend refuse to say so in the Bill ?

MR. SEXTON said, he would be glad that the noble Lord should explain how he supposed any Executive officer in Ireland could act at all with any certainty if his Amendment were accepted, because he proposed to make it unlawful for any Executive officer in Ireland, except by the direction of the Lord Lieutenant as representing Her Majesty, to do, or omit to do, any of the acts defined in the Amendment. If the Amendment were adopted it would be necessary for every Executive officer in Ireland, of whatever degree, from the highest to the lowest, on receiving any order from the Lord Lieutenant, to do any act, or to omit to do any act, to satisfy himself whether the Lord Lieutenant was acting on the advice of the Irish Executive or as representing Her Majesty, unless he wished to run the risk of a prosecution for doing an illegal act. That would be an impossible state of things. He would point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that there was a fundamental difference between Clause 3 and Clause 4 of the Bill. Clause 3 defined an Imperial sphere of legislation, and it was clear that as no law could ever be made upon any of the subjects defined in Clause 3 by the Irish Legislature when the instrument of delegation was issued defining the duties of the Lord Lieutenant he would be instructed that he was to act in all matters defined in Clause 3 upon Imperial instruction and not upon Irish instruction; and it was evident, therefore, that the Lord Lieutenant, in any Executive action arising out of those subjects, must act upon Imperial authority. It would be open to the House of Commons at any time, if the instruction was imperfect in that respect, to amend it. If the Government issued an improper instruction of delegation they could be called to account, and they would be obliged either to amend the instruction or go out of Office. So much for Clause 3. Now they came to Clause 4. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, so acute in intellect, which he had applied so extensively to this Bill, had failed to take note of the fundamental difference between the two clauses. Clause 3 was the subject of Imperial legislation; Clause 4 was the subject of Irish legislation. The subjects dealt with in Clause 4 were life, liberty, property, religion, education, and corporate institutions. The Irish Parliament might make laws upon every one of these subjects, and undoubtedly would; but Clause 4 said that any law they might make in connection with those subjects should not violate certain principles. When the Irish Parliament passed a Bill upon any of the subjects mentioned in Clause 4, such a Bill, if it did not violate any of the principles laid down, would receive the Royal Assent and become the law of the land. If, on the contrary, such a Bill violated any of the principles laid down in the clause, the Bill was ultra vires, and though the Royal Assent was given to it, it might be declared void on the initiative of any person who might be injuriously affected. The Lord Lieutenant, in regard to any of the matters mentioned in Clause 4, would have to act on the advice of the Irish Executive; and, therefore, the Amendment of the noble Lord did not apply itself to the case. The second part of the Amendment was unconstitutional, because it proposed that the Lord Lieutenant should not do any act in regard to Clause 4 whereby any person or corporation should be injuriously affected. The words "injuriously affected" did not occur in Clause 4, and it was quite possible that if the Irish Legislature passed a law upon any subject dealt with in Clause 4, the Lord Lieutenant, under this Amendment would have to take upon himself to say whether or not the Act would injuriously affect any person, although such person may be injuriously affected legally. It was conceivable that a person might be "injuriously affected" by force of law, and through the proper operation of the law. The Amendment, if it were passed, would cast upon the Lord Lieutenant a responsibility which it would be impossible to discharge.

SIR H. JAMES: The arguments of the hon. Member for North Kerry very strongly support the substance of the Amendment; and if the noble Lord who moved the Amendment can only obtain the assent of the Government to a portion of the position taken up by the hon. Member he might very well be satisfied with the work he has done. The first objection of the hon. Member for North Kerry was that it would be impossible for an Executive officer in Ireland to satisfy himself in any case whether he was receiving instructions from the Lord Lieutenant in his Imperial or his Irish capacity. But that is a duty cast upon the Lord Lieutenant. He must tell the Executive officers when he gives his orders whether the instructions are from the Imperial Government or the Irish Government. You cannot legislate on the hypothesis that the Lord Lieutenant will disobey that duty. But the main question is, what will be the relations of the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Executive in regard to all the matters excluded by Clause 3? The Attorney General, I respectfully submit, has not attempted to meet the interrogatories put to him by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. It is admitted by the hon. Member for North Kerry, as it is admitted by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that with respect to all matters excepted by Clause 3 from the Irish Legislature, the Irish Executive shall have no power to advise the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. SEXTON: My conclusion was that the way to amend the provision was to amend the instrument of delegation.

SIR H. JAMES: The instrument of delegation will follow the Statute, and will be the creature of it; and it is necessary to have the limitation in the Bill. I cannot understand the position of the Attorney General as to the Constitutional functions of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and learned Gentleman's view is that the Lord Lieutenant must take the advice of the Imperial Executive in respect of matters excepted in Clause 3. But while the line is clear in that clause between matters excepted from and matters delegated to the Irish Legislature, the hon. and learned Gentleman invites the Lord Lieutenant to be always passing that line. He says—"What is to prevent the Lord Lieutenant from discussing these matters with the Irish Executive?" That would be putting the Lord Lieutenant from a Constitutional point of view in an absurd position. Of course, the Lord Lieutenant could talk the matter over with his friends at his club. But that is not the point. The Lord Lieutenant must act upon advice constitutionally given. As the Representative of the Sovereign, he must act upon the advice of some Minister who will be constitutionally responsible for his action. My hon. and learned Friend places the Lord Lieutenant in this position. He is to take advice in regard to the accepted matters under Clause 3, from the Imperial Executive; but still at the same time he may, to use the colloquial phrase of the Attorney General, talk them over with the Irish Executive. But are they to speak to him as the Executive Government or as individuals? If the Irish Ministers are to speak only as individuals in discussing matters with the Lord Lieutenant, their advice counts for nothing; but if they speak as the Executive Government he must accept their advice or dismiss them. If they speak as Constitutional Advisers, and their advice clashes with that of the Imperial Government, which is to prevail? What is the use of discussing matters with the Irish Executive if their advice is not to be regarded? Let me give a concrete instance. Clause 3 excepts treason and treason-felony from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature. Supposing a person were convicted of that offence in Ireland, and that great sympathy was felt for him in the country, according to the view of the Attorney General the Lord Lieutenant could not pardon the man or mitigate sentence except on the advice of the Imperial Executive. What, then, would be the use of consulting the Irish Executive if he had to say, "I cannot listen to your views"? The Government shrink from putting into the Bill what they admit to be the case—that the Lord Lieutenant must take the advice of the Imperial Government. The Government have accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston on the ground that it refers to a matter excepted under Clause 3, and that, therefore, the Irish Executive cannot advise the Lord Lieutenant in that matter; by a well-known legal maxim the insertion of that one head includes everything else. Having accepted an Amendment in respect to one of the excepted matters in Clause 3, why do you leave out of your consideration the 20 other matters in Clause 3? In the great confusion resulting from the fact that the House has not been allowed to adapt the later clauses of the Bill to the clauses which have been amended, no point will stand out more prominently and injuriously than that of the functions of the Lord Lieutenant as set forth in this clause unless the clause is properly amended.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) (who rose amid cries of "Divide!") said, that the House could not divide until some answer had been given, not only to the Leaders of the Opposition, but to the hon. Member for North Kerry.

It being half-past Five of the clock the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY) moved that, in the absence of the Earl of Morley, Lord Playfair be appointed to take the Chair in Committee of the Whole House for the business of the day.

Moved, "That the Lord Playfair do take the Chair in Committee of the Whole House this day in the absence of the Earl of Morley."—(The Lord President, [E. Kimberley].)

Motion agreed to.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF CHILDREN) BILL.—(No. 219.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), with the Amendments.

On Question, "That the Bill do pass?"

Clause 7.

LORD SANDFORD said, that when this Bill was in Committee Amendments were made for the purpose of relieving subscribers to the voluntary schools of what would be a considerable charge upon them. But Clause 9 rendered that concession nugatory in the case of children who were paid for by the school authorities. He, therefore, proposed the following Amendment, which was really consequential.

Amendment moved,

In page 3, line 41, after ("rates") to insert ("reduced by a sum equal to the contribution made by or received from parents under Section 9 (1).")—(The Lord Sandford.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I quite agree that it is necessary to make some Amendment, but I hope the noble Lord will be willing to adopt one which has been suggested by the draftsman as carrying out more completely what is intended. It is to this effect :—

In Clause 7, to insert,—“For the purposes of this section there shall be included in local rates every sum received under this Act by a school authority from a parent and applied towards the general expenses of the school authority.”

I am sure the noble Lord will consider that that carries into effect what he desires. The draftsman assures me it will do so.

LORD SANDFORD agreed to accept the Amendment in substitution for his own.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendment (Earl of Kimberley) agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have an Amendment in this clause the object of which is that fees paid by agreement shall not be included.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 8, to leave out ("paid under the order") and insert ("received by a school authority under this section.")—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

*LORD SANDFORD said, he ought, perhaps, to apologise to the Lord President for having put down his second Amendment; and if the noble Earl would kindly give an explanation of the Reference to the provisions of the Education Act it might not be necessary to move it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : It will be observed that Clause 9 says—

“Where a school authority incur any expense under this Act in respect of any blind or deaf child, the parent of the child shall be liable to contribute towards the expenses of the child such weekly sum, if any, as, regard being had to the provisions of the Elementary Education Act, 1891, may be agreed on between the school authority and the parent.”

The object of the reference to the Education Act of 1891 is this. It is obvious that the parent of a child who is required by this Bill to attend a school in the same way as we require children to attend elementary schools should not be placed under any disadvantage as compared with the parent of a child who is not blind or deaf. The intention, therefore, is that in making any order care should be taken that nothing falls upon a parent in respect of the free education which he would have a right to demand if the child was sent to an ordinary elementary school. It is quite obvious no one could desire that such a parent should be placed in a less favourable position. That is the whole object of the Reference, and I apprehend there will be no difficulty in providing for it.

*LORD SANDFORD asked, as the cost was much greater in these special schools than in ordinary elementary schools, and the limit in the Act was 10s., whether it was proposed to limit the grant to 10s. ? He asked that question because he had been unable to get any explanation of the matter, and the clause as it stood seemed unintelligible.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I cannot say exactly what sum would be allowed, but it is quite clear the intention is that the parent should not be placed at a disadvantage. If you take his child and place it in an institution against his wish, it is quite clear he should not, as regards that child, be made to pay anything which he would not be compelled to pay if the child were sent to an ordinary school. It is true there is some additional expense; but that is thrown upon the parent by the action of the law, and it would be extremely unfair that a parent who has the misfortune to have a deaf and dumb child should be placed under a disadvantage. There are other institutions to which these children may be sent which are not elementary schools; but power is given by this Bill to make grants to these schools, and those grants will be made with reference to the amounts which might be fairly taken into consideration in reference to the parent having free education for the child. I do not think there will be any difficulty in carrying it into effect.

*LORD SANDFORD said, after that explanation he would not move his proposed Amendment to leave out the Reference to the Education Act and insert that regard should be had to the means of the parent.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 9, as amended, agreed to.

LORD SANDFORD moved, as a new clause—

“The Education Department shall annually lay before both Houses of Parliament a report of their proceedings under this Act during the preceding year, and in that report shall give lists of the schools to which they have granted and refused certificates under the Act during the year, with their reasons for each such refusal.”

Clause agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (SWINE FEVER) BILL.—(No. 254.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he felt sure their Lordships would give a Second Reading to this Bill in view of the history of swine fever in this country. Before explaining the provisions of the Bill, he would shortly refer to the history of that most malignant and contagious disease. Apparently, prior to 1862, swine fever did not possess the dismal prerogatives of a special disease, but a virulent disease affecting swine, and variously known, was recognised by the dealers at Bristol. In 1878 the Privy Council issued an Order for slaughter and quarantine with the view of dealing with the disease; and from time to time, between 1878 and 1892, Local Authorities had adopted measures for the purpose of dealing with it. But whether from want of uniformity of action or other causes the steps taken by the Local Authorities had not been successful in stamping out the disease. Some of the Local Authorities became discouraged from those in neighbouring districts failing to support them ; and altogether they became slack in administering the powers of which they had been put in possession. In February, 1892, a strong deputation waited upon Mr. Chaplin, the then President of the Board of Agriculture, and urged him to compel uniformity of action. The successful way in which pleuro-pneumonia had been grappled with by Mr. Chaplin was pointed to ; and they asked, why should not swine fever be dealt with with equal success ? On February 7 last a very strong Departmental Committee was appointed by the President of the Board of Agriculture to inquire into the whole question of swine fever, and as to the best way of dealing with it. After taking evidence, that very authoritative and responsible Departmental Committee came to this conclusion—they were satisfied from the evidence submitted to them that, owing to the impossibility of securing uniform action on the part of Local Authorities, swine fever could not be extirpated unless under the direction of a Central Authority ; and they added that overwhelming evidence had been adduced to the effect that, by the adoption of proper measures, the disease could be extinguished in a reasonable time. The Bill was based upon the recommendations of that Departmental Committee. The Bill made any money available for dealing with pleuro-pneumonia under the Act of 1890 available also for dealing with swine fever, and all the powers at present exercisable by the Board of Agriculture in this country, and by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council in Ireland under this Act with respect to pleuro-pneumonia and cattle, were made exercisable with respect to swine fever and swine. The compensation to be paid for any animal slaughtered under the provisions of the Bill was to be the value of the animal immediately before it was slaughtered, or, in the case of a diseased animal, one-half of the value of the animal before it became affected. With regard to finance, the Government anticipated that the money already standing to the credit of the pleuro-pneumonia account, together with a small balance of about £9,000 which remained of the moneys voted for foot-and-mouth, and the sum of £65,000 already provided in the Estimates for the present year, would very nearly, if not quite, enable them to defray the cost of the administration of the Bill up to March 31 next, the end of the present financial year. In future years, under the provisions of the Bill, the net contribution of the Exchequer in any one year would be limited to £50,000, and the balance, after crediting the fund with the proceeds of the sale of carcasses, would fall to be provided, as in the case of pleuro-pneumonia, out of the local taxation accounts in Great Britain and the general cattle diseases fund in Ireland. The Bill was to come into operation on November 1 next. The noble Lord hoped their Lordships would give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Ribblesdale.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ISLE OF MAN (CHURCH BUILDING ACTS) BILL.—(No. 143.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL) : My Lords, this Bill is for the purpose of removing a doubt which has arisen as to disabilities under the Church Building Acts.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Herschell.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE OPIUM COMMISSION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for India if he would refuse to allow the expense of an Opium Commission, which had not been asked for either by the India Office or by the Government or the people of India, to be put upon the Indian Treasury ? He said he would, at the outset, state his own convictions and personal experience with regard to the opium traffic in the East, in order that he might not appear to be speaking now against them. There was, in the first place, a great difference between the eating and smoking of opium ; and it was possible to keep on eating the drug in moderation without any resultant pernicious effects. But with regard to smoking opium, he had been asked by Chinese in Singapore and Penang not to believe that any of their countrymen considered it otherwise than a vice ; and once, on a vessel where the supercargo—a Chinaman—was continually smoking opium, all the people on board spoke of him as a good man, and pitied him for having fallen into that vice. There were two opinions about the opium traffic, and it seemed there was no room for a third. One opinion was that opium was an unmixed evil, except when administered by doctors, and that in forcing it upon the Chinese we had been guilty of a national sin. However, since the Treaty of Chefoo, Englishmen now living might be considered to have purged themselves from that sin. The other opinion, as he had said, was that opium was not injurious when taken in moderation ; that it was a necessary of life in some countries ; and that its cultivation could not be abolished in India without inflicting a loss on the Indian agricultural population, causing friction with the Native States, and sacrificing £4,000,000 annually of Indian Revenue. A large portion of India had been brought under cultivation for opium, and it was not possible to do away with the traffic without doing injury to our own subjects, to whom our first duty was due. Under the first of those opinions a national sin had to be atoned for, which could only be done by the sinners. That we had committed a national sin had been lately avowed by the Prime Minister. Under the second class of opinion the disturbance of the existing state of things was uncalled for, and was what was colloquially called a fad. Mr. Gladstone, in a part of his speech which had not been noticed by any of the papers as far as he knew, said he was obliged to object to that part of the Motion as being tainted with the sin of ambiguity, and referred to it as the wildest and most shadowy measure. It was rather singular to hear Mr. Gladstone complaining of ambiguity, and he seemed to be unconscious how much of it there was in his own speeches. He thought the House was entitled to hear from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India which of those opinions he held as to this traffic, and whether he could deny that its discontinuance must be either a duty on the part of this country or a gratification of the feelings of a section of it ; and, that being so, that it ought to be paid for by this country and not by India, and that all preliminary steps to such discontinuance of the opium traffic, such as the appointment of a Royal Commission, ought to be paid for out of the British Exchequer and not out of Indian taxes. He had just received a letter which had been sent to The Daily Chronicle by the Anti-Opium Society's Secretary urging this view, and pointing out that Mr. Gladstone had apparently left the matter open for reconsideration. He, therefore, hoped, as it was still open for reconsideration, the noble Earl would be able to give a satisfactory answer that the Government did not intend to impose this cost upon India. If they did so it would be extremely unfair to the people of India. Personally, he would have been satisfied to leave the matter as it had been left in Viscount Cross's Blue Book, showing that the opium traffic had been stopped in Burma. The spread of the traffic in Bombay, and in other places where the sale of opium had increased, should be restricted. In other respects the traffic would correct itself. The last news from India was that, in consequence of the late silver legislation, the sale of opium to China was already diminishing, and in that case the Indian Government would be obliged to find some other means of raising Revenue. He would also ask his noble Friend what was the view taken by his Council, and whether he had any objection to lay any opinions expressed by any Members of that Council on the Table ? Before sitting down, he felt bound to say that the Prime Minister had made an admirable and comprehensive speech on the opium traffic, and the only fault to be found with it was that the speech did not justify the conclusion arrived at—namely, an inquiry into a vast range of subjects which would occupy many years by a Royal Commission the Members of which, so far as the selection was known, did not appear to be very competent for such an inquiry, so that the proposed Commission appeared to be intended as a sop to one section of the Prime Minister's followers of an electioneering nature.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : My Lords, I will confine myself to answering the question which the noble Lord has asked me. I can inform him that it is proposed that the expense of the Opium Commission shall fall half upon the Indian Revenues and half upon the British Treasury—that the cost shall be divided.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : May I ask whether that has been decided? Has the proposal been agreed to?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : That is what is proposed. It is only a proposal at present. We are obliged to get it into shape before it can be arranged.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked whether the noble Earl would not give any reason why half the cost was to fall upon India? That appeared to him to require justification.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : It seems to me that India is deeply interested in the settlement of the question raised by the promoters of this Commission, and, that being so, it is not unreasonable that one-half of the expense should fall on the Indian Revenues, the other half being borne by the British Treasury. That is all I can say.

THE LORD PRESIDENT'S SALARY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for India if he had made any progress towards obtaining a salary for the Lord President out of the British Exchequer? He said that when he last put a question to the noble Earl upon this subject of his salary as Lord President, at the same time complimenting him upon the performance of his duties as Secretary for India and as Lord President, he did so on behalf of the people of India. He now asked the same question on behalf of the people of this country. An opinion was generally prevalent that unpaid services were not valuable, and that the absence of salary and irresponsibility went together. The noble Earl had already told the House that he was able to discharge his functions and duties as Lord President through his Vice President; but, at the same time, the noble Earl ought not to have taken advantage of his connection with India to have borrowed a mau-eating tiger to turn loose into the Education Office. The noble Earl had been in the House for about 45 years. In the early part of his career he served the country with advantage in many places. He did good service in St. Petersburg. He had also been Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and in his time there were no riots in Belfast. His noble Friend also had always acted with responsibility and with dignity, whether as Colonial Secretary or as Secretary for India; and the way in which the Duke of Richmond had complimented him in that House upon the manner in which he had conducted a Licensing Bill would be in their Lordships' recollection. Under those circumstances, he must entreat his noble Friend not to allow his great reputation to be muddled away by the proceedings of his Vice President—he would not say “wrecked,” because wrecking a reputation would only apply in such a case as the Prime Minister's—gambling away his position and sacrificing everything in his endeavours to pass the Home Rule Bill. When he last brought this subject forward he was written to by the editor of a Tory paper that it was not desirable to press the matter, because the public might not get, in the noble Earl's place, so good a man as Lord President. But he differed from that opinion, and would prefer one of Mr. Frederick Harrison's chimney sweeps as Lord President, because, if so, there would be nobody to support the Vice President in the injurious course he was pursuing. However, he would not speak further of the Vice President on this occasion, because he had a Notice on the Paper for going into the subject. His noble Friend had had so much to do with the India Office that he had become very autocratic. He would again urge the noble Earl to obtain a salary as Lord President of the Council, as distinct from his other Office of Secretary of State for India. If he would do that the grievance felt in India in this matter of the payment of salary to the Secretary of State for India would be removed. His own view was that the noble Earl should have both.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : My Lords, I ought really to be grateful to my noble Friend for his strenuous exertions to obtain for me an increase of salary; but I do not quite perceive by what logical deduction he arrives at the conclusion that I should have greater influence over the Vice President if I received a larger salary than I do now. The noble Lord has described the Vice President in a way not quite Parliamentary. He has gone the length of calling him a Bengal tiger. I can only suppose that the noble Lord thinks I am, as Indian Secretary, so greatly influenced by Indian traditions that I have actually chosen as Vice President a gentleman having as many qualities of a wild beast as can be found in a man. Whatever the idea of the noble Lord may be with regard to that, I regret to have to tell him that I have made no progress at all in the direction of obtaining a salary as President of the Council. I further wish to assure my noble Friend that whatever may be the correct description of the Vice President I have complete confidence in that gentleman, and fully approve the course which he has taken in educational matters.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : My Lords, I do not think the noble Earl has quite understood why objection is taken to his self-denying ordinance with respect to his salary. The result of his not receiving the salary attached to the Office of President of the Council is that he occupies a kind of detached position, and that it creates in him a merely philosophic disposition in connection with all that takes place in the Education Office. If we cannot persuade the noble Earl to obtain this salary of £2,000 a year, which, I think, would revive the noble Earl's zeal in the cause of English education, I would suggest that as the noble Earl's payment from India has such a philosophic effect upon his mind it might be well to try the experiment of paying Mr. Acland's salary out of Indian Revenues also. That course might have a useful effect upon his mind, and the result might be a lightening of the burden imposed on voluntary schools at the present moment.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, as the noble Earl seemed to think he ought not to take a salary from the British Exchequer, perhaps he should not take one from the Indian Treasury either.

STANDING ORDERS.

Standing Order 194 read.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he wished to move an Amendment to Standing Order 194. This Order was only two years old, and was introduced in relation to Bills of the London County Council such as dealt with the borrowing of money. The Standing Order introduced considerable changes in the procedure which had up to that time applied to Bills of that description, and with those changes the London County Council was not satisfied. Nor could he express himself, on behalf of the London County Council, as satisfied with the position in which their Bills relating to the borrowing of money stood.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners ;—

The House went ;—and, being returned ;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to—

1. Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Act, 1893.
2. Improvement of Land (Scotland) Act, 1893.
3. Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1893.
4. Conveyance of Mails Act, 1893.
5. Law of Distress and Small Debts (Ireland) Act, 1893.
6. Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893.

7. Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 15) Act, 1893.

8. Salmon Fishery Act (1873) Provisional Order (Tees Fishery District) Confirmation Act, 1893.

9. Education Department Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Act, 1893.

10. Education Department Provisional Order Confirmation (London) (No. 2) Act, 1893.

11. County of the City of Glasgow Act, 1893.

12. Tramways Orders Confirmation Act, 1893.

STANDING ORDERS.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. STUART (continuing) said, the Standing Order to which his Amendment referred was introduced after considerable correspondence between the parties concerned respecting the Bills for the borrowing of money of the London County Council. It was understood by the London County Council, and intended by the then President of the Local Government Board, that the Standing Order should only apply to such Bills. On the 29th May, 1891, the date of the Standing Order—or before the introduction of the Standing Order—a draft of it was conveyed to the London County Council by Mr. Ritchie, who wrote to say that it would be understood that the proposed Standing Order would not affect in any way whatever the authority which the County Council possessed to execute any works within their statutory powers, the cost of which would be defrayed out of the rates. It was only in respect of works constructed out of borrowed money, the cost of which would fall upon future ratepayers that it would apply. Though that might have been the understanding, the effect was different. The first words of the Standing Order was—

And then followed certain exceptions with respect to these Bills which affected the borrowing of money. It had been understood, until quite recently, on account of the letter of the President of the Local Government Board, that the raising of money there was intended to refer to the raising of it by means of borrowing ; but, as Mr. Speaker, in the earlier part of the Session, in a remarkably lucid ruling, ruled, and as the plain sense of the words indicated, the Standing Order was a prohibition, and prevented the London County Council from introducing a Bill of any kind for the raising of money as a Private Bill. That being so, what he begged to contend was this—that in the change then introduced by the Standing Order the County Council was deprived of a power which its predecessor, the Metropolitan Board of Works, had possessed for 35 years; and, in the second place, that the County Council was placed in a different position by the Standing Order from that in which other Municipal Bodies were placed, because, as he had submitted to the House at the time the Standing Order was passed, there were many instances in which Bills affecting the distribution of rating and the raising of money had been brought in by Municipal Bodies and actually passed into law which the London County Council was prohibited by the Standing Order from bringing in. If the Standing Order were altered as he proposed, it would read thus—

Amendment proposed, in line 2, after the words “raise money,” to insert the words “by the creation of stock or on loan.”—(Mr. J. Stuart.)

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, his Friend, in moving his Amendment, said he did so on behalf of the London County Council, whom he described as being dissatisfied with the existing order of things. No doubt the County Council had expressed itself in favour of altering the Standing Order ; but his hon. Friend would recollect that their decision was by no means unanimous. It was strongly opposed, and the result at which it arrived was only arrived at after a Division. But, however that might be, he (Mr. Cohen) had risen to oppose the present proposal in no spirit of hostility to the County Council. He had had the honour to be a member of the Council since the first days of its institution—longer, he thought, than his hon. Friend—and he should be the last person to do anything which he thought prejudicial to its interests or reputation. He recollected in the Debate in that House on the Thames Conservancy the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board cast some reproaches not very relevant, as it seemed to him at the time, and certainly unjust as regarded himself, against those who he said were hostile to, and were constantly attacking, the Council. In his (Mr. Cohen's) belief, such a Motion as that of his hon. Friend was calculated to give ground for—perhaps to produce—these attacks from those who might be unfriendly to the Council ; and he thought, in opposing the alteration, he was doing what he could to disarm such attacks, and to sustain, and even to enhance, the reputation of the London County Council. Let the House consider only for one moment the effect of his hon. Friend's Motion. The Standing Order, as it now stood, prohibited the Council from raising money by Private Bill, except by borrowing, through the creation of stock or otherwise. His hon. Friend's Motion would forbid what was now permitted, and would permit what was now forbidden. He did not want to prevent the Council from doing what it could now do, and he did not want it to be able to do what was now forbidden. He thought the House would see that the Standing Order as it now stood was justified by equity as well as by practice. It was right in practice that the Council should be empowered by Private Bill to create stock subject to present conditions as to Government sanction, and in conformity with the existing provisions as to Schedule, because the means were simple, and the method certainly, as far as regarded the Council with its £30,000,000 of debt, could not be said to be novel. But to enable the Council to raise money by Private Bill, through any means other than by borrowing, by means of the creation of stock or otherwise, appeared to him wrong in equity and not justifiable by practice. The hon. Member had said this power was vested in other Municipalities. But surely he must recognise the difference between London and other Municipalities. They scarcely resembled each other in any respect at all, while in all matters that governed the subject now before the House they were diametrically different. For his hon. Friend's illustration to be in point he should have cited counties, and not Municipalities which consisted of small wards or parishes all homogeneous, and whose various interests were not only similar, but probably also identical. Could this be said of London? It was quite conceivable—it was even probable—that the interests of Kilburn might conflict, say, with those of the Borough, and that Hackney might know nothing and care nothing about the wants of Battersea; and if, as was doubtless intended, and as they knew was attempted, it was sought to alter the incidence of taxation and to change the system of levying the rates, those were great questions of public policy which did not arise in small Provincial towns, which affected the interests in different ways of the various divisions of the County of London, containing a population of 5,000,000 people, and which ought to be debated and decided in public Debate on the floor of the House. The hon. Gentleman had referred to what he considered was the intention of Mr. Ritchie at the time the Standing Order was framed. He regretted his right hon. Friend was not here to explain for himself his intention, but he hoped they would hear on this subject his hon. Friend the late Secretary to the Local Government Board. He submitted the interpretation put on the Standing Order by Mr. Speaker was the only one that the words of that Order admitted of; and he submitted, further, that the intention of its framers must be taken to be that which was the natural, and, indeed, the only meaning which attached to their words. The London County Council did not in 1891 make any attempt to introduce by Private Bill an Improvement Rate. If they had done so he ventured to say neither his hon. Friend nor anyone else would have been left in doubt as to what would have been on such procedure the opinion of the late President of the Local Government Board, who, he was convinced, never contemplated for one moment the introduction by Private Bill of such legislation as would be possible were the House to accept the Motion now before it. He apologised to the House for having detained it. He would conclude by saying that he wished in no sense to be understood as arguing against an Improvement Rate or a Betterment Rate in principle. Those important questions were not now before them. His object only was to guard the Council from acquiring a reputation of trying by clandestine and side methods to pass legislation which involved great questions of more than municipal, even of national, policy. He believed that such a procedure as his hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch contemplated was not likely to enhance the reputation of the London County Council, which was as precious to him (Mr. Cohen) as it was to his hon. Friend. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be in the interest of the London County Council and of the authority of the House that the Motion should be rejected by an emphatic and decided majority.

Mr. J. Stuart

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) observed, that the opposition of the London County Council to the Standing Order did not originate when the Owners' Improvement Rate Bill was thrown out this year. On the contrary, the Council was opposed to the Standing Order in 1891, and he had a most distinct recollection of a very strong speech made in opposition to it by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Sir J. Lubbock). The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cohen) said it was right and equitable to impose restrictions on the London County Council in this matter. But why should a restriction be imposed on the London County Council from which other Local Bodies were free? It seemed to him that the argument which the hon. Member had founded upon equity must go by the board when it was remembered that this was a special restriction imposed upon the London County Council. No doubt London was technically a county; but it had far more in common with the great cities of the country than with the counties. The hon. Member (Mr. Cohen) insinuated that the former power of the London County Council on this subject was withdrawn because it had been abused. That was a most unjust insinuation to make against the London County Council. In the discussions that took place in reference to the change in the Standing Order in 1891, the point now raised was never debated at all, the discussion being limited to the right to raise money by loan. The London County Council was really placed in a great difficulty by the provisions of the Standing Order. If the Council introduced a Private Bill authorising them to levy a rate, they were told that they could only proceed by means of a Public Bill. If they introduced the Bill as a public measure they were referred to Standing Order No. 1. The hon. Member for East Islington (Mr. Cohen) seemed to think that if the Standing Order were amended in the way suggested, the House would be depriving itself of all control over the Bills of the London County Council, and of all opportunity of discussing their projects. That was not the case. All the Council desired the House to do now was to settle the question of order, and to enable them to introduce Bills of the kind referred to—the question of merits would be reserved for the decision of the House. If the Council ever introduced a Private Bill of too large a character, the House could, of course, throw it out. He did not think there was any machinery in the world that was more adapted for threshing out a difficult question than a Committee of the House of Commons, to which, in the ordinary course, a Private Bill would be referred. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cohen) said the Council was proposing to introduce a Bill by clandestine means. It would be for the House to judge whether a description of that kind could be properly applied to such an Amendment of the Standing Order as was now proposed. He trusted that the Motion would be carried.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said that, although he was not a member of the London County Council, he had some personal knowledge of the system of Local Government in London in the past, and especially in regard to the finances of the Metropolis. He wished to know why the hon. Member for Shoreditch (Mr. J. Stuart) should, at the end of a somewhat weary Session, bring forward a Motion of this kind, and in consequence keep the House from the discussion of the important Bill that was now before it?

MR. J. STUART: The hon. Gentleman asks me a question, and I will answer it. It is because before the beginning of November we have to introduce our Bills, and it is desirable that we should know the circumstances under which we are to introduce them.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER went on to say that it was not the case that under the old system the Metropolitan Board of Works had the powers now asked for by the London County Council. Not only on all questions of loans, but in respect of all additional expenditure, the Metropolitan Board of Works had to come to the House of Commons; and it was his duty, he believed, on three occasions, to defend Money Bills introduced into the House by a Member of the Government on behalf of the Board. The London County Council at the present time had an increasing expenditure. That expenditure now amounted to £2,000,000, which was a very heavy burden on the ratepayers of the Metropolis; and if, by means of the procedure of the House, some slight check could be placed on the expenditure, he should not regret it. At present the whole Budget of the London County Council was brought before the House every year, but under the proposed system the money proposals of the Council would be sent up to a Committee, and the House would have no knowledge of the facts. He thought it was necessary for those Conservative Members who wished to do their best to guard the interests of overburdened middle-class ratepayers from the effects of the fads of the London County Council to vote against the Motion.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The speech delivered by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down discloses, to my mind, a grave misapprehension of all the facts of the case, with regard both to the position of the London County Council and the position of Parliament. I must, therefore, recall the attention of the House to what is the position of the Council and of the House, and to show what would be the extent of the operation now proposed by my hon. Friend. Two or three years after the constitution of the Metropolitan Board of Works, it became the practice of the Treasury to bring in what was called the "Money Bill" of that Body. This was practically a Government Bill, and had all the facilities of a Government Bill in passing through the House. By means of that Bill, no doubt, the House controlled the borrowing powers of the Metropolitan Board. A new state of things supervened when the London County Council was established; and several Members—I myself among the number—strongly protested against the London County Council being placed in a different position from all the different Municipalities of the Kingdom, by having its Money Bills brought in on the responsibility and under the care of the Government of the day, without being subjected to the checks which were applied to the Bills of other Local Authorities. Mr. Ritchie gave the matter consideration; and in 1890, and I think again in 1891, he gave a pledge to the House that this most unsatisfactory state of things should be terminated; that the Government should be relieved of the responsibility of dealing with London finance; and that the Council should introduce their own proposals into Parliament as other Municipalities did. The Standing Order was arranged, I think, in the Session of 1891, under the supervision of Mr. Ritchie and the representatives of the London County Council, and with the assistance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), then the Chairman of Committees. It was intended to meet—and it really seems to me it did meet—all the facts of the case. It provides that all Bills introduced by the London County Council for money purposes should be introduced as Public Bills, unless they complied with certain conditions, but that Bills authorising the borrowing of money and complying with those conditions should be introduced as Private Bills. This year the London County Council introduced a Bill for the purpose of authorising the raising of a new rate. You, Mr. Speaker, held that the words “containing power to raise money” were not confined to raising money by borrowing, but extended to raising money by levying rates; and, if I may venture to say so, you, no doubt, most accurately ruled that under the Standing Order the Bill must be introduced as a Public Bill. It is not too much to say that in the present state of Public Business, or in any conceivable state of Public Business in this century, or in this decade of the century, it is useless to empower the London County Council to introduce Money Bills as Public Bills. They must either be Government Bills or Private Bills to have any chance of passing. All that is now asked is that the Standing Order should not be restricted to Bills authorising the borrowing of money by means of stocks and loans, but that the London County Council should be enabled to introduce a Rating Bill as a Private Bill. The hon. Member opposite says that, in that case, the House will have no control. The House will have a great deal of control. All Private Bills must be read here a second time; and if a novel principle is introduced into such a Bill, its opponents will have a better chance against it, because they will have this early period of the Sitting in which to bring forward their views. Certainly, we have this Session had enough experience of reviewing the action of the London County Council on Private Bills. After a Private Bill has gone before a Committee it is brought before the House on the Report stage, and again on the Third Reading. I can see no possible disadvantage that will accrue to London on the one hand and to the House on the other from the adoption of the course proposed. I absolutely repudiate the doctrine of the hon. Member that we in this House are to review the current expenditure of the London County Council. If so, why should we not do the same with regard to the Birmingham, or the Manchester, or the Liverpool Town Councils? The doctrine I venture to submit to the House is that the London County Council should have the same powers as, and neither more nor less than, other Municipal Councils. It should not be kept in leading strings, but should be put on the same footing and have the same powers as Glasgow, Manchester, and Liverpool. One of those powers is that of coming to the House by means of a Private Bill, in order to obtain powers to deal with the rates. The object of the Standing Order is to put London on the same footing as other Municipalities, and so far as the Government are concerned they have no objection to offer to that. But I should strongly object to any change from the Local Government Board to the Treasury. On the broad principle that I wish London to be exactly where all other Municipalities are; and under the control of the same Government Department as Manchester and Liverpool, I am prepared to extend to it the Standing Order which applied to all Provincial towns. I know nothing of the circumstances under which the Standing Order was originally introduced; but I have no doubt that Mr. Ritchie intended to do what was wise and just, and if that intention was not carried out it is only fair that the mistake should be remedied by the House. The question of the application of this special restriction to London is an open one, which the House may well decide, without in any way parting with any of the powers it now possesses of complete control over Private Bill legislation.

MR. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he was glad to recognise that there was no sharp disagreement between the two sides of the House upon that question. The President of the Local Government Board had based his support of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hoxton on the ground that he desired to put the London County Council on an equal footing with other Municipalities. But he would not secure that end by merely supporting the Amendment. It might possibly reduce the inequality, but it would by no means place London on all-fours with Provincial Corporations; and if once the House began to discuss that argument he believed they would soon be found to be in sharp disagreement. The description given by the right hon. Gentleman of the proposed change was, no doubt, absolutely correct; but the alteration was a serious one, and he could not help regretting the absence of the Chairman of Committees, whose guidance on these occasions was always received with respect and gratitude. They knew that the progress of a Private Bill through the House was much more simple and easy than that of a Public Bill, and that would account for the desire of the London County Council to effect this change. It was not for him, however, to suggest that it was an undesirable one to make; and, under the circumstances, he thought his hon. Friends might be content with having fairly and clearly stated their case, and not press their opposition to a Division.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

QUESTIONS.

PROPOSED FRENCH CABLE FROM AUSTRALIA TO AMERICA.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has observed in The Standard of Thursday, the 17th instant, a despatch from Berlin stating that the cable from Australia to New Caledonia, constructed by a French Company, is the first section of a cable service from Australia to America via Samoa and Honolulu, and that the German Imperial Post Office has expressed its readiness to grant a subsidy towards the construction of the Samoan connection; whether he has any information that would throw light on this alleged intention to construct a complete cable service under foreign management and control between Australia and America; and whether any steps have been, or are being, taken to give effect to the strongly-expressed wishes of the Australian and Canadian Delegates to the Imperial Conference held in London in 1887 in favour of the construction of a Pacific cable under British management and control?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is "Yes"; but I have no official information which bears out the statement. As to the second paragraph, the agreement which has been entered into by the French Government with a Company for a cable from Queensland to New Caledonia has been published, and I shall be glad to let the hon. Member see a copy if he wishes. I am not aware of any steps having been taken to lay a cable under British management and control; but I ought to add that, as subsidies to Submarine Cable Companies are not borne on the Vote for the Post Office, the question is not one under my special control.

THE "COSTA RICA PACKET."

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he has seen, in the The Sydney Daily Telegraph of 6th July, a further statement of Captain Carpenter, of the Costa Rica Packet relative to the losses, privations, and indignities to which he was subjected during his unwarrantable seizure and detention by the Dutch authorities of the Moluccas ; whether he has observed the allegation of Captain Carpenter, that the £2,500 suggested by the Foreign Office to the Dutch Government as personal compensation under the circumstances would be more than swallowed up by the expenses he has incurred, and the losses consequent on the disarrangement of his affairs ; whether the Foreign Office will reconsider Captain Carpenter's case in the light of this additional communication ; and whether any decision has yet been arrived at in the matter of the claim of the owners and crew of the Costa Rica Packet for compensation from the Dutch Government for the loss of a whaling season, occasioned by the arrest and imprisonment of Captain Carpenter ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : I have seen the statement referred to ; but, apart from the impossibility of founding claims upon a statement in the newspapers, we could not in reason have pressed for the amount demanded—namely, £10,000, as compensation for loss entailed upon Captain Carpenter personally by a detention of a few weeks. A further point as regards the claims of the owners and crew has been submitted for the consideration of the Law Officers, and is still being considered ; but no new decision has been come to.

THE LOSS OF THE "VICTORIA."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, by the regulations and custom of the Navy, it was nobody's duty, when it appeared that there was imminent danger of the Victoria foundering, to order the engineers and stokers to be called up from the engine room and stoke hold ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : The circumstances attending the loss of the Victoria are well-known. At the moment of the final catastrophe the ship was being turned towards the land with the object of reaching shallow water, and the engineers and stokers on watch were at their stations carrying out their duties in obedience to the last orders received for working the engines. It is doubtful whether, as the hon. Member implies, the imminent danger of the ship foundering was fully realised on board the Victoria, and the Admiralty are not prepared to impute blame to anyone as suggested by the terms of the question. If the case had been totally different, and all hope of saving the ship and the whole of her crew by means of her engines had been abandoned, the officer in command would undoubtedly have done all in his power to prevent a single man remaining below in the engine room or elsewhere.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : The right hon. Gentleman has not touched my question. He implies that I was making an imputation when I asked if it was anybody's duty to warn the engineers and stokers to come on deck.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I submit to the House that I have fully answered the hon. Gentleman.

NAVAL SIGNALLING.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state, without prejudice to the Public Service, what is the T.A. system of signalling alluded to in the Victoria Court Martial as having been invented by Admiral Tryon, and in what way it differs from the ordinary naval signals ; whether this T.A. system was first tried in the Channel Squadron, under Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour in the years 1890-1 ; whether any Report upon it was made by the Admiral in command of that Squadron ; and whether the Report was favourable or the reverse ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : As a general rule, it would be prejudicial to the interests of the Public Service to give answers relating to the Signal Books in use in the Fleet. But, in this case, there is no objection to stating that the T.A. system of manœuvring is only an elaboration of a signal that has been in the Signal Book many years. The effect is to manœuvre the Squadron by closely watching and following the Admiral's motions without signals. It was tried by Sir Michael Culme-Seymour in the Channel Squadron, and the Report, although favourable as a whole, suggested several minor alterations.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the instructions, under which the officers commanding Her Majesty's ships on the coast of Newfoundland are now acting, can be made public; and whether the Naval Estimates are charged with the costs of printing executed for them in Newfoundland, or whether such charges are borne on the Colonial Vote?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: In the opinion of the Board of Admiralty it would be inexpedient to publish the instructions to the naval officers on the coast of Newfoundland. No expenses for printing in Newfoundland have been charged to Navy Votes. I presume that any such outlay would fall on other funds.

THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India intends, for the purposes of the Behar Cadastral Survey, to re-introduce the Patwari Bill in some modified form; and whether the Patwari Bill was vetoed by the Secretary of State in 1885 as an infringement of the permanent settlement, and on what grounds?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): (1.) The intentions of the Government of India in regard to the re-introduction of a Patwari Bill have not been announced to this Office. (2.) The Patwari Bill was abandoned in 1886 in connection with the Muzaffarpur Survey, because, the measure being purely experimental, it was not considered right to lay the expense upon the people.

COOPERS IN THE DEPTFORD VICTUALLING YARD.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there are any, and, if so, how many, coopers employed in the Deptford Victualling Yard at less wages than those agreed to by the London master coopers, and that the current rate of wages paid in their trade?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): Of the 34 coopers at Deptford

2 earn 30s. a week; 6 earn 26s.; and 26 work piece-work according to a scale of prices revised in 1890. This scale was proposed by the men and adopted by the Admiralty, who, however increased the prices in some instances. Under the scale men can earn up to 36s. a week. It is believed that these earnings compare favourably with those of the private trade.

SLAVERY IN ZANZIBAR.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Decree issued at Zanzibar by the Sultan and Sir Gerald Portal, on the 11th September 1891, forbidding the hiring of porters to proceed inland from the Sultan's dominions in consequence of the stimulus this practice gives to the Slave Trade, is still in force; and whether caravan organised in the British Protectorate of Zanzibar for travel in Africa are manned in part by hired slaves; and, if so, how many such caravans have started for Uganda and elsewhere since September 1891?

*SIR E. GREY: The Decree in question referred to the Islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, and, so far as Her Majesty's Government is aware, is still in force. It is understood that caravans organised on the coast are in some cases manned partly by persons who are technically slave. But in all cases which come under the notice of British Authorities the greatest care is taken that the hiring is a direct transaction with the person hired, as his status as a slave or otherwise does not come in question. It is impossible to say how many caravans have left the coast since September, 1891.

THE COURT MARTIAL ON THE "VICTORIA."

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can now lay upon the Table of the House the Report in full of the evidence taken before the Court Martial on the Victoria and Camperdown disasters, especially that part relating to the manipulation of the bulkhead doors which was not reported in the newspaper and in consequence of the finding of the Court being silent upon the question of the efficiency of their bulkheads or the doors through them, or if such doors we or were not capable of being closed in time, will the Admiralty as soon as possible have these questions thoroughly investigated by a Committee in which independent outside authorities shall be invited to join?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The Minutes of the Court Martial on the loss of the Victoria will, as I have already stated, be laid upon the Table of the House; and they include full evidence with respect to the bulk-head doors. The time has been too short since the Minutes reached the Admiralty for the whole of them to be printed. As soon as the Board have the printed evidence before them, they will thoroughly consider all the questions arising upon it. But, until this can be done, it is impossible to determine whether it will be necessary to institute any special inquiry such as that which the hon. Baronet suggests.

SIR E. HARLAND: About how soon is it probable that the Report will be on the Table?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That depends on the printers. I cannot make any conjecture. I know, however, they are subjected to much pressure just now.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Are we not going to have this before the Estimates? It is a very important matter.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The Board of Admiralty has not yet seen it.

HILLSBOROUGH POSTMISTRESS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): In the absence of the noble Lord the Member for West Down, I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial from the inhabitants (of all denominations) of Hillsborough, County Down, praying that the daughter of the late Postmistress should be appointed to the post office; and whether, inasmuch as the daughter of the late Postmistress has performed the duties of the post office during the last three months in a completely satisfactory manner, he will grant the prayer of the Memorial?

MR. A. MORLEY: There were two candidates for the post referred to—Miss Ingram, the daughter of the late Sub-Postmistress, and Mrs. Mulvaney, who had been employed for 12 years in the Sub-Office at Ballynahinch, also under Lisburn. The late Sub-mistress was called upon to resign in consequence of serious irregularities in her accounts, and of general carelessness in the performance of her duties. Under these circumstances I appointed Mrs. Mulvaney, who was reported to be of exemplary character.

THE TELEPHONE QUESTION AT GLASGOW.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the agreement now in course of settlement with the National Telephone Company will prejudice the position of Municipalities in applications for telephone licences; and whether that agreement, if executed, would prejudice the Corporation of Glasgow in their recent application for a telephone licence, or would make that licence, if granted, less valuable; and, if so, whether he will consider the Glasgow application, and give it a full answer upon the merits before making any agreement with the National Telephone Company?

MR. A. MORLEY: The agreement now in course of negotiation with the National Telephone Company will not in any way limit or affect the right of the Postmaster General to grant licences to other persons.

SIAM.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether H.M.S. Linnet left Bangkok on 17th August; whether there is any British gunboat now in the Menam, or neighbourhood; and whether sufficient guarantees exist for the continued protection of British subjects and property?

*SIR E. GREY: The Linnet left Bangkok on the 17th, probably for reasons of health, by order of the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Naval Forces at Hong Kong; but it is intended to supply her place by another vessel. There is no other British ship of war in Siamese waters at this moment; but Her Majesty's Minister at Bangkok reports that the condition of affairs there is quiet. There are two gunboats now off Bangkok, one French and one German.

LABOURERS' COTTAGE SCHEMES IN IRELAND.

MR. KENNEDY (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Local Government Board for Ireland just issued, from which it appears that out of 25,975 cottages included in schemes which they have been petitioned to confirm, from the inception of the Labourers Acts up to 31st March, 1893, they have already rejected 11,376; whether the rejection of schemes depends on the individual discretion of the Inspector who holds the local inquiry; whether the great majority of applications are dismissed owing to informalities in the representation forms, caused by their being filled by the labourers themselves, many of whom have very slight education; whether the preliminary expenses up to the close of the local inquiry into the then rejected representations cost on an average £3 per head; and whether, in view of this loss to the Unions, he will direct Boards of Guardians to instruct their solicitors or clerks on application by the labourer to fill his representation form for him, and give him instructions as to the necessary signatures he will require to obtain for it?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The numbers given in the first paragraph are correct. The rejection or approval of schemes does not depend upon the individual discretion of the Inspector, but upon consideration of the evidence taken at the inquiry and the recommendations made by their Inspector. So far as the Board are aware, only a very small proportion of the houses have been rejected for the reason assigned in the third paragraph. A certain number have been thrown out consequent on informalities in representations, schemes, notices, &c.; but the great majority of cottages rejected have been thrown out on the merits. The Board have not sufficient data to say whether the fact is as stated in the fourth paragraph. In some Unions the preliminary expenses in legal, engineering, advertising, have been somewhat heavy; but where the Clerk of a Union has advertised the scheme, served the notices, and prepared the petitions, the cost would not be as high as £3 per cottage. The Local Government Board think it would be objectionable that Clerks of Unions or other officers should be instructed to fill up the representation forms for labourers. The Board consider that representations should emanate from the ratepayers themselves, without the intervention of the Guardians or Union officials, before whom the representations would afterwards come for consideration.

MR. KENNEDY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that after the Act was passed representations were made by agricultural labourers themselves to the effect that they did not understand how to fill in the forms, and could not afford to pay a solicitor to do it?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have looked at the forms. They seem to be simple enough, and I see no difficulty in filling them in.

DISMISSAL OF A METROPOLITAN POLICE CONSTABLE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to a case heard on the 8th and 22nd July at Westminster Police Court, in which two men were charged with disorderly conduct and assaulting the police, when evidence was given that a police constable assaulted the defendants and others without justification, and the Magistrate ultimately dismissed the charge, stating that the Commissioners of Police would make inquiry into the matter; and if he can state what has been the result of this inquiry?

MR. ASQUITH: My attention has been drawn to the case. The Commissioner has made careful inquiry. There are many circumstances of doubt, and he arrived at the conclusion that the case would be met by compulsory resignation of the constable, and in this I concur.

READING BOOKS IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain on what grounds the Board of National Education in Ireland has recently issued a revised edition of the Fifth Reading Book, in which the articles on The British Constitution, by the late Archbishop Whately, and the articles on political economy by the same author have been expunged, and which contains as new matter five articles by the Right Rev. Monsignor Molloy, two by the Most Rev. Dr. Healy, one by Cardinal Wiseman, one by Lord O'Hagan, and one by Cardinal Newman?

DR. COMMINS (Cork, S.E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the discarded chapters on Constitutional Law and political economy are to be added to the advanced higher course in Trinity College, Dublin?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): May I ask the Chief Secretary will he explain on what grounds the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have omitted from the Fifth Book of Lessons The History of the British Constitution, by the late Archbishop Whately, and also 18 articles, by the same author, on political economy, and why five out of the eight lessons on Scripture history have been omitted, and writings substituted which are objected to by Protestants, and in the Third Reading Book for children from 9 to 12 years of age, the last verse of Moore's Canadian Boat Song, teaching the Invocation of the Saints, has been inserted; and if this change is made with the sanction of the Government?

*MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the last annual meeting of the Trades Union Congress, representing the organised workers of the United Kingdom, a resolution was unanimously passed protesting against the retention of these articles on political economy by Archbishop Whately; and has he not received a resolution passed by the Belfast Trades Council, which is largely composed of supporters of the hon. Member for South Antrim, also protesting against the retention of these articles as being prejudicial to the interests of Irish working men?

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers these questions, will he say if he is aware that the curriculum of intermediate education include the works of a certain Pagan, an alleged poet named Homer; is he aware that in this person's writing the doctrine is taught and encouraged of the invocation of heathen deities including Jove, Venus, and Mars, and other objectionable personages, and in the interests of pure evangelical teaching will he have these works removed from the intermediate programme with a view to substituting for them—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question savours somewhat of ridicule, I think.

MR. J. MORLEY: With reference to this question, and the one which follows on the same subject in the name of the hon. Member for South Belfast, I am informed that, in consequence of representations urged on the Board of National Education from time to time, a revision of the Fifth Book was undertaken and brought to a completion in 1892; that at a meeting of the Board, held on January 31 last, a Committee of the Commissioners, consisting of four Protestants of various denominations and two Roman Catholics, was appointed to consider the draft of the book as revised; that this mixed Committee unanimously approved of the revised publication; and the Board at its meeting, on April 25, also unanimously adopted the Report of the Revision Committee. Now, as regards the matter expunged, &c., the articles on The British Constitution, I understand, were considered too difficult for readers of the Fifth Book, and more appropriate for pupils further advanced. As to the lessons on political economy, I find that on June 4, 1891, and again on May 5, 1892, dissatisfaction was expressed at these lessons, in questions addressed to my predecessors in office. Several passages in the lessons were considered prejudicial to the interest of working men who are Trade Unionists, and one passage made the singular observation that the effect of fixing a judicial rent would be to leave the farm idle on the landlord's hands. These doctrines are now clearly antiquated. As to the addition of the last verse of The Canadian Boat Song, all I can say is that the hon. Gentleman has waited a long time to make this discovery, the addition having been made and published as far back as 1884. Moreover, the song in its entirety is very commonly used in the public elementary schools of Great Britain. I may add that the Fifth Book was regarded as too extensive for the pupils' course, and, on the recommendation of the Revision Committee, the Board decided to reduce it. The Scripture lessons shared in the reduction, I believe, though 18 pages still remain, and any new matter substituted for old matter has been selected for its excellence and for the distinguished character of the authors. I have examined these passages; they mainly concern physical and geographical matters, and seem to me not to contain a syllable of controversy or offence to the most sensitive mind. The Executive Government was not consulted before the publication of the revised book, nor is it considered necessary, under the circumstances of the case, that it should have been consulted. A discretionary power is necessarily vested in the Commissioners with regard to these publications, within the limits of which they may make such changes as to them appear desirable without previously communicating with the Government.

MR. MACARTNEY: I shall call attention to this matter on the Estimates.

PROHIBITED MEETINGS IN IRELAND.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he would state to the House what is the number of persons who have been committed in Ireland under the Act Edw. 3, c. 1, since the 22nd August, 1892; what is the total number of outdoor meetings which have been prohibited in Ireland by the Government since 22nd August, 1892; and on what grounds have such meetings been interfered with?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not in a position to give to-day the information required by the first paragraph of the question; inquiry is still in progress. As regards the second and third paragraphs, it appears that 16 such meetings have been interfered with since August 22, 1892, on the ground of anticipated intimidation in connection with evicted farms.

OUTRAGE ON A HORSE IN COUNTY TIPPERARY.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, within the last few days, near Fethard, County Tipperary, a horse belonging to Mr. Crooks, of St. Helens, Lancashire, was maliciously killed by having its throat cut; and whether the police have been able to discover what was the motive for the outrage?

MR. J. MORLEY: The outrage referred to was committed on the 4th instant. The police have their suspicions as to the cause and author of the outrage; but it is not considered expedient to make any statement on the subject which would tend to frustrate them in their endeavour to make the offender amenable.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any contracts from his Department are placed with the Clydebridge or Mossend Steel and Iron Companies; whether such firms are non-Union, and pay considerably less than the Union rates of wages; and what action he proposes to take in the matter to enforce the Resolution of the House relating to the conditions of labour?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. WOODALL, Hanley): The War Department has had no contracts with the Clydebridge Company. The last contract with the Summerlee and Mossend Company of Glasgow was in August, 1892, and has now been completed. Nothing is known as to whether such firms are non-Union and pay considerably less than the Union rate of wages. The usual action has been taken in these contracts to carry out the Resolution of the House of Commons, the clause as to the wages paid being those generally accepted as current having been inserted.

THE SLEAHEAD ROAD CONTRACT.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that William Long, of Ballyferriter, County Kerry, is contractor for the completion of the work known as the Sleahead Road under the Congested Districts Board; that all the land necessary for this road has been purchased and paid for, and conveyances duly executed by both owners and occupiers and deposited with the Congested Districts Board; whether he is aware that the contractor, having been duly authorised by the Congested Districts Board and by the engineer of the works to proceed with the construction of the road, has been obstructed by the occupiers for whose benefit the road is being constructed, and obliged to seek police protection for himself and his men to enable him to carry out the works according to the terms of his contract, and that on the 18th instant he had to dismiss 40 men whom he had engaged for the carrying out of the work owing to the violence and obstruction offered; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. J. MORLEY: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph. I understand that some six tenants, through whose lands it is proposed the road shall pass, objected to the work being proceeded with, on the ground that they had not received the full amount of compensation allowed by the Congested Districts Board. Five of these tenants have since waived their objection. On one day only, the 19th instant, were the men not employed, and at no time was actual violence offered to the engineer or contractor in the construction of the road. Two policemen were present on the 17th, the only occasion on which they attended, and matters proceeded most peaceably. The work is now in progress, and I have no doubt the scruples of the remaining solitary objector will soon be overcome.

IRISH COPYING CLERKS AND HOME RULE.

MR. H. PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the copying clerks of the Law Courts in Ireland, who are paid by progressive salaries and fees, are entitled to pensions under the provisions of the Government of Ireland Bill; and, if so, which clause or sub-section applies to their case?

MR. J. MORLEY: Scrivenery clerks in the Irish Law Courts are paid by an annual retaining fee, calculated according to the number of folios written. The employment does not qualify for pension or gratuity on retirement; but under Clause 25 (7) and the Fourth Schedule (5) of the Government of Ireland Bill a scrivenery clerk, if removed for any cause other than incapacity or misconduct, may apply to the Treasury, who may award him compensation, having regard to the amount of his retaining fee received out of the moneys provided by Parliament.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Will pensions also be provided under the Bill for the charwomen employed at the Castle?

GOVERNMENT PAINTING CONTRACTS IN IRELAND.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Government painting contracts have been given by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to a contractor who disregards the Resolution of February, 1891; and whether he will take steps to have the wishes of this House carried into practice in those and all other Governmental contracts?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is presumed this question has reference to the contract for the painting of two of the Training Colleges in Dublin. I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that the contractor for this work has assured them that he pays the workmen employed at the contract at the same standard rates of wages as are commonly paid by other firms in Dublin for the same kind of work.

THE NEW SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can now furnish the particulars omitted from the Navy Estimates, pages 210 to 220, in regard to the new vessels building or proposed to be built, especially as to their estimated cost, speed at natural draught, coal capacity, and armament; also the estimated cost of reconstruction or repairs, speed, and principal armaments of the Sultan, Warrior, Northumberland, and Agincourt, which are included in the Navy Estimates; when will the statement as to the number of men employed at each rate of pay and number promoted be delivered; and when will he be able to state the decision of the Admiralty in regard to the abolition or otherwise of the graduated or classified system of day pay?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The statement as to the number of men employed at each rate of pay and the number that have been promoted is in the hands of the printer, and will, I hope, be ready to-morrow or Saturday. On the Motion of my hon. Friend the Civil Lord, a statement, showing the present and revised scales of pay for labourers and certain classes of workmen in the Naval Establishments at home, was ordered by the House to be printed yesterday. I hope that this also will be in the hands of Members before Monday next, when my hon. Friend will be prepared to give any more detailed information that may be desired.

MR. FORWOOD: Will Vote 8 be the first one on Monday?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Yes; the Shipbuilding Vote will be put down first.

MR. HANBURY: And in what order will the others be taken?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: In the regular order.

CRANE ACCIDENTS.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can give the number of accidents that have been caused since 1st January, 1892, by the breakage of chains in mines, quarries, and factories, and on railways, canals, and all other places where cranes are used?

MR. ASQUITH: The Inspectors of Mines state that no fatal accidents from the above cause have been reported to them during 1892 either as regards mines or quarries. The Chief Inspector of Factories has no available figures on the subject; but he declares that such accidents from the breaking of crane-chains in factories, as the Factory Acts require to be reported, are very rare. The Board of Trade state that they are unable as regards railways to give details of accidents from the breakage of crane-chains as distinguished from other accidents. As regards wharves and quays, there is no statutory obligation under which accidents occurring there must be reported to a Government Department. The Government have introduced a Bill—the Notice of Accidents Bill—which would impose such obligation, but it has not yet been read a second time.

HEREFORD POSTAL QUESTION.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he lately received a Memorial, signed by 300 residents in Hereford, asking that the sub-post office, situated in premises known as the Bartonsham Stores, occupied by Messrs. Reynolds and Phillips, should not be removed elsewhere; whether he is aware that the Memorialists comprised 90 per cent. of the residents in the district of Bartonsham; and whether, notwithstanding the wishes of so large a proportion of the residents, he has refused to accede to the prayer of the Memorialists, and has removed, or is about to remove, the said sub-post office to a less convenient situation in Green Street?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have received and carefully considered the Memorial referred to by the hon. Member. The person who has been nominated by the Treasury as sub-Postmaster at Green Street, Hereford, resides in the same street as the late sub-Postmaster, and not more than 80 yards away, and he will afford satisfactory accommodation for the public. Under these circumstances, I should not be justified in disturbing his appointment.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Was the removal of the post office decided upon by reason of any allegation of inconvenience?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Postmaster nominated proposed to carry on the postal business in his own shop, and the Department came to the conclusion it was a suitable place.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Before any nomination was made, did the right hon. Gentleman receive a Memorial asking that any change should be made?

MR. A. MORLEY: I think the nomination was made by the Treasury before any representations reached me. I cannot disturb the present practice.

BOMBARDING CRANMERE POOL.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a letter in The Daily News of 23rd instant, signed J. A. J. Brindley, in which the writer states that a few days ago Cranmere Pool, a portion of Dartmoor much frequented by tourists and others, was for the space of half an hour bombarded with shells by 18 guns, without any notice being given or precautions taken for the safety of the public; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the truth of these allegations?

Perhaps I may be permitted to add that in The Daily News to-day is another signed letter, the writer of which says that proper precautions were taken by the military on the Okehampton side. The writer of the original letter, it appeared, approached the Pool from the other side.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : A full Report has been called for from the Local Authorities. All at present known is that the position by Cranmere Pool was, on the 18th instant, the object of fire; that notice of this was given in the local papers, and that steps were taken to warn off the public.

THE MILITARY AND THE LABOUR DISPUTE IN SOUTH WALES.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the statement that the officers in charge of the troops in South Wales have met in consultation with the Emergency Committee of the mine-owners as to the most effective method of disposing of their forces; whether the officers in command of the soldiers in South Wales are authorised to consult with the Emergency Committee of the mine-owners, and not with the Magistrates; whether the Secretary of the Mine-owners' Emergency Committee is allowed to accompany the General in command while disposing of his forces; whether he is aware that the General in command of the troops received an address of thanks from the mine-owners of South Wales, and stated, in reply thereto, that he would send more soldiers into the district, if necessary; and whether it was in order for the General to receive such resolution of thanks, and make such promise in reply?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The officers in command of troops are only authorised to confer with the Magistrates and local Civil Authorities, and I have no reason to believe that there has been any departure from the usual practice; but it is natural that an officer should obtain all information, from whatever source, which would help him in discharging his duty. Before the General arrived the disposition of the troops had been already arranged. In visiting the troops he was accompanied by the Chief Constable and by Major

Williams, of the Monmouth Volunteer Artillery, a local Magistrate. Whether Major Williams is connected with the Mine-owners' Committee I am not aware. With regard to paragraph 4, I may quote the words of the General, who says—

“ I may have stated in the course of a private conversation with one or two gentlemen who came to see me at my hotel to explain the situation, and who I understood were local Magistrates, that I was ready to comply with legal requisitions for more troops, if, after my inspection, I found they were required to maintain order.”

We have no Report as to any address or resolution of thanks.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any disturbance occurred in South Wales which the local police were unable to cope with; and whether the services of the troops have been required since their introduction into South Wales; and, if not, whether he will order their immediate withdrawal, or cause an independent inquiry to be made as to the justification for their continued presence there?

MR. A. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg, at the same time, to ask whether all cause for alarm has now completely disappeared; and whether the Home Secretary will withdraw the troops which have been despatched to the colliery districts of South Wales?

MR. ASQUITH : The duty of the Local Authorities is not merely to suppress but to prevent disturbance, and the despatch of troops was not sanctioned until the authorities had endeavoured and failed to supplement the local police by drafts from other police forces. There has been, I am glad to say, no collision between the soldiers and any part of the population. I am satisfied that the troops have been handled with great discretion, and that they have rendered valuable service in the protection of person and property. No one is more anxious than I am to see the troops withdrawn, and I have no reason to doubt that the Local Authorities share my wish. I am in constant communication with the Chief Constables of Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire, and I am glad to say that the intelligence received during the last two days has been more reassuring, but, though both districts are quieting down, I cannot yet say that all cause for apprehension has been removed. There will be no avoidable delay in withdrawing the military force as soon as the necessity which led to its introduction has ceased.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Will the right hon. Gentleman put himself in communication with the representatives of the men, among whom is my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. W. Abraham), so as to be able to ascertain whether, in their opinion, there was any continued necessity for the troops remaining in the district?

MR. ASQUITH: It is obvious I could not do that. If I were to put myself in communication with the men I should have to put myself in communication with both parties, and also with the employers. The only safe course to adopt is the course which has been adopted in this case as in all others—namely, for the Central Authorities to put themselves in communication with the Local Authorities, including the Chief Constable.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: I am afraid I have not made myself clearly understood. In instructing the Chief Constable, who I understand is responsible for the military being in the county, and who is evidently in communication with the Coalowners' Association, will the right hon. Gentleman ask him to take care also to obtain the opinion of the representatives of the men?

MR. ASQUITH: I have no reason to doubt, from the communications which have reached me, that the Chief Constables of both these counties have obtained their information from all available sources, and that they do not go to one side more than the other.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the meeting on Wednesday of the Sliding Scale Committee, of which my hon. Friend (Mr. Abrahams) is a member, a resolution was passed in which they said they informed the employers on Saturday that they regretted that the employers had thought it necessary to resort to extreme measures. Does not my hon. Friend represent the men who are not on strike?

MR. ASQUITH: I am not aware of that resolution; I have no doubt the hon. Gentleman does represent these men; but, as I have already stated, the troops were sent not upon the requisition of the employers; and so far as I am concerned, I have no more to do with the wishes of the employers than with the wishes of the men.

MR. BURNIE (Swansea): May I ask whether 100 cavalry have been sent to Swansea, notwithstanding the objection of the Mayor?

MR. ASQUITH: I saw a statement that a certain number of cavalry were being sent to Swansea, but I understand it was on the requisition of the local Magistrates.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: But is the right hon. Gentleman aware that The Pall Mall Gazette states that the Mayor of Swansea has expressed a strong feeling of indignation that the military were sent to Swansea, and that they were sent without his knowledge, and that he considered he could maintain public peace and order without their assistance?

MR. ASQUITH: I have not seen the statement referred to; but I must point out that the Mayor, whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight, is only one of the borough Magistrates, and, as I understand, the requisition proceeded from the Borough Bench as a whole.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: Is it not the fact that, under the Riot Act, the Mayor of the borough is specifically mentioned as the person responsible for calling out the military?

MR. ASQUITH: That may be so.

SOUTH DUBLIN UNION.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the fact that the Fair Wages Resolution is not carried into practical effect by the Guardians of the South Dublin Union; and whether there is any objection to allow those who desire it out of the 1,767 men and women inmates over 60 years of age a small weekly allowance of tobacco or snuff?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Resolution of the House on the subject of fair wages is clearly not applicable to Boards of Guardians. I am glad to say, however, that several Boards of Guardians in England are acting upon it. In reply to the second portion of the question, the Guardians have already power to make an allowance of tobacco to workhouse inmates on the medical officer's advice. This plan has been found to work very satisfactorily, and the Local Government Board see no reason for making a departure from it in the case of the South Dublin Union.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: As a Circular was issued to English Boards of Guardians freeing their hands in the direction of allowing tobacco and snuff to aged paupers, will the right hon. Gentleman issue a similar one in Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will consider that.

THE IRISH ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Fair Wages Resolution is not carried into effect in the Irish branch of the Ordnance Survey at Mountjoy Barracks, Dublin; whether there is an undue proportion employed of boy labour to skilled hands, and what are their terms of employment; and when is it expected that the 25-inch scale of the Irish Survey will be completed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): The Resolution to which my hon. Friend refers does not apply to the members of the Ordnance Survey staff in Dublin, inasmuch as they are in the service of the Government itself, and enjoy many privileges which must be taken into account in comparing their position with that of persons doing similar work in private employ. I have no reason, however, to believe that such a comparison, even if wages alone are taken into account, would be other than favourable to those engaged on the Survey, and I may refer my hon. Friend to the conclusions arrived at by the Departmental Committee of 1891—a copy of whose Report was laid on the Table. The proportion of boy labour to skilled hands is not greater than is consistent with the nature of the work to be done. Speaking generally, the boys are paid at the rate of 6s. a week at about 14 years of age and rise to about 15s. a week about the age of 18. The completion of the 25-inch survey of Ireland depends almost entirely upon the amount of money made available for the purpose by Parliament. The question is being fully considered by me, and I hope to submit certain proposals to the Treasury in connection with the Estimates for 1894-5 which will secure the acceleration of the work.

MR. FIELD: Then are we to understand that the Government employs labour in the country which is not subject to the Fair Wages Resolution?

MR. H. GARDNER: No, Sir; and I have pointed out that the wages these men receive compare very favourably with the wages paid outside.

THE COOTEHILL DISTURBANCES.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland have any, and, if so, how many, persons been prosecuted in respect of the riotous proceedings at Lisnagoon, Cootehill, County Cavan, and with what result; and how, and from what fund, will the expense of the extra police employed in protecting labourers be defrayed?

MR. J. MORLEY: Nine persons were proceeded against for assaults on the police arising out of the recent disturbances at Lisnagoon. Of these, five were fined 10s. each, or seven days' imprisonment in default of payment of the fine; one was fined in a similar amount on two different charges; one case was adjourned; and two cases were dismissed. The police employed in the locality in protecting the labourers were engaged in this duty from the 3rd to the 17th instant, and on the latter date returned to their stations in the county. No extra charge will fall on the county in respect of the temporary employment of this protection force.

MR. DANE: Then how will the expense of the extra police be paid?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not sure that there will be any extra expense.

THE OUTRAGE ON MR. WELDON MOLONY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Weldon C. Molony, who was fired at and dangerously wounded on 1st June last near Eunis, has been refused payment of his salary as Registrar of the County Court, Tipperary, although his absence from duty arose from no fault of his own; and whether this action has been taken with the authority of the Government; and if there is any precedent for it?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed by the Treasury Remembrancer in Ireland, who is Accounting officer of the County Courts Vote, that no claim has been made by Mr. Molony for his services as Registrar of the County Court Judge of Tipperary since June 1 last.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: If I get an opportunity I shall call attention to this matter on the Estimates. My information does not agree with that of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the hon. Member is referring to an application which has nothing to do with the question.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): Is it intended to pay this gentleman's expenses in the same way as was done in another case by the last Liberal Government?

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe in the case referred to by the hon. Member a medical fee of 100 guineas was paid. If any claim is made in this case it will be carefully considered.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): I hope such a scandal of paying an enormous fee will not be perpetrated again.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Has the salary due to Mr. Molony as Registrar of the County Court been paid?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot say; but I will inquire. It does not arise out of the question on the Paper.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the industrial rule of the National Board of Education is compulsory or optional; and if managers desiring their schools to be exempt from the rule are liable to have it forced upon them by the Board?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Commissioners of National Education report that the rule determining instruction in the new industrial programme is not absolute. No manager who is able, giving due notice, to assign a satisfactory reason for having his school exempted, is refused. The number of schools in which the Commissioners for various reasons assigned by managers have dispensed with the alternative scheme for sixth-class girls is very considerable.

Mr. T. W. Russell

BAGOT STREET REPAIRING WORKS, BIRMINGHAM.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is making arrangements for the sale of the repairing works, Bagot Street, Birmingham?

MR. WOODALL: The right hon. Member is aware that the continued use of Bagot Street as a repairing factory has only been sanctioned for the current year; but the changes that may be necessary, in the event of its being closed, are still under consideration, and there is no present intention of offering the property for sale.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what arrangements can be made, when the Bagot Street Factory is closed, for carrying on the work of repairing now done there?

MR. WOODALL: The right hon. Gentleman wants me to anticipate a decision which I have told him has not yet been arrived at. Repairing work will undoubtedly be continued in Birmingham, even if the Bagot Street Factory is closed.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: This is a matter of great interest and importance to my constituents; and I want to ask whether he will take it from me that it has been decided to close Bagot Street works at an early date?

MR. WOODALL: No absolute decision has been arrived at; but I may remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he knows perfectly well—that Sparkbrook Factory was acquired many years ago with the intention of superseding the Bagot Street Factory, but that up to the present the Treasury have allowed the latter to go on working. It is only fair to say that the amount of work now required to be done does not justify the continuance of two factories.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I gather from the answer that the Sparkbrook Factory is to be turned into a repairing shop in place of the Bagot Street Factory, and that it will be discontinued as a manufacturing establishment. In that case, will the hon. Gentleman say what is to become of the manufacturing machinery at Sparkbrook?

MR. WOODALL: My right hon. Friend is premature in supposing that any such decision has been arrived at. I shall be glad to confer with him, if he will give me an opportunity, as to what is most expedient. There is no intention to dismantle Sparkbrook, although it may be desirable to continue there the repairs now done at Bagot Street.

THE IRISH PRESBYTERIAN ADDRESS ON HOME RULE.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he has seen a letter signed "John Wilson, Carrickfergus" in The Times of Wednesday, 23rd instant, in which it is asserted that the so-called Presbyterian Petition or Address to the Prime Minister was not exclusively signed by Presbyterians; is he aware that when the Petition was brought into a family whose head was a Home Ruler, all the family who could write, no matter how young, signed it also; and whether he will refer it to the Committee on Petitions of the House of Commons to examine and report on the signatures?

MR. ROSS: Is there any objection to publishing the names of the alleged signatories who have not expressly requested that their names shall be concealed?

MR. MCCARTAN (Down, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a large number of Ulster Presbyterians in avowed sympathy with the Irish policy of the Government had no opportunity of signing this declaration? Has his attention been called to a letter from a Presbyterian Liberal published in The Belfast Northern Whig, in which the writer states that he is a Presbyterian; that he would have been pleased to sign the Address had he known it was in contemplation, and would have undertaken to procure within one hour the signatures of at least a dozen Presbyterian heads of families in his town?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): In reply to the first paragraph of the question, I am not aware whether any and what religious test was employed to ascertain whether these gentlemen were Presbyterians or not, but I doubt whether there was much inducement used to those who were not Presbyterians to sign and assume the character for the purpose, considering the sentiments supposed to prevail in that portion of the country. With regard to the second paragraph, I do not read the letter as the hon. Member has read it; and as to the third paragraph, I apprehend the Committee on Petitions has no power whatever to investigate these matters. If I were to refer the Paper to them I should feel myself to be guilty of a positive impertinence. I am not prepared to undertake the investigation of the separate wishes and opinions of the 3,500 persons who signed the Petition. It is impossible for me to enter into the investigation of minute particulars, but I have the utmost confidence not only in the good faith but in the prudence and discretion of those who signed the letter to me, and made themselves responsible for it, so far as I am capable of forming a decision on the subject. Further than that I cannot go, and I must leave the matter to be fought out between the respective Parties outside the walls of this House.

THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Land Transfer Bill is likely to be proceeded with?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The House is aware that this Bill stands for Second Reading to-night, and, considering the remarkable concurrence of opinion among many important authorities both in this House and in the other House, I hope it will be allowed to pass through the stage of Second Reading. The hon. Member is well aware that the mortgages on the time of the House at the present moment are so heavy that we could not, without causing general inconvenience and dissatisfaction, displace the appointed business during the hours at the disposal of the Government. If the Bill is allowed to pass its Second Reading, as I sincerely hope it will, it would be well worth considering whether we might not secure a discussion of its principles without delay by referring it to the Grand Committee on Law.

WELSH TITHE DISTRAINTS.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that at the meeting of the Cardiganshire Joint Standing Committee, held on August 10, at Aberayron, his letter to the Chief Constable, pointing out that the County Court bailiff was insufficiently protected on May 5, was not mentioned by the Chief Constable in his Report, and only produced on the demand of the Chairman of Quarter Sessions; that the Chairman of Quarter Sessions proposed two motions to the effect that the Chief Constable be ordered in all cases where the police were engaged in protecting the Sheriff's officers when carrying out the orders of any Court to employ such number of constables as may be necessary to ensure the proper protection of the Sheriff's officers, and the due execution of such orders; and that any existing orders or instructions of the Committee to the Chief Constable in any way repugnant to this order be rescinded, but they were lost by the votes of the representatives of the County Council, every Justice voting for them; whether he is aware that two of these County Councillors are also members of the Anti-tithe Committee; and whether he now intends to take any steps to get the intention of his letter carried out, and the law enforced, and, if so, if he will state what steps?

MR. ASQUITH: I am informed that my letter, to which the hon. Member refers, was not mentioned by the Chief Constable in his Report, but was produced and read on the Chairman of Quarter Sessions asking if it had been received. It is also a fact that the Chairman of Quarter Sessions gave notice of the two motions referred to by the hon. Member, but on the first being defeated the second was not moved. The representatives of the Quarter Sessions, of whom five were present, all voted in favour of the motion, and the County Council representatives, 12 in number, who appear to have stated that they thought the motion unnecessary, voted against it. I have been informed (but I have no means of verifying the information) that one, and probably two, of these County Councillors are members of the Anti-Tithe Committee. The Chief Constable wrote to me, in reply to my letter, undertaking to give adequate police protection to the bailiff, and to prevent a repetition of such an assault as was committed on the 5th of May. No facts have been brought to my knowledge which would lead me to suppose that the Chief Constable has failed, or will fail, to carry out the undertaking so given. I must express my hope that in so doing he will receive the co-operation and support of the Standing Joint Committee, who are responsible for the administration of the local police.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in 1891 the Standing Committee passed a resolution instructing the Chief Constable that not more than three policemen were to be employed at tithe sales or distraints. If so, how is it possible, now the Committee have refused to repeal that instruction, to afford adequate protection?

MR. ASQUITH: This is the first I have heard of that instruction.

THE CORDITE DISPUTE.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War who were the members of the Explosives Committee other than Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar; in how many and which foreign countries have Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar, or either of them taken out foreign patents for cordite, and on what dates in each case; what was the date of the assignment to other persons of each of such patents; to what official of the War Office did they or either of them communicate the fact of having taken out such patents, and on what date or dates, and by what method; and when did this information formally reach the Secretary of State, and by what method?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In answer to the first paragraph, Dr. Dupré, F.R.S., was the third member of the Committee, and Captain Thompson, R.A., was Secretary. As to the subject of paragraphs 2 and 3, we have, as I have already stated, no information. With regard to numbers 4 and 5, there is no record of any formal communication of the fact that foreign patents were taken out, but the assignment of these patents was, as I informed the hon. Member, intimated to the Director of Artillery on March 25, 1891, by letter.

MR. HANBURY: When was the intimation conveyed to the Secretary of State for War?

Mr. Griffith-Boscawen

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : If the hon. Member means the Secretary of State for War personally, I cannot tell him. He probably heard of it in conversation with the Director General of Artillery. If the hon. Member merely means official conveyance, then the imparting of the information to the Director General of Artillery would be equivalent to giving it to the Secretary of State for War.

MR. HANBURY : Does the right hon. Gentleman say that information in regard to the foreign patents was not given to the War Office until two years after they had been taken out? And was the late Financial Secretary to the War Office correct when he said that the Director General of Artillery did not convey it to the Secretary of State for War till a further year had elapsed?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is no official record. I can only judge by the Papers, and I cannot tell when the Secretary of State was personally informed of the assignment, as it is not alluded to in any official document at the War Office.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, to what Military Authorities, if any, did Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar, or the Explosives Committee, submit the result of their trials of various explosives, and what Military Authority decided that cordite was distinctly superior to the other explosives, and thereupon recommended it to the Secretary of State for adoption; did such or any Military Authorities investigate the other explosives independently of Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar before giving their decision; on what date was it finally decided to adopt cordite into the Service; and on what date did Messrs. Abel, Dewar, and Anderson apply for a patent for machinery for its manufacture?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The results of the trials were reported by the Committee to the Director of Artillery, who submitted his recommendation on the subject through the Adjutant General to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and the Secretary of State approved cordite for manufacture and for further experiments on November 14, 1890. The Reports submitted by the Committee embraced all the explosives under competition, and the Military Authorities considered that no further investigation was necessary, except as to cordite. Subsequently to this approval of cordite, it underwent further tests in various climates and under varying conditions. The results of these being satisfactory, it was finally and formally adopted as a Service store in May, 1893. The date stated by the hon. Member on the 15th instant as that on which the patent for machinery was taken out—namely, July 22, 1889—is correct.

FAILURE OF THE CHELSEA WATER SUPPLY.

MR. FISHER (Fulham) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the failure (owing to an accident) of the Chelsea Water Company to supply water during 48 hours to the inhabitants of Fulham and to the inadequacy of the notice of such accident given by the company; and whether, looking to the extreme risk, through the bursting of boilers and otherwise, which is incurred by the inhabitants under such circumstances, he will direct an inquiry to be held into the cause of the accident and the nature of the notice given to those affected by it, with the view of pressing upon the Water Companies the best means of avoiding such accidents in future, or, in case of their occurrence, the speediest and most effective methods of warning the inhabitants whose supply is temporarily cut off?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : A communication was addressed by the Local Government Board to the Chelsea Water Company with reference to the temporary failure, owing to an accident, of the water supply to Fulham. The secretary of the company furnished an explanation similar to that in the letter which he addressed to The Times. The serious difficulty occasioned by the failure of the supply is much to be regretted. I do not think that any practical advantage would result from such an inquiry as is suggested.

THE AMERICAN MAIL SERVICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that on the arrival of the Majestic at Queenstown on Tuesday evening last, carrying American mails, the mails had to be taken on to Liverpool, the ordinary train having left, and there being no special service; whether, if there had been a special service, letters could have been replied to by the mail leaving Queenstown on Thursday; and whether this was possible after the delivery of the mails through Liverpool?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Majestic did not bring full mails for the United Kingdom, but only mails for Ireland and such correspondence for London and other parts as had been addressed specially to be sent by the Queenstown route. This, therefore, was not a case in which the through special service to London would have been used. In addition to certain closed mails for through conveyance to the Continent, the Majestic only brought for delivery or treatment in London 10 small bags containing about 2,500 letters.

MR. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Majestic brought mails for Lancashire and North of England and Scotland other than those mails specially addressed?

MR. A. MORLEY: She brought 151 bags of mails altogether—91 for Ireland, which were landed at Queenstown, 60 bags which were carried on to Liverpool, and 36 bags which were dropped there for delivery or direct despatch. There were 24 bags, including some closed mails for the Continent, and a number of specially addressed letters which were brought on to London for delivery.

MR. M. HEALY: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has answered my question, which was whether the Majestic brought mails for the North of England other than mails specially addressed; and, if so, does that indicate any change in the practice of the United States Post Office?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Majestic only brought mails for Ireland not specially addressed. The mails for England were all specially addressed.

MR. MACARTNEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman state at what time the Paris, which left New York about an hour-and-a-half before the Majestic, arrived at Southampton, and how much time elapsed between the landing of the mails and their delivery?

MR. A. MORLEY: I cannot answer that question off-hand; but if the hon.

Gentleman desires to know I will endeavour to get the information.

MR. FIELD: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if the special service will be continued in future under the circumstances which gave rise to it?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have already stated that I hope in a very short time to make a statement on the subject.

THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

MR. KENYON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to a statement by the Judge of Patna, in a letter to The Times on the Behar Cadastral Survey, that in Behar the fields, each with its 12-inch separation from the next, are often not larger than a gentleman's drawing-room, and the farmer who holds 10 acres has to find his total from, it may be, 20 or 30 patches lying all over the country; whether the Report of the Sone Irrigation Survey shows that the actual cost of the Cadastral Survey of such holdings, with its record of rights, sometimes exceeds the fee-simple value of the land; and whether the Secretary of State will permit the Government of Bengal in such cases to make a compulsory survey at the costs of the landlords and tenants?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: Yes; the attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to the letter written by Mr. Tweedie which appeared in The Times of the 19th August. My answer to the second and third questions is that the Secretary of State has not in his possession any evidence showing that in the Sone Canal District the cost of the Cadastral Survey will exceed the fee-simple value of the land.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): May I ask the Under Secretary of State for India what would be the total cost of the Behar Cadastral Survey in its eight stages, as indicated in the notice issued by the Director of the Survey in February last, including the settlement of "fair rents" in the fifth stage of the Survey; whether this cost is to be defrayed by fresh taxation on the land of Bengal; what will be the annual cost of the maintenance of the record of right; from what source will this cost be defrayed; and will any legislation on the subject be submitted to the Legislative Council of the Viceroy or the Legislative Council of Bengal, with permission to the official members to vote as they liked; whether the proposals of the Government of Bengal involve the abrogation or modification of the permanent settlement of Bengal; and will all the Papers be submitted to Parliament before the sanction of the Secretary of State was given?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The cost of the Behar Survey has been estimated at eight annas per acre. As at present arranged, a portion of the expense will fall upon the landholder and the ryot, and a part will be defrayed by the State. The cost of maintaining the record of right would be about three-quarters of an anna per rupee of rent, an amount which would be defrayed by a cess. The Survey of Behar is an outcome of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885, and any questions respecting the permanent settlement must be considered to have been determined by the passing of this latter Act. The Secretary of State has already given his sanction to the survey; but he has inquired whether further Papers can be presented.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): May I ask the Prime Minister whether after the proceedings to-morrow night on the Government of Ireland Bill are closed he will move the Adjournment of the House? It would be of convenience to many hon. Members who desire to go into the country to know.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; I think it would be quite proper that I should do so.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed [23rd August] on Consideration of the Bill as amended.

And which Amendment was, in page 3, line 38, after the last Amendment, to insert the words—

"(3) The Lord Lieutenant shall not do or omit to do any act upon the advice of the Executive Committee, or otherwise than as representing Her Majesty—

(a) In respect of any of the matters upon which the Irish Legislature are disabled from legislating under Section 3 of this Act; nor

(b) Whereby any person or corporation would be injuriously affected in respect of any of the matters in regard to which they are protected as against legislation by the Irish Legislature under Section 4 of this Act;

and it shall be unlawful for any Executive officer in Ireland, except by the direction of the Lord Lieutenant representing Her Majesty, to do or omit to do any such act."—(Viscount Cranborne.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said, that last night he founded the hope that the Government would see their way to accept, at least in part, the Amendment of his noble Friend on the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry. To-day he returned to the charge fortified by a declaration of the Chancellor of the Duchy—a declaration of such importance that it confirmed his hope even to the point of anticipating that the Government would not only accept part, but would accept the whole, of the Amendment before the House. But before he read the words of the Chancellor of the Duchy he should like to dwell upon the conditions and the circumstances under which they were delivered, for those were hardly less significant than the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman. He did not know whether the House recollected that they approached for the first time the 5th clause at half-past 12 o'clock on a Wednesday in June, and that at half-past 5 on that day notice was given of the first Closure Resolution. The first hour of that day—the 28th of June—was occupied in discussing an Amendment which the Government accepted, after challenging a Division, an action which the Opposition not uncharitably attributed to the fact that the Government were at that moment in a minority in the House. They then went on to consider an Amendment kindred to the one now before the House, but covering a wider field, which had been moved by the hon. Member for Preston. The hon. Member wished that the Lord Lieutenant should act as the Representative of Her Majesty not only within the limited sphere contemplated by the Amendment of his noble Friend, but in all matters and at all times. That Amendment was debated practically the rest of the day, and was only rejected by a majority of 29. The smaller contention of his noble Friend did not, therefore, come before the Committee. His noble Friend was treading on virgin ground, and laying before the Government a proposal to which the Opposition, on the whole, attached the very greatest importance. It was upon the large Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston laying down that the Lord Lieutenant should at all times act as the Representative of Her Majesty that the Chancellor of the Duchy made a memorable speech—memorable for its length, which might, perhaps, be justly attributed to the same cause which led the Government to accept the previous Amendment rather than accept defeat in the Division Lobbies; memorable for its interesting view of the Constitutions of Germany, the United States, and our Colonies; but in connection with the Amendment before the House, the speech was, perhaps, most memorable because of its conclusion. This was it—

“We consider—and this is my concluding answer to one of the complaints of my right hon. Friend—that the Executive will be subjected within the sphere of its action to exactly the same restrictions as are by Clauses 3 and 4 imposed as respects legislation on the Irish Legislature.”

That was precisely the object aimed at by his noble Friend; and all he had to do, he thought, in order to gain its acceptance at the hands of the Government, was to show that the Amendment attained that object, and no more than that object. Perhaps before he argued in favour of that contention he might be allowed to suggest a very slight verbal alteration in the Amendment, to which his noble Friend did not object. It was to leave out the words “upon the advice of the Executive Committee, or.” The Amendment would then run—

By leaving out the words he suggested all misconception would be avoided. Either these words had a definite Constitutional meaning, as argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James)—that was to say, that if the Lord Lieutenant took the advice he must act upon it, or else call upon the Ministry to resign; and if the words bore that definite Constitutional meaning they were not needed there, because the phrase “as representing Her Majesty” covered the whole ground, by excluding the responsibility of the Irish Parliament, and substituting, in these particulars, the responsibility of the Imperial House of Commons. If, on the other hand, the opposite contention were true, that the phrase was a mere colloquial expression, and could be held to mean that the Lord Lieutenant would take counsel with his advisers in Ireland, then most certainly they would be mischievous. He chiefly wished to see the words eliminated because of the view taken yesterday by the Attorney General, who rightly said that it would be absurd to suppose that the Lord Lieutenant would act in a time of crisis without talking over the difficulty with the men best able to advise him on the state of Ireland. He should like to commend the Amendment to the examination of the Government in compartments. He did not think there should be any difficulty at all in accepting the Amendment down to the sub-section marked (a), which referred to matters excluded from the powers of the Irish Legislature under Clause 3. They had in favour of this part of the Amendment not only the support of the Chancellor of the Duchy, but the support in substance, if not in form, of the hon. Member for North Kerry.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): The hon. Member is altogether mistaken. I think it most inexpedient that the words should be inserted, because occasions may arise when the Imperial Government may think it well that the Lord Lieutenant should consult the Irish Government, and I said that the matter could be better dealt with in the instrument of delegation.

MR. WYNDHAM said, that explanation showed that the hon. Member for North Kerry was in favour of the first part of the Amendment, as he had said, in substance if not in form. The hon. Member, whilst agreeing that in the matters excluded under Clause 3 the Lord

Lieutenant should act as the Representative of Her Majesty, held that it should be laid down, not in the Bill, but in the instrument of delegation. The hon. Member differed, therefore, only on the question of form. But he submitted that those safeguards had not been introduced into the Bill in order to calm the fears and lull the suspicions of the hon. Member for North Kerry. They had been put in in order to allay the just fears and the reasonable suspicions of the loyal minority in Ireland, and, so far as important matters were concerned, of the British people; and, that being so, he thought that upon a mere question of form the wishes of the loyal minority and of the British people were to be consulted in preference to the wishes of the hon. Member for North Kerry. But he was not content to rest his argument on a mere question of form. There was much more than form in this matter. They all knew that this Bill would not pass into law; but, having once received the assent of the House of Commons, it would become, as regarded the relations between England and Ireland, an historic document of importance only less to that of the Act of Union. There were many provisions in the Bill to which the minority in this country and the majority in Ireland objected; there were many provisions to which the majority in Ireland and the minority in this country objected; but there were some few provisions upon which they had arrived, on the whole, at the same conclusion. He laid it down with great confidence that in the future neither Party would ever accept less than they received in this Bill. Arguments would be founded on the concessions in the Bill both by Nationalists and Loyalists. If that were so, and as the Chancellor of the Duchy and the hon. Member for North Kerry were willing to concede the principle that in all the excluded matters in Clause 3 the Lord Lieutenant should act as the Representative of Her Majesty, he did not see how the Government could refuse to allow that principle being enshrined in the Bill. In the future, if they were not allowed to enshrine this principle in the Bill, it would be said that as between England and Ireland the Lord Lieutenant was not to act as the Representative of Her Majesty's Government in all matters enumerated in Clause 3, but as the Representative of the Irish Legislature. He now came to the second compartment of the Amendment marked (b). In that paragraph his noble Friend extended the limitation upon Executive action to the matters under Clause 4. Again, he could call the Chancellor of the Duchy as his witness, for the application of the principle of the right hon. Gentleman to Clause 4 would mean that the Executive would under Clause 4 be subjected to the same restrictions as were imposed upon the Legislature. But that was not in the Bill, and the hon. Member for Kerry was anxious that it should never be put into the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: My argument was that, whilst all the laws under Clause 3 would be Imperial, all the laws under Clause 4 would be Irish laws, but that the Irish Legislature must observe certain provisions in passing them; and that, therefore, in regard to Executive action arising out of Clause 4 Irish advice was necessary.

MR. WYNDHAM said, the hon. Member for North Kerry drew what he called a fundamental distinction between Clause 3 and Clause 4. Supposing the Government gave way on Clause 3, the hon. Member might object, but he would object not quite so much as were the Government to give way on Clause 4.

MR. SEXTON: Hear, hear!

MR. WYNDHAM said, that the hon. Member for North Kerry, dealing chiefly with the questions under Clause 4, drew a picture of an officer who trespassed within the powers under Clause 4 and was proceeded against. But any such officer would be no worse off than any other officer of the Royal Irish Constabulary under the 2nd sub-section of the 27th clause. Under Clause 27 the Lord Lieutenant would have control of the Constabulary, so long as the force existed, as the Representative of Her Majesty. The hon. Member for North Kerry had said that under Clause 4 there were not exceptions and restrictions, so much as principles which the law should not violate. He did not think that description was quite applicable to the policy of Clause 4. What principle was violated in establishing a religion or in endowing a denominational school? It was far more accurate to say that under Clause 4 legislation was not to pass certain limits, and what his noble Friend urged on the acceptance of the House in the second part of the Amendment was that for any action outside those limits the Irish Executive should be responsible to this House, and not to the Irish House. Take some of the dangers guarded against by Clause 4—disabilities or privileges imposed on account of religious belief. Would anyone pretend that those dangers were not greater from Executive rather than from legislative action? The Opposition had been taunted with being distrustful and suspicious of the Irish House of Commons. But he, for one, would never believe that they would pass a law against Protestants. What was feared was that in the administration of the law men might be made to suffer, or might obtain benefits on account of religious beliefs. Was not that likely? Unless this Amendment were accepted the Lord Lieutenant would be the blind hand and instrument of the Irish Legislature placed between the two alternatives of accepting their advice or accepting their resignation, and that was not a position in which they could fairly place the Lord Lieutenant. If they put the Lord Lieutenant in that position, it would be found before very long that disabilities would be imposed and benefits conferred on account of religious beliefs in Ireland. At any rate, it did not lie in the mouth of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that this was unlikely. If they argued in the case of the Executive that those crimes and outrages were unlikely, then by that very argument they admitted that every outrage of tyranny and favouritism under the legislative province of the Bill was not only a possible but a probable consequence. If those dangers were unlikely, why, in Heaven's name, had they inserted Clauses 3 and 4? He believed the dangers were likely; but supposing they were fanciful and unfounded—mere phantoms bred in the horrors that haunted the gloom of a past religious and racial animosity. But the Government claimed to have redeemed and abolished that past by this policy of conciliation; and yet while endeavouring under Clauses 3 and 4 to allay that phantom, how could they object to insert provisions in the Bill against dangers much more substantial? He passed to the last compartment of his noble Friend's Amendment, which laid down that it should "Be unlawful for any Executive officer in Ireland, except by direction of the Lord Lieutenant representing Her Majesty, to do, or omit to do, any such act."

He would leave the arguments on that clause to lawyers, who were more able to deal with it than he, though he thought it was easy to show the necessity of such a provision. He would point out that under the 27th clause any Constabulary officer who went outside the law was proceeded against in a Court of Law, whether he was acting by orders of the Lord Lieutenant or not; and all that the Amendment would provide was that any official whatever within the sphere of this restriction who injuriously affected or conduced to injury against one of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland should be amenable to the law just as a police constable was now. They were told by the Attorney General that the Lord Lieutenant must be allowed to have the advice of his Irish Ministers, and allowed to act with despatch. Both these advantages were left to the Lord Lieutenant under this Amendment. In times of crisis, or foreign invasion, or insurrection, or in any difficult problem arising out of the state of Ireland, he would act at once, should the necessity arise, on his own responsibility. If the Amendment were accepted in these matters alone, the Lord Lieutenant would be in the position of the Viceroy of India—that was to say, he would be responsible to and would be represented by a Minister in this House, and his action through that Minister would be open to their criticism. He would in the interest of the Amendment—to which they attached a great deal of importance—deprecate the attitude of suspicion so constantly taken up by the Government towards any suggestion coming from that (the Opposition) quarter of the House. They must surely by now be familiar with the aspect of their Amendments by the hundreds of them that had appeared, and yet they believed in every one of them there lurked some pitfall and some hidden trap. Whatever might be said of the merits or demerits of their opposition to this Bill, he thought they could not be accused of Machiavellian subtlety in their mode of attack, and least of all in the Amendment they were bringing forward that afternoon, and yet the Government had to be soothed and coaxed like a shy horse before they could be induced to approach these subjects because of their suspicion and alarm. He could assure the Chief Secretary he would find in this Amendment no hidden trap, but merely a straightforward declaration of the principle already enunciated by the hon. Member for North Kerry and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

MR. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) desired to say a word upon this Amendment, because he could scarcely think it possible that the House would pass this 5th clause and deal with these enormous powers of the Executive without putting some sort of restriction upon the power of delegation and the powers which were thereby to be vested in the Irish Government. They had had various explanations as to what would be the effect of this Amendment. The Chief Secretary had given one to the effect that the Irish Government would be restricted in regard to the 3rd clause of it by the acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston. They had had another opinion from the Attorney General to the effect that the Lord Lieutenant might take the advice of the Irish Government upon these questions arising in Clauses 3 and 4, but that he would not be bound to act upon it. They had had an opinion from the hon. Member for North Kerry to the effect that the matters in Clause 3, being Imperial, would necessarily be outside the competence of the Irish Government, and they had the opinion of the Chancellor of the Duchy which had been read by the last speaker. He desired to point out that there was nothing in this Bill to justify any one of these opinions. Why? Because the House would perceive that the questions of the Executive which were to devolve upon the Irish Government were not laid down in this Bill at all, but were to be dealt with in a document not now before the House—namely, the instrument of delegation. It was the instrument of delegation which was to settle what were to be the powers of the Irish Executive. What was the House asked to do? The House was asked to give a letter of unlimited credit to the Government of the day in the framing of this instrument of delegation. They were asked to give a blank cheque, for whatever was included in the instrument of delegation would be in the competence of the Irish Government, including every one of the matters in Clause 3, though it was Imperial, and every one of the matters in Clause 4. The question arose, would the House allow the matter to be left in that way? He could recognise the difficulty of framing and putting into the Bill the powers that were to be given to the Irish Government. He did not envy the gentleman who had to frame the instrument of delegation, because it was extremely difficult to say what matters should be included. The noble Lord in his Amendment had taken the simpler and easier course of saying what should not be included; and although the Amendment had been subjected to rather severe criticism on the part of the Attorney General, if the Government were to put on the Paper the subjects on which the Irish Government were to have power, such a proposal would be subjected to far more severe criticism than the present Amendment. If the Government found fault with the Amendment as it was, why did they not bring up one themselves? What he wished the House to understand was this: that upon this 5th clause—which was the crux of the Bill, which was more important than all the restrictions in the 3rd and 4th clause upon the powers of the Legislature put together—the House was asked to vote in the dark, to give unlimited power to the Government, and to have no voice whatever in the document which would ultimately settle these matters. One point was pretty clear in reference to this instrument of delegation; and that was that whatever would be included in that delegation would pass to the Irish Government; therefore, he assumed there would be a distinction in these matters which had not yet been adverted to. The Lord Lieutenant was to possess a double capacity. In one capacity he would be the Representative, not the Delegate, of the Imperial Government; he would act on behalf of Her Majesty, not as the Delegate, but as the Representative of Her Majesty. He presumed that where the Lord Lieutenant was to act as an Imperial officer representing Her Majesty and the British Ministers he would do so by virtue of Letters Patent; but whatever was included in the instrument of delegation would certainly pass to the Irish Government. He was of opinion that the instrument of delegation would not be, and ought not to be, a personal matter at all. The instrument of delegation should be to the Lord Lieutenant as such, and be permanent in effect, so that there need be no difficulty on emergencies arising. He considered that if the Government were not prepared to say what powers they were going to delegate they ought to consent to an Amendment such as this saying, at all events, what should not pass to the Irish Government.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said, he might call attention again to a proposition which had been advanced more than once in reference to cognate questions, and that was that the method proposed by this Bill was a method which gave to this Parliament the greatest possible measure of power in respect of the subjects of the Amendment. It was a method which, by leaving the instrument of delegation to be prepared by the Government of this country — by the Imperial Government commanding the confidence of the people of this country, by the submission of that instrument to this Assembly, for its review, and its modification, to be moulded at its pleasure, not directly but indirectly through well-known methods by which the Imperial Parliament could exercise the supreme authority of advising as well as censuring — retained in their hands the greatest amount of power that they could possibly retain. The plan was advisable also, because it was not only in accordance with precedent, but was approved by experience. It was the method which they had adopted in the framing of other Constitutions; and they had acted upon that power which those Constitutions had given them, by, from time to time, moulding and changing the instrument of delegation, as experience indicated the advisability of such a change. If it was, as the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham) had stated, the loyal minority and not the Nationalist majority that was to be consoled and fortified, whose nerves were to be strengthened and toned by the clauses that were to be put into the Bill, he maintained that the minority had a greater security under the system which confessedly left it in the hands of the Imperial Parliament to frame and mould, and alter the delegation from time to time, than they could obtain by any such effort as was now being made in part and summarily to discharge a task which the hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) rightly described as being an extremely difficult, and delicate, and complicated task. It was better to leave all at large, recognising — and that recognition was the only security for those of them who were to be almost excluded from the ultimate settlement of the question — recognising, as they had clearly recognised, the general principle upon which that delegation should be framed. That general principle unquestionably was that the Executive power should be commensurate with and complementary to the Legislative power in all matters in which they were conferring on the Irish Legislature legislative power, that they should make the Executive power efficient in purely Irish questions by permitting in these Executive action on the advice of those who were responsible to the Irish Legislature, while in all matters in which Imperial legislative power was retained they should retain the complementary and commensurate Executive power in their instrument of delegation by requiring that the Viceroy should act upon the instructions of the Imperial Government. If Irish Members spoke as they had spoken before, and as they would speak again should occasion require, of the views of the Irish Government being important views, they quite recognised the vital distinction between the technical phrase, advice, and the suggestion of those views, and so he would say with reference to the views of the Imperial Government. No lover of his country, no lover of the United Kingdom, no lover of Ireland, he thought, would omit for a moment from his mind the consideration that while it was vital on the one hand that the constitutional advice upon which action was to be taken should be the advice or instructions of the Imperial Government in Imperial affairs, and the advice of the Irish administration in Irish affairs, it was also most important, and they hoped and believed it would be the case, that due consideration would be given to all opinions, and that an effort would be made to rule both countries with the general consent, and to the common advantage of the people of both countries. He knew nothing more important to either an Irish or an Imperial Ministry than that they should know informally what were the views of men who were responsible to the Irish people on all the questions which touched their interests as well as on Imperial interests. The utmost freedom of communication in that sense, the utmost facility for obtaining information, the freest use of those means, ought to be considered as one of the essential and elementary arts of Government; but consistently with that they should always recognise the fundamental Constitutional principle which he had advanced, that Executive action must be commensurate with and complementary to legislative power, and there a sharp line of distinction must be drawn. The general principle had been stated, but to enter fully into details was agreed to be impossible. The Amendment did not suggest that they should incorporate in the Bill a complete description of the whole delegation. Why, then, should they enter into it partially? Why not leave their hands absolutely free when they had an entire concurrence of opinion as to the general principle? Why not leave their hands perfectly free to apply that principle of the Bill, so that they might be able to mould and change the instrument of delegation from time to time as might be advisable? He should repeat what he had said before in the House—that if there were to be objection taken in any quarter of the House to the plan, he knew no quarter where it might be more reasonably taken than from the Irish Benches, because this power was to be exercised by the Imperial Government upon the responsibility of the Imperial Parliament, in which, out of 670 Members, Ireland would have only 80. But they did not object, for the reason that they believed in the equity and justice of the Imperial Parliament as to the method they would adopt in executing the provisions of this Act when once it had become law. They believed it would be carried out according to its spirit, and, so carrying it out, they (the Irish Members) were ready to trust them. The hon. Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) said that while the instrument of delegation would be very difficult to draw up in full, yet it was very easy to draw it in part; and the hon. Member proposed that it should be, in fact, drawn in part by clauses in the Bill. But this was indefensible. The hon. Member went on to say that all the powers contained in the instrument of delegation would be powers to be exercised on the advice of the Irish Government. He wholly differed from him. Clause 5 contemplated, and necessarily contemplated, an entirely different state of things. The whole Executive power in Ireland was to continue vested in Her Majesty the Queen; and whatever was done was to be done in her name, and the Lord Lieutenant was to exercise any prerogative or other Executive power of the Queen, the exercise of which might be delegated to him by Her Majesty. It was recognised as quite competent, and it would also be convenient, to delegate to a person on the spot some prerogatives of an Imperial character, and to delegate their exercise on Imperial instructions, or upon Imperial advice generally or specially. Therefore, this instrument of delegation must do what was done under other instruments of delegation. There might be two instruments if they pleased; but one, or more than one, must deal with prerogative or Executive powers, some of which the Lord Lieutenant should exercise upon Imperial instructions, and others of which he should exercise upon Irish advice. If he thought that this matter could be satisfactorily dealt with by any clause which could be put into the Bill at that or any other stage, he should feel no insuperable difficulty in attempting its consideration; but surely when they were told that there were a vast number of important matters, some absolutely new and untouched, which required to be dealt with, to propose to take up time in a discussion as to whether a provision should be inserted in respect of a matter which it was clear that they were keeping ample power to frame and mould according to their own will, was clearly to be described as nothing but a waste of time. The hon. Member for Harrow had suggested that the Government themselves should frame an Amendment. He not think the experience of the Treasury Bench with reference to the reception of Amendments which they had framed to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite was at all calculated to induce them to again accept that task, particularly when they were of opinion that no Amendment at all was required, and that the method they had adopted was the best. As to the first part of the Amendment, it was already absolutely clear that the advice or instruction must be Imperial advice or instruction. As to the second part of it, the subjects in respect of which there were instructions were obviously Irish subjects. No Act, however, could be passed by the Irish Legislature which should infringe the protection referred to in the clause ; and if any Act was passed which did infringe that protection, it would, of course, be so far as void as an Act infringing the provisions of the first part. The question whether an Act was void or not was properly left to the judicial power, and the question whether Executive action was sound or unsound would depend upon the question of the validity of the Act itself. But to say that any condition whereby any person should be injuriously affected in respect of matters in which he was protected was to be dealt with by the Viceroy only upon Imperial advice was to suggest what was an impossibility in the first place, because if the proposed Executive action was under a void law he could not perform it validly. If, however, they got over that position, they were lauded in this one—Who was to decide whether the action was in truth one whereby a person or Corporation would be injuriously affected ? Was the Lord Lieutenant to decide the question upon his own individual opinion, or, if not, upon whose opinion was he to act ? They had the preliminary question, was any person injuriously affected ? The advice given to the Lord Lieutenant would be given on the theory that the legislative Act was valid, and, therefore, it would be given on the theory that the whole matter was within the purview of the Irish Legislature, and who was to determine whether it was or was not ? The Courts, and the Courts alone, could determine that. As to the remaining provision, which made it unlawful for any Executive officer to act save under certain conditions, was every officer, from a bailiff upwards, to decide for himself whether any Act of the Irish Legislature affected any person injuriously, and whether he himself could act lawfully under such Act or not ? Was every such officer to find out for himself by which branch of his authority the Viceroy ordered him to act ? Was he to refuse obedience, instead of obeying, and trusting to his superior to protect him ? Really, it seemed to him that the Amendment was inartistically and inadequately drawn, and was calculated to produce insurmountable confusion and to obscure the application of a plain, clear, and fundamental principle which the House, by the Bill as it stood, retained and maintained practically in its own hands.

MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): I did not gather from the only speech we have heard from the Treasury Bench that the Government dissent from the principle of the Amendment. The principle of the Amendment is simply this : that the Irish Ministry ought not to be allowed to do by Executive action that which the Irish Legislature is forbidden to do by legislative action. As the Bill stands, it is perfectly clear, in my opinion, that the Irish Ministry will be able to do many of those things which the Irish Legislature is forbidden to do. I do not wish to take up time at any length, and I will cite two or three instances only as examples. You have, for instance, prohibited the Irish Legislature from making any law about treason-felony. I suppose there can be no question whatever that the Lord Lieutenant, whatever the form of the delegation, will have the prerogative of mercy entrusted to his exercise. As the Bill stands, you provide for a Privy Council and Executive Committee in the Government of Ireland. This Body is to advise the Lord Lieutenant, and, in the case of treason-felony, they may advise him to grant a pardon. That would practically be repealing the law of treason-felony just as if the Irish Legislature were to pass a repealing Act. What definition, therefore, are we to have—

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, the definition was contained in the Bill.

MR. MATTHEWS : What definition are we to have of the manner in which the Lord Lieutenant must exercise his prerogative ? I think it is clear that the Lord Lieutenant must follow the advice of his Constitutional Ministers, or dismiss them. The Home Secretary advises Her Majesty now. If Her Majesty could not agree with the advice of the Home Secretary I should like to know how long he would feel himself bound to hold that office. If his advice were not followed he would have no alternative but to resign. If the Lord Lieutenant objects in Ireland, or does not feel disposed to act on the advice of his Irish advisers, difficulties may arise, and what is then to become of the enforcement of the law of treason-felony? Another example: The Legislature is prohibited from passing a law regarding the country's relations with Foreign States. But what is to prevent the Irish Executive from advising the Lord Lieutenant to send an Envoy to France or to Rome? And the result of Executive action would be the same as if a law to the same effect had been passed. Again, the Legislature is forbidden to pass a law constituting Associations for learning and practising use of arms or of drilling for military purposes. But the Executive can permit, connive at, and encourage such Associations. Only one other example from Clause 4. The Legislature is prohibited from passing any law which would deny the equal protection of the law to any subject. But do you think the Lord Lieutenant may not be advised by the Irish Executive not to give police protection to the bailiff levying a distraint, or to the Sheriff executing a decree of ejectment? That would have just the same effect as if they were at liberty to pass a law for the non-payment of rent. It is manifest that under Clauses 3 and 4 there might be Executive action by the Irish Ministers by which the same results might be effected as by the laws which the Irish Legislature are forbidden to pass. The Attorney General says that the instrument of delegation will put all this right. I say that is a totally impracticable and false theory. I have submitted the example of a case of treason-felony. Is the delegation to say that the prerogative of mercy is delegated to the Lord Lieutenant, except in cases of treason and treason-felony? The result of that would be that the prerogative of mercy in Ireland would be exercised by the English Home Secretary, and, to quote the phrase that we have heard from those (the Government) Benches, the law would then "come in a foreign garb." In that case two distinct Executives would be established in Ireland; and it would be necessary to insert provisions in the Bill to compel the Governors of gaols, Commissioners of Police, and authorities of every sort in Ireland to obey the orders of the English Home Secretary. You are at present having a limited delegation, and a limited delegation means that the Lord Lieutenant is absolutely void of Executive power on the prohibited subjects. The void must be filled by someone, and that someone would be the Home Secretary in England. Such an instrument is positively impossible. It is an impracticable system. In practice every Executive act in Ireland must, perforce, be performed through the Lord Lieutenant; and the practical question raised by the Amendment is—"Who shall direct the Lord Lieutenant"? By doing as I have said you set up two distinct Executives. The question is, Who shall direct the Lord Lieutenant. He is the Representative of the Queen in Ireland, and he must be advised in these matters. We suggest that upon matters purely Irish the Lord Lieutenant should act upon the advice of the Irish Ministry, and upon the matters reserved by the Bill he should act on the advice of the Imperial Ministry. Surely, you are not seriously going to ask that the Home Secretary should be consulted in all cases—such questions as the control of the Constabulary, and many others? Although we have the greatest confidence in the intention of the Government with regard to the delegation, the House can have no assurance, unless by a provision inserted in the Bill, as to what will be the conduct of future Governments in drawing up delegations. You do not know what inclination future Governments may have, or what influence Party interests may have, upon the decision of the moment. It seems to me obvious that, in laying down the outline of this new Constitution, you should impose some restriction upon the Irish Executive just as you do on the Irish Legislature. If you do not intend that the Irish Executive should do those things which the Irish Legislature is forbidden to do, why not make it plain? Why relegate it to the delegation, the limitation of which must be practically impossible, and must result in the establishment of two Executives side by side—one of them English, and the other Irish? The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) has declared in the course of the Debates that the Government are anxious that the Executive in Ireland should be subject to the same restrictions as the Legislature. That being so, I claim his vote for this Amendment. This is simply a difference in words; the proposal is exactly what he expressed in that passage of his speech on the subject. All the practical Executive functions of the Government must be delegated; and the only effective limitation is to repeat Clauses 3 and 4 in the instrument. I think the reasons are conclusive in favour of the Amendment. I should be quite prepared to see it modified, and I would not object to striking out the last paragraph, as referring only to matters of detail, but otherwise I think it meets the case.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): Sir, the Debate has contributed no argument to shake the opinion to which the Government gave expression yesterday through the mouth of the Attorney General. The Attorney General put the reasons of the Government for objecting to the Amendment quite clearly and sufficiently for all purposes, and nothing has been said to make us vary from the opinions then expressed. The Amendment consists of three parts, and in this case, as in most others, directly the Amendment was introduced an apology was made for some part of it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say—"We like the general principle; let the Government select their own words." I do not say that for the purpose of taunting the Opposition, but for the sake of pointing to it as evidence of the supreme difficulty of the questions with which the Opposition attempt to deal. With all their talent, they cannot put their Amendments into a satisfactory shape, because what they endeavour to effect often cannot, consistently with the scheme of the Bill, be effected. I want to deal with the three questions which they raise by this Amendment. In this case gentlemen opposite have, I think, sufficient legal talent at their command to enable them to know that they are attempting to do things which cannot be done, and to introduce matters which are incompatible with the principle of the Bill and which would render it unworkable. The Government, in opposing such Amendments as this, are bound to point out that the evident intention of the Opposition, and of the whole policy they have pursued, and have, indeed, more than once candidly avowed, has been to endeavour to make the Bill unworkable. All the Amendments have tended to the same object. The Amendments have been based upon the supposition that the House cannot rely upon broad principles, but must enter into a vast number of details which, when put into the form of provisions, would be found to be impracticable, and which would destroy the Bill itself. The Amendment, as I have said, consists of three parts. I come to the first part. The hon. Member for Dover has been good enough to quote some words of mine, and my views have also been quoted by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. To those words I fully adhere. Sir, it has always been the view of the Government, and it has always been so expressed by them, that the Lord Lieutenant should act upon the advice of the Imperial Government in Imperial matters, and that the same restrictions should apply to the acts of the Irish Executive as apply to those of the Irish Legislature.

MR. WYNDHAM: That is not in the Bill.

*MR. BRYCE: Then the hon. Member for Dover asks why we do not accept the Amendment? We do not do so for the reason that, in our opinion, the principle of the Amendment—I speak of the first part of it—is already sufficiently contained in the Bill.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Member for North Kerry has said the matter should be in the instrument of delegation and not in the Bill.

*MR. BRYCE: The hon. Member for North Kerry put the same construction on the Amendment as I have done.

MR. WYNDHAM: Clause 4.

*MR. BRYCE: I will come to that. I am dealing now with the first part of the Amendment. With regard to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews), I would remind him we laid it down in Committee that the Lord Lieutenant, in the Imperial matters reserved by Clause 3, would take his instructions from the Imperial Government and would be responsible to the Imperial Government for any act he might do; and the whole question of the way in which the Imperial Government should deal with them, and of the relations that would exist, was very fully discussed. The right hon. Gentleman puts a case of conviction for treason-felony, and he asks how the Lord Lieutenant is to exercise his prerogative in a case of that kind. It is quite clear to me, and I hope also to the House, that the Lord Lieutenant in Imperial matters will take his advice solely from the Imperial Government. No instrument of delegation would be drawn so to run counter to the scope and provisions of the Bill as not to indicate in accordance with the scheme the functions of the Lord Lieutenant as regards Irish matters and as regards Imperial matters. It will do so, because it will obviously be in accordance with the frame and purport of the Bill. The Imperial matters mentioned in Clause 3 are matters in which he will take his advice from the Imperial Government; and whether he consults the Irish Executive or not, whether he gives them an opportunity of expressing their opinion, he will act on the advice given by the Imperial Government, and that only.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Why do you not say that in the Bill?

*MR. BRYCE: It would be more convenient, perhaps, if the right hon. Gentleman would let me finish my argument, and I will then answer his question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Birmingham (Mr. Matthews) next dealt with the Imperial question as to sending Envoys to Foreign Powers. It is absolutely impossible that an attempt should be made to send Envoys without the intervention of the Lord Lieutenant, who could not sanction any such action. But the sending of Envoys has not been tried in the past—you cannot find an instance of an attempt to do it in the Irish history of last century. The right hon. Gentleman went on to speak of the function of the instrument of delegation. That function will be clear, and will doubtless cover this case, defining, in accordance with the provisions of Clause 3, which in our view are perfectly explicit, any point in which the Lord Lieutenant may be concerned. There is only one remaining point that the right hon. Gentleman dilated upon—namely, the possibility of setting up a double Executive in Ireland, and he said we would avoid that by accepting the Amendment. But the very thing the Amendment itself does is to set up a double Executive in Ireland. It has no other meaning. We distinguish very clearly between the Lord Lieutenant's position as the Queen's Representative and Imperial Minister and his position as the head of the Irish Executive advised by the Irish Ministry.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then why not accept the Amendment?

*MR. BRYCE: The Leader of the Opposition says—"Why not accept the Amendment?" We do not think it is necessary to put it in the Bill, because the Bill already indicates with sufficient clearness what the duty of the Lord Lieutenant will be, and lays down a principle to which the instrument of delegation must conform. We think it has been universally understood in every part of the House that the restrictions under Clauses 3 and 4 have been imposed with this object—of making clear the duties of the Executive and the Legislature; and it is impossible to suppose that matters will be otherwise than provided for, because you give the Irish Ministers the power to state their opinion on matters with which the Legislature has nothing to do. The Irish Ministers will only speak for their own Legislature. Their weight as counsellors depends upon the fact that they have the confidence of, and speak for, that Legislature. Beyond its province they are not entitled to go. How, then, would it be possible for them to authoritatively advise the Lord Lieutenant regarding Imperial affairs which are excluded from the purview of the Irish Legislature? The only weight that their opinion would have would be based upon the fact that they were the Representatives of the Irish Legislature, as far as concerned such matters as that Legislature were competent to deal with, and no Lord Lieutenant would accept their opinion upon matters outside the restrictions imposed upon that Legislature. I, therefore, see no reason why we should accept the Amendment. The hon. Member for Dover spoke of the way in which the Government treat those who bring forward Amendments—of our being suspicious. But, Sir, I would remind the House that we have had considerable experience of these Amendments, and on nearly every occasion when we have admitted an Amendment—purely for the sake of peace and of saving time—an Amendment, it might be, which, to our own judgment, might not be necessary—we have found that such a concession was made the basis for other Amendments being moved. We rely in this instance upon a broad and clear principle, and we do not think it is necessary to restate a point for which we consider that the Bill already provides. Now I come to the second and third part of the Amendment. The second part of the Amendment is doubly objectionable. In the first place, it provides that the "Lord Lieutenant shall not do or omit to do any act upon the advice of the Executive Committee, or until he has received Her Majesty's instructions thereupon, or otherwise than as representing Her Majesty, . . . whereby any person or Corporation would be injuriously affected in respect of any of the matters in which they are protected as against legislation by the Irish Legislature under Section 4 of this Act."

But, Sir, we cannot contemplate the Lord Lieutenant, as representing Her Majesty, doing wrong—that is, transgressing the restrictions imposed in Clause 4. He is to be in Ireland as representing Her Majesty to do right, not wrong. Moreover, it is perfectly plain that if a law were passed transgressing the provisions of Clause 4 of the Bill it would be a law passed by the Irish Legislature, with regard to matters which were not excluded from the general sphere of domestic legislation. The law would be invalid so far as it transgressed the restrictions of Clause 4, but it would have nothing to do with the Lord Lieutenant in his Imperial capacity, and it would not help matters to bring him in in that capacity. Then I come to the last part of the Amendment. The same objection applies to it, with this addition: that it would throw an impossible duty on subordinate officers, and it would render the government of Ireland entirely impracticable. Before I sit down I may mention for the information of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Birmingham that the very case he mentioned as regards pardons has arisen in some of our Colonies, and the directions given to the Colonial Governors are that where a prisoner has been convicted for an offence against Imperial law, or for a matter involving Imperial acts, the Governor is not to be guided by his Colonial Ministry, but is to act upon his own discretion, consulting, if he pleases, the Secretary of State at home.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not propose to reply to that part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in which he denounced the Opposition for being prepared after debate to modify the Amendments they put upon the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman is very anxious that he and his friends should be judged by the general principles laid down in the Bill. I claim that the Opposition also shall be judged by that canon—that is to say, by the general principles laid down in their Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely in error in supposing that the Opposition think Sub-section (b) to be of less importance than Sub-section (a). If (b) is less important from an Imperial point of view it is far more important, so far as the loyal minority in Ireland are concerned. I shall, therefore, support (b) as heartily as I shall support (a). We are in a very curious position. The Government allege that they approve of both sub-sections, and the hon. Member for Kerry says that he approves of Sub-section (a) but does not approve of Sub-section (b).

MR. SEXTON said, he did not approve of stating it in the Bill. It ought to be done in the instrument of delegation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understood his position was that he did not want this Amendment embodied in the Act. He did not object to Sub-section (a) being embodied, but he did not wish (b) to be. Therefore we have it that the Government approves of both sub-sections. ["No!"]

MR. BRYCE: (B) is unworkable.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then I would ask them the plain question whether they think that the Lord Lieutenant, in regard to matters dealt with in Sub-section 4, is to act on the advice of Irish or of British Ministers?

MR. BRYCE: The Lord Lieutenant is not to break the law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is no answer. I am talking about Executive acts. It is not a question of breaking the law. One of the provisions of Sub-section 4 lays down that no Act shall be passed which would prevent the Conscience Clause being enforced in any school in Ireland. At present educational matters in Ireland are under the Educational Board, and it is in the power of that Board, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant, to abolish the Conscience Clause in any school. No Act is required.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: They tried to do it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And, in face of that, the Chancellor of the Duchy can only interject that the Lord Lieutenant is not to break the law. Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy have the courage to say that after this Bill passed it would be impossible to abolish the Conscience Clause in Ireland, and thereby injure any Corporation or individual intended to be protected by Clause 4 without breaking the law? I put it to him, would it be breaking the law to abolish the Conscience Clause? It is obvious that it would not, and that in some way or other, either by delegation or by Bill, you must prevent the Lord Lieutenant from dealing with educational matters on the advice of the Irish Ministers.

*MR. BRYCE: My hon. and learned Friends the Attorney General and the Solicitor General are of opinion that it would be unlawful to abolish the Conscience Clause.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then let them get up and prove it. It would be more instructive to hear their legal acumen exercised in supporting that proposition in Debate than to have the statement merely thrown across the Table. I do not gather that the legal luminaries to whom the right hon. Gentleman has referred have yet ventured to do more than to say that they think it would be illegal. When they reach a more certain frame of mind perhaps they—or, at any rate, one of them—will make a statement on the matter. If they do not reach a more certain frame of mind, perhaps they will put words into the clause to put the thing beyond doubt. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy oscillated between two inconsistent theories; in one half of his speech he said the whole matter was to be done by delegation; in the other he stated that it was provided for in the Bill as it stands. And when I asked—"Where is it provided for in the Bill?" he said, "In the framework of the Bill." Well, we asked—"What is the framework of the Bill?" but to that question we got no trace of an answer. I know what the clauses, and the sub-sections, and the Preamble of a Bill are, but I do not know what the framework is. When a Judge is asked to interpret the framework of a Bill, what does he do? I should think he does what we do—namely, ask the learned counsel what clause, and sub-section, and definite statement in the Bill carries out his declaration. I say we have asked what is meant, and have received no trace of an answer. To be told by the same Minister in the same speech, in the first place, that the thing cannot be done; in the second place, that it is done; and, in the third place, that though it is not done in the Bill it ought to be done in the delegation, is placing before us a mass of inconsistencies which are difficult to swallow. If these inconsistencies were to be expressed they ought at least to have been put into the mouths of different Ministers, and not to have all come from one. Then as to the answer which it was attempted to give to my right hon. Friend the Member for East Birmingham (Mr. Matthews) with regard to the objection he raised in reference to the double Executive in Ireland. My right hon. Friend said—"If you are going by your instrument of delegation to except from the powers of the Lord Lieutenant certain spheres of action, those spheres will be left empty, and the vacuum must be filled up by some Executive authority, which by a natural process will be the English Ministry—probably the Home Secretary—and this will have the effect of setting up a double Executive." But the Chancellor of the Duchy says that there is no force in that objection, for that is already done in the Bill. Let me grant that that is so, and that this unfortunate Lord Lieutenant is to carry out a double Executive function. You have only got to alter the form in which the right hon. Gentleman's argument is put, and you can say that under the plan of the Government there will be three Executives in Ireland. In some cases the Lord Lieutenant will act as advised by Her Majesty, in others as advised by his Irish Government, and in a third set of cases he will not act at all, but the whole matter will be done by the Home Secretary. I listened most carefully to the speech of the Attorney General yesterday and to the Chancellor of the Duchy this evening, and was at a loss to understand why the Government are so obstinately set upon refusing this Amendment. If it is impossible to put in the Bill words that will prevent the Lord Lieutenant in his Executive capacity dealing with things forbidden to the Legislature in Ireland, I say it will be impossible under the system of delegation. Even if there were no other argument against leaving this to the delegation, the argument would remain absolutely conclusive that we wish to lay down in permanent and unalterable terms the limitations and protections which we give to the minority in Ireland and to Imperial interests. Your proposal is in favour of leaving it open to every Government that sends a delegation to put the question in what form it likes, to accept what it pleases, and to protect whom it chooses. We therefore say that inasmuch as it is certain that limitations on the Executive are as necessary in these great objects as on legislation, it is necessary to see that the limitations are embodied in a permanent form in the Bill itself, and not left to the haphazard policy of successive Governments.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he agreed in principle, as he thought they all did, with the Chancellor of the Duchy and the hon. Member for Longford opposite, that the limits of the action of the Executive Authority ought to be strictly conterminous with the limits of the action of the Legislature. If they were agreed in that, the question really resolved itself into this: Was it well that the equality of the action of the Legislature and of the Executive should be expressed in the Bill, or ought the limits of Executive action to be reserved to be expressed in the delegation by which certain prerogatives were conferred on the Lord Lieutenant? The arguments that had been used in favour of not expressing the Executive action of the Act appeared to be these: they could get more elasticity in the delegation—they could learn by experience, and, where necessary, modify the terms. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy had said—"You would have more flexibility in the matter of the delegation." Well, these things might be looked on by some people as merits, but in the eyes of the Opposition they were faults. If the delegation were to be conterminous with legislative authority, what ground was there for having any elasticity? They did not intend to limit the action of the Executive within the limits of the Legislative Authority; they did not intend to go beyond them. It was intended to make them conterminous—simple words would make them so—and if that was the principle to be adopted why should it not be expressed in words instead of allowing an ambiguity to exist? Were they afraid to make it more clear? Were they afraid to make the matter independent of the varying opinions of successive Ministries? The Opposition did not want to allow successive Ministries to exercise the elasticity—now withdrawing and now extending powers. They wanted the Lord Lieutenant to be informed strictly what he could do and in what capacity he could do it, so that he could never be at a loss, when circumstances arose, to know what was his duty, and what was the course of action he would pursue. In Canada, in the remarkable case of the half-breed Riel, the sentence was carried out upon the responsibility and the advice given by Sir John Macdonald. He accepted all the responsibility.

MR. BLAKE said, that in Canada the law of treason was a local law.

MR. COURTNEY: In such a case in Ireland the local Ministry would have no authority.

An hon. MEMBER: We are agreed on that.

MR. COURTNEY said, he wanted to make the matter plain and not leave it obscure. They wanted to put into the Act that which the Government said was involved in it, and that which they said was their principle—namely, that the local Ministry would have no responsibility, because Executive functions were not to transcend the limits of legislative action in Ireland, and the Legislature would have nothing to do with treason. In receiving an address from the Legislature on such a subject as reciprocity or the abolition of the Most Favoured Nation Clause and passing it on to the Imperial Government, the Lord Lieutenant would be acting simply as the Representative of Her Majesty, and it was desired that that should be made plain and not be left ambiguous in the Bill. They wanted to prevent the possibility of error. The hon. Gentleman opposite, and, he was afraid, Her Majesty's Government, went a little too far in their estimate of the wisdom and Constitutional knowledge of all Imperial Ministers. In a former branch of this discussion he had referred to a case that happened not very long ago. There was a great Ministerial crisis in one of our Australian Colonies. The Governor was pressed by his Ministers to take certain action; and, being uncertain as to whether that action was within the scope of his authority, he telegraphed for instructions to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who responded—"Consult your Constitutional authorities." The very question which perplexed him was whether it was or was not his duty to consult his advisers, and he was told to consult them upon the question whether he should consult them. That had happened to a distinguished Minister in quite recent times. It might happen again. They now had the opportunity of preventing it in the case of Ireland, and they should avail themselves of that opportunity. Yesterday the Government had accepted a proviso which was really an abandonment of the position they now seemed desirous to maintain.

MR. BYRNE said, it seemed to him that the matter stood thus: This Bill would exempt certain subjects from the Irish Legislature, but it was argued on the part of the Government that the Irish Executive could act in respect of matters excluded from the powers of the Legislature. He should have thought himself that that, to say the least of it, was a doubtful position. He was afraid, however, that they must accept it as the view of the Government, after the statement of the Chancellor of the Duchy with, no doubt, the concurrence of the Law Officers of the Crown. The last Amendment, it was said, was unnecessary, but it had been accepted by right hon. Gentlemen opposite; and having, therefore, adopted a certain subject for the purpose of excluding it from the enumerated subjects, the maxim must apply—inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the Charter of national education allowed the Education Board in Ireland to alter the fundamental principle of the national system of education, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant. In what capacity and on whose advice would the Lord Lieutenant act either in giving or withholding his assent to the abolition of the Conscience Clause? That question had been asked by his right hon. Friend, and the Government had not thought it necessary to reply; but the question was important, and they ought to have an answer.

MR. J. MORLEY said, the Chancellor of the Duchy had replied to the question, but he (Mr. Morley) was quite willing to repeat the answer. The hon. Gentleman assumed that the National Board would go to the Lord Lieutenant and say that—"We propose to do away with the Conscience Clause." What did that clause affect, and what was it affected by—a grant of public money? That money was granted by the Appropriation Act to schools on the hypothesis that they would have a Conscience Clause, and it was suggested that in future the money might be granted on the understanding that there should be no Conscience Clause. Under the 4th subsection of this Bill such a proceeding on the part of the National Board would be invalid, and the Lord Lieutenant could not assent to any such act.

The House divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 200.—(Division List, No. 279.)

MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) moved to add, at the end of line 38, Clause 5—

"Such Committee is in this Act referred to as the Irish Government."

He said, the Amendment was consequential on a new clause which had been accepted by the Government. No doubt it would be said that the subject should be dealt with in the Definition Clause; but he was afraid the clause would not be reached in time to be dealt with by a private Member. If the Government would undertake to deal with it in the Definition Clause he should be perfectly satisfied.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 38, to insert, at the end of the last Amendment, the words "such Committee is in this Act referred to as the Irish Government."—(Mr. H. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, he thought the statement in the Amendment was inaccurate. The Committee referred to in the clause was the Cabinet, and the Cabinet was not the Government, but only part of the Government.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) pointed out that many of the references in the Bill to the Irish Government referred to a more extensive Body than the Executive Committee.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) agreed that it would be inconvenient to accept the Amendment as it stood, but urged that some definition of the "Irish Government" referred to in the new clause was needed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): The Amendment of the new clause can be made by the House of Lords.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will look into the matter in the course of the evening, and if I agree with my right hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney), I will put a provision into the Definition Clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) moved to insert—

Clause 5, page 3, line 38, at the end: "Provided always, that there shall be a Secretary for Ireland holding office in the Imperial Ministry, and who may be a Member of either House of Parliament."

He said, that the somewhat similar Amendment moved in Committee differed in some respects from the present proposal. He believed the former Amendment stipulated that the Secretary for Ireland should be a Member of the Executive Committee, and since it was moved the matters reserved to the Imperial Parliament had been largely increased in number, while it had been finally settled that 80 Irish Members should remain in the Imperial Parliament. In introducing the Amendment he was simply endeavouring to enable the new Irish Constitution to be worked as every other Constitution in the Empire was worked. There was in the Imperial Parliament a Secretary representing India, although that country contributed nothing towards the expense of the India Office; there was a Secretary for the Colonies, although those Colonies were to a large extent independent, and had hitherto been Secretaries both for Ireland and Scotland. The theory that had been put forward by the Government was that Imperial matters in Ireland would practically be under the control and responsibility of the particular Ministers in charge of the particular Department affected, and that for Irish matters no special Minister was required. Although the Imperial Parliament was to retain its supremacy over all Irish matters, and was to be able to legislate in all matters relating to Ireland, and although there would be very nice and delicate matters connected with the limits of the respective authorities of the two Parliaments, the Government did not think it necessary to have a special Minister to deal with these questions. It seemed to be the idea in the mind of the Government that the Home Secretary would deal with them. The Home Secretary was already one of the hardest worked of our Ministers, and he had about the least to do with Ireland of any Minister. The Chief Secretary had said that under the old system the Home Secretary was the Irish Minister. Under Grattan's Parliament, however, the Executive was an English Executive, whilst under this Bill the Executive was to be under the control of the Irish Parliament. The Departmental Ministers who, according to the theory of the Government, were to be responsible for Departmental work in Ireland would not, as a matter of fact, be responsible for it. Could it be said that the English Education Minister would be responsible for all the difficult questions connected with education that would arise in Ireland? Would the English Attorney General be responsible for prosecutions for treason in Ireland? Would the Home Secretary be responsible for the control of the Irish Constabulary? Then there was the Land Question, and another question which the Prime Minister said the other day the House of Commons ought to maintain a lively observation of—the appointment of Land Commissioners.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say this House.

MR. HANBURY said, in that case he did not see who was to maintain the lively observation. [An hon. MEMBER: Parliament!] If the Prime Minister meant Parliament, he thought it was hardly worthy of the right hon. Gentleman to draw such a fine distinction. Was the Minister for Agriculture to be responsible for matters connected with land in Ireland? They knew that he was nothing of the sort. Therefore they wanted a Minister for Ireland who would be responsible to the House of Commons for matters which did not fall under the cognisance of any Departmental Minister in England. There was abundance of work for such a Minister, and work which would never be properly done if it were left to the Home Secretary, who was already overburdened. They had got a Secretary for Scotland, whose work was not near so heavy and responsible as the work of a Secretary for Ireland would be, and they had a Secretary for the Colonies, who, though he had very little to do with the Colonies, was the symbol of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. If Irish Members were willing to have a Minister for Ireland retained in the House as a symbol of Imperial supremacy, just as the Colonies were willing that there should be a Colonial Minister in Parliament, he thought the Government would, no doubt, be willing to appoint such a Minister. But nothing of the sort was done by the Government, and he fancied that their Irish allies would not allow them to do it. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), when the matter was raised in Committee, said, as to who was to be responsible, that it was a question of detail with which the Committee need not concern itself. On the contrary, it was a very important question—the question as to who was to be the Minister responsible for Ireland to the Imperial Parliament—and one which Parliament ought to discuss. This curious principle, enunciated by the hon. Member for North Kerry, had practically been accepted by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Chief Secretary said, in reply to a question put by the right hon. and learned Member for Bury, that the Home Secretary would be responsible for what was done in Ireland “as far as this House could be cognisant of it.” That was a strange observation of the right hon. Gentleman, for as long as the Imperial supremacy was retained this House ought to be cognisant of everything in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Member for Bury asked whether the Home Secretary would be responsible for the advice given to the Lord Lieutenant, and the answer was—“Certainly not for the advice given, but for the action taken.” That was a most unconstitutional doctrine. Then the Chief Secretary was asked who would be responsible for the advice, and according to The Times’ report the only reply given was this—“Mr. Morley shrugged his shoulders.” That was not a sufficient answer to give to a question of such importance. Here they had the Chief Secretary for Ireland shrugging his shoulders and unable to tell them who would be responsible for the advice given to the Lord Lieutenant under Home Rule. If the Home Secretary was not to be responsible for the advice given to the Lord Lieutenant, it was high time to have a Minister who would be responsible. Ireland had at present its separate responsible Minister for each Department of Irish work, and its Lord Lieutenant acting as a Constitutional Monarch. He asked that that state of things should continue under Home Rule. He asked that they should have in this Imperial Parliament under Home Rule a separate responsible Minister for Ireland, as they had for Scotland and for the Colonies, and that that Minister should be responsible to them as the Irish Ministers would be responsible to the Irish Legislature. Surely this proposal was only carrying out the Constitutional practice. Why should they have this difference between the state of things which existed now when they had a Minister for Ireland and the state of things which would come into existence if the Bill was passed? There was no real reason for it. Why should there be this objection to appointing a British Minister who would be responsible for affairs in Ireland? At present the President of the Board of Trade had charge of Irish lighthouses, beacons, buoys, &c., and he would continue to be responsible for all those Irish matters in the future as in the past. The President of the Board of Trade was a responsible Minister in every sense of the word; but directly they got away from the Departmental subjects the Government proposed that the Home Secretary should look after the more general affairs in Ireland, but that he should not be responsible for the advice given. That would be a gross anomaly. They would have two sets of Ministers under the Home Rule Bill—one set responsible to the House, and another set not responsible to the House. There would be a great distinction between the Home Secretary in his different functions; because, as a Departmental Minister, he would be responsible for the Constabulary in Ireland just as he was responsible for the Police in London; but for all other matters in Ireland which generally fell strictly within his Department as Home Secretary he would have no responsibility at all. Those were very absurd restrictions, and the only way to get rid of that absurdity was to have in the future, as in the past, a Minister for Ireland who would be responsible for all those matters. He was not asking for anything unusual. He was simply asking that they should have a Minister who, by his very name, should be the symbol of the Imperial supremacy in Ireland, in the same sense as the Secretary for the Colonies was the symbol of the Imperial supremacy in the Colonies; and that they should adopt in regard to Ireland the same practice which was adopted in regard to every other portion of the British Empire—namely, that there should be a Minister in this House distinctly and separately responsible for it. On these four grounds—because they wanted a symbol of Imperial supremacy in Ireland, because it was the universal practice to have such a Minister, because it was absolutely necessary to have such a Minister on account of the work that was to be done, and, above all, in the interest of Constitutional principles—he begged to move the Amendment, and he hoped the Government would be induced to accept it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 38, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words,—“Provided always, that there shall be a Secretary for Ireland holding Office in the Imperial Ministry, and who may be a Member of either House of Parliament.”—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have very great jealousy of the constitution of offices by Statute. It is very far from being the universal practice in this country. It appears to me that offices ought to be constituted according to the necessity arising for them, and of that necessity you cannot judge until circumstances have attained a state of ripeness. It is totally impossible for any man, be his experience what it may, to form a judgment at present as to what in all likelihood will be the amount of Irish business normally devolving on the House of Commons under the system of Home Rule. On special occasions offices are constituted by Statute; but if you were to go over the list of offices recently established and held by Members of the Cabinet, my belief is that a very small minority of them would be found to have been so constituted. The hon. Member who has moved the Amendment has not observed what is the established practice in this country.

Mr. Hanbury

MR. HANBURY: The Minister for Agriculture was constituted by Statute a few years ago.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Some of the offices were constituted by Statute, such as the Secretary for India and the Secretary for War; but in each of those cases there were specific reasons. The Secretary for India was constituted by Statute because it was thought by Parliament that the President of the Board of Trade, who had previously looked after India, could not possibly continue to discharge the mass of business in relation to India, which grew with the extension of the Indian Empire. Perhaps the House does not recollect that it is not very long ago since the Secretary for the Colonies was also Secretary for War. I have myself held the offices 47 years ago. It was when Parliament—whether wisely or unwisely is a matter on which I reserve my judgment—broke up the old military offices and scattered them that it became necessary to establish at their head a separate Minister, and as it was thought impossible that the Secretary for the Colonies could discharge the duties a Secretary for War was appointed. But my point is that there is no case whatever for the allegation of the hon. Gentleman that there is certain to be a necessity under Home Rule for a separate office for Ireland. I admit that, as regards Imperial duties connected with Ireland, there will be a standing responsibility for which provision ought to be made; but I am not sure that that responsibility will entail any serious addition to the work of any existing Government Office, or will require the appointment of a new officer of State to deal with it. If all the prohibitions and exclusions contained in Clause 3 are looked at it will be seen that almost all the excluded subjects fell within the province of one or other of the existing British Ministers; and my opinion is that all the Imperial duties which will continue to attach to the British Legislature will be specifically provided for under the different Departments of the Government. I do not deny, however, that there will be a general responsibility in connection with Irish affairs; but that will be the responsibility of the Government at large, and not of any particular Minister. No doubt, if a particular case arises it will be the duty of the Government at large to make a specific provision; but we say that we should have the light of experience before we make such a provision as the hon. Member asks for in his Amendment. We should submit a Resolution on the subject to the consideration of the House, and with regard to which the House would have the advantage of being able to judge whether it was required. Therefore, I object to this Amendment altogether as being in every sense premature. The hon. Gentleman says that such a Minister would be the symbol of our supremacy in Ireland. I think supremacy would have reached a very low ebb indeed, if it was to depend upon the presence of some individual or another in this Parliament to show that it exists.

MR. HANBURY : I did not say that it was to be the sole symbol of supremacy.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I did not say anything about its being the sole symbol. Of course, the hon. Member gave other reasons. But this is one reason, and what an absurd reason it is. What the hon. Member wants is that there should be a perpetual supervision of Irish affairs by this House. We are not to be deprived of any portion of the means we have now for interfering day by day in the Government of Ireland. The object of the hon. Member appears to be to keep alive the system which is known as "Dublin Castle." There is to be a perpetual supervision by this House over all Executive transactions in Ireland under Home Rule as there is now. To that I object.

MR. HANBURY : The right hon. Gentleman himself, in a recent speech, expressed the hope that Parliament would keep a lively observation on Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The hon. Gentleman does not quote my words. He gives his recollection of them. I also depend on my recollection, but I know the idea that I intended to convey, and that was that an earnest observation should be carried on by those who had got a particular interest in the Land Question. I say that the hon. Gentleman desires to have on the part of this House a perpetual supervision over all Executive transactions in Ireland, and that consequently the existing machinery should be retained. The object of the Government, however, is to get rid altogether of that supervision, and certainly we do not intend to set up a Minister to whom dozens of questions at a time may be put with regard to Irish local matters. If it is intended by the hon. Gentleman or by anybody else—and many of the speeches we have heard tend to inspire the belief that such a desire does exist in many quarters—that there should be a Minister here for the purpose of having dozens of questions put to him in regard to local and casual occurrences in Ireland, so as to encourage the perpetual bringing of Irish affairs before this House, I say that independently of all other objections on that ground alone no such provision will be made. The case of the Colonies does not apply. If the Colonies had started into life as self-governing countries, I am not at all sure that a Secretary of State would have been necessary. But the necessity for the Office arose historically, and it must be maintained in regard to the Crown Colonies. But there is no necessity for such an Office in regard to Ireland; and we, therefore, cannot accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have listened with attention to the right hon. Gentleman, but I have not listened without regret. He has told us that if there were self-governing Colonies existing from the first, a Secretary of State for the Colonies would not have been required. I think that if the right hon. Gentleman will consult the Secretary for the Colonies he will find that the self-governing Colonies require constant attention on the part of the English Cabinet, and, therefore, there is no reason to suppose that the attention will be less necessary in the case of Ireland. I concede, however, that the right hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying that we in the Imperial Parliament do not desire to spend our lives over minute details of Irish administration, and that it is impossible for anyone to prophesy with accuracy at the present time the exact amount of work which would fall on an Irish Minister constituted by the arrangement proposed by my hon. Friend. But some duties will be cast on a Minister who ought to be responsible to the House of Commons for giving some information as to Irish affairs; and now, and not later, as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, is the time to decide the point. Besides the questions reserved in Clause 3, there are also questions which will arise under Clause 4 which will not fall into any of the existing Departmental arrangements, and it is admitted on all hands that the Imperial Parliament must keep a general supervision over Irish affairs, and must have the power of debating questions of adequate importance when they arise. I do not see, therefore, how these questions are to be dealt with unless there is a Minister in the House who is in constant communication with the Irish Government and who can advise the House as to the views of the Irish Government. In the interest of the Irish Government themselves it is important that they should have a proper channel of communication with the House. Occasions, for instance, may arise in which the Government would be perfectly justified in their action, and of which, if the grounds for the action were known, no one would complain. Are we to be dependent on some Irish Member who is not a Member of the Irish Government and not in any way officially connected with them for their views on those occasions? Would it not be better, and more in accordance with Parliamentary usage, to have some authorised channel of communication? The question, therefore, resolves itself into this—Is it, or is it not, desirable to give power to appoint a Minister in the Bill, or must we wait until the necessity is forced upon us by the actual difficulties in which we find ourselves by the non-existence of the Minister? The right hon. Gentleman seems to entertain the idea that it would be possible to appoint a Minister by some process less elaborate than a Bill. I believe that a very small number of Ministers now exist except under statutory power, and all the modern Ministries have been created not by the Crown, but by Parliament. The Ministers for War, for India, for Scotland, for Agriculture have been constituted by Act of Parliament; and I have a painful recollection of the time when the late Government desired to appoint my lamented Friend (Colonel King-Harman) to be Under Secretary for Ireland. That appointment could not be made without an Act of Parliament, and we had to drop the Bill because we found the difficulties would have been almost insuperable, owing to the opposition, had we endeavoured to proceed with the Bill. I say, therefore, if you do not settle the question in this Bill, that when the necessity for an Irish Minister is felt, and when the Government of the day brings in a Bill to appoint one, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, who may have good reasons why no such office should be established, will deal with the appointment of an Irish Secretary as they dealt with a subordinate appointment in the Irish Office. Those reasons are quite conclusive in favour of the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I think he was well justified in bringing it forward.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, that the Irish Land Question would continue to demand, even under Home Rule, a good deal of attention and trouble in the Imperial Parliament. The question was reserved from the Irish Legislature for three years. If there was to be a Bill dealing with the land to pass through the House during these three years, it would be desirable to know what Minister would have charge of a measure of such importance. No existing Minister would be able to carry through the House a complicated measure like that. The Prime Minister had said that there would not be many important Irish questions raised in that House under Home Rule. Well, the Irish minority would always look to that House for the due protection of its rights and privileges. As subjects of the Queen they would have the right to look to the House, and whenever the need arose they would come to the House and claim protection. They, therefore, considered that a special Minister should be appointed to look after the affairs of Ireland.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, the hon. Baronet must not have read the Amendment. The hon. Baronet was extremely anxious that there should be a Minister to answer for the affairs of Ireland in the House of Commons. The Amendment said that the Minister should be in either House of Parliament; so that even if the Amendment were carried there would be no security that the object desired by the hon. Baronet would be carried into effect. He submitted that the proposal in the Amendment was entirely inappropriate. The range of the Imperial subjects reserved from Ireland were not confined to one Department, but extended to all Departments. A glance through the excepted subjects in Clause 3 made it evident that if one Minister were appointed to deal with the affairs of Ireland that Minister would have to deal with Imperial affairs which were properly belonging to the various Departments of the Government. He submitted, therefore, that the appointment of one Minister would involve, necessarily, continual friction, and possibly conflict, between him and the other Members of the Government. The responsibility of the Government was a responsibility on the whole Government, and could not be devolved on any one Member of the Government.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, he had had no doubt whatever before he saw the Bill, or before it was brought before the House on the Second Reading, that one of the things that was certain to be provided for in it was the retention in this House of a responsible Minister who would be able to answer questions, to give explanations, and generally to deal with Irish affairs; therefore it was not wonderful that his hon. Friend should have brought forward this Amendment, or that they should have had the question before them under several different heads during the Committee stage of the Bill; it seemed to him absolutely necessary that there should be in that House a Minister responsible for Irish affairs. According to the Amendment a Minister responsible for Ireland might be in either House; but he (Mr. Rentoul) agreed with the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) that it would be better to have the Minister in that House, so that he could be questioned by Members here. But with respect to one point urged from that side of the House and ridiculed from the other—namely, as to the advisability of having a Minister in that House as an emblem of supremacy, he thought that was a matter of great importance.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. RENTOUL proceeded. He was saying this matter of a Minister in that House as an emblem of Imperial supremacy was rather important, because when they asked in Committee where there was anything in reference to Imperial supremacy they were told it was scattered all through the Bill, and was contained in all parts of it. A thing that was in all parts of a Bill might very likely be held by lawyers to be in no part of the Bill at all. Our Colonies were represented by a Colonial Minister, and though the Prime Minister said the Colonial Minister was retained because there were Crown Colonies who had not a Government of their own, he (Mr. Rentoul) thought the experience of Colonial Governors was that their services had been required more in connection with those Colonies that had a Legislature and Executive of their own than even with regard to the Crown Colonies. But with reference to an Irish Minister in that House it was said that the various matters that were at present under the cognisance of the Irish Chief Secretary would be, after this Bill was passed, scattered throughout every Department. For example, that the Minister for Education here would be the man who would be responsible to a certain extent, at any rate, not merely for the education in Great Britain, but for the education in Ireland; that the Minister for Agriculture would have his eye on the agriculture of Ireland also; and the English Attorney General would be the man to instigate prosecutions for treason after this Bill passed. But the difficulty that arose in his mind with reference to that was this—that these Ministers would probably know nothing whatever about the affairs of Ireland. Suppose the Chief Secretary for Ireland, now in that House, were asked a question with reference to Irish education or any other important Irish matter, he would be ashamed to get up and say, “Really I do not know anything about that.” But suppose the Minister of Education here—the Vice President of the Council—were asked some minutely technical question about education in Ireland, he might very properly say—“I know nothing about that,” and no one would think anything the worse of him that he did not pretend to know that, because he would simply be the Minister for Great Britain and not for Ireland. If a man undertook the duties as Minister representing Ireland in that House, he would be selected as a man knowing something about Ireland; but if the Irish business was to be scattered through the hands of a number of Departments, how was any one of them to have a knowledge of Irish affairs? It was supposed a man was selected for a particular office because he had some special knowledge—more than the average Member of the House—with regard to that Department. It was told of a certain gentleman, who was suddenly asked to undertake the duty of Secretary of State for the Colonies, that after he accepted the appointment and went back to his office he said to his secretary—"Had we not better get down the map and see where these places are?" Whether that was true in fact or not, it represented a great truth—that many found themselves in places they were little competent by knowledge or experience to fill. But if they had a man here who undertook the duty as his sole work, he would, for his own sake, try to make it his business, even if he knew nothing whatever of it. The Prime Minister ridiculed the idea that there should be a Minister who would exercise a sort of perpetual supervision over Irish affairs in that House. But that was the consolation that was given to them all through the Bill that there was to be a constant supervision exercised, and that if the Irish Parliament should do anything wrong, which, said the Members of the Government, "We do not for a moment expect, but in the extreme case, in the almost impossible case, that they should do something wrong, we are here to interfere." What they wanted was to put into the Bill the machinery by which that interference could be brought into active play. The Prime Minister said they must wait until they saw what the duties of the Irish Minister would be, because at present they did not know what he would be needed for. Undoubtedly, he would be needed for the question referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Londonderry (Sir T. Lea)—the question of the land. The very moment this Act came into force, then they expected this would be one of the first questions that would be brought before the House, because the Prime Minister had said that it was impossible to conceive that during the next three years this Land Question would not be attempted to be dealt with by some Government in this country. The very moment, therefore, that the appointed day arrived and the Bill came into operation, there was the Land Question, which was not a comparatively small thing as it was in England, but which was almost the whole life of the Irish people, and of great concern to that country. The Prime Minister had also stated that trade matters with regard to Ireland could be dealt with by the President of the Board of Trade, and matters concerning foreign relations could be dealt with by the Foreign Secretary for the entire Empire. But they wanted to have a man whom they would know, who would undertake the duties of the Irish Minister, because he knew something about the inner life of Ireland and Irish concerns generally. They did not want to have Irish affairs scattered over the entire Members of the Government of this country, giving them full proof of the truth of the common saying that what was everybody's business was nobody's business. The Prime Minister said he did not deny that outside these affairs there would be a general responsibility not provided for, and not under the supervision of any of the present Ministers. For example, there might be a matter of conflict on laws, or between class and class. The right hon. Gentleman, after using what he no doubt considered his convincing argument, that the Irish affairs would be scattered among the different Departments of this country, then turned to refute his own argument, and said—"I do not deny there will be a general responsibility not provided for," instancing two classes of cases of the very gravest and greatest importance. Yes; certainly there would be a general responsibility, and, according to the admission of the Prime Minister, there would be needed a Minister to represent that responsibility. The Prime Minister said there might be such a need in the future. The future would have arrived the moment this Bill passed with regard to the Land Question. But the Prime Minister used his customary argument, which was to postpone the evil day, and he said they would postpone the appointment of this Minister to some future time. The right hon. Gentleman said—"I am extremely jealous of a Minister appointed by Statute." If the Prime Minister was jealous of a Minister appointed by Statute, he was face to face with the fact that all recent appointments had been by Statute, and it seemed to be the mind of this country that the appointments for all future time should be made by Statute. In fact, those Ministers whose offices were not created by Statute were old creatures of the past—the recent ones had all been directly and distinctly appointed by Statutes passed by that House. The Prime Minister said—"I know what gentlemen opposite are trying to do ; they are trying to revive another form of the old system of government by Dublin Castle." The old system was simply government by the representative Minister of the Crown for the time being. Dublin Castle was a set of officials absolutely under the power and control of the Irish Chief Secretary for the time, who was a Member of the Government then in power and almost always a Member of the Cabinet ; therefore the idea that they were trying to revive an iniquitous system, which the Prime Minister seemed to imply that Dublin Castle was, was surely a fallacy when they recollected that Dublin Castle was a set of officials governed by a Minister in the Cabinet of this country. It seemed to him there was by this Bill a large number of matters retained from the power of the Irish Parliament, and on which it would not have power to legislate, and according to the Debate that evening matters with which the Irish Executive would not have power to deal. No doubt, some of these matters could be answered for by a particular Minister. For example, any matter regarding trade laws might be under the direction of the President of the Board of Trade ; but with regard to questions most important of all which affected the people, which were calculated to raise feeling in Ireland, and which the minority had their attention particularly turned to, there would be no official in that House when the Chief Secretary was removed who would be able to answer questions or give a scrap of information. Under these circumstances, seeing that the Colonists were represented in the Imperial Parliament, seeing that there was the greatest possible necessity for this Minister, and seeing that, according to the Prime Minister, the Land Question would occupy the attention of that House during the first three years of the existence of the Irish Parliament, surely it was not too much to ask that there should be a responsible Minister, whom, for his part, he should prefer to see in that House.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he thought the Prime Minister hardly treated this Amendment with the attention it deserved. The right hon. Gentleman relied upon one argument only, and that was that there was no reason to suppose that the future exigencies of Parliamentary life in the Imperial Parliament would require a Minister of State to reply for Irish affairs. He could not for a moment agree with the Prime Minister—that there was no experience upon which the Opposition could base their claim for such a Minister. In the first place, what had they to look forward to if this Bill became law ? They had to look forward to a period of Parliamentary life when there would be 80 Irish Members in that House ; and they knew that this Bill was regarded by those Members as merely transitional and tentative, and they had also this fact, which was patent to all who read the Irish Nationalist Press and the speeches made by the supporters of the Prime Minister in Ireland—that they looked upon the whole policy of the right hon. Gentleman as incomplete, and requiring in the next few years the greatest attention of those whose duty it was, as patriotic Irishmen, to obtain that full measure of Home Rule which their country demanded. That being so, it appeared to him the Prime Minister was not justified in saying there was no basis for the demand of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury). It was admitted that there would be a large number of problems of a most difficult and delicate character not solved by this measure. It was admitted that these problems—many of which entailed consequences of an incongruous and inconvenient nature, both to the Irish Government and the Government of the Imperial Ministry—would be complicated by the fact that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who was to represent the Crown and to be the Representative of the Imperial sovereignty of Parliament, was not confined in his action to one character, but would have to occupy three or four different positions. He would first of all be a purely Imperial servant ; secondly, he would be a sort of Constitutional Monarch, who would be guided by the advice of an Irish Cabinet ; and, thirdly, he would occupy a position which was consonant with neither of these two occupations—namely, he would have to act entirely upon his own responsibility, for instance, in relation to duties imposed upon him in regard to the Irish Constabulary for a period of six years, or perhaps onger. That being so, it appeared to him it was impossible to leave all these questions to the random consideration of some Minister or other of the future Imperial Government. The Chief Secretary had told them that the Government as a whole would be responsible; but that was a most unsatisfactory position in which to leave the matter. They all knew that from time to time questions arose in connection with which there was doubt as to what Minister was responsible, and after trying various Secretaries of State the unfortunate Member who was desirous of eliciting some definite answer to his query was referred from one Department to another by successive Secretaries of State, and was at last obliged to apply to the Prime Minister. They also knew that all Leaders of that House took advantage of the doubt and uncertainty which applied to the duties of the particular office to shuffle out of an awkward question. The hon. Member for Preston did not desire to appoint this Irish Minister for the purpose of interfering with the Irish Government. He did not say that this Minister ought to have any right to be or ought to be a Member of the Irish Cabinet; but he ought to represent in that House the relation between the Imperial Parliament and Ireland in the same way that the Colonial Secretary represented the connection between the Colonies and this country. The Prime Minister stated that the proposition of the hon. Member for Preston that this Minister was to be a symbol of the Imperial supremacy was to degrade the Imperial supremacy altogether. He did not agree with that, and he did not believe there were any Constitutional grounds for the view taken by the Prime Minister. At all events, there was the very high Constitutional authority of Mr. Hallam for the exactly opposite view. In one of the most powerful passages in his work on the Constitutional history of this country, Mr. Hallam had contended that the sovereignty of Parliament was principally established and maintained by the fact that within the walls of Parliament there were Ministers responsible to the Representatives of the people and to the sovereign power of the country; and it was in order to preserve the Imperial supremacy and the sovereign power of that House that he (Mr. Macartney) desired to see a Minister of State appointed, upon whose shoulders there would be a definite responsibility with regard to Irish affairs. The presence of 80 Irish Members in the House made it imperatively necessary there should be some Minister in the Imperial Parliament upon whom definite responsibility could be cast in relation to the action of the agent of the Imperial Parliament—the person who in Ireland represented that supremacy, and who had to exercise that veto with regard to supremacy of which they had heard so much in the country, and of which they saw so little in the provisions of that Bill. The occasions on which doubt must arise in the mind of the Lord Lieutenant—no matter how capable and efficient a public servant he might be—must be innumerable; and he would then be put to the very greatest extremity in dealing with matters submitted to the consideration of the Irish Parliament, and afterwards submitted to him for his exercise of the veto or not. What provision was there by which the communication between him and the Imperial Government would be simple and easy? Was it proposed in the instrument of his appointment to give him specific directions as to what Minister of State he was to apply to on the various questions that might arise. Let them assume that Parliament was not sitting, and the Members of the Cabinet were scattered to the four winds of Heaven. What Minister was the Lord Lieutenant to select to advise him upon one of these intricate and difficult problems which it was admitted by the framers of the Bill would be left to the decision of the Irish Parliament, or of the Lord Lieutenant, or of the Imperial Parliament? He thought the manner in which the Government had dealt with this whole matter showed that they had no intention of dealing with the relations of the Imperial Parliament to the Irish Legislature in a fashion which would be consonant with the professions they had made to the House and the country. Experience had shown it was necessary to have a Minister to meet the demands that were made by their relations to the Colonies in that or the other House; and he said that their experience of the past, together with the necessities this Bill created, made the appointment of a Minister to represent Ireland in an authoritative manner in the Imperial Parliament in the future an absolute necessity. He hoped, therefore, the Government would accede to the Amendment.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) expressed the opinion that not only would the convenience of Parliament be greatly served by having concentrated in one Minister matters relating to Ireland, but that if hon. Members who desired the establishment of a separate Parliament in Ireland would only look at the matter not from the point of view of the interference of an Irish Minister in that House with local affairs in Ireland, but from the point of view of the actual working of a Public Department, they would come to the conclusion that the adoption of such a proposal as that contained in the Amendment was the most important stroke they could make for the success of an Irish Parliament. What was the experience with regard to the Colonial Secretary? Did anybody suppose it likely that on any Colonial measure of importance the views of the Colonies would be considered by the Cabinet in the sense desired by the Colony if the responsibility rested not upon one Minister, but was divided among an irresponsible body of 12 or 14 Ministers? He thought the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) would himself feel that if Irish action were challenged in that House here would be no greater safeguard for Irish interests being properly represented or Irish opinion being properly expressed in the Cabinet than the fact that an Irish Minister was present there and could also submit them to Parliament. What he thought they suffered from now more than anything else was that at this moment and for years past they had had a majority of Representatives from Ireland and not one of whom had a share in the Government of this country. He was speaking from the Imperial point of view, and he said there were men sitting on the Irish Benches at this moment who were absolutely in accord with the Ministry of the day, but for reasons which did them honour they preferred to hold themselves aloof from actual government and the emoluments of Office. That had been the case for many years. They had had many men sitting below the Gangway who practically had the power in that House, and they had had men sitting in Office who, without the Irish Members, had not the power. It was unquestionably one of the great weaknesses of the present Administration that they had a large number of supporters many of whom were competent, and would be desirable Members of its Administration, and yet not one of them, for certain reasons, was willing to join the Government. Was the farce really going to be perpetuated of having 80 Irish Members, who by the Bill were to be here for all purposes, not one of whom was to have a seat in this Government, or, if he did, could not be put there to deal with the affairs of the country he was to represent? It seemed to him that if, as was generally admitted, there was to be Imperial control, it was an irrational thing that that Imperial control should not be stereotyped in one person as was the case in regard to our Colonies at the present time. In the case of our Colonies, the highest distinction to which a man looked forward, next to that of Prime Minister, was to become Agent General to Great Britain. It was obvious, then, that it was an admirable Imperial instinct which induced men who had been Prime Ministers in their Colonies to come here as Agents General. If we now got the best men here from these Colonies who had no Bills to pass or money to vote in London, surely they could see what ought to happen in the case of those who were forced to have an Imperial instinct, who were to be obliged to come here to make Imperial laws. For that reason, he thought it would be a great misfortune if this self-denying ordinance laid down by hon. Members (the Irish Members) were to be applicable. It might be reasonable at present, but it would not be so under Home Rule. As to the Office of Irish Minister, he did not enter into that, beyond saying that probably the Chief Secretaryship for Ireland would be held, if one Party were in power, by men like the hon. Member for South Longford (Mr. Blake), and, if another were in power, by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). But to say that no man who might be an Irish Representative in the Imperial Parliament was to have a possibility of dealing with Irish affairs in this House in a responsible situation seemed to him to negative everything contained in the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would not put off until another Session what must be, and would be, the result of this measure — the establishment, from motives of convenience as well as of policy, of a Minister who would be responsible for the affairs of Ireland in the House of Commons—a position which could not properly be filled by the Viceroy, who, according to the Prime Minister, might be a Member of the Imperial Cabinet. He trusted the Government would recognise the importance of the question in time, and that they would not allow it to stand until another Session, but would deal with it in the calmer atmosphere of the present on the simple judgment as to what was best for Ireland and best for the Imperial position.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had said some gracious things of the Irish Members, which, on their behalf, he acknowledged; but there were some things to which he took exception. The latter portion of the hon. Gentleman's argument was based on the proposition that, unless there were established a Minister for Irish affairs, it would be practically impossible for any one of the 80 Members who were to be sent to the Imperial Parliament to become a Member of the Imperial Government. Well, Scotland had a population of 4,000,000—not as much as Ireland—and that country had six Members in the Cabinet. The hon. Gentleman said the Irish Secretary was not necessarily to be a Member from Ireland, and unless they insisted upon it that he should be, they could not take any part in the government of the country.

MR. BRODRICK said, he did not say "the government of the country." He referred to the government of the country which the Members would come here to represent.

*MR. BLAKE said, Members, in a sense, came from Scotland to represent Scotland, from England to represent England; but they came not to represent those particular portions of the country only, but to represent the whole United Kingdom. The Members from Ireland would come in the same sense. They did not propose to come here to represent Ireland alone, nor to deal with Irish local affairs alone, or, indeed, at all, but to take their part in the common concerns of the United Kingdom. He denied that there was any self-denying ordinance in their objecting to the Amendment. There would be a self-denying ordinance, he thought, in assenting to it. He was glad to feel assured that, this Amendment not being agreed to, yet whatever Member of the Government accepted the duty of becoming the medium of communication and the exponent of the views of the Viceroy might still be an Irishman. He regretted, with the hon. Member, that the circumstances of the past had made it necessary, obviously necessary, that the Members of the Irish Party should take no part in the Government of the Empire; and he rejoiced, if he might be allowed to say so, with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brodrick) that, on this Bill becoming an Act, those circumstances would be ended, and it would then be competent for them to take a common part in that Government. But he hoped that there would be no such limitation as was suggested—that the Minister to be appointed from among Irishmen would not be merely the Irish Secretary; but that they would be allowed to take such common part in the work of government as their own merits might deserve and as they might justly claim as good citizens of the Empire.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he wondered what conclusion Ministers had arrived at as to the particular one of their many Bills they were now discussing. They were supposed to be discussing one which got rid of Irish questions in that House. But that was not so. Ministers seemed to be under the impression that Irish questions were got rid of; but most important questions remained—the questions of the Army and Navy, relationship with the Colonies, finance, the Post Office arrangements, and other important matters—police and the land. Each one of them was of sufficient importance, he thought, to necessitate a Minister in this country. The Imperial matters in Ireland were still to be treated here, and it followed from this that they did not get rid of Ireland. If there was a case for a Minister of Agriculture in England, how was it, in these circumstances, that there was not a case for a Minister for Imperial affairs in Ireland? It was a very remarkable thing that it was suggested there was to be no interference with Ireland after the passing of this Bill. He must point out that there was a most minute and intimate interference by Clause 12 of the Bill, which provided that the Comptroller and Auditor General was to go into the whole of the finances—not of Ireland only, but of the relative finances of Ireland and England—and who was, upon his own determination in this country, to issue an order, and to send it to the Lord Lieutenant; and upon that act—which was to be mandatory on the Lord Lieutenant—no payment was to be made out of the funds of the Irish Exchequer until the Comptroller and Auditor General had been satisfied. That was an instance of extreme minuteness. Then he came to the question of a Minister. It was admitted there was to be a Minister here to speak for Ireland—the Home Secretary. The only question was whether there was to be a special Minister, or whether, in addition to his duties, the Home Secretary was to undertake this duty in connection with Ireland? It seemed to him that the Prime Minister had shown that want of respect for Ireland and that want of sense of the dignity of Irish affairs of which he had so often accused them (the Opposition). According to the right hon. Gentleman, these affairs were not to be worthy of having a Minister—they were not of sufficient importance to warrant the appointment of a special Minister. The Post Office in England was, in itself, enough to warrant the appointment of a Minister; and yet the Home Secretary was to have all these matters under his control. He thought he was right in saying that the Home Secretary was not, however, to be responsible, so that a fatal duality existed in his case, as in the case of every official under the Bill. The Prime Minister said he objected, because the Amendment would make any appointment of an Irish Minister a statutory post. Yet every one of the instances that he quoted was statutory. He said that the Secretary of State for India was created for special reasons. The appointment was for the same reason that existed in this case. It was expected in the case quoted by the Prime Minister that the work would be very great; in this case they did not know how much work would have to be done, but they knew it would be very great. Another reason given by the Prime Minister was that no Minister should be personally responsible, but the Cabinet should be responsible in its corporate capacity. That was an entirely wrong and equally false doctrine under the British Constitution. They ought to have fixed responsibility. The proposition of the Prime Minister meant that they should have no responsibility at all. Was the late Mr. John Bright responsible for the bombardment of Alexandria—an act which he denounced as a crime against the laws of nations and the moral law, and upon which he left the Ministry of that day? Would they impeach Mr. Bright in that case? He was a Member of the Cabinet that ordered the bombardment—there was no record kept of Cabinet meetings, and they could not know the extent of his responsibility; but he was a Member of the Cabinet, and the inference was that he was a party to what was done, though he afterwards denounced it. They should have, therefore, in his opinion, a Minister who would be personally responsible, and no corporate responsibility. Another reason put forward by the Prime Minister was that his hon. Friend wished to keep Dublin Castle in existence; but this Bill kept Dublin Castle in existence, because the Lord Lieutenant had added importance as a quasi-chief of a quasi-independent State. Were they going to burn down Dublin Castle, while they charged £5,000 for the Lord Lieutenant's household? There must be an administrative staff to carry on the business of Ireland, and his impression was that after the Act passed there would be more of the Dublin Castle spirit than before, as the gentlemen below the Gangway (the Irish Members) would be much readier to assert their authority; and if any resistance was made to the laws of the Irish Parliament, there would be a speedier expression than they had yet seen. He certainly thought they ought to have a Minister in this House who would give fair and proper consideration to Irish affairs, and who would be in a position to answer for them to the House.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) said, he opposed the Amendment, because it was distinctly Separatist in spirit and in all its forms. They had been 77 days discussing this Bill; yet hon. Gentlemen did not understand that the scope and object of the Bill was to make Ireland autonomous in reference to local affairs, and to unite Ireland more closely with Great Britain in Imperial matters. They united Ireland more closely in those matters with themselves, in so far as they did not put any distinctively Irish Minister in the Imperial Parliament. Why should they make this distinction in the case of Ireland? For his part, he thought that Ireland would be more closely united to England under the Bill than ever before. This was not a Conservative proposal. When Ireland had a separate Parliament there never was an Irish Minister in the English House of Commons. The business relating to Ireland was transacted by the Home Secretary. But it was said that Irish affairs would continue with them still. Technically, he would remind them, there was no Secretary of State for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Morley) was merely Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The matter was not one of policy. Within the last few years the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), when Home Secretary, was asked a question with regard to Ireland, and he admitted that he was responsible. Through circumstances that had arisen during the past 25 years the Chief Secretary had discharged the duties of a Secretary of State, though he was not a Secretary of State; but, previous to that, the business was always conducted by the Home Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would be aware that the great Duke of Wellington held the Office of Chief Secretary while away at the Peninsular War. Before the Union what occurred was that the Lord Lieutenant took over to Ireland with him as Chief Secretary a person who was always a Member of the English Parliament. The only Irish Secretary who did not sit in the English Parliament at that time was Lord Castlereagh. By this Amendment they would create a new Office, which would have a Separatist tendency so far as related to Irish matters. They (the Irish Members) did not wish that there should be any such Office after this Bill became law. They had the greatest wish to do everything they could to avoid the tendency which this Amendment would impose; and they did not, for the reasons he had stated, wish to have an Office of this character.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University): The Secretary for Scotland!

MR. MAC NEILL said, the Secretary for Scotland was only appointed in 1885, and he was not a Secretary of State; he was merely Secretary for Scotland. There was a Secretary for Scotland for 10 years after the Union, and then the Office was dissolved. The reason of the revival of the Office was that there was no local Parliament in Scotland; if there were such a Parliament there would be no Secretary, for Scotland would no longer have separate concerns in this House. This was a Separatist Amendment, and sought to create an Office which had never yet been created and which would be out of harmony with the scope and object of the Bill, and, therefore, he could not vote for it.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he did not think the reasons given by the hon. Member for South Donegal were reasons against the adoption of the Amendment. If they admitted that, on the passing of that Bill, England and Ireland would be drawn more closely together, it seemed to him that in that case—with a separation of domestic and general matters—it would be necessary to have someone in that House who would be responsible for Irish matters. Under the 4th clause certain questions were to have a partial jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature. It was said Irish affairs would be under the control of the Home Secretary; but he was not to be responsible. As regarded the Lord Lieutenant, he might have a seat in the other House. And what was the Lord Lieutenant's position at the present time? Only the other day a question arose in the other House in which the Lord Lieutenant was concerned, and it was found that he need not be there while the question was being considered. How were Englishmen, who had relations with different places in Ireland, to be sure on various points in which they would be interested unless they adopted this proposal? They should, he thought, have some Minister whom they could make responsible? The question had been argued as an Irish question, but he looked at it as an English one. It was as much an English question as an Irish question. They could not separate the two interests. He held that they should have some responsible Minister, as he said, and for that reason he hoped the House would agree to the Amendment.

SIR H. JAMES said, they had never had before such a condition of things as they would have in Ireland when she had a Legislature of her own and 80 Members in the House. They could not, therefore, look at precedent in this matter, and they must be guided by what they considered sound principle and the public advantage. This was much worse than a Parliamentary matter. It represented the Government of Ireland, and reflected the condition of things that would exist in Ireland as well as in this Parliament. The Lord Lieutenant had to act in three capacities. He would be a Lord Lieutenant guided by Irish advice, he would be a Lord Lieutenant guided by Imperial advice, and he would be a Lord Lieutenant acting without any advice at all. As to the first capacity, it might be said that the Imperial Parliament had very little to do with the matter; but with what he did in the second and third capacities this House had everything to do. If he were to have advice from a British Executive, if he was to obtain any benefit whatever from such advice, there ought to be a responsible person to advise him. The answer given by the Prime Minister showed the difficulty of the position the Lord Lieutenant was about to be placed in. In seeking advice as to the subjects excepted in Clause 3, he would appeal to the heads of different Departments according to the subject on which advice was required. In matters of trade he was to go to the Board of Trade. In matters of treason and treason felony he would go to the Law Officers of the Crown, and so on. He was to go to the head of every Department. What did that mean? Why, that every one of the heads of these Departments would have to give an Irish Representative of the Queen advice affecting Ireland without any knowledge of what was occurring in Ireland. It was to be British advice. What did the President of the Board of Trade know about Ireland?

AN hon. MEMBER: Just about as much as you.

SIR H. JAMES: That observation, made with the usual courtesy of hon. Gentlemen opposite, bore upon the whole point of his argument. What would be the use of the Lord Lieutenant coming to him for a legal opinion about Ireland when he knew nothing about the country? The Lord Lieutenant at present was advised by a Chief Secretary who devoted all his official energies to Irish affairs. This most unhappy individual, the Lord Lieutenant, was to have advice wherever he could get it, from men who would know nothing of the subjects in their Irish aspects. Would it not be well to consider whether, when they entrusted the destinies of the country to such a person, he should not have someone by his side to assist him with advice? But there was another view of the question. The Lord Lieutenant, it might be said, when he was advised by a Department, could find a Parliamentary Representative in the House. But when he acted without advice at all, and a question was raised in that House, who was to answer for him? He was said to be a Minister responsible to that House. Each member of the British Government would say, in this case—"The matter is not in my Department. What have I to do with it?" Where, then, would be the supremacy and the supervision of this Parliament? They had been told over and over again, when they asked how the Imperial Parliament was to undertake the control of the Irish Legislature, that the Lord Lieutenant was answerable to Parliament. But who would be his mouthpiece? Who would represent him?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Government as a whole.

SIR H. JAMES said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was now laying down a Constitutional doctrine. He said that the Government, as a whole, would represent the Lord Lieutenant who would not be advised by anyone, and who was not to look to any individual Minister to represent him. Then it followed that the Government, as a whole, might be censured for acts it had taken no part in and had never been consulted about; and a good Government of Great Britain might be turned out of Office and cease to govern Great Britain because the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had done something they never knew of. The position taken up by the Government was absurd. It reduced the Parliamentary administration of the country to a condition that did not result from any necessity or policy of wisdom, but from the difficulty of endeavouring to carry on the Government of two countries together—partly separating them, giving them different Executives for some matters and the same Executive for other matters, and all the time endeavouring to maintain the sham of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and Executive. He recollected that in an early part of these discussions the hon. Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), who spoke with considerable weight on the matter, had told them that the Executive in Ireland would be answerable to the Parliament of Ireland and Great Britain. Well, if that Executive was to be answerable to the Parliament of Great Britain, ought it not to be represented in that Parliament? How were they to call the Irish Executive to account—how were they to get information from it? Who was to be its mouthpiece, and guide it in all matters that were Imperial matters affecting Great Britain? There would be nobody. Why was that? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said they wished to avoid an undue line of interest—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no!

SIR H. JAMES said, the right hon. Gentleman's explanation was that there was to be no undue interference with Irish affairs on the part of the Imperial Parliament. But they had reserved to the Imperial Parliament some 20 subjects under Clause 3, and had fixed on that Parliament the duty of taking a lively interest in them, and yet they were not to have any means of developing that interest or of obtaining information except from the public Press. It had been said they were never to let go their hold upon Irish affairs; that they were still to be a United Kingdom and a united Parliament, with 80 Members from Ireland in that House; but, whilst Irish Members were to maintain great power in the Imperial Parliament to control the fate of Parties, they shrank from bearing any responsibility in regard to Irish affairs. ["No, no!"] They shrank from the responsibility of making answer for what was going on in Ireland. The Prime Minister said—"You have nothing to do with Irish internal affairs—"

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I never said anything of the sort.

SIR H. JAMES said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had said they had nothing to do with Irish affairs so as to entitle them to interfere.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is a subordinate Legislature.

SIR H. JAMES said, the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the Irish Legislature would have to deal with composite matters that were partly British and partly Irish and with matters that were purely Imperial, and of these two classes the right hon. Gentleman seemed to take no heed. The Amendment showed the position to which the new Irish Executive had brought them; the Lord Lieutenant, in three capacities, was to be represented in the Imperial Parliament in none, and thus, if the Bill passed with the Amendment unaccepted, they would be losing entire control over Irish internal affairs; and if they attempted to interfere in matters which were not purely internal, they would find themselves in a hopeless position, with the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament reduced to a contemptible absurdity.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, it was at present the right of every aggrieved individual in the United Kingdom to bring his case, whatever it might be, immediately under the view of this great tribunal, and what he wanted to understand was whether what they had feared was to be the fact—namely, that those he represented—a large number of their fellow-citizens in Ireland—were in this matter to be put on an inferior footing to other subjects of the Queen? He wanted to know whether, if a man in Ireland were wronged in respect to matters in the control of the Irish Legislature, or matters which he thought the Irish should have under their control, he was to be deprived of the power of bringing his grievance instantly and effectually under the view of the House? If such were the case, they would have taken from the Loyalists of Ireland one of the few remaining protections they greatly valued. The one thing that kept hope alive in many parts of Ireland was the certain knowledge that any injustice to which they were exposed would be dealt with promptly and effectually in the House of Commons. Would there be no single Minister charged with the duty of answering questions with regard to personal wrong suffered by people in Ireland? for, if not, Irishmen would be the only inhabitants of the United Kingdom whose wrongs would be hidden and not attended to. Was there to be no one in the House capable of giving the true facts as to these grievances, and were there to be no means of reaching the tribunal of public opinion. It was absolutely idle to say that each Minister would answer for the correlative Department in Ireland. The absurdity of it was apparent on the face of it. Was one part of a question to be addressed to the

Sir H. James

First Lord of the Treasury, another part to the First Commissioner of Works, and a third part to the Secretary to the Treasury—because it might be that according to strict formularism a question might in substance distribute itself over three Departments? They wanted a man who had abundant experience like the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, and those who had preceded him in Office. He was not sure that it would not be better to have another Minister in the place of a Chief Secretary, but he honestly said that the experience even a Chief Secretary acquired, and the knowledge he possessed, fitted him for dealing with these matters infinitely better than any of the colleagues who sat beside him. Was he to tell his constituents that they were to be placed in a permanent position of inferiority as compared with Englishmen and Scotchmen? If so, he should feel free to comment on the message, and to point out that with less consideration went less obligation.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, he rose to put a question to the Chief Secretary. When in Committee they were discussing the question of the power committed to Colonial Governors of reserving the assent of the Crown to Bills passed by Colonial Legislatures, the Leader of the Opposition put this case: Supposing the Irish Parliament were sitting when the Imperial Parliament was in Recess and no Cabinet Council could be summoned without inconvenience, would it not be well to give the Lord Lieutenant power to suspend the assent of the Crown to any Irish Bill? The Chief Secretary answered the question by saying that a Cabinet would have to be summoned if the question became a Cabinet question, but that ordinarily it would not become such. Generally the Minister would deal with the question on his own responsibility, and be ultimately responsible to the Cabinet. He (Mr. Gerald Balfour) rose to ask whether, in giving that reply, the Chief Secretary had in his mind a single Minister such as was contemplated by his hon. Friend, or, if not, what was meant?

MR. J. MORLEY said, that the answer to the hon. Member was not very difficult. When he said that the Minister in such a case would act on his own responsibility he referred to the Minister, whoever he might be—the Home Secretary or someone else — on whom the Cabinet devolved the responsibility of representing them upon the particular occasion. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen appeared to be amused. Any one Secretary of State, the hon. Member must be aware, could perform any duty or office devolving upon any other Secretary of State; and there could be nothing ridiculous in the possibility that owing to the state of Business the Irish Department would at one time be represented by one Minister and at another time by another.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to move an Amendment to Sub-section 3, Clause 5. He wished to provide that the Lord Lieutenant should give or withhold the Royal Assent to Bills "in accordance with instructions given by Her Majesty." The sub-section as it stood provided that the Lord Lieutenant should give or withhold assent on the advice of the Executive Committee of the Irish Privy Council as a rule, subject to special instructions he might receive from Her Majesty in special cases. His contention was that the Lord Lieutenant should exercise the veto as an Imperial officer, and as a sentinel for England and the Empire—without being bound by the advice of the Executive Committee. Pray what was that Committee? Yesterday's Debate had shown that ultimately it would be an Irish Act that would regulate the constitution of the Executive Committee, and the House might be quite sure that sooner or later—and sooner rather than later—every Member of the Committee would belong to the Irish Executive and sit in the Irish Legislature. These men would enjoy the confidence of the majority, and would, in the highest and truest sense of the term, represent the Irish Legislature, just as much as the Ministers who sat on the Front Bench opposite represented the House of Commons. These were the men who were to advise the Lord Lieutenant as to the exercise of the veto. If any objection were taken to an Irish Act, or to a series of Irish Acts, an appeal might be made to the Lord Lieutenant. What, however, would be the use of such an appeal? The Lord

Lieutenant would only, as a general rule, exercise the veto on the advice of those who were the leading Members of the Legislature, whose measure he was called upon to set aside, and who were probably the men who had procured the passing of the measure. To say that the Lord Lieutenant was to exercise the veto on the advice of these men was to turn the veto into a sham—to make it an unsubstantial, shadowy, and unreal thing. An appeal to the Lord Lieutenant to exercise the veto would really be an appeal from the Irish Executive to the Irish Executive—an appeal not from Philip in one condition to Philip in another condition, but from Philip sober to Philip still sober. If the veto was to be of any use it must be independently exercised by an Imperial officer, acting solely on the advice of Her Majesty's Imperial advisers. He could imagine no case in which the veto (as proposed in this Bill) would be of any real value, except a case in which an objectionable Bill, having been passed by one Ministry, an appeal for the exercise of the veto was made to their successors. These successors might advise the Lord Lieutenant to veto. This, however, was so improbable a case as to verge on the impossible. The veto had been often put forward as the one thing upon which the Protestants and the Ulster Loyalists were to rely, but it was even more of a sham than the other safeguards under the Bill. It was conceivable that the Government might say that, wherever real wrong had been done, or reasonable complaint might arise, the Lord Lieutenant might, under the latter part of the sub-section, apply to the Home Government for Her Majesty's instructions, and that those instructions might be so far extended as to constitute rules governing almost any case that might arise. However, he could hardly conceive the Government saying that, because they might just as well accept his Amendment. It was conceivable that it would be said that if the veto were exercised in the way he proposed the Irish Ministers would resign. If, however, they did, it was obvious that they would not submit to the supremacy of England, and that they had only accepted a shadowy supremacy on the ground that it was never likely to be brought into operation. He submitted that there were great dangers throughout the Bill, and the only chance of the Opposition was to obtain real safeguards, and that those safeguards should be administered by persons who were entirely independent of the Irish Legislature and dependent upon no one except the Parliament of Great Britain. He earnestly hoped that the House would give consideration to his Amendment and would preserve intact and inviolable the exercise of the veto.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 39, to leave out the words "on the advice of the said Executive Committee," and insert the words "in accordance with instructions given by Her Majesty."—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I must pay one compliment—I really cannot offer many—to the hon. Baronet, and it is to this effect: that I think he has devised for Ireland a provision that has hitherto been totally unknown in every country in Europe. The ancient practice always was to admit large legislative freedom in secondary and dependent States, but to view with extreme jealousy the grant of Executive power. That was the way England proceeded in the case of Grattan's Parliament. I do not recollect whether the veto was ever trusted to as a mode of thwarting the action of Grattan's Parliament, though the Government sometimes made use of its interest for the purpose of defeating measures in that Parliament. The hon. Member proposes to introduce a new state of things. He proposes to take away from the Executive Council all semblance of functions in regard to the legislation of Ireland. That is a most extraordinary reversal of the practice heretofore pursued for the regulation of the Government. I do not require to discuss it at any length. I must admit that the hon. Baronet has fairly laid the axe to the root of the tree. After we have introduced a Bill and debated it 77 days or more for the purpose of giving local freedom to Ireland, he, in an Amendment of a few words, proposes entirely to destroy that Bill. It would be a mockery to Ireland or to any other country, under the name of a Bill for the Government of Ireland, to carry a measure under which the passing or non-passing of every Bill which had gone through the two Houses of the Irish Legislature was to be determined by directions from England. I confess I do not see the wisdom or advantage of this method of coming back again and again, and again and again, first in one form and then in another form, to a principle which has been affirmed by the House over and over again after unexampled discussion and, under the name of modest and unassuming Amendments, framing provisions which would be totally fatal to the whole object and purpose of the measure. I think we have made every necessary provision not only for meeting British feeling, but also for meeting British jealousies in regard to legislation. The Government have provided—and the Representatives of Ireland have taken no objection to it—that in any case in which the Sovereign or her advisers see occasion to interfere they will be entitled to interfere. The hon. Baronet is not satisfied with that, and proposes to sweep away the whole legislative freedom which it has been the purpose and the work of this lengthened Session to give to Ireland. I need hardly say that the Government are totally unable to listen to any such proposal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am somewhat astonished at the brief reply which the Prime Minister has deemed adequate in the case of this very important Amendment. The reply of the right hon. Gentleman amounts to this: that the proper way of checking the action of a subordinate Parliament is by putting limitations on its Executive power.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say that, or any thing like it. I dealt with the history of the question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then what did the right hon. Gentleman say? I listened, as I always do, with attention and interest to his observations, and I say that that was the impression produced by his argument. I certainly understood him to convey to the House that there were two ways of dealing with a subordinate Parliament, one by circumscribing its Executive power and the other by limiting its Executive power. The right hon. Gentleman derided the hon. Baronet, and said that he had devised a new Constitution for Ireland—a thing which never entered into the head of the right hon. Gentleman. Such an argument comes with peculiarly bad grace from a Government which has been occupied during the early hours of this evening in checking our efforts to circumscribe the Executive powers of the Irish Legislature. Up till 8 o'clock we were trying to carry out the policy which the right hon. Gentleman now says is so superior to the proposal of my hon. Friend, and surely it is a little ungracious on their part to say that my hon. Friend may not try any other method to check the Irish Government in any undue exercise of the powers conferred by the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, when he interrupted me a little while ago, said he was dealing with the history of the question, but I venture to think it is hardly adequate to say that he bases his statement on an historical survey. He appears to think that my hon. Friend has devised an entirely new method for dealing with a subordinate Parliament—a method not only unknown to history in general, but to Ireland in particular. But in Grattan's Parliament every Act had to be submitted to the Great Seal of England; in other words, the policy of this Amendment is the policy of Grattan's Parliament. My hon. Friend has gone back on Irish history, and has given again to Ireland more than was taken from her by the Act of Union, of which we have heard so much. The clause provides that the Lord Lieutenant is to give his assent to every Act of the Irish Legislature on the advice of the Irish Administration, except in those cases in which the English Government choose to interfere. In other words, this Parliament potentially has the power to stop every Act of the Irish Legislature. Certainly the clause does not lay it down that they are to exercise that power, but it leaves the whole question in a condition of ambiguity as between the Lord Lieutenant acting on the advice of one set of advisers and on that of another set. My hon. Friend desires to simplify that matter. It is evident that the Amendment will not increase the power of the Irish Administration, and it is equally certain that it does not increase the responsibility of the British Administration, because if the latter have the power to stop all legislation they must also have the right to examine it. These powers and responsibility will remain unaltered if the Amendment is accepted, and the only change it will effect will be to get rid of the present absurd ambiguity. Can the Government, in the whole circuit of Representative Constitutions, point to any case in which the veto was given to one set of individuals to be exercised by them unless another set chose to interfere? I think the matter is really beyond argument. Let us make this question quite clear. I agree that in practice pettifogging interference would be impolitic, and perhaps impossible; but, as the Government leave to the British Government the responsibility of stopping Irish legislation, the Amendment will remove the ambiguity of the clause without bringing in its otiose and ridiculously illogical features. I hope that in this country we shall always have sensible Ministers from whatever Party they may be drawn, and if we have then any interference under the Amendment or under the clause will never be constant or of a pettifogging character. Then why complicate the whole machinery of the Bill by introducing this fifth wheel of Irish advice, when British interference is to be always supreme? The Amendment will work no injury to Ireland, and I hope that the Government will not oppose it out of any undue deference to Irish susceptibilities.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said, the clause, instead of being marked by ambiguity, inutility, and impracticability represented what they believed would be the practical working of the Constitution. It was expected—and the right hon. Gentleman had acknowledged to a considerable extent the justice of the expectation—that the Acts of the Irish Legislature would become law, not by virtue of the consideration of them by the Imperial Executive—although they might be exposed to review by that Executive—but on the advice of the Irish Executive. They believed that normally the Bills would be such as ought to be passed into Acts; and, if so, it was fitting that they should become law only on the responsibility of the Irish Executive, and it should not be that the Imperial Executive should make them into Acts by its assent. Of course, if there were any grave abuse of Imperial interests or of delegated powers then the Imperial Executive could intervene and assert its power by dissent. There certainly was no ambiguity in the clause, which represented the state of things that would exist in practice.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I looked at the Amendment

on the Paper with every desire to appreciate its importance, and I confess that although it deals with an important question—namely, the subject of the veto—I do not think that the Amendment is likely to raise any serious Debate. So far as the Irish Parliament and the Irish Executive are concerned, the veto will be a matter of form. One is not likely to veto the act of the other which has placed them in power. It could only be necessary to do such a thing when a grave mistake has been made, which can only be remedied by destroying the Bill. I cannot speak with certainty, but I do not believe there is any example in which a British Executive has advised the Queen to veto a Bill passed by a Parliament in which that Executive is in the majority. When we talk about the veto, therefore, it is not the veto of the Irish Executive to which we attach importance. It is the veto of the British Executive which we are told is the real security, and the, in fact, most cardinal feature of the Bill. Now, the hon. Baronet, feeling that the veto of the Irish Executive was never likely to be used, and constituted, therefore, a useless provision in the Bill, proposed to simplify the clause by omitting it. That appeared to be a small matter. But what did the Prime Minister say about this apparently innocent Amendment? He said that the hon. Baronet was once again deliberately attempting to reverse the principle which had been again and again adopted in the House, and that he was going by this Amendment to sweep away the legislative freedom of the Irish Ministry, thereby taking away from the Irish Executive the power to veto their own Bills.

*MR. BLAKE: It is the power of assenting to their own Bills for which I contend.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is not necessary for them to assent. The Bills will pass without their assent, unless they are dissented from by the British Executive. The only power you are asked to take away is a power which will never be exercised unless the Parliament makes some extravagant blunder. I must say I am utterly astonished at the importance which the right hon. Gentleman attaches to this Amendment. He has accused the hon. Baronet of introducing an absolutely new principle into our discussions and into the Constitution we are making and he has described my hon. Friend as a rara avis—a sort of black swan in Constitution making. He has spoken as if this were an absolutely new proposal, whereas it is precisely the same proposal which the Prime Minister himself put forward in the Bill of 1886. And, forsooth, because my hon. Friend is but a humble imitator of the right hon. Gentleman, the Prime Minister falls foul of him, and declares that he desires to sweep away the whole legislative freedom of the Irish Parliament. I never before heard of such a remarkable instance of forgetfulness as that displayed by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. DARLING said, he thought there was one consideration that might reconcile the Government to the Amendment and induce them to accept it. Throughout the Debates on the Bill it had been impressed upon them that they must do nothing in any way to hurt the unreasoning susceptibilities of Irish legislators. Now, he would venture to point out that if the Amendment were carried the sole and only veto which could be applied in the case of an Irish Bill would be the same veto as was applied to any Bill which had passed through that House. There was no particular degradation in that; but if the clause was passed as it stood, then a Bill which had passed through all its stages in the Irish Legislature and received the assent of the Executive Committee could be vetoed by the direct interposition of the Sovereign acting on the advice of a Minister in the House of Commons. Could anything be more humiliating to the Irish people than that? Surely it would be better for the Prime Minister—recognising that first thoughts were often best—to revert to his proposal of 1886?

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.) thought the Amendment of the hon. Baronet might very well be argued in two parts—firstly, as to what it proposed to cut out of the Bill; and, secondly, as to what it recommended in substitution of the omitted words. When in Committee it was proposed to omit the words “on the advice of the said Executive Committee,” it was pointed out to the Government that the words were not to be found in the Constitution of any one of our Colonial Legislatures; that they were not contained in the original Australian Acts, in the British North America Act, nor in the Act establishing Constitutional Government at the Cape of Good Hope. The Government admitted the accuracy of the statement, but replied that they were now acting on what experience had proved to be necessary. But, if that were so, why, in 1885, in the scheme for a Federal Council for Australasia, were no words inserted analogous to those in this Bill? Since those arguments were used in Committee, the whole scheme of the Government had been changed, for at that time it was supposed that the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament would have no direct influence on purely English and Scotch legislation. But the present situation was that 80 Irish Members would be in the Imperial Parliament exercising what would be, to all intents and purposes, all the powers of a veto on Scottish and English legislation, while English and Scottish Members would have no control over Irish legislation akin to the manner in which they had some influence on Colonial legislation, though the Colonies were not represented as Ireland would be in the Imperial Parliament. Hence the defence of these words set up in Committee would not hold good now.

MR. SEXTON said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had sneered at the hon. Member for South Donegal, who, he thought, was quite capable of holding his own as against the right hon. Gentleman, and certainly as against the inarticulate legislators above the Gangway on the Opposition side, whose only contributions to the Debate were ironical laughs. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, had fallen into an extreme error in his effort to prove that the language of the Bill of 1886 upon this subject was identical with the proposition which was now made by the hon. Baronet. What was the language of the Bill of 1886?—

“Subject to any instructions that may from time to time be given by Her Majesty, the Lord Lieutenant shall give or withhold his consent to Bills framed by the Irish Legislature.”

What was the plain meaning of these words? That there was to be a system of assent, which was only to be affected in an exceptional manner by instructions from Her Majesty. These instructions were, as he had said, exceptional, and in those cases upon whose advice was he to act? Obviously upon the advice of the Irish Legislature, and, therefore, it was clear that the provision in the Bill of 1886 was the same as the provision in this Bill. He agreed with the Prime Minister that the change involved by this Amendment would be a fundamental change, and that it would strike at the very root of the Bill. According to the words in the Bill the system was to be a system of deference to local opinion. The Lord Lieutenant was to give or withhold the Royal Assent in ordinary cases upon the advice of the Irish Ministers, and what the Imperial Parliament contemplated and what they hoped for—he would not answer for the right hon. Member for West Birmingham—was that the functions — legislation and Royal Assent—might go on in Ireland, and that the Imperial Parliament would not be troubled in the matter. The system proposed by the hon. Baronet was that the Lord Lieutenant should, in accordance with the instructions of Her Majesty, give or withhold his assent. What was the meaning of that? It meant that the Lord Lieutenant would, in the event of any Bill passed by the Irish Legislature, be obliged to refer it to the Imperial Parliament. How, then, could the Lord Lieutenant act at all unless he sought those instructions? and, therefore, it would be incumbent upon him to refer every Bill passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature to the Imperial Government. That was not the system proposed by the Irish people, or which the Irish people would accept, and that was not the system which the interests of the British people required.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, that in one sense the discussion of what was in the Bill of 1886 was almost academic; but in another sense it was very important, because it appeared to him that the alteration from the proposal in that Bill was one of enormous concern, inasmuch as it went a greater length in favour of Irish interests as opposed to the interests of Great Britain. He could not for one moment read the Bill of 1886 as the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had read it. The words of the Amendment as proposed left the clause identical with the clause in the Bill of 1886.

MR. SEXTON: The words "subject to" are used in one case, and "in accordance with" in another.

SIR H. JAMES said, that that did not make the slightest difference; and yet, on the strength of this unimportant variation, the Prime Minister said that a perfectly new faith was being propounded, and that no such suggestion had ever been heard of before. The Amendment did not take away the liberties of the Irish Parliament. It merely took away a shadow, a phantom, and a nullity. That was the veto to be exercised on a Bill by the very Executive who carried the Bill. By taking away that veto they took away nothing. It was not a veto at all. It was only exercised when a blunder was made in a Bill, and not on the ground of policy. The question simply was whether all powers of legislation were to be handed over to the Irish Parliament without a check, or whether they should retain the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) rose to move, as an Amendment to Clause 5, page 4, line 3, at end, to add—

"Passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature declare either that he assents to any such Bill in the Queen's name, or that he withholds the Queen's assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure."

The object of the Amendment was to make Sub-section (3) read as follows :—

"The Lord Lieutenant shall, on the advice of the Executive Committee but subject to any instructions given by Her Majesty in respect of any Bill passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature, declare that he assents to any such Bill in the Queen's name, or that he withholds the Queen's assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure."

It being Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended, to be further considered To-morrow.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked for information concerning the Bill.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): My explanation of this Bill will be very brief, and I hope it will be acceptable to the House.

It is entirely non-contentious, and it is a Bill mainly aiming at the codification and consolidation of a very important branch of the law. It was introduced in the form in which it substantially now stands during the last Parliament by the then Lord Chancellor, and, with the assent of the present Lord Chancellor, passed through the House of Lords after a very careful examination. It was re-introduced by the present Lord Chancellor, and, with the assent of the late Lord Chancellor, passed through the House of Lords in the present Session. It then came to this House, and was referred to a Select Committee, upon which Committee all sides of the House were represented. Among those who were Members of that Committee were my hon. and learned Friend opposite, the Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Hackney (Mr. Bousfield), the Solicitor General for Scotland, and several other distinguished lawyers in this House. After very careful examination it was passed by that Committee, and I hope the House will not interpose any difficulty in the way of its passing now.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): The Bill certainly did receive very careful consideration by the Select Committee, and I think anyone who has studied the subject and has had an opportunity of reading the Bill will, I am sure, be of opinion that it does represent the law as it now stands.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) asked if it was to be understood that there was nothing new in the Bill? Was it simply a codification?

SIR C. RUSSELL: There is only one qualification I have to make in respect of that, and that is this: that while certain characteristics of the Scotch law are preserved, certain others are removed and brought into harmony with the existing law in this country. The approximation of the laws between the two countries has received the assent of Representative Bodies in Scotland, and there were several Scotch Members on the Committee.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Then, so far as the English law is concerned, it is simply a codification?

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

SIR C. RUSSELL: Practically so.

SIR R. WEBSTER: There is an alteration in the English law later on in the Bill. Certain modifications are introduced into the English law, but they are in accordance, as the Attorney General has rightly said, with the Scotch law. They are not of any great importance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 12.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) requested further information.

SIR R. WEBSTER explained the effect of the clause, and said, he ventured to think that the Amendments made were Amendments of the law in a matter in which the Scotch law had been in advance of ours for some time.

MR. BARTLEY said, he thought attention ought to be called to the fact that only a few minutes after midnight could be given to this Bill, which enormously affected the interests of the people, while a whole Session was being devoted to an abortive Bill which was not going to pass.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

[Mr. A. O'CONNOR in the Chair.]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.), on a point of Order, called the attention of the Chairman to the fact that the record was that on a former occasion when the Chairman rose to put the First Schedule he (Mr. Healy) said he had an Amendment, and, as he understood, the Chairman had not time to put the Question, "That this be the First Schedule of the Bill."

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. A. O'CONNOR) said, he had a clear recollection of what occurred. He put the Question, "That this be the First Schedule of the Bill," because there was no Notice of Amendment on the Paper, and he was not aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to move one.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will move my Amendment to the Second Schedule of the Bill.

Second Schedule.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he wished to move an Amendment. The right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir H. James), alluding the other night, on the Home Rule Bill, to the Habeas Corpus Act, described it as obsolete.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Vicary Gibbs,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

EDUCATION CODE (SCOTLAND) (EVENING CONTINUATION SCHOOLS).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. W. WHITELOW (Perth) rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her to withhold Her assent from the first of the detailed Schemes appended to the Scotch Code of Regulations for Evening Continuation Schools (1893)."

He said, that this was a matter of such great importance to the cause of higher education in Scotland, that it was absolutely necessary that the House should be invited to pass judgment upon it. He did not object to the principle of the scheme. He did not object to any part of the population being taught the duties of citizenship; but he did object to the way in which the scheme was drawn up, believing that it opened up sources of the greatest danger to the system of education in Scotland. If the duties of citizenship were taught under a well-considered scheme there could be no possible objection to it; but he was afraid that one of the results of the scheme of the Education Department would be to lead to a great number of educational appointments being made, not for educational proficiency, but rather for political opinion. He could not see how it was possible to prevent any teacher who might be appointed to carry on the evening continuation school from teaching not only the facts about voluntary schools, but going further, and teaching whatever theories they might hold on the benefits or otherwise of the voluntary system. It would also be possible for the teachers to teach the scholars their own particular theories about land legislation. How could they expect that in all the schools the same theories, whether they were right or wrong, would be taught? There was the question of the appointment of Justices, and the question of public-houses and licences, on which there was the widest possible difference of opinion. Even if the teaching under the Code was going to be limited entirely to the facts of the case, he did not believe that they would get all teachers in the whole Kingdom to teach the facts of licensing and public-houses in precisely the same way. On page 18 were found such subjects as the composition of the House of Lords. At this time, especially, it seemed to him hardly probable that they would get all their teachers in their continuation schools to agree as to what should be done as to the powers of the House of Lords. Then, under the working of the Parliamentary system, they had such subjects as the rights of majorities and minorities. This was just the time when this was a question that no man could lecture or teach upon without showing some Party spirit. Coming to the question of Trades Unions, their history and work, and Co-operative Societies, their work and production, he thought it was wise that their children should be taught what was the history and the work actually done, and what was the power of Trades Unions. But if the teachers were to have the power to impress upon their students that every single one of them ought to enter a Trades Union, and that it was the duty of a citizen to enter a Trades Union, then he thought a very great danger was opened up, and that this Code, instead of being what he thought it might be, a substantial advantage to the people of Scotland, would be a very great disadvantage, and would do great harm to the cause of education. With regard to the question of co-operation, he had received a large number of hysterical telegrams upon the Motion he had put down for to-night. His view on the question was that there was no harm in children being taught what Co-operative Societies were, and what their objects were ; but he objected to these schools being made, as it were, a sort of cheap advertisement for Co-operative Stores against retail traders. It seemed absurd to allow a teacher to enforce on his pupils that it was the duty of every citizen of the Empire to join a Co-operative Society. If it was amended in that spirit, he thought it would be of great service to education in Scotland ; but he could not admit for a moment that there was any reason why Co-operative Societies or Trades Unions should be laid before the people of the country as things which it was the duty of all citizens to join. He submitted that under this Code it was perfectly possible for teachers to take that view of the matter. If the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, when he drew up the Code, was that only facts and not matters of opinion should be taught, he must see, on further consideration of the Code, that his intention had not been altogether carried out. If his object was to teach facts, and not to allow opinions to be scattered broadcast over the country, he had not attained it ; and if his object was to allow opinions to be scattered broadcast over the country, then, for that reason alone, the Code most certainly deserved to be condemned. In the first issue of The Labour Gazette one of its objects were stated to be to “ Provide a sound basis for the formation of opinion, but not to supply opinions.”

This Code not only provided a sound basis for the formation of opinions, but, more than that, it bristled with temptations to the teachers to supply opinions to their students. That was the point he wished to attack in this Code ; and in making a protest against this part of the Code, at all events, he thought he had a right to demand the support of hon. Members in every part of the House. This was in no sense a Party question, for even if political opinions were to be taught by the teachers in Scotland he did not think it would make any difference whatsoever in the balance of Parties in that House ; and it was not because he thought there was any danger of political doctrines with which he did not agree being spread about that he objected to the Code, but because he thought all Parties ought to combine against putting in force in Scotland a Code which, whilst it was bound to be of the greatest service if it was well-considered, nevertheless, under the present conditions, and as it stood, was in his belief calculated to be a source of the very greatest danger. He begged to move his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“ That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her to withhold Her assent from the first of the detailed Schemes appended to the Scotch Code of Regulations for Evening Continuation Schools (1893).”—(Mr. W. Whitelaw.)

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think the House will probably wish that an answer should be given at the very earliest moment to the Resolution which the hon. Member has brought forward. The hon. Member has practically started three questions : First, in the evening schools, ought the scholars to receive instruction on the conditions of the life of our people and on the duties of citizens ? secondly, is the detailed scheme helpful or hurtful towards this object ? and, thirdly, ought there to be any mention in that scheme of co-operation ? Generally speaking, it is considered that Scotland is more go-ahead than England in matters of education. Rightly or wrongly, it is so considered ; and it is certainly a curious thing that the English Code, containing exactly the same principles as those contained in this Scotch Supplementary Code, has already passed through the ordeal of this House without any comment or opposition, and has become the law of the land. Now, Sir, in the first place, I say most emphatically that in these continuation schools the scholars should be taught their duties as citizens. They are youths on the threshold of life, or men of mature age, because I am glad to say that there is no limitation in the age of the scholars taught in these schools. It is right that these people should be taught subjects in which they can take a manly interest ; and the very last subject which I would exclude would be the municipal, national, and social institutions under which we all live and do our work in this world. If people do not learn these things properly—and I am quite certain that the institutions under which we live can only be properly learned if they are taught tolerably early in life, and taught systematically—if they do not learn these things properly they will mislearn them. It is very much better they should be taught these things on a system than that they should pick them up piecemeal from Party newspapers and leaflets on which-ever side these Party newspapers are written, and I am quite certain good teachers can make these subjects both intelligible and palatable. Really if you keep out these manly questions which concern the real life of a citizen you come to this: that they are only to learn such stories in England, how Alfred burnt the cakes, and in Scotland, how Bruce watched the spider. That is a very insufficient pabulum on which to bring up people. Then objection is taken because women come to these schools. For my part, in these days, when women take so active a part in politics on both sides, I am glad that they come to these schools, and there is as much reason that they should be informed as men on matters in which it is plain that they take a great interest, and which they are thoroughly qualified to understand. The next question is, if the duties of a citizen are to be taught in our public schools in Scotland as they are taught in England—and I would not have Scotland behind England in this matter—is this detailed Code the proper means for teaching them? I should just like any hon. Member of this House to try to draw up, in the space of five pages, a better system of suggestions to teachers how to teach these questions. This is an extremely useful paper. The real difficulty to a teacher is not to discourse on subjects, but to know the subjects on which he discourses. I appeal to hon. Members here, when they have a speech to make, whether the real difficulty in making that speech is not to find the words, but to supply the heads of the subjects on which you are to discourse? We give the teachers the heads, and in my opinion there is no serious objection which can be taken to these heads which we have proposed. The hon. Member says the teachers are going to talk about School Boards and School Managers, and that they may give their own opinion about voluntary education and the religious difficulty. The hon. Member, as a Scotch Member, ought to know that there is a School Board in every single parish in Scotland, and there is no religious difficulty in Scotland. The School Board is just as much an institution in Scotland as the Parochial Board or Commissioners of Supply, and people ought to know what a School Board is. The hon. Member talks of the powers of the House of Lords, and says that political instruction may be given by the teachers upon that question. Why, Sir, if you are so careful of the political morals of the people of this country that you will not even mention the House of Lords historically and constitutionally, I say this is not a free country at all, and our education is not adapted to a free country. For my own part, I believe that this sketch of the civic life and civic duties will give just as much assistance to teachers in teaching as is given to them by other schemes to which the hon. Member does not object, and which instruct the teachers in natural science. Then we come to the question at the root of this discussion, and without which we should have no discussion at all at this time of the night—namely, the subject of co-operation. It is said that no encouragement should be given to the system of co-operation in schools which are supported by the nation; no assistance to co-operation and no assistance to the question of Trades Unionism. I will just read the passage on which the contention of the hon. Member rests.

“Associations of Workers:—

“(1) Trade Unions, their history and work. Labour disputes and strikes. Arbitration and conciliation.

“(2) Co-operative Societies; their work in distribution and production.

“(3) Friendly Societies. Training in habits of industry; thrift and self-help. Value of the work of voluntary associations in the education of the adult citizen.”

Now, Sir, my answer to the charge of the hon. Member lies in that passage. Is it, or is it not, the opinion of hon. Members that something should be learned by Scotchmen, as it will be learned by Englishmen, about Trade Societies, about Friendly Societies, and about Co-operative Associations? I can only say, looking back at my own education, that I know nothing so valuable in it as the fact that when I was a young fellow I got a very clear explanation about the financial system of this great country from one who knew it very well, and my belief is that there is no method of really understanding the essence of these great questions except by being told what are the essential features of these great questions early in life, by people who are anxious to instruct you. The individual employers of labour may think that their interests may suffer by instruction being given about Trades Unions. Individual speculators in building land may think they might suffer by Building Societies. Insurance Companies may think they may suffer by Friendly Societies, and in the same way, no doubt, manufacturers may think they may suffer by co-operative manufacturers, and traders may think they may suffer by co-operative distribution. If we strike out one of these topics, we must strike out all, and we must attempt to give a picture of what interests the great masses of our fellow-countrymen and the circumstances under which they live, leaving out such important things as all the methods by which the working classes can combine to protect themselves and better their own circumstances. No, Sir; no harm and no injustice can come from teaching people to understand these things. Harm and injustice come from ignorance and dulness, and not from light and understanding. I must say I believe those people who think they suffer from Trades Unions and from productive Associations are very much mistaken if they think, in the long run, they will suffer more by people understanding the real story. If there is any country in which Co-operative Societies and Trades Unions are to be ignored—for I understand the hon. Member has an equal objection to either Co-operative Societies or Trades Unions being regarded as institutions of the country which may be mentioned above your breath—[Mr. W. WHITE-LAW: No, no!] Well, he spoke so. [Cries of "No!"] If there is any country in which these matters cannot be ignored it is in Scotland. Now, it is not my business to praise or to recommend at this moment either Trades Unions or Co-operative Societies; but I say that both the one and the other are solid facts of Scotch life which every Scotchman ought thoroughly to understand. Parliament has legislated over and over again for a great many years past in order to enable both the one and the other class of this society to work without the trammels which formerly beset it; and it will, indeed, be a very strong thing if now we say that they are institutions of such a class that nothing is to be mentioned of them in a course of education the object of which is to enable mature citizens to understand the circumstances in which they live; and, for my own part, I can see no more reason against explaining what co-operation is than, in a State-assisted College, of explaining what banking is. I remember in the old days in this House hearing Mr. Bright arguing in favour of an extension of the franchise, with the assent of all parties, on account of the admirable self-reliance of the Rochdale Pioneers. Are we seriously, in the same walls which heard Mr. Bright, going to pass a Resolution which states that to teach our young citizens what the Rochdale Pioneers are is an undertaking which Parliament will not consent to sanction? All we do is to explain what co-operation is. That is all we do, and it is all that those interested in co-operation ask. I have got before me a paper which has been circulated by the Co-operative Union, and in that they say clearly—

"We do not ask for co-operative teaching in the evening schools, that is in the sense of recommending students to become co-operators, but only so far as to show these students of citizenship what are the facts actually in existence around them."

That is what they ask, and that is what we teach. The School Boards are not obliged to give instruction in the duties of a citizen; they are not obliged to give instruction in co-operation; but if they give either one or the other they must give it in a fair and reasonable spirit. It is quite true that a stupid teacher might, if he was permitted by a School Board, use this detailed scheme of the duties of a citizen to enforce his own views about politics, just as he might use, if he was stupid enough, historical literature to enforce those same views, just as he might, if he was ill-advised enough, use the opportunities of religious instruction to enforce his own denominational creed. But, Sir, we trust the School Boards, and if the School Boards do not do their duty it will be our business to look after them. There is enough common sense in our people to render all such fears as these illusory; and if the result is that teachers in teaching this Code of the duties of a citizen teach their own Party politics, all I can say is we shall withdraw it. What is the text book of the duties of a citizen? It is written by an hon. Gentleman in this House—I will not give his name—who holds diametrically opposite views to myself in politics. I have read every single word of that text book, and there is not a single word of it I would not willingly have taught in any school in England or Scotland. But when you come to the question of teaching our citizens the main outlines of English and Scotch history and political institutions, on both sides of the House I venture to say all are patriots before they are Party politicians ; and in the same way, if in teaching what co-operation is a teacher makes himself an advertiser of Co-operative Stores and an adversary of the retail traders, all I can say is we should not only do what the hon. Gentleman asks and withdraw the detailed scheme, but we should forbid this teaching of the duty of citizens which would have been so misused being one of those subjects for which any grant might be given at all. But to say that such a province of human life and human interest as the association of working men to promote that which they believe to be the welfare of their class is one outside the pale of what ought to be explained to the citizens of this country is a proposition to which I, for my own part, will never consent, whether you look at it either from the point of view of private justice or public expediency.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I think that this new development of the Education Code is extremely deplorable, and nothing that has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman—whom I had always regarded hitherto as an advocate of liberal education—has at all changed my views. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that all the public virtues which we are so ready to recognise in his public career have been derived from some early training in the knowledge of the finances of this country. I do not know that finance has ever been a matter in which the right hon. Gentleman has shown any special ability or great interest in. The right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished scholar. He was a distinguished scholar in a great school, and subsequently a distinguished scholar in a great University. I will undertake to say that neither in the curriculum of the great school nor the great University was any one of these subjects taught which he now thinks it absolutely necessary to cram down the throats of the persons who attend the continuation schools. The right hon. Gentleman has entirely mistaken the point of the objection taken by my hon. Friend behind me. He has no objection to co-operation as such ; he has no special affection for retail trade as such ; he neither objects to Trades Unions, nor does he wish, so far as education is concerned, to start a propaganda in their favour. What he objects to is starting controversial subjects as subject-matters of education. I do really think that no human being with the slightest spark of humour could have conceived such a scheme as this. The object of the teacher, I read—

“ Should be to proceed from the known and the familiar, such as the policeman and the ratepayer, to the more interesting facts of English history.”

Do not let us begin English history with the policeman. It is a grotesque way of introducing people to a knowledge of the institutions of their country. I cannot conceive how this Code which is common to England and Scotland could have passed this House, so far as England is concerned ; and I am glad that, at all events, a Scotch Member was found, even at the last moment, to protest against its being dragged into the educational system of our country. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that Scotland has always been ahead of England, and he does not wish it to lag behind England in adopting this Code. Let me tell him that nothing could be more humiliating than to be dragged up to England if this is to be the result. If this is the result, let us stick to our system. [A laugh.] However it may excite the merriment of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, it has, at all events, produced no inconsiderable results in the history of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman told us he never would be a party to excluding from school teachers the power of dealing with such important matters as Trades Unions or co-operation. But, Sir, you cannot help these matters being treated controversially. You can only profit by such teaching if you can secure that the schoolmaster takes an external and detached view of these subjects, and as many schoolmasters are interested in co-operation they must take a view in favour of that form of trading, and they cannot be expected to take an absolutely impartial view of the matter. I think the Code altogether degrades education to a purely utilitarian level, and even that utilitarian level does not give an idea of the depth to which we should sink if such controversial matter were to be included. If controversial matter were once admitted, the whole subject of continuation schools would become a matter of Party controversy; worse than that, you would choose your schoolmaster, not because he knew literature, history, or science, but because he either opposed or believed in Trades Unions and co-operation. If you once do that the whole idea of education will be absolutely ruined, and you may as well throw up your continuation schools altogether. I think this is a deplorable and even ludicrous departure, and I hope the Government will reconsider the position, and that next year, when the Code comes before us, this melancholy addition to it will be omitted.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): As I have some responsibility in the drawing of this Schedule in connection with the English Code, I should like to say one or two words with reference to the strong expressions used by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. Almost in his very first sentence he said that the Secretary for Scotland wanted to cram down the throats of the children this syllabus. We do not desire to cram anything down their throats. The teacher will not be asked to teach anything unless the School Board or the management of the school are satisfied that it is a useful subject, and that the teachers are competent to give instruction in it. The right hon. Gentleman says that the syllabus is full of controversial subjects. There are very few subjects in education which are not controversial after we get beyond the mere elementary subjects. How are we going to teach history without raising controversy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that history was not connected with the current Party politics of the day. By controversy he did not mean doubt. There were great doubts about the exact truth of early Roman history; but that did not enter into the ordinary controversial matters of the day.

MR. ACLAND: How can you teach the history of the last three centuries, as we wish to teach it, without constantly touching some of what are the most bitter and difficult controversies unless we trust the teachers in the elementary schools, just as we trust our Professors in the Universities? Unless the teachers can be trusted to teach those subjects properly, they must be looked upon in a very different light to that in which I look upon them. I cannot join with the right hon. Gentleman in saying that there is anything ludicrous in introducing the subject of the duties of citizenship. It is a perfectly voluntary subject, with which managers and teachers are perfectly capable of dealing. An authority which the right hon. Gentleman respects, Professor Seeley, has said, again and again, that in his opinion this very subject is one which ought to be taught to young people from the ages of 14 and 15 onwards in our schools, and even in Universities.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What subject is that?

MR. ACLAND: This very subject.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Co-operation?

MR. ACLAND: This very subject of the rights and duties of citizens. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that it is ludicrous to teach that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said syllabus.

*MR. ACLAND: The right hon. Gentleman must know that it is impossible to teach the subject without such a syllabus. I venture to say that nine-tenths of the syllabus contains uncontroversial matters, which any reasonable teacher can teach without any danger of controversy whatever. I would further say that any sensible teacher who can teach history reasonably and well can also give instruction on the three subjects here specially referred to. When the representatives of the Trades Congress and Co-operative Union waited on me and asked that these subjects should be introduced, it was testimony to the fact that they were anxious their children should be brought up with knowledge which would be useful and serviceable to them as citizens.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, the speech of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite showed that the Scottish Tories were the worst of all Tories, as no English Tory had been found to take such an obscurant view. The position adopted by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen was the result of pure ignorance of the nature of the instruction given in the elementary schools. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion admitted that, at all events, it was proper that children in the continuation schools should be taught the facts with regard to Co-operation and Trades Unions; that was all that they could be taught under the Code. The Inspector who gave the marks on which the grants were based did so not because of the opinions of the scholars upon the Land Question or theories about Co-operation, but because of solid information acquired.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) desired to say that this matter had not escaped the notice of English educationists, and, if these subjects were included in next year's Code, they would probably have to take objection.

Question put, and negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 25th August 1893.

QUESTIONS.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE EDENDERRY UNION.

MR. KENNEDY (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of applications for new cottages received and refused by the Edenderry Board of Guardians under the Labourers' Acts from their inception up to 31st March, 1893; what were the general reasons assigned by the Guardians for refusing the labourers decent houses to live in; what advance has been made towards completion of the 13 cottages which the Local Government Board, Ireland, report as in progress or contracted for on 31st March, 1893; and whether, in view of the fact that the number of cottages authorised by the Local Government Board for the Edenderry Union is over 50 per cent. less than the average number authorised for all the other Unions of Leinster, he will cause the Local Government Board to expedite the passage of the schemes now under the consideration of or promoted by the Edenderry Board of Guardians?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): (1.) The reply to first paragraph is 110. (2.) The general reasons assigned for the rejection of these applications are "informality of representations," "cottages not considered necessary," "applicants not looked upon as labourers within the meaning of the Acts." (3.) Of the 13 houses referred to in paragraph 3, five are finished, three are commenced but not finished, and five are not commenced. (4.) New schemes, having in view the erection of 37 cottages, were submitted to the Local Government Board for approval on the 2nd instant. The documents in relation to these are at present under examination, and, if found regular, a local inquiry will be held at the earliest date possible.

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. KENNEDY: Does the difficulty arise in consequence of the existence of an Orange Lodge in the district?

PENSIONERS AS PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the North Dublin Union, in a recent public advertisement for a night watchman, lay it down as a condition that no pensioner is eligible; and whether this condition is intended to exclude men because they have served in the British Army or in the Royal Irish Constabulary, but who may otherwise be fit and proper persons to be appointed?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have seen a copy of the advertisement referred to. The Local Government Board have been informed by the assistant clerk of the Union that, so far as he is aware, the condition was not inserted in the advertisement for the purpose of excluding men because they had served in the Army or Constabulary, but because the Guardians believe that there are a large number of respectable men unemployed in the City, and that the Guardians are anxious to give preference to persons of this class so as to prevent the possibility of their becoming a burden on the rates.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is of opinion that that is the real reason for the exclusion—[Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order! It is impossible to hear what the hon. Member says.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks the reason alleged by the Clerk of the Guardians is the real reason?

MR. J. MORLEY: Mr. Speaker, I submit—

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a question which I think the right hon. Gentleman cannot answer.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him this—whether, considering that the Government are taking energetic steps to secure employment for pensioners in England, he will make some representations to the Board of Guardians in Ireland, so that a similar policy may be pursued there?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, Sir; I do not propose to do anything of the kind. It is quite true that the House expressed a very strong opinion in favour of the employment of pensioners; but upon the occasion of that discussion in this House there were Members, including, I think, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. J. Burns), who adopted the view that persons who had pensions were not on that account well fitted to compete with ordinary labour. I think that is not an entirely unreasonable view; but whether it is or not, I am not going to press any views on that subject upon the independent Local Bodies in Ireland.

CATTLE RATES ON THE NORTH EASTERN RAILWAY.

MR. MAINS (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the North Eastern Railway Company have charged cattle dealers since the 1st February last £2 10s. 2d. per truck for cattle between Carlisle and Darlington, and also the ordinary railway fare between these two towns—namely, 6s. 8½d. which, added to the £2 10s. 2d., makes a total of £2 16s. 10½d., whereas the rate prior to the 1st February last was £1 16s. and a free railway ticket to the cattle dealer between these two places; whether he is aware that farmers in and around Darlington, owing to the excessive drought this season, are not able to pay the Irish cattle dealers the extra price for cattle owing to the rise in railway rate on this particular line, and that the goods agent of the Carlisle branch recently stated that all other goods were back to the old rates, and that the cattle rate would be back immediately to what it was before, and that the extra rate that had been paid per truck for cattle from 1st February last would be refunded; whether he is aware that the Glasgow and South Western Railway Company give cattle dealers railway tickets at half ordinary fares by their cattle trains, and the Midland Railway Company give cattle dealers return tickets at single fares by ordinary trains, and that the through rate on cattle from any station on the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company, Ireland to Carlisle, is the same now as it was prior to 1st

Mr. Powell-Williams

February last—namely, 6s. per head; and whether the Board of Trade will use its powers, and see that the North Eastern Railway Company will charge the same rates as other Railway Companies?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I have received a Memorandum from the North Eastern Railway Company traversing the allegations referred to in the question. It is rather long to read to the House, but I shall be happy to furnish the hon. Member with a copy. In brief, the company inform me that the figures quoted are incorrect, and that a comparison is made between a rate quoted last year for a "small" waggon and a rate quoted this year for a "medium" waggon. I gather that the change of practice as to free passes for drovers has been adopted by all Railway Companies, on the ground that the privilege has been abused. The Board are prepared to communicate with the company with reference to any specific instances of unfair or unreasonable rates.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Does the right hon. Gentleman concur in the opinions expressed by the Railway Company?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have no evidence at all on the question. I am only quoting the expression of opinion by the Railway Company. The Board of Trade cannot compel the Railway Company to give free passes.

MR. TOMLINSON: This is a rather important matter. Are the Board of Trade prepared to acquiesce in the statement of the Railway Company that the privilege has been abused without making an independent inquiry on their own account?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Board of Trade could not undertake such an inquiry. It would be a Roving Commission.

MR. MAINS: Have not the Railway Company increased the rates exacted prior to the 1st February last in the sense at any rate of charging the drovers their fares?

MR. MUNDELLA: If the hon. Gentleman asks me whether they have increased the rates, I must request him to give me specific instances, and on those I will make representations to the Railway Company.

MR. MAINS : I am referring to the charges for cattle traffic. I am instructed that the rates have been increased considerably.

MR. MUNDELLA : I shall be glad if the hon. Gentleman will furnish me with specific particulars.

AMPNEY ST. PETER NATIONAL SCHOOL, CIRENCESTER.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (Gloucester, Cirencester) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware of the circumstances under which Mr. W. Scott, head teacher (Ampney St. Peter National School, near Cirencester), has received a notice of dismissal, and that such notice is unauthorised by Managers recognised by the Education Department ; whether, from September, 1887, to April, 1892, Mr. Scott performed his duties to the satisfaction of all concerned ; and also further assisted the Rector of the parish by teaching in the Sunday School and giving assistance in the choir ; and whether, having regard to the action taken, he can and will interfere to give effect to the wish of the Managers recognised by the Department ? I may further ask if the right hon. Gentleman thinks assistance in parish work should be a necessary qualification for an engagement as school teacher ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : No, Sir. The Department have not received any intimation from the Managers of this school with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Scott, but it would not be their duty to notify the Department of a change of teacher until he had actually left. I understand from correspondence which has appeared in the Press that Mr. Scott is under notice to leave, and that in one of his letters to Mr. Scott the Rector of Ampney St. Peter expressed himself as well satisfied with his work in the school. The Department has no power to interfere in the matter, nor to determine whether the Rector's letter was sufficiently authorised by the Managers. As I have already stated, the question of legislation with a view to improving in some degree the position of teachers as regards dismissal is under my consideration.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE TRALEE AND DINGLE RAILWAY.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the cause of the last accident on the Tralee and Dingle Railway, when a train ran off the line at the curve approaching the bridge over the river at Ballydunlea ; whether the line is safe for traffic ; and if it is the fact that the Directors of the Tralee and Dingle Railway have refused to carry out General Hutchinson's recommendations for the better management of the line ?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Manager informs me that one end of a goods waggon got off the rails owing to two of the tie-rods breaking. He says the speed of the train was only three miles an hour, and that the accident is grossly exaggerated. The Board of Trade are unable to say that the line is unfit for traffic. The Board much regret that the Directors have refused to carry out General Hutchinson's recommendations with one exception ; but I am in communication with them on the subject, and I trust they will not adhere to the unsatisfactory position they have assumed.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Considering that three lives were lost by the recent accident on this line, are we to understand that the Board of Trade have no means of compelling the Directors to carry out General Hutchinson's recommendations ?

MR. MUNDELLA : We are pressing them upon the subject.

MILITARY PAY IN INDIA.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the remuneration of all officers, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers serving in the Army mainly consists of two parts—namely, (a) a payment in actual money, and (b) certain free allowances in kind, such as quarters, fuel and light, exemption from rates and taxes whilst occupying Government buildings, servants (according to rank) to all officers, and forage to mounted officers, and in the case of soldiers of all ranks, free rations, free uniforms and clothing, and free education for themselves and their families ; whether, when regiments go to India, the above-described remuneration is also given to non-commissioned officers and men partly in cash and partly in kind, as at Home and in other parts of the Empire, but to officers in cash only, a certain addition according to rank being made under the name of "India pay and allowances," in lieu of the allowances which he receives in kind elsewhere; and are such "India pay and allowances" paid to officers in the now greatly depreciated rupee; and, if so, could immediate steps be taken to provide such officers more generally with quarters in kind, having regard to the fact that rents of houses at Indian stations have risen so greatly, especially at the large seaport towns of Kurrachee, Bombay, Calcutta, and Rangoon?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): The answer to the first two questions is in the affirmative. Indian pay and allowances are paid in rupees. It has long been the practice to provide officers with quarters, as far as possible, in forts, Presidency towns, and other places where officers find a difficulty in renting houses. We cannot say how far it would be possible to extend the provision of public quarters for officers, but the subject is one which is under the constant consideration of the Government of India.

WEST CORK TRAIN SERVICE.

MR. E. BARRY (Cork Co., S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with regard to the resolutions recently received from the Public Bodies in West Cork requesting a better train service for that district, he will be prepared to use his good offices with the Directors of the West Cork Railways to induce them to grant a more efficient train service?

MR. MUNDELLA: I will certainly use my good offices with the Directors to induce them to afford a more efficient service; but, as I have said before in answer to questions of the hon. Member, the Board of Trade would be glad to know what further facilities are desired.

ALLOTMENTS EXTENSION ACT.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as representing the Charity Commissioners, if the Commissioners have established any schemes since 30th March, 1886, in which the provision prescribed by Section 4 of "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882," is not inserted in cases in which the endowments include land other than buildings and the appurtenances of buildings?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): The Charity Commissioners have not, so far as they are aware, since the date to which the hon. Member refers—which is the date of an Order of this House for a Return relating to this matter—established any scheme, such as is comprised within that Return, in which the provision prescribed by Section 14 of "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882," is not inserted.

IRISH REPRESENTATION IN THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, inasmuch as the Government have not proposed any Amendment to the Second Schedule of the Government of Ireland Bill, it is their intention to suggest any such Amendment at a later stage elsewhere, or whether they still propose to abolish in Ireland the single-Member system of county representation, and to heavily reduce the representation of counties while leaving that of small boroughs untouched?

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman is, of course, aware that the Government have expressed their entire willingness to reconsider the subject if there was any prospect of such a concurrence between the various quarters of the House as would enable them to introduce the change into the Bill by consent. Unfortunately, that concurrence they have not been able to obtain, and, therefore, as things now stand, it is not open to us to introduce the change, although we think that in some particulars advantage would result from it.

ST. KILDA.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he has received a Petition from the natives of St. Kilda, in the outer Hebrides, where they live isolated for nine months of the year from all communication with the rest of the world, craving for an occasional visit of the gunboats cruising in Northern waters during the autumn, winter, and spring months; and whether it will be possible to comply with this request?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): I received the Petition two days ago from my hon. Friend, and I can only at present assure him that the request is receiving immediate and careful consideration. A gunboat visited the Island last year.

DEFERRED CRIMEAN PENSIONS.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the whole or any portion of a Royal Warrant is now in force under which soldiers who completed 12 years' service about the period of the Crimean War were entitled to a deferred pension upon attaining the age of 50; and whether such a pension is now given to those who joined under those conditions of service?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The Regulation alluded to was cancelled by the Royal Warrant of July 23, 1864, but it remains in force for all who enlisted before that date, and between 400 and 500 men annually make good their claims to deferred pension under it.

TELEGRAPH LEARNERS.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether telegraph learners joining in March last were obliged to undergo compulsory vaccination, to submit to their unsound teeth being drawn, and subsequently to pass a simple examination; whether, having submitted to the first two of these requirements, they found that the simple examination was changed in April last to a severe one, at which a great number failed; whether, seeing that numbers of the telegraph learners submitted to the Government initial requirements solely upon the understanding that the examination was simple, would he substitute the original for the present examination in these cases, and not make the present examination retrospective; would he be prepared to consider any individual case of hardship brought to his notice under these Regulations; upon what date was the syllabus of examination changed; and what notice of such change was there given to the candidates?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): Candidates for situations in the Post Office are required to show that they have been vaccinated, and that their teeth have been attended to by a properly qualified dentist. The standard of examination for telegraph learners was slightly raised on the 1st April last, and due notice was given of the alteration on the 28th February. I am unable to express an opinion as to any individual case without further information; but if the hon. Member will forward to me particulars of any case that he has in mind, I will investigate it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regie): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of holding the examination first and drawing the candidates' teeth afterwards?

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the prohibition of the importation of rags, enacted on 11th and 13th July, 11th August, and 14th December, 1892, was on the 9th instant revoked; and, if so, what other precautions the Local Government Board propose to take to prevent the introduction of and spread of cholera and other noxious diseases in this country?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): So much of the Order as prohibited the importation of rags packed in bales as merchandise has been revoked. The Local Government Board will act as they have hitherto done under the advice of their Medical Department with respect to taking all precautions to prevent the introduction and spread of cholera in this country.

MR. MACDONA: Have there not been several cases of cholera since the revocation of the Order?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Not that we are aware of.

LIGHTS AT THE OLD HEAD OF KINSALE.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Commissioners of Irish Lights have applied for the sanction of the Board of Trade to their proposal to establish a fixed electric light at the Old Head of Kinsale; is he aware that, in the opinion of experts of high standing, the Giant Lens Lighthouse gaslight would be much more effective; has Mr. J. R. Wigham, of Dublin, offered to pay the expenses of a practical test of the comparative merits of these two lights; and will he insist on this test being made?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have replied to the first of these questions in my answer to the hon. Member for Dublin City, St. Stephen's Green Division, on June 19 last, in which I stated that the Trinity House declined to approve the proposal to establish an electric light at Kinsale Head. I am aware that there is a difference of opinion as to the comparative merits of electric, gas, and oil lights in foggy weather. The Board have received an offer from Mr. Wigham to pay the expenses of experiments with his new "intensity burner" and "giant lens." The Board referred this offer to the Irish Lights Commissioners and Trinity House for their observations. In reply, the Irish Lights Commissioners sent to the Board of Trade a copy of a Report from their scientific adviser on the subject, and of a letter they had written to Mr. Wigham, dated July 17, stating that they do not consider it would be wise to enter into any experiments at present. The Trinity House have asked for further information respecting the desired experiments. It is not the province of the Board of Trade to instruct the Lighting Authorities in such matters, and we have no power to insist upon such tests being made.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take the earliest opportunity of testing the appliance of Mr. Wigham?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am afraid my opinion would be of very little value as against that of the scientific adviser to the Irish Lights Board, who has made a very exhaustive Report.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Would the right hon. Gentleman obtain the assistance of the Member for West Birmingham?

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what the Irish Lights Board have done or are doing towards improving the light at Kinsale?

MR. MUNDELLA: I believe it is not proposed to do anything at present at the Old Head of Kinsale.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Has anything been done recently?

MR. MUNDELLA: No.

SUPERVISORS OF INLAND REVENUE.

MR. H. FORSTER (Kent, Seven-oaks): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received from the Chairman of the Inland Revenue Commissioners any representation of the grievances of the supervisors and officers of that Department; and, if so, whether he has come to any decision in the matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): Very great improvements in the position of Excise officers have been effected in the past three years, involving an annual increase of £50,000 in mean salaries. The Board of Inland Revenue do not admit that anything which could be properly described as a "grievance" now exists, though some modifications in the existing arrangements may be desirable. I have not received any proposal on the subject from the Board.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has seen the statements in The Labour Gazette for August, to the effect that during the month of July seven County Councils had resolved to put the Small Holdings Act into operation; that two of these were negotiating to obtain land; and that one (Holland, Lincolnshire) had decided to purchase 136 acres of land for the purposes of the Act; and whether this statement in The Gazette might be regarded as an official one?

MR. MUNDELLA: The information given in The Labour Gazette with regard to the Small Holdings Act is, like all the information published in The Gazette, obtained from the best sources available to the Labour Department, and every care is taken that it should be accurate. The statements are not derived from Reports officially made to a Government Department, and in that sense are not official.

In reply to a further question,

MR. MUNDELLA said, the Board of Trade had every reason to believe in the accuracy of the local correspondents.

THE POST OFFICE VOTE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will undertake to bring on the Post Office Vote at such an early hour of the day as will afford ample facilities for the discussion of the telephonic communication in this country and the recent arrangements made by the Post Office on the subject?

MR. A. MORLEY: I fear it is not possible, considering the period of the Session when the Telegraph Estimates are likely to be reached, for me to give the suggested undertaking. I am now engaged in carrying out the policy of the late Government, which was fully considered and discussed at the time and was approved by the House of Commons, and with regard to which a Committee of the House of Commons specially reported that the details should be settled on the responsibility of the Government.

THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state when the agreement between the Post Office and the National Telephone Company is likely to be concluded and laid before the House?

MR. A. MORLEY: A draft is now under the consideration of the Company, and I trust that no undue delay will arise in the conclusion of the agreement.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): May we expect to have it before the Recess?

MR. A. MORLEY: I am afraid not. There are so many matters involved.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the event of the Telephone Company's trunk lines being purchased by the Post Office, any and what arrangements are being made to safeguard the subscribers to exchanges of private or municipal companies using the trunk lines from having their messages unduly delayed, or placed under any other disadvantages as compared with similar messages from the exchanges of the National Telephone Company?

MR. A. MORLEY: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that when the telephone trunk lines come under the entire control of the Post Office their use will be subject to the usual regulations, which forbid any favour or priority being given to particular persons.

THE CASE OF MR. JAMES SADLEIR.

MR. MANDEVILLE (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. James Sadleir, of Brookeville, Tipperary, who in resisting legal seizure of cattle made on his lands on 16th July, 1892, twice struck with stones Sergeant Mullany, Royal Irish Constabulary, while protecting the Sheriff's bailiff, with such violence that Sergeant Mullany's life was for a long time in danger; has the sergeant been since able to resume duty; will he explain why Mr. James Sadleir was not arrested on the date of this occurrence, and why, on his being arrested the following day, he was immediately bailed out, although Sergeant Mullany's life was in imminent danger; why has Mr. James Sadleir not yet been tried for the assault; has he observed that Chief Justice Sir Peter O'Brien did not ask at the last Clonmel Assizes why Mr. Sadleir has not yet been tried, although three Assizes have already passed in that county since the assault was committed; is he aware that Mr. James Sadleir gave evidence as an informer and Crown witness against the traversers at the Tipperary coercion trial in 1890, and then stated on oath that his wife had received £50 from the hon. Member for South Tyrone; and what steps, if any, does the Government propose to take in reference to this case?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is a fact that Mr. Sadleir, in resisting a seizure made on his lands on the 11th of July, 1892, seriously assaulted Acting-Sergeant Mullany, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, by striking him with a stone, which inflicted a deep wound. Sadleir was arrested the following day and admitted to bail by the Magistrates, who did not consider the injured man's life in danger. The sergeant has not since been able to resume duty. It is also the fact that the trial has been three times adjourned as stated. On the last occasion, at the Summer Assizes, medical evidence was given that the sergeant was suffering from melancholia and mental aberration, and a postponement was applied for by the Crown and granted by the Court. There is some hope that Sergeant Mullany will be sufficiently recovered to appear as a witness at the next Assizes; but if he be not able to appear the Attorney General will then consider the advisability of putting the accused on his trial on the other evidence that may be available. With regard to the fifth paragraph, I have already pointed out that the Lord Chief Justice, who presided at the late Assizes, consented to the postponement of the trial till the next Assizes. As to the sixth paragraph, the hon. Member for South Tyrone is in his place, and can say what he wishes on the subject.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : As the last paragraph of the question practically amounts to a charge that I suborned this man to give evidence at the Tipperary trials, I will state to the House exactly what took place. In August, 1890, I was entrusted with the distribution of funds for the relief of the boycotted in Tipperary. Those funds were publicly subscribed and publicly administered. I had not, of course, the local knowledge to guide me, and I requested three gentlemen, the Rector of Tipperary, the Presbyterian Minister, and the local Magistrate, to give me the necessary advice in administering the funds. As far as Mr. Sadleir is concerned, he had been originally one of the campaigners. When his name was brought before me for relief I was informed of that, and I point-blank refused assistance. I was afterwards applied to again by the local committee. The application was to the effect that Sadleir's wife was a most deserving woman; that she was the daughter of a clergyman in the county, and was suffering great hardships with her family on account of the boycott. On these representations I authorised the amount to be paid to Mrs. Sadleir, and I declined to have anything to do with Mr. Sadleir. This was before the trial took place, and before I knew anything about the trial as likely to take place. I administered the fund to the best of my ability, and to this moment I do not regret that I was able to help a woman whom I have since satisfied myself deserved the relief that was given. I have never had the slightest connection with Mr. Sadleir. He was a party to the Plan of Campaign, and he backed out of it when he found that it would not pay. I left him to his fate, but I am glad that I was able to save his family from starvation.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) : May I ask whether the latter portion of the question is strictly an orderly question to put?

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member spoke to me about the question, and I said that if what was stated in the question was a statement of fact, and had been made on oath, I could not prevent its being put in the question. But I thought that the hon. Member for South Tyrone was fully entitled to make any personal explanation he wished after the question had been put.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : May I ask whether Sergeant Mullany applied to the Tipperary Grand Jury for compensation for injury, and what was the effect; and why, if the sergeant's depositions were taken in the ordinary way, were they not put in so that the trial might be proceeded with?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not sufficiently well informed as to the details of the matter to answer at once; but if there is any significance in the question I will make inquiries.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : I beg to ask whether, during the whole 13 months which have elapsed, the sergeant has been unable to give evidence at either of the three Assizes; and whether there is not sufficient evidence without that of the sergeant?

MR. J. MORLEY : There is other evidence, but the Attorney General thought it would be better not to go on with weaker evidence when he hoped to get stronger. The Lord Chief Justice entirely concurred, and I think the course quite justifiable.

MR. SEXTON : In any event, I suppose the trial will come on at the next Assizes ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have said that the Attorney General is considering the advisability of proceeding with the trial at the next Assizes, whether the sergeant is able to give evidence or not.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) : Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House what the seizure was for ?

MR. T. M. HEALY : For Smith-Barry's rent.

EDINBURGH INLAND REVENUE OFFICE.

SIR C. PEARSON (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the complaints of the clerks in the Solicitor's Department, Inland Revenue Office, Edinburgh, as regards salaries and promotions ; whether it is the fact that as regards salaries these clerks compare unfavourably with those in corresponding positions in London and Dublin ; whether the Treasury has had under consideration a Memorial on this subject addressed to the Board of Inland Revenue on 20th January last ; and whether he can say when a decision will be arrived at, and a reply sent to the Memorialists ?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : When this matter came before the Treasury in 1890 and 1891 the then Board of Treasury held that a case had not been made out for the increased salaries suggested by the Board of Inland Revenue, and that the argument which it was sought to base on the analogy of the English and Irish Offices was not valid. I understand that a Memorial was sent to the Board of Inland Revenue by the clerks in January of the present year, asking the Board to make fresh representations on the subject to the Treasury. But up to the present time the Inland Revenue Board have not seen fit to do so.

*SIR C. PEARSON : Are the facts referred to in the second paragraph of the question correct ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I have no doubt it is so.

THE LATE MAJOR GENERAL NOBLE, R.A.

MR. DANE : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury upon what grounds the Treasury refused to act upon the recommendation of the Ordnance Council to grant to the widow of Major General Noble, R.A., an increase of £200 a year pension in consideration of the valuable services rendered by her husband in respect of the introduction of improvements in the manufacture of gunpowder ; and will the Treasury reconsider the matter ?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The War Office endorsed the opinion of the Ordnance Committee that Major General Noble had rendered valuable service by introducing improvements in gunpowder and the manufacture thereof, and in arrangements for obtaining supplies of acids, by which a considerable saving was effected in the cost of gun-cotton. The recommendation referred to was, therefore, a proposal to recognise General Noble's services as an inventor, which should, if the War Office are satisfied that the case is good, be rewarded in the manner that inventors are usually rewarded. The Treasury objected to meet the case by a relaxation of the pension regulations. These regulations are liberal, and should, in their opinion, be strictly observed.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION ESTIMATES.

SIR E. REED (Cardiff) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will state how it has happened that, in the Navy Estimates for the current year, while the revised estimated cost of labour and materials for the hull, fittings, and equipment is less than that of the original Estimates, in the case of each of the armoured first-class battleships built in Her Majesty's Dockyards, the revised Estimates are much greater than the original Estimates in the case of each of the first-class protected cruisers built there ; if he can state whether the additional sums required for the latter ships—namely, £16,990 for the Royal Arthur, £10,490 for the Crescent, £16,810 for the Edgar, and £27,220 for the Hawke—have been found fully sufficient for their completion ; and whether these large increases of expenditure in the case of these four ships are due to miscalculation in the first instance, or to additions or improvements in their hulls, fittings, or equipments developed during the period of their construction ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: In answer to the second paragraph, the figures are correct, except that, for the Edgar, they should be £26,180. The ships have been completed for practically the amounts named in revised Estimates. Regarding the first and third paragraphs, I have to state that the increase in the cost of cruisers has been due partly to additions and improvements in hulls, fittings, and equipment; partly to change in design and armament of Royal Arthur and Crescent, and partly to rise of wages to dockyard workmen.

IMPERIAL BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. T. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have information confirming the telegrams in the newspapers which state that Mr. Hamilton, an Imperial British East Africa Company's Superintendent, has been killed by natives and a Company's garrison deserted, while a steamer is in danger of seizure, and that a British man-of-war has sailed for the spot; whether the paralysis of government in British East Africa, revealed by the fighting at Vitu and by the present occurrences, is occupying the attention of the Government; and whether he will consider the desirability of terminating the rule of the Company elsewhere, as has already been done at Vitu, by the revocation of the Charter or otherwise?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): Information has been received that a portion of the garrison of Kismayu in the service of the British East Africa Company deserted to the Somalis and attacked and killed Mr. Hamilton. The steamer Kenia is believed to be in a position to defend herself if attacked. H.M.S. Blanche was to leave Zanzibar for Kismayu on the 22nd, and should now be there. As to the second paragraph of the question, Her Majesty's Representative telegraphs that he has returned to Zanzibar, having made arrangement for the security and administration of the Vitu territory. The rule of the East Africa Company at Vitu was not terminated by Her Majesty's Government, but by the Company's decision to withdraw.

The question of the future position of the Company is being carefully considered.

COLONEL STRACEY'S CASE.

MR. LODER (Brighton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Colonel Stracey's successor in command of the Scots Guards was on full pay in command of a battalion of the Scots Guards when the regimental command was about to become vacant; whether Colonel Stracey's successor had finished four years' term of battalion command; and whether he was placed temporarily on half-pay, and thus enabled to be repaid his over-regulation purchase money, before being appointed in regimental succession to the command of a regiment of Foot Guards; and, if so, whether he will reconsider Colonel Stracey's case?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Colonel Stracey was placed on half-pay on July 1, 1891; his successor, Colonel Gascoigne, having made a voluntary application to retire on half-pay, was gazetted to half-pay on June 23, 1891. He had been for three and a-half years in command of a battalion. He was not placed on half-pay temporarily, but retired voluntarily, and thereby fulfilled the condition enabling him to receive the over-regulation value of his commission. This fact does not point to any necessity for reconsidering Colonel Stracey's case.

KINSALE PIER.

DR. COMMINS (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the dispute which exists between the Town and Harbour Commissioners of Kinsale and the Board of Works as to a claim made by that Board for the completion of the Kinsale Pier over and above the amount provided by "The Kinsale Harbour Act, 1880," for that purpose, and of the steps taken by that Board to enforce their claims and impose for that purpose an additional rate of 2s. in the £1 on the ratepayers of Kinsale; whether he has received from the Town and Harbour Commissioners of Kinsale a copy of a resolution passed by them on the 18th instant in reference to the proceedings of the Board of Works, in which they allege that there was gross mismanagement by the Board of Works in the execution of the work (that is, the building of the pier), which resulted in increasing the ratepayers' liability to the amount of about £5,000, and asking that a public inquiry be held in connection with the entire expenditure, the entire cost of which the members offer to pay out of their own pockets; and whether, in view of the fact that the summary enforcement of the claim of the Board of Works, even if a just one, will impose a burden that may prove ruinous to the ratepayers of Kinsale, he can see his way to grant the inquiry they desire, and recommend that the proceedings taken by the Board of Works may not be pressed on till it has investigated the matter?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Board of Works obtained a mandamus for the payment of arrears amounting to £1,979 13s. 1d. The Town Commissioners are also liable to make good any sum by which the net harbour revenues fall short of the annual charge for principal and interest amounting to £885, and the average deficit has been £575 per annum. In requiring the striking of a rate of 2s. in the £1 calculated to produce £600, the Board of Works are in the circumstances making a moderate demand, falling very far short of the powers given by the mandamus. I cannot admit the accuracy of the allegations in the second and third paragraphs, and I can see no reason to interfere. There is no need for any inquiry. The Treasury has already made a liberal offer to the Harbour Commissioners which, so far, they have shown no disposition to meet.

DR. COMMINS: But would not the 2s. rate drive every substantial ratepayer out of Kinsale?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I hope not. I believe the town rate is only 1s., and the poor rate 1s. 7d.

THE NEW IRONCLADS.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is to be the estimated indicated horse power of the Majestic and Magnificent under natural draught and under forced draught, what consumption of coal per hour, and how many days' coal will they be able to carry?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Indicated horse power—natural draught, 10,000-horse power (specified); moderate forced draught, 12,000-horse power (about).—Contractor's trials. The coal consumption at 10 knots' cruising speed is estimated at 70 tons per day, and the supply would suffice for about 28 days. For continuous steaming over long periods about 6,000-horse power would be developed, and the corresponding estimated coal consumption is 165 tons per day, and the supply will suffice for about 12 days.

MR. WOLFF: What is the difference which accounts for continuous steaming requiring 165 tons a day, while 10 knots only require 70 tons a day?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am afraid I cannot accurately state that.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead): Is the horse power named for each engine, or is it the combined horse power?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Combined.

SIR E. HARLAND: How many days' coal supply will the bunkers hold for full steaming?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I must ask for notice of that.

COMMITTEES OF INQUIRY INTO INVENTIONS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Treasury in 1872 issued a Circular to the War Office on the subject of Committees of Inquiry into inventions for the Public Service; whether that Circular stated that no officer in the Civil, Military, or Naval Services of the Crown should be called upon to judge or give an opinion where his own interests might come into collision with that of any other person, or be permitted to obtain or hold, or be directly interested in, any letters patent for any articles needed for the use of the Government; whether he can state what occurrences led to the issue of this Circular; whether this Circular is still held to be valid by the War Office, or when it was first formally held not to be binding upon them; and whether he will lay a Copy of it upon the Table?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In December, 1871, a Treasury Minute on the subject in question, dated November 29, 1871, was communicated to th-

War Office. The points stated in the second paragraph were among those included in it. The Minute was issued because a case had occurred in which an officer under the War Department had been offered a royalty for the use by a private firm of an invention of his. This called the Secretary of State's attention to the general question, and after consultation with the Admiralty the issue of such Minute was suggested to the Treasury. After the passing of the Act of 1883, which altered the law as to patents, the whole question was reconsidered, and in 1885 the Minute was withdrawn. It will be rather for the Treasury to say whether this Minute, now obsolete, should be laid upon the Table.

SCHOOL FEES IN IRELAND.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what number of schools in Ireland were free from all school fees last October, and in how many schools fees are still paid?

MR. J. MORLEY: I gather from the last Annual Report of the Commissioners of National Education that the number of schools declared by the Board to be absolutely free from school fees on October 1, 1892, was 7,173, and that the number in which fees have been partly abolished is 1,071.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Duke of Edinburgh will continue to hold his present active command in the British Navy, he having, as it is stated, sworn allegiance to a Foreign State?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: If my hon. Friend will be so good as to postpone this question, I will inform him a few days hence when I shall be in a position to give him a reply.

THE AMERICAN MAIL ROUTE.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the American mail, landed at Liverpool ex Majestic, was delivered in London about 3 p.m. on Wednesday, 23rd instant, enabling replies to be despatched by the outgoing steamer on Thursday; whether he could state what time could be gained by availing of the special service from Queenstown; and whether he is aware that the letters carried by the American liner Paris, via Southampton (which left New York at the same time as the Majestic, and is the faster vessel), did not reach London until long after business hours on Wednesday, and cannot, therefore, be answered until Saturday, 26th instant?

MR. A. MORLEY: As I stated in the House yesterday, the Majestic brought for London only a small quantity of specially addressed correspondence. This was sent out for delivery in the City soon after 5 p.m.; and replies could be sent by the outgoing mail of Thursday. Some four hours might have been gained if a special through service had been employed, but the facts which I have stated clearly show that the necessary expenditure would have been unjustifiable. I am aware that the letters brought by the Paris did not reach London in time for reply by the outgoing mail. The Paris arrived at Southampton at 4.38 p.m. on the 23rd of August (Wednesday), and the mails reached the General Post Office, London, at 7.4 p.m.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Does not this prove the superiority of the Queenstown route for delivery in London?

ARMY ORDNANCE LABOURERS' PAY.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether the Naval Ordnance labourers at Woolwich will receive the 19s. minimum paid to Army Ordnance labourers; and whether he is now prepared to fix the minimum pay for labourers in other departments under Naval control?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): I have to thank my hon. Friend for postponing this question till to-day. The main or standard rate of pay for hired labourers in the Home Naval Establishments will in future be 19s. a week. This rate will not be uniformly applicable in all cases, as the special circumstances of particular localities may have to be taken into account. In the particular case of Woolwich referred to in the question and also in the case of Deptford, it has been decided that 1s. a week in addition to the standard rate shall be paid. Fuller details will be found in the Return ordered on 23rd August.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the increase be given to the men forthwith?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: From the 1st October.

ANTHRAX.

MR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture for information as to the particulars of the disease that has broken out among the cattle belonging to Lord Egmont at Midhurst; what number of healthy animals has been killed; and whether the full value of the animals killed has been paid to Lord Egmont? May I further ask whether any recommendations have been issued by the Board of Agriculture as to the mode of slaughtering animals?

MR. LODER: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Horsham Division, I will at the same time ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention has been called to a very serious outbreak of anthrax near Midhurst, and whether there have recently been other cases in the adjoining part of the County of Surrey; if the Board will cause inquiry to be made into the origin of these cases; if the Board can give any information as to the length of time during which the land or buildings where an outbreak has occurred remain infectious, or as to any mode of disinfecting them; and if the Board have any information to show whether the disease is capable of being transmitted by contact with an infected animal, and at what stage of the disease?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): There appears to be no doubt that the disease which has broken out among Lord Egmont's cattle at Midhurst is anthrax. Five animals are reported to have died from it, and the slaughter of 53 cattle and 34 swine which were on the farm has been ordered by the Local Authority, and probably by this time carried out. Under the Anthrax Order of 1892, the compensation payable for the animals ordered to be slaughtered but not affected with anthrax would be their value immediately before they were slaughtered, and where they were affected one-half of their value before they became affected. Perhaps I may be allowed to reply now to the question which the hon. Member for the Horsham Division has placed on the Paper on this subject. I am informed that no cases of anthrax have recently been reported from the particular districts of the County of Surrey to which the hon. Member refers; but the unfortunate increase of the disease in Sussex and in many other parts of the country has recently engaged my close attention. It would be impossible for me, with the small veterinary staff at my disposal, to cause inquiry to be made into the origin of every case; but I may say generally that we have reason to believe that the spreading and recrudescence of the disease is not infrequently due to the inadequacy of the measures taken for the disposal of diseased carcasses. We propose, therefore, to issue a Circular Letter to Local Authorities on the subject, since it is with those authorities that the duty of dealing with this disease now rests. It would be impossible for me, within the limits of an answer, to make any adequate statement on the matters referred to in the two concluding paragraphs of the question; but we are bound to issue a leaflet on the subject for general information, a copy of which I shall be happy to supply to the hon. Member.

SIR H. FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes): May I ask whether the disease has not very seriously increased of late; and whether it is not attended with great risk to human beings as well as to animals?

MR. H. GARDNER: Yes, Sir; I am sorry to say the disease has increased of late, and it is attended with danger to human beings. I issued a Circular some time ago pointing out that danger.

MR. MACDONALD: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will answer the latter part of my question.

MR. H. GARDNER: I am about to issue a Circular upon the subject to the various Local Authorities. I did issue an Order on the anthrax question last December.

MR. MACDONALD: Will the Circular deal with the slaughtering of animals?

MR. H. GARDNER: Yes; that will be so.

DEFAULTING CONTRACTORS.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether firms which have been for some years past struck off the list of contractors to the War Office for having supplied bad material have nevertheless since been continuously allowed to contract with the India Office for supplying material of like description for the forces in India; whether, when Messrs. Ross and Company were struck off the list of contractors to the War Office, information to that effect was supplied to the India Office for its guidance in respect of the Army in India; and whether, on this and similar matters of common interest, it is the custom for other Departments to communicate with the India Office, or vice versa, for their mutual guidance or protection?

*MR. G. RUSSELL : I am not aware of any instance where a firm which has been removed from the list of contractors to the War Office is continuously allowed to contract with the India Office for the supply of stores. The removal of Ross and Co. from their list was not communicated by the War Office to the India Office. Ross and Co. have never been on the India Office Store Department list of contractors, as they are, it is understood, manufacturers of accoutrements which are obtained locally, and rarely supplied from this country. The reply to the last question is, Yes.

MR. J. BURNS : Could not the Government have a black list in which all such contractors might be pilloried; and could not that list be open to all Departments?

*MR. G. RUSSELL : That is a matter for consideration between the various Departments.

RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what are the terms on which the Railway Passenger Duty is assessed on the City and South London Railway; whether he has observed from the Railway Returns that the said Company has only paid 5½d. per £100, whilst the average payment of other Companies was £1 2s. 6d. per £100; and whether by an adjustment of their rates, or by the adoption of what is known as the zone system, all Railway Companies might equally escape the tax; and, if so, whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the advisability of abolishing the Railway Passenger Duty?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, after full investigation of the facts, agreed to assess the duty on 1·15 per cent. of the gross passenger receipts. The comparison which my hon. Friend seeks to draw is misleading, because on the City and South London Railway the fares not exceeding 1d. per mile constitute an infinitely larger proportion of the total receipts than they do on other lines, and the rate charged is the urban rate of 2 per cent., whereas on most other lines the predominant rate is 5 per cent. I fail to understand how Railway Companies could adjust their rates so as to produce the result contemplated by my hon. Friend, and I see no reason for making any suggestion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

SIR C. W. DILKE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies under what Statute, British or Colonial, the Commander of H.M.S. Pelican acts in forbidding the inhabitants of St. George's Bay, Newfoundland,

"To sell herring to any other parties than the French ships in port, or who may arrive in port, until they are baited,"

or in proclaiming by poster

"The price of herring is fixed for the present at one dollar per barrel"?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : The notice in question was not issued pursuant to any statutory power, but in the exercise of the discretion conferred on the commanders of Her Majesty's ships on the Newfoundland Coast. I am informed that the action taken was in the interests, and with the approval, of the inhabitants; for it would appear that on the arrival of the French fishermen to obtain bait at St. George's Bay, the commander got them to agree to purchase it from the Newfoundlanders, instead of exercising their Treaty right of catching it themselves uninterrupted by competition. Thus, instead of being prevented from fishing while the French boats were there, the Newfoundlanders obtained remunerative employment. Further, the early baiting of the French boats enabled them to leave more speedily than usual, and the risk of conflict was materially diminished.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: Is it contended that it is possible for naval commanders on the coast of Newfoundland to exercise, in virtue of their own discretion, powers for which they have no statutory authority?

MR. S. BUXTON: I think that the discretion given to commanders was sufficient to cover the proceedings in this case. As a matter of fact, the inhabitants on the spot were entirely in favour of the proceeding.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that it has been held in the local Courts, and on appeal, that no such discretion exists?

MR. S. BUXTON: I cannot give a legal opinion. This case has not been raised in the local Courts, as the inhabitants were in favour of the action taken.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I desire to know whether the House is really to understand that a discretion is given to Her Majesty's naval officers to fix the price of herrings?

MR. S. BUXTON: No; but if the hon. Member knew the circumstances he would see that, in this particular instance, the notice was given in the interests of the inhabitants themselves. No complaint whatever was made by the inhabitants of that locality.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But did he fix the price of herrings?

MR. S. BUXTON: The action which the commander took was under a discretion conferred by Treaty.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter on the Admiralty Vote.

ALLEGED PERSECUTION OF GALWAY PROTESTANTS.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Protestants of Moyross, County Galway, have for some time been subjected to serious persecution; that on the night of the 4th July, 1893, the house of a Scripture reader of the Irish Church Missions was assailed by a party of men, who threatened the inmates and alarmed them; that on the night of Sunday, the 6th August, shots were fired near the parsonage, and near houses of two Protestants; and whether, in consideration of the threats that have been used, he will cause a police station to be established at Moyross for the protection of the Protestants so threatened?

MR. J. MORLEY: The two cases referred to in the question were promptly reported to the Government by the police. No actual violence appears to have been used towards the Scripture reader on the occasion first referred to, and he declines to proceed against the offenders for their threatening language. As regards the outrages on the 6th instant, I am informed by the local police that no intention to injure life or property is believed to have existed. Every exertion has been made to trace the perpetrators. The Constabulary authorities do not, at present, consider it necessary to establish a station at Moyross. The adjoining station at Carna, which is only four miles distant, has been strengthened by drafting in some additional constables, and it is considered that this will suffice to give all the requisite protection by means of increased patrolling.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that while the only native Protestant in Moyross, County Galway, lives on the best of terms with his neighbours who deal in his shop, a colony of proselytisers has recently settled in the district; and whether a number of tracts and prints offensive to Catholic worship and practice—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Would it not be in Order to ask whether religious tracts offensive to Catholics and the Catholic religion had not been circulated in the neighbourhood in question?

MR. SPEAKER: It is a question relating to some local religious squabble, and is not a proper matter to be brought before this House.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the students' fees referred to at page 346 of the Civil Service Estimates for 1893-4, as received by the Professors of the Royal College of Science, Dublin, are not paid directly to the Professors, but are transmitted through the Science and Art Department, Kensington, to the Treasury; that these fees are then apportioned amongst the Professors and are remitted to them by drafts on the Paymaster General, less one-tenth retained by the Treasury and Income Tax; and if he will explain why these fees do not appear in the Appropriation Accounts as extra receipts, and how the pensionable rights of these Professors differ in substance from those of the Professors of Queen's Colleges in Ireland in respect of students' fees?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The hon. Member is misinformed. These fees are not transmitted to the Treasury, nor are they paid by the Treasury to the Professors; nor, finally, are they paid into the Exchequer or appropriated in aid of voted moneys. For these reasons no pensions can legally be awarded in respect of them. The case is entirely different with the students' fees at the Queen's Colleges. Those fees are appropriated in aid of voted moneys, and an equivalent sum is provided in the Estimate and paid thereout to the Professors. Accordingly, pension is properly calculated upon the sums received by the Professors.

LUXURIES FOR AGED PAUPERS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will advise the Local Government Board to take tobacco and snuff out of the category of articles which can only be ordered as medical comforts by the medical officers alone, and confer on other Executive officers the power of granting them in properly selected cases as in England; and whether he will recommend the Local Government Board to advise Boards of Guardians in Ireland to provide a room for man and wife over 60 years of age, as allowed in England, so that similar practice may be the rule in both countries?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will take an opportunity of discussing this matter with the Local Government Board when I am next in Dublin.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: Is there not a statutory obligation to allow man and wife to live together when they are both over 60 years of age?

MR. J. MORLEY was understood to reply that to the best of his belief that was so.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea): Will the right hon. Gentleman do his best to assimilate the practice in the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland with that in England?

MR. J. MORLEY: My hon. Friend, no doubt, knows that there were differences in the foundation of the two systems of Poor Law. My desire is, however, to do all possible in the direction he suggests.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman put a stop to the practice of sending paupers from England and Scotland to Ireland?

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): And will he also institute inquiries into the scales of dietary?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Are not these matters which may fairly be left to the Home Rule Parliament?

MR. J. MORLEY: I should think so.

PROVISIONAL ORDER PROCEDURE.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that, at a meeting of the Municipal Associations held in July, a resolution was passed, asserting that considerable inconvenience is caused to Municipalities by the delay at present existing in the holding of local inquiries by the Local Government Board, preliminary to the granting of sanctions for loans and the issuing of Provisional Orders, and suggesting that additional Inspectors should be appointed, or some other means adopted whereby inquiries shall be more speedily held; and whether he intends to take steps to increase the staff of Inspectors of the Local Government Board?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am aware of the resolution passed at the meeting referred to. The increase which has taken place in the number of cases for local inquiries by the Engineering Inspectors of the Local Government Board has been very great. In the present year the number of such cases up to the 12th of August was 835, whilst in the corresponding period of 1889 it was 407. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to avoid some delay in holding the inquiries. The matter, however, is receiving consideration.

BALLYCOTTON PIER.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury upon what grounds the Grand Jury of County Cork decline to take over charge of Ballycotton Pier ; and whether he will state the nature of their communications to the Irish Board of Works upon this subject ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The ground alleged is the "defective state" of the pier. As I have before stated, the allegation is not admitted, and the Grand Jury have no power to repudiate charge of it.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) : Has the right hon. Gentleman received any Report recently on the state of the pier ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Yes ; last week.

MR. JACKSON : Was it satisfactory ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : It is reported that there is a slight crack which became apparent five years ago, but it is no worse now than then.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : How is it there is always a "slight crack" in the Board of Works piers ?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Leeds (Mr. Jackson) was Chief Secretary it was reported that the fissure had widened, and that an iron band was necessary ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am informed by the Board of Works that the fissure has not increased for five years. This is one of the matters a Home Rule Parliament can deal with.

THE WELSH UNIVERSITY.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether any representations calling for the inclusion of Lampeter as a constituent College of the Welsh University have been received by the Privy Council or the Government from any persons other than the Professors of the College ; and whether any representation has been received from the Visitor of the College ?

MR. ACLAND : No such representation has been received by the Privy Council except one from the principal tutors and Professors of Lampeter College. I am not aware that any such representations have been received by the Government. No representation has been received from the Bishop of St. David's, the Visitor of the College.

MR. KENYON : I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether in that case the notice of Motion for Tuesday next, in the name of the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division of Shropshire, will be in Order ?

MR. SPEAKER : I will decide that question when the Motion comes on.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.) : May I ask whether the Principal of Lampeter College sat on a committee, which considered the whole matter, and drafted the Charter submitted to the Privy Council, and whether he made any suggestion for the inclusion of Lampeter College ?

MR. ACLAND : I understand that the Principal did sit on the committee, but that he did not make any such proposal.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state the terms of Reference to the Royal Commission on Agriculture ; whether the Commission will take evidence in various parts of the United Kingdom ; and whether Scotland will be directly represented on it ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : The Royal Commission on Agriculture will be very simple in its form, its object being to inquire into the agricultural depression prevailing in Great Britain, and whether it can be alleviated by legislation or by other measures. It is hoped that the Commission will include the names of two gentlemen specially interested in Scottish agriculture. The Commission will have to decide for itself the mode in which it will proceed with respect to the taking of evidence.

SCOTCH RELATION TO IMPERIAL FINANCES.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now in possession of any information as to the wishes of a number of the Representatives of Scotland in favour of an inquiry into the financial relations of Scotland to the Imperial Exchequer ; and, if so, whether the Government will take immediate steps to give effect to such wishes ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I received last week from my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow an intimation that a number of Scotch constituencies had arrived at a resolution that it would be satisfactory to them if an inquiry were to be proposed by means of a Select Committee to investigate the financial relations of Scotland at the commencement of the coming Session. Other information has been supplied to me to a corresponding effect, with respect to the views of constituencies not in harmony with the present Government. We are, consequently, of opinion that it would be proper to propose an inquiry of that kind in the next Session.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION FOR MAGISTRATES.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will find time this Session for the consideration of the Bill for the repeal of the property qualification of Magistrates in England and Wales, so as to put the people of those countries on a par with the people of Ireland and Scotland in that respect ?

*MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of making provision for removal from the Commission of the Peace of Magistrates who do not attend to their duties ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : This must be considered with reference to the abundance or paucity of claims in regard to the appointment of Magistrates and their urgent claims, which cannot be set aside. I do not think that I can, on the part of the Government, hold out any prospect of dealing with legislation on these points at an early period of the coming Session.

SPARKBROOK FACTORY.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the number of persons employed in the Sparkbrook and Enfield Factories respectively on 1st June, 1892 ?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley) : The numbers of persons employed in the Sparkbrook and Enfield Factories for the week ended June 4, 1892, were—Sparkbrook, 657 ; Enfield, 2,100.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether the rate of discharge of the men has not been much more rapid at Sparkbrook than at Enfield ; and whether he will say why the Government have dealt so unjustly with the workmen ?

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member can answer the first part of the question, but it is out of Order to ask why the Government have dealt unjustly with a certain class of workmen.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : I will alter the last part of my question, and ask why the Government have dealt so differently with the men at Enfield as compared with those at Sparkbrook ? The hon. Gentleman will see that, even taking into consideration the shorter hours worked at Enfield, the rate of discharge there has been very much less rapid than at Sparkbrook.

*MR. WOODALL : I have already on former occasions explained in the House that the proportion of men discharged at Sparkbrook is larger than those discharged at Enfield, because, whereas Sparkbrook is a mere factory for small arms, Enfield produces a great many other things, such as sabres, bayonets, and quick-firing guns, and consequently affords employment to a greater number of men. I may draw the attention of the right hon. Member to the fact that at the Bagot Street factory the amount expended in wages last July was more than double the amount expended in the same month last year.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : My hon. Friend, I think, did not fully understand my question. I pointed out that, taking into account the reduction of hours at Enfield, the rate of discharge was larger at Sparkbrook than at Enfield. As rends the wages at Bagot Street, I think the hon. Gentleman will admit that if the two Birmingham factories are put together there has been not an increase, but a very great reduction.

MR. WOODALL: I have explained to my right hon. Friend more than once that the comparison between Sparkbrook and Enfield is not perfectly fair, because Sparkbrook is a small arms factory, while at Enfield a great variety of weapons are produced.

IRISH POLICE MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Dr. O'Driscoll, M.B., Royal University of Ireland, and medical officer of the Goleen Dispensary, District Schull Union, applied on the 3rd of June last for the position of medical attendant to the constabulary at Goleen, Dunmanus, and Crookhaven Barracks, places within his dispensary district; whether his application went through the hands of Sergeant Benus in charge of Goleen Barrack, the latter having written to Dr. O'Driscoll requesting him to send his qualifications; whether Sergeant Benus made this request by the direction or with the authority of his immediate superior, Inspector Langhorne; whether it is the recognised practice to give the medical attendance on the constabulary to the dispensary medical officer within whose district the barracks are situated; whether it is the fact that in this case Dr. O'Driscoll's application was passed over, and Dr. Nixon was appointed to the Dunmanus Barrack, and Dr. Bridgok to Goleen and Crookhaven Barracks, although neither of these gentlemen is a medical officer for the district in which said barracks are situated; and whether he can state the reason for the departure from the general rule in this case?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Inspector General of Constabulary informs me that Dr. O'Driscoll did make the application referred to in the first paragraph. The District Inspector, Mr. Langhorne, directed the sergeant to write to Dr. O'Driscoll to forward his qualifications, but no application for the vacancy went, I am informed, through the sergeant. It is not the recognised practice to give to the dispensary doctor the attendance of the police barracks within his district.

The attendance on the police at Crookhaven and Dunmanus stations was given to the medical gentlemen residing nearest to these stations. The Inspector General felt himself unable to accede to Dr. O'Driscoll's application, and it would not be consistent with precedent to call upon him to state his reasons.

DR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in this case the dispensary doctor resides at least two miles from the barracks?

MR. J. MORLEY was understood to say he could not interfere in the matter.

THE QUEENSTOWN MAIL ROUTE.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he anticipates being able to announce the decision of his Department on the subject of the acceleration of American mails arriving via Queenstown, in reference to which important subject a deputation composed of representatives of all parties in Ireland recently waited on the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. A. MORLEY: I hope to announce it in the course of the evening.

THE AMNESTY OF POLITICAL PRISONERS.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the Irish Government have recently liberated Walker, who during the excitement of the Belfast riots in 1886 killed a soldier and a policeman who were discharging their duties, and who, though sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude, served but seven years of his sentence, he will now consider the expediency of liberating John Daly and other political prisoners who were convicted in 1863, during a period of great political excitement, of treason-felony, and who have served over 10 years of their sentences?

MR. ASQUITH: I am not acquainted with the details of the case of Walker, but I am informed by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that he was liberated after consultation with the learned Judge who tried him, and who approved of his being discharged. Every case must, of course, be judged upon its own merits. For reasons which I stated at length earlier in the Session, I am of opinion that, apart from special circumstances, such, for instance, as the health of the convict, which may affect the decision of particular cases, the time has not come at which I could properly interfere with the sentences passed upon any of the prisoners referred to in the latter part of the question.

DR. KENNY : In reference to that answer, might I ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether it is on the plea of health that the Irish Government liberated Walker ; and was not Walker's offence committed in a time of great political excitement, and was not Daly's offence also committed under circumstances of great political excitement ?

MR. J. MORLEY : It is quite true that Walker's offence was committed during the Belfast riots of 1886, which might be described as a time of political excitement. Walker's health was one of the reasons for his release, but other circumstances were present in my mind.

THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) : I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, on the Second Reading of this Bill, he will consent to its being referred to a Select Committee ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I think that is a question very well worth consideration, but I should not like to give an answer at the present moment.

THE SCOTCH SUSPENSORY BILL.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) : May I ask the Prime Minister when the Government propose to introduce the Suspensory Bill for the Church of Scotland ? I ask the question, because I believe the right hon. Gentleman to-day received a deputation of hon. Members in support of the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Scotland, I should not like to say anything of a positive character upon the subject ; but I think the hon. Member is quite justified in putting the question, and, if he will allow me to have a word with my right hon. Friend, I shall be quite prepared to answer him.

THE ARMS (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, of which notice has been given by the Government, will include the Arms (Ireland) Act, 1881 ?

MR. J. MORLEY : Although the Bill stands on the Paper it will not, in accordance with the arrangement which has been made, be taken to-night.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he wished for an answer to the question of his hon. Friend—whether the Arms Act was included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill as one of the measures to be renewed ?

MR. J. MORLEY : Yes. Being a measure of police it is included in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to know whether the Act would contain a clause extending the period within which leaseholders in Ireland might make applications to the Land Court ?

MR. J. MORLEY said, he thought such a clause was not included in the Bill.

A REGIMENTAL QUESTION.

MR. WHITELOW (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for War whether it had been decided to send a regiment to Fort George ; and, if so, whether the difficulty of the water supply had been overcome ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I would ask the hon. Member to give notice of that question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL. (No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [FOURTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) rose to move, in page 3, line 40, to leave out from "Committee," to "subject," in page 4, line 1, and insert "but." He said, in bringing forward this Motion he thought he was entitled to deal with the general principles upon which this Bill was founded. They had heard a good deal of the British Colonies ; but the plan adopted in the case of the Colonies had been departed from in the case of the present Bill, and, as they had gone on with this measure, they found that the Bill weakened the Imperial supremacy and diminished the protection that was suggested as being provided for the minority. The Bill completely succeeded in weakening that supremacy and in diminishing the value of that protection. There could be no doubt that in the course of the Debates on the Bill they had heard a great deal about the Imperial supremacy; but whenever any attempt had been made to translate into practical provisions the Imperial supremacy, those attempts had been resisted by the Government. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had told them—it was incontrovertible—that the veto was an absolutely ineffective instrument for securing Imperial supremacy. The policy of the Government since 1886 had been to water down the provision made for the establishment of the veto, and in this clause they found it in its very weakest form. They had had no reasons given by the Prime Minister to show why the safeguards for supremacy should not be the same as in 1886. The Premier appeared to take great credit to himself for the principles laid down in this clause, and he said that the Nationalist Party did not object to it. But the fact that the Nationalists did not object did not encourage him (Mr. Macartney) in the belief that this was at all an effective or a valid provision. The hon. Member for North Kerry had warned him in the most distinct way that the Imperial Parliament would not be allowed to exercise this weapon to prevent the Irish Parliament doing that which would be within its sphere; he told them that no meddling interference would be permitted with the position and authority of the Irish Legislature. It might be said by the Prime Minister that he had the greatest confidence in the Irish Legislature; but it was to be remembered that while, perhaps, reliance might be placed on the hon. Member for North Kerry, that hon. Gentleman could not always be with them, and he thought when they looked into the future it was not satisfactory that this question of the exercise of the veto should rest upon such an expression as “capricious or vexatious”—a term which had no fixed meaning, but was open to doubt. The manner in which the hon. Member for North Kerry had accepted the proposal of the Prime Minister was open to a hundred thousand interpretations. He made his declaration with most perfect candour, but there was nothing in the manner of the acceptance to prevent the basing of the most extravagant pretensions upon it. It was admitted by all that the Bill left almost every important topic connected with the internal Government of Ireland in an unsettled condition, and, therefore, they were justified in asking the Government to reconsider the question of the veto. They must look forward, both in Ireland and in the British Parliament, to numerous incongruities and inconveniences, and, owing to these incongruities and inconveniences, they must expect the intervention of the sovereign power far more frequently than would have been necessary if the Prime Minister had adhered to his first plan. The Amendment was suggested in the hope that it would diminish the friction that would be inevitable. It would bring the Imperial Ministry into more immediate contact with the Lord Lieutenant, and enable them to convey to him opportunely the decisions that were likely to be arrived at with regard to the legislation of the Irish Parliament. He also ventured to submit that no sufficient reason had been given for the departure from all the Colonial precedents. The Prime Minister would recollect that this question had only extremely short debate in Committee, being closed by the Chief Secretary. He would also recollect that no reason was given in support of the departure from Colonial precedents. The proposal in the Amendment would bring the great principle of the full reservation of the sovereign authority of this Parliament into more accord than the clause now did with the pledges given by the Government before the introduction of the measure; and it would go a considerable way towards making the supremacy of the British Parliament an actual fact instead of leaving it somewhat of a sham. The Amendment was founded on the Colonial precedents which had received the sanction of all Governments, including those of the Prime Minister himself. He was of opinion that the House was entitled to hear from the right hon. Gentleman some more substantial reason for retaining the clause in its present form than any that had yet been given.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 40, to leave out from the word "Committee," to the word "subject," in page 4, line 1, and insert the word "but."—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The most important part of the subject mentioned by the hon. Gentleman is that in which he challenges us on our departure from Colonial precedents—the provisions in the Colonial Constitutions. Well, Sir, those provisions are due in part to the distance of the Colonies from the Mother Country, and in part to circumstances which have undergone complete change. I remember well when the ordinary average return post between England and India was 12 months, and there was analogous delay in communicating with the Colonies. The present facility of communication between London and Ireland constitutes a broad distinction between the case of Ireland and that of the Colonies. A single night suffices for the passage of written communications between the two countries, and there is no difficulty in transacting business by means of such communications, to say nothing of the use of the telegraph as supplementary to the transmission of written documents. It is quite evident that the reservation aimed at by the Amendment ought not to be introduced unless there is a necessity for it; and we hold that there is no necessity for it. Everything that is needful can be known up to the last moment without any sensible interruption of business. Of course, the Lord Lieutenant is not to be compelled, nor will he be expected, to give his assent within 24 or 48 hours. There is no difficulty of that kind. Therefore, after full consideration, the Government cannot accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I do not think, Sir, there is any analogy between the case of Ireland and that of distant Colonies. I admit that something is to be allowed for the facility of communication with Ireland, but I do not think the Prime Minister has quite apprehended the full purport and policy of the Amendment moved by my hon.

Friend. Under the sub-section as it stands—and it is rather curiously worded—the Lord Lieutenant has a right to withhold his assent to any Bill; but I think it is important we should have in the Bill words which will protect the Lord Lieutenant from any misconstruction of the earlier phrasing of the sub-section, which says that the Lord Lieutenant shall, on the advice of the Executive Committee, give or withhold his assent on behalf of Her Majesty. If the words proposed by my hon. Friend are inserted I do not see that there would be any undue delay, or that any injury would be inflicted on the interests of either country, while it would mark the fact that the Lord Lieutenant must in every doubtful case consult the British Government, and he would himself be protected by the assent being withheld. As the sub-section stands, the matter may remain in doubt or ambiguity.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, he would venture to suggest that the Leader of the Opposition had misapprehended the point of the Amendment. As far as concerned Imperial instructions to the Lord Lieutenant, the Amendment made no change whatever. The hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) talked of securing the Imperial supremacy, but the Amendment would not make the shadow of a shade of difference in regard to that supremacy which was already absolutely secured by the terms of the Bill. What would be effected by the Amendment would be to make the clause read in the following way:—

"The Lord Lieutenant shall, on the advice of the said Executive Committee, but subject, nevertheless, to any instructions given by Her Majesty in respect of any such Bill, declare either that he assents or dissents, or that he reserves the Bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure."

Anyone who read these words, and compared them with the words in the Bill, would see that they did not propose to make any change in reference to Imperial instructions to the Lord Lieutenant. If the Amendment were inserted the Imperial instructions would be in no way different from what those instructions would be under the Bill. What the hon. Gentleman really proposed to do was to alter the system of veto as between the Lord Lieutenant and the Executive Committee of the Irish Privy Council. By the scheme of the Bill—a very simple, reasonable, and, so far as Imperial supremacy was concerned, a very effective scheme—the Lord Lieutenant would be bound to act on the advice of the Irish Ministers unless he received instructions from the Sovereign. If he received instructions from the Sovereign, then these instructions would over-ride the will of the Irish Executive. What did the hon. Member propose to substitute for that simple and effective scheme? That the Lord Lieutenant should declare that he would assent or reserve the Bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure. Did the hon. Gentleman who drafted this Amendment allow his mind to run before and imagine the circumstances to which he would apply himself? Evidently the hon. Member for South Antrim thought it possible that the Irish Executive Committee might advise the Lord Lieutenant to reserve a Bill—although the Chamber to which they were responsible had passed it—and to send to London to know what the Imperial Government thought about it. The suggestion was absurd, and the hon. Member was providing for a state of affairs which could never possibly arise. Because it was not conceivable that the Irish Executive would advise the Lord Lieutenant to reserve a Bill passed by their own Chambers in order to await the signification of the Queen's pleasure. The second point was that while reserving the Bill the hon. Member did not say what was to be done with it in the meantime. He would have expected from an hon. Gentleman who aspired to be a Constitutional Leader that when he moved his Amendment he would at least, having reserved the Bill, say what was to happen to it afterwards. He made no provision, and apparently the Bill dropped out of sight or out of existence altogether. He would only say that, in the first place, the Amendment proposed to make a system for an impossible state of affairs; and, in the second place, the hon. Member did not follow up his Amendment by proposing to make any necessary provision as to what would happen in case the Bill was reserved.

*COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he thought the Amendment made the matter clearer. A subsequent Amendment could be put down to say what was to happen after a Bill was reserved.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) wished to say that in Colonial Institutions not only with reference to subordinate Legislatures subject to a Colonial Legislature which had the power of review, but also with reference to the relations of Colonial Legislatures to the Sovereign and Central Power, the trend and drift of opinion had been adverse to the power of reservation. The change made about 1878 in the form of the instructions omitted a number of cases in which it was made the duty of the Governor General of Canada to reserve Bills; and in practice, as between the subordinate Legislatures in Canada and the Central Legislature, it was now the settled Constitutional view that the power of reservation, which nominally existed, was not Constitutionally to be exercised. The proper course was agreed to be to assent to the Bill, and leave it afterwards to be dealt with in another fashion. He wanted to point out that there was a practical inconvenience in the power of reservation, because wherever they proceeded by reservation they imposed upon the Central Authority the duty of deciding not merely whether they would negative the Bill or not, but also whether they would or would not give it the force of law by positive assent, and he thought the duty of the Sovereign Authority should not be complicated by any such consideration. With reference to the remark of the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the clause was ambiguous at present, he averred that the clause was as clear as it could be made as it stood, and that it would only be confused if the Amendment were adopted.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) said, he thought that in dealing with Ireland it was imperative that every one of the Acts of the Irish Legislature should be brought before Her Majesty's Imperial advisers, and be made the subject of thoughtful investigation. There was no clear means by which the exercise of the Lord Lieutenant's veto was to be put into operation. Under what circumstances was the veto to be initiated? There was no provision made for that whatever, and he therefore thought some such Amendment was necessary.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) wanted to know what would happen if the "pleasure" of which they had heard should not be signified? This was a regular form which had been used in all the Colonies.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): I conceive that under the wording of the Bill as it stands, in any case in which the Lord Lieutenant may think it reasonable to ask for special instructions from Her Majesty's Advisers here, with respect to any Bill under consideration, he would be enabled, as a matter of right, to claim a reasonable time—a week or a fortnight—to obtain those instructions. If the opinion of the Solicitor General were given, it might tend to clear the matter up.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I will only say that I concur in the view which has been already given by the Attorney General.

Question put, and negatived.

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) moved an Amendment to insert words to provide that the Royal Assent should be given or withheld, subject "to the provisions of this Act" as well as to any instructions given by Her Majesty. His reason for desiring the insertion of the words was this—they had been told, in the course of the Debates, that where the Lord Lieutenant considered Bills passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature to be ultra vires he would veto them. As the clause now stood, it would not be possible for the Lord Lieutenant to do anything of the kind without receiving instructions from the Imperial Government. It appeared to him that the subsection was at present framed in such a way as to leave the Lord Lieutenant no discretion whatever on his own account. He must either act according to the advice of the Executive Committee, or according to any instructions that might be given by Her Majesty. His object in moving to insert these words was to give the Lord Lieutenant the power, of his own motion and on his own responsibility, to veto a Bill which he conceived to be contrary to the provisions of Clauses 3 and 4.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 2, after the word "nevertheless," to insert the words "to the provisions of this Act, and."—(Mr. Gerald Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. Tomlinson

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): The hon. Member will see, and the House will recognise, that the Amendment cannot possibly affect the object in view. The Lord Lieutenant either has the power which the Amendment proposes to give him, or he has not. If he has the power, the words are not required; but if he has not the power, the words will not give it to him, and will have no operation whatever.

Mr. CARSON (Dublin University) said, the question which had been raised was a serious one. As he understood the Amendment, what the Mover wished to put forward was this: that supposing the Lord Lieutenant had received no instructions, and supposing he was of opinion or might imagine that the Bill passed by the Irish Legislature contravened the provisions of Clause 3 or Clause 4, what was he to do? Under the clause as it at present stood the Lord Lieutenant had to give his assent to the Bill unless he had received instructions from Her Majesty to the contrary. As he understood the Amendment, his hon. Friend wished in some way or other to give the Lord Lieutenant some discretion—either to enable him to obtain advice of the Law Officer or some person who might be competent to give it. He did not know whether the form of the veto might be that it was meant in every case that the Lord Lieutenant was to send over the Bill, and himself to take instructions upon it. If that was so, of course it would get rid of the difficulty. But that was not what the clause said. If the clause meant that it ought to be distinctly stated; it would be the easiest thing in the world to state it upon the face of the clause. At present no discretion was left to the Lord Lieutenant, and he must in this case, unless he got those instructions, give his assent to a Bill which might contravene the provisions of Clauses 3 and 4. The only answer given by the Attorney General was not an answer to the principle they wished to establish here. The Attorney General had put forward one of those general propositions which nobody could dispute. They did not want generalities; they wanted the Attorney General to tell them whether the Lord Lieutenant had this power or not. He did not take the view of the Attorney General. He himself held that these words would have the effect which the Mover of the Amendment suggested. He submitted that the Amendment raised a question which vitally affected the whole machinery as to how they were to give effect to Clauses 3 and 4. He hoped the Attorney General would tell them how the matter would be carried out.

MR. ROSS said, he would like to know what was the meaning of the words—“Subject, nevertheless, to any instructions given by Her Majesty in respect of any such Bill”?

Did those words involve this: that every Bill was to come over here for the assent of the Imperial Ministers, or that the Lord Lieutenant was to act on the advice of the Irish Executive unless instructions were specially sent over? The matter was not clear in the clause as it stood.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, the Debates on this subject had already been rather prolonged, and questions about the veto had been asked again and again. From his recollection, he thought he could say that it had been often explained that the Lord Lieutenant would act upon the advice of the Irish Ministers unless he received instructions to the contrary, which was the system in the Bill. Whatever learned Gentlemen might desire—and certainly the hon. Member for Dublin University had made his desire very clear—he thought it was beyond denial that the words of the Amendment effected nothing. What the hon. Member wished was that, subject not only to instructions from Her Majesty, but to all the provisions of the Act, the Lord Lieutenant should give or withhold his assent. The reply of the Attorney General was unanswerable. If the provisions of the Act, to which the hon. Member referred, were applicable at all, they would apply themselves without words. If there were provisions anywhere in the Act applying to the subject of this clause, they would necessarily apply themselves without words to that effect; and if any provisions in the Act elsewhere did not apply to the veto, no words that the hon. Member could suggest would help him. He ventured to think that the hon. Member for Dublin University was in error as to the effect of the application of those words to Clauses 3 and 4. The hon. Member said that any law made in contravention of the section would be void. That pointed to an Act of assent, and Clauses 3 and 4 could only apply to a Bill which by assent had become law; and then, when it became law, the Bill provided elaborate machinery for making the Bill void if necessary. He therefore took issue with the hon. Gentleman that the Lord Lieutenant was to anticipate the decision of the Judicial Tribunal and make himself in any sense a Judge of ultra vires. The Act was clear. Specific and abundant directions were given as to when a Bill would or would not be ultra vires; and the Prime Minister lately, in these Debates, in the most conclusive terms pointed out how contrary to public policy it was, and how contrary to public convenience it might be, that after the passing of a Bill by the two Chambers in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant should take it upon himself to form an opinion as to whether the Bill was ultra vires—a matter properly reserved to the Judicial Tribunal—and having given that opinion should refuse his assent to the Bill. If anybody supposed that under such conditions there could be harmony in Ireland he had only to say it would be impossible. They should leave the judicial question to the Judicial Body, and if there was any reason to suppose that a Bill was ultra vires that question should be reserved to that Body alone. If they attempted to turn a political official into a Judge or tribunal, and allowed him to suggest that a Bill was beyond powers, and then make that his own decision, they would turn everything topsy-turvy. The question remained, was the Lord Lieutenant to send over some Bills, any Bill, or every Bill to London, whilst at the same time he was directed to act upon Irish advice in the absence of instructions from London? If the Lord Lieutenant was to act as a Political Agent, to select Bills and to discriminate between them—if he was to be allowed to say that in the case of one Bill he would give his assent and in another that he would refuse it—the result would be to generate prejudice and suspicion in the Irish mind in reference to the Lord Lieutenant; and where the assent was refused, the people in Ireland would suspect that it was so refused because the Lord Lieutenant made some suggestion on the subject. He assumed the Lord Lieutenant would act upon some advice or other. It was for the Imperial Ministry to inform themselves of what proceeded in the Irish Legislature. They could easily do that, as they were within a few hours' journey of Ireland. The proceedings of the Irish Legislature would be reported from day to day, and he did not see how any difficulty could arise. He respectfully submitted that, for the official and smooth working of the Government in Ireland, it was desirable that the Lord Lieutenant, in respect of the veto, should be a perfectly impartial person, should take no initiative of his own, and should act upon Irish advice where it was given to him, and upon Imperial advice where it was given to him.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Our view is perfectly plain in this matter. We entirely agree that the Lord Lieutenant should possess the power that is desired. We believe that he does possess it; and that if he does not possess it, the words proposed, as the Attorney General has said, will not give it to him. It does not require a special provision in Clause 5 to enable him to refuse his assent. It is his absolute duty to obey the law and refuse his assent if he should see that a Bill is ultra vires.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The speech of the right hon. Gentleman does point to the conclusion that some words ought to be imported into the clause, in order to make the meaning of Sub-section 10 clear. The reason I say that is that two gentlemen, great authorities on the subject, both give an entirely different interpretation as to its meaning. There is the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and there is the hon. Member for North Kerry who has given an entirely different version, both as to the power and the duties of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. Member for North Kerry derides the idea that it would be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to consider whether or not an Act of the Irish Legislature was consistent with the provisions of Clauses 3 and 4 of this Bill. According to the hon. Member, the question would not be one for the Lord Lieutenant, but for the Law Courts. But the Prime Minister, on the other hand, says that it is not only within the power of the Lord Lieutenant, but that it would be his absolute duty, to form a judgment upon that very question. The second difference is not much less important. The hon. Member for North Kerry takes the view—and I bring myself more in accord with him than with the Government—that the Lord Lieutenant always acts under advice. It may be the advice of the Irish Administration, or it may be the advice of the English Administration; but when he acts it is always under advice like a Constitutional Sovereign. That is the view of the hon. Member for North Kerry, but it is not the view of the Government. On that point, also, they entirely differ from the hon. Member for North Kerry. They think the Lord Lieutenant acts in three quite distinct capacities—as a Constitutional Sovereign under the advice of the Irish Government, as a Constitutional Sovereign under the advice of the English Government, and as a Minister himself of his own initiative. That is the view of the Government, but it is not the view of the hon. Member for North Kerry. This is a matter which should be made perfectly plain, as it would be if the words of my hon. Friend were introduced into the Bill. On these two points it is quite clear there is a wide distinction between the views of the Government and the hon. Member for North Kerry. There is a third point. I understand the view of the hon. Member for North Kerry to be not only that the Lord Lieutenant invariably acts under advice, but that he has no initiative to select which set of advisers to go to. His view is that the Lord Lieutenant may be passive or, as he calls it, impartial in Ireland on the question of the veto; that he is to act on the advice of the Irish Government, unless, without their being set in motion by the Lord Lieutenant at all, the English Ministers step in and say—“You have received this advice from the Irish Government; we give you contrary advice; and as between these two sets of advisers, of course, under the Act, you have got to choose us.” I believe that view of the hon. Member for North Kerry to be an accurate view. If that be so, here is a third point on which he differs from the Government, because I believe the Government hold that if the Bill is to be made a rational workable measure one of the most important and interesting questions of discretion that will be left to the Lord Lieutenant is whether or not he will appeal to the English Ministry to give him advice with regard to certain Bills. As I conceive the mode in which the Lord Lieutenant will deal with his duties, it will be this. A Bill comes up, and it is obviously of a character within the competence of the Irish Legislature, and in which no question of general policy or the rights of special minorities is concerned, he will act on the advice of the Irish Ministers, nothing more will be said, and the Act will become law, or, at any rate, until somebody chooses to contest it before the Privy Council. If, on the other hand, he considers it a doubtful case, he will, according to the Government, either of his own initiative refuse, assent, or say—"It is not a question I can act upon without advice, and I will insist on appealing to English Ministers," on whose advice he will have to act. But the Member for North Kerry takes an entirely different view. He thinks the Lord Lieutenant is to receive these Bills as they come up, and unless and until he gets word from the English Ministers he is to give his assent as of course. I think, if my hon. Friend's Amendment has done nothing else, it has, at all events, given us an occasion on which we may really get to the bottom of this matter. I do not wish to put metaphysical or abstruse questions to the Government; but this is an important question of policy, on which great divisions exist not between them and us, but even between them and their supporters. That being so, I think the least we have a right to ask is that they shall make a perfectly clear exposition of their views of what the Lord Lieutenant ought to do, and of the mode in which they think these views are to be carried out.

MR. J. MORLEY: The first point the right hon. Gentleman puts is whether the Lord Lieutenant can, under any circumstances, absolve himself from the necessity of either taking the advice of the Irish Ministers or seeking instructions from Ministers here? The Government hold, undoubtedly, that cases might arise when it would be the Lord Lieutenant's plain, obvious duty to withhold his assent from Bills without consultation with English Ministers. I will give a case, and then the hon. Member for Kerry will see the force of our position. Supposing the Irish Legislature were to pass a Bill endowing any Church, or a Bill providing funds for the use of an Irish Envoy to a Foreign Court, it would not be necessary for the Lord Lieutenant to consult the English Ministers before withholding his assent from such measures. He would see for himself that they were absolutely ultra vires, and would act accordingly. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman took another point, and, undoubtedly, a point of great interest. He said, take a case where Irish Ministers tendered advice in respect of Bills to the Lord Lieutenant, and he then asked—"Is the Lord Lieutenant to be free to say to his Irish Minister I do not like your Bill, and I shall invite some other set of gentlemen to form a Ministry who will not bring in this Bill. Is he to be free to do this?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Is he to be free to say—"I do not like your Bill; I will refer to another set of advisers"—namely, the English Ministers? That is what I meant to convey.

MR. J. MORLEY: I should have thought that in all matters exclusively Irish which were entirely within the competence of the Irish Government the Lord Lieutenant would be as free as a Colonial Governor to say to his Irish Ministers—"I do not like your Bill." He would not say—"I will refer to the English Ministry," but he would say—"I will invite Mr. So-and-so to form an Administration with another policy." A Colonial Governor might take, and would take, that course, and I do not know why the Lord Lieutenant should not be allowed to take the same course.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That, I think, has never been in dispute. What I understood was in dispute between the hon. Member for North Kerry and the Government was this—whether the Lord Lieutenant, acting Ministerially and acting under advice, may choose the set of advisers to control his action? This subsection contemplates that, under certain circumstances, he is to act on the advice of British Ministers. Is he to wait until the British Ministers put him in motion, or may he say—"I will appeal to them and see what their views are"?

MR. J. MORLEY: If he chooses he might, undoubtedly, communicate with the English Ministry. If he sought their advice that would be a matter for his own discretion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member for North Kerry denies that.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then I am sorry to say I differ from the hon. Member for North Kerry.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) desired to point out the great importance of this difference which had arisen between the Government and the hon. Member for North Kerry. It was not an academic difference, not a mere difference of opinion. What did the hon. Member for North Kerry say? He said that if his view was not correct there would be suspicion bred in the Irish people as to the Lord Lieutenant, and he further said that this Constitution could not work smoothly unless his view was correct. It was important they should know that on this vital question affecting the relations between the Imperial Government and the British Government, and which affected the exercise of the veto of the Lord Lieutenant, the theory which the Government had now pinned themselves to was one which, on the authority of the hon. Member for North Kerry, would not work smoothly, and would breed suspicion between the Irish people and the Representative of the Crown.

MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): May I point out one point in which Section 5, as it stands, is in direct conflict with the view of the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to what it ought to imply? The right hon. Gentleman said that if the Irish Legislature presented to the Lord Lieutenant a Bill for providing funds for the appointment of an Envoy from Ireland to the Court of France, or for the endowment of any religion in Ireland, he is not to assent to the Bill, and that he may dissent without instructions from the English Ministry. Sub-section 3 does not say that. Sub-section 3 is imperative upon the Lord Lieutenant to follow the advice of his Executive Committee, unless he has got instructions. It says in terms that the Lord Lieutenant shall, on the advice of the Executive Committee, give or withhold assent, subject, nevertheless, to instructions given. I venture humbly to think that the argument of the hon. Member for North Kerry was extremely convincing on that point, because he said Sections 3 and 4 assumed that ultra vires laws may be laws in force. There may be a law as ultra vires as you please—say for the endowment of the Presbyterian religion in Ireland—which yet has received the assent of the Lord Lieutenant, and is law. The hon. Member for North Kerry said with equal force that you have got a special provision, and you may object. A law of that kind which is void is to be declared void—namely, by reference to the judicial authority; therefore, the proposition of the Chief Secretary that the Lord Lieutenant has some reserved discretion in his third capacity for dissenting without any instructions is a proposition which is contradicted both by the terms of Section 5, and by the inference drawn from the language of Sections 3 and 4. May I observe upon this same point that the theory of the Government is so novel that it requires express words to carry it out? The Lord Lieutenant represents the Sovereign. I suppose there are some functions of the Lord Lieutenant for which he can himself be made responsible, and the Sovereign never can be made responsible. But in this particular function of giving assent to a Bill he represents the Sovereign in a peculiar sense as a Member of the Legislature; and I should have thought that, without express words, it was quite clear he must act under advice. There must be some Minister responsible for the assent or dissent which the Lord Lieutenant indicates to the proposals of the Legislature; consequently, if he has not got the advice of his Irish Executive, he must have the instructions of English Ministers to enable him to act. The Government, on the other hand, take the view that the Lord Lieutenant, although he is a Constitutional Sovereign, yet still is a man of sense and a reasonable being, and is not bound to assent to a law which, on the face of it, any person would declare to be a nullity and void. Well, surely, you want express words in Clause 5 indicating that he may act in this way. It is contrary to the language of the clause as it stands, and it is contrary to the Constitutional doctrine that Constitutional advice must be obtained before he assents or dissents.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, it certainly appeared to him that if the intention of the Government was as had been disclosed to the Chief Secretary, it was not expressed by the text of the Bill. In the case of a colony, the Governor acted on his own responsibility. He assented or dissented, and nothing was said in the Colonial Acts as to any advice; but in the case of the present Bill the language of the clause was perfectly clear. The Lord Lieutenant was to act under advice, and he submitted, therefore, that he was bound either to follow that advice or dismiss the Ministry. The Lord Lieutenant might think that a Bill submitted to him was a Bill full of evil consequences; but he was bound to accept that Bill should the Executive Committee give him that advice. He might think, moreover, as was stated by the Chief Secretary, that it was an infringement of Clause 3. It might be for the endowment of a Church, or for the appointment of a foreign Envoy; but the Lord Lieutenant would be bound to follow the advice of the Executive Committee if they desired him to sanction this Bill, and then the cure for any mischief must be under a subsequent section of the Bill—Section 20—which gave power to a Court to deal with any such legislation, and declare it void by a solemn decree. He felt strongly that the intention of the Government was entirely sound; but he was sure they had failed once more in the drafting of the Bill, and that their intention was not carried out by the language of the clause.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) ventured to think that in the course of the discussion of this Amendment they really had touched upon one of the vital questions involved in this Bill. They had now come to a clear and definite issue between the Chief Secretary and the hon. Member for North Kerry. On the one hand, the Chief Secretary told them that the Lord Lieutenant could, without any instructions from a Member of the British Cabinet, withhold his assent to an Irish Bill, although the Executive Committee directing him might have advised him to assent to it. On the other hand, the hon. Member for North Kerry said most distinctly that the Lord Lieutenant could do nothing of the kind. What he ventured to submit to the Government was this—that on the wording of this Section 5, as it stood, the construction placed upon the Bill by the hon. Member for North Kerry was correct. The section was directory to the Lord Lieutenant. It said—

“The Lord Lieutenant shall, on the advice of the said Executive Committee, give or withhold the assent of Her Majesty.”

There was, no doubt, a subsequent proviso directing that the Lord Lieutenant should act subject to any instructions given to Her Majesty; but if no instructions were given there was no alternative for him but to act on the advice of the Executive Committee. If that were so, he thought they might fairly appeal to the Government to accept the Amendment, and insert words in the Bill that would put an end to this most unfortunate difference that had arisen between them and their allies of the Irish Party.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, that in the course of this discussion the hon. Member for North Kerry had brought out one point, at all events, and that was that if the Lord Lieutenant sought the advice of the English Ministry he would become extremely unpopular. Could anyone doubt that? The Chief Secretary said—“Suppose a Bill is brought before him to send an Envoy to a Foreign Court, or to endow a Church.” But there was no fear of any such Bill being brought before him. He did not fancy that a Bill so outrageous and so much in direct opposition to the present Bill would be brought forward. Suppose, however, that a Bill a shade beyond the powers of the Irish Legislature was passed. The Lord Lieutenant, on it being brought before him, might say he did not see his way to give his assent to it, and ask for the advice of the English Ministry, who would decide against the Bill. The Irish Legislature would naturally say that if the Lord Lieutenant had not asked for advice, but had given his assent to the Bill, no question would have been raised at all by the English Executive. The entire blame of stopping that Bill, and other Bills of the kind, would be laid not upon the English Executive, but upon the Lord Lieutenant. It should, therefore, be made clear in such a case that the English Executive were to act on their own motion, and the Lord Lieutenant must wait for them to act, or else that he was bound to ask for their advice.

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth): I should like, before this matter closes, to express my strong opinion as to the necessity of putting some words into Clause 5 in order to carry out the view of the Prime Minister. The words in the Amendment would be extremely apt and effective words. The declarations of the Prime Minister and of the Chief Secretary for Ireland are entirely satisfactory. The declaration now is that it would be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to refuse his assent to a Bill which was inconsistent with the limitations imposed in Sections 3 and 4; and they have swept away the contention—which was a perfectly unreasonable and untenable contention—that it was the Lord Lieutenant's duty to assent to anything, whether inconsistent with the clause or not, and to leave it to be decided by a judicial tribunal at some future time, even in reference to Bills which were most manifestly inconsistent with the Act. I would point out to the Prime Minister that if he desires, as I am sure he does, to secure on the face of the Bill the establishment of the principle he has so distinctly laid down, some words are necessary here. Suppose a Bill to have passed the two Houses of the Irish Legislature which distinctly and manifestly contravenes the limitations imposed in one part of Section 3. Suppose a Bill is passed dealing with alienage and aliens as such—a matter which is clearly excluded from the power of the Irish Legislature. This Bill is brought to the Lord Lieutenant for his assent. What has he to do? The 5th clause tells him what he has to do. Sub-section 3 says—

Suppose Her Majesty gives no instructions at all, and even if the Lord Lieutenant were to consult the Ministers here, and ask to be advised on the matter, those Ministers might say, in the very words which the Prime Minister has used this afternoon—“It is your duty to see whether this is in contravention of Clause 3, and if you see that it is to give effect to your view.” The answer of the Lord Lieutenant would be this—“By Section 5 you have told me that I shall give or withhold my assent on the advice of the Executive Committee.” But that Executive Committee, by the hypothesis, is the very Government which has passed through these two Houses the Bill which is so manifestly inconsistent with Clause 3. I submit to the Prime Minister that the words which my hon. Friend has proposed are exactly appropriate words. My learned Friend the Attorney General said that the provisions of the Bill always applied, and that the Lord Lieutenant was acting under the provisions of the Bill. Not so. Here is the specific instruction to the Lord Lieutenant—that in dealing with this particular part of his delegated power he shall act upon the advice of the Executive Committee in Ireland; and, as the Bill now stands, I say, without the smallest hesitation, that if they passed a Bill obviously inconsistent with Clause 3, then presented it to the Lord Lieutenant, and he received no instructions from Her Majesty, it would be his absolute duty to give assent to that Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: And to concur in an entirely illegal act?

*SIR E. CLARKE: Certainly, because there is a mandate to him to act on the advice of the Executive Committee in Ireland. What can he do? Supposing he said to the Executive Committee—“This Bill is in contravention to the limitations of Clause 3,” their answer to him would be—“Look at Clause 5, which specifically says you are to act upon our advice.” All this difficulty could be avoided if the Government would only give effect to their own view of the matter, and accept the words which my hon. Friend proposes, because these words would then apply the provisions of Clauses 3 and 4 to the discharge of that duty prescribed in Section 5, and would make it perfectly clear that it was the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to take that course which the Prime Minister has so distinctly declared it ought to be his duty to take.

SIR H. JAMES said, if the Government had time for reflection, he thought the Prime Minister, at least, would desire to carry out the views which he had himself expressed. If the right hon. Gentleman would look at the matter for a moment he would see that these words had that object. They were told that the Lord Lieutenant was to have these capacities—as representing the Queen, as an Imperial Minister, and as Lord

Sir E. Clarke

Lieutenant in advice with the Irish Executive. When a Bill was passed by the Irish Legislature they would submit it to him for his assent. He was bound to act upon the advice of the Irish Executive. There could be no doubt about that, for the words were, "He shall act." If he were to act otherwise than upon their advice he would be a usurper. No such question could arise in this country. The supremacy here, at all events, was assured. In Ireland various questions might arise. When a Bill was brought to the Lord Lieutenant he was told that he should, as required by the Act, follow the advice of the Executive. The Prime Minister said he was protected, because he would not be called upon to obey the Act—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say that. I said he would not, with his eyes open, disobey this Act.

SIR H. JAMES said, it was the same thing. He admitted that when an Act was brought to the Lord Lieutenant, which was a good and useful measure, he would take the advice given. The question was, however, whether a Bill was good or bad. If he refused his assent he placed himself in a position which would subject him to an extreme penalty. The Irish Legislature might pass an illegal Act. What, then, would be the position of the Lord Lieutenant? Was he protected by this Act? Under the clause as it stood, he was subject to the Act, but he was not protected by it. If these words were inserted the intention of the Prime Minister, and, he believed, the majority of the House, would be carried out. The Prime Minister having declared that the Lord Lieutenant might exercise his discretion apart from the Executive, unprotected by Constitutional advice, he was asked that he should put the Lord Lieutenant in the position that he would be able to refer to the Act and see that he could deal with a Bill under its provisions, and with perfect protection to himself. As it was, he was to be placed in a dangerous position—the words proposed were really for the purpose of carrying out the Government's own intention. There was a point of substantial importance upon which he had to say a word. If the Lord Lieutenant had before him a Bill of 15 clauses, 10 of which were ultra vires, what was he to do?

On whose advice was he to act? He would wish to give his assent to the useful clauses of the measure, perhaps; but he could not give his assent to the other 10. To whom was he to look? To the Executive Council. He was bound to follow their advice, the question being not Imperial but local. If he did not look to them—if he exercised his discretion—he was placed in a position by which he had an arbitrary right of sovereignty—a greater Constitutional power, he feared, than the Sovereign herself. A Viceroy placed in such a position would be most unhappy and the most to be pitied of any of Her Majesty's subjects. He would be placed in conflict with the Executive; and he repeated that that was not desirable, and that the clause was entitled to reconsideration by the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman went on the supposition that in future the Lord Lieutenant would be always a fool. That was their experience of Viceroys; but doubtless the gentlemen of the future would be possessed of a fair measure of intelligence. Let them take the case where a bit of railway was being made which might, or might not touch some portion of the Crown land. That might be a question of fact; and to tell him that the Lord Lieutenant was to go down to the County of Cork and find out by some means whether, as a matter of fact, this Act was dealing with a piece of Crown land, instead of leaving it to the local military authorities to apply to have the Act abolished, was to tell him what was absurd. The position taken up by the Unionist Party was that when the Government offered one provision they asked for something else. They did not say that the provision giving the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council power to determine questions of ultra vires was no good, but they said they wanted something else. They would not have a paper safeguard; they wanted a brown-paper safeguard. Could anything be more absurd? If all the provisions of the Bill were paper safeguards, absolutely useless, what did they gain by putting in these tissue-paper safeguards in addition? He (Mr. T. M. Healy) conceived that if the Lord Lieutenant were asked to pass a Bill that was plainly ultra vires he would veto it; but if he got a Bill that was not plainly ultra vires, and if he was advised by responsible men that it was within the powers of the Legislature, unless he was a person, say, of the type of Lord Londonderry—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Hear, hear !

MR. T. M. HEALY : Or of some of the jockey Viceroys whom they had had in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant would probably take note of the good sense of his advisers, and, unless the matter was clear and plain, he would refuse to veto the Bill. They had had a question put that day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. Dilke), who asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies under what Statute, British or Colonial, the Commander of H.M.S. Pelican acted in forbidding the inhabitants of St. George's Bay, Newfoundland,

"to sell herring to any other parties than the French ships in port, or who may arrive in port, until they are baited,"

"the price of herring is fixed for the present at one dollar per barrel."

No doubt some provision would be made in this Bill to fix the price of herring at a dollar a barrel ! And the Lord Lieutenant would consult his advisers as to the fixing of the price of herring ! He (Mr. T. M. Healy) ventured to say that business in Ireland would be carried out in good temper in every respect. What they objected to in the provision of the hon. Gentleman opposite was this—that it converted the Lord Lieutenant into a Judge. He would not have the case argued against or argued for. He would not have advice on both sides. The case would not be settled in open court. It would be settled by him in secret. The Government proposed that if there was a doubt it should be argued on both sides by a proper tribunal on judicial principles. They consented to the application to the matter of what they had got inserted in the Bill—namely, "due process of law." On the principles of due process of law, and not upon the principles of private negotiation or private practice, they hoped to see this Bill carried out.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said the next Amendment stood in his name—

Mr. T. M. Healy

Clause 5, page 4, line 3, at end, add—

"(4) The Lord Lieutenant shall, subject to the above conditions, have the power of cancelling and annulling Resolutions passed by either House or both Houses of the Irish Legislature.

"(5) Any Petition from either House or both Houses of the Legislature to Her Majesty's Government or to Parliament shall be forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant, who shall in his discretion and subject to the above conditions transmit or withhold transmission of the same."

He did not, however, propose moving the Amendment. The question which it raised had been more or less discussed in Committee, and once more on the Report stage ; and as anything he could say would not induce the Government to accept the Amendment he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name—

Clause 5, page 4, line 3, at end, add—"Provided that, except upon instructions given by Her Majesty, no such assent shall be given by the Lord Lieutenant until the expiration of 40 days after such Bills have been passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature."

The object of the Amendment was to give reality to the safeguard of the Imperial veto, and to provide that some reasonable time should be given to the Imperial Government for the purpose, if they thought proper, of giving instructions to the Lord Lieutenant in the case of a Bill which might be ultra vires or oppressive and unjust in character. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), the Leader of one section of the Nationalist Party, gave a gloomy acquiescence to the veto, and the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin McCarthy), the Leader of the other section, had, he understood, no serious objection to it. In Clause 5 it was provided that the Lord Lieutenant should give his assent on behalf of Her Majesty, subject to instructions from the Imperial Government. His Amendment proposed to give time to the Imperial Government, if they thought proper, to give instructions to the Lord Lieutenant. As the matter stood, the Lord Lieutenant could give his assent to a Bill on the very day that it was passed, or within a week, and there would be no time for considering the Bill, or for giving instructions to the Lord Lieutenant. He was quite aware that no time was fixed for the Lord Lieutenant to give his assent in ; but he might give it on the very next day that Bill was passed. His desire was that a period of 40 days should be fixed for, as he had said, the purpose of allowing the Imperial Government to consider what ought to be done. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had suggested that it would be the duty of British Ministers to read the Irish newspapers ; but he (Mr. Butcher) expected that the British Ministers would be better employed in looking after British interests than in watching the eccentricities of the Irish Parliament. It was suggested that the Home Secretary, on reading in the newspapers what was occurring in the Irish Parliament, could send over instructions by telegraph. Those were things which they could not contemplate as reasonable, and so he thought some reasonable time should be allowed in order that the Imperial Government might consider the measures that were passed. They might be told that occasions upon which that Imperial veto would be exercised would be so rare that it would be hardly worth while bringing it into effect. But it was quite possible the Irish Government might be disposed to trench upon the right reserved from them, and pass laws beyond their power. Such Bills ought to be submitted to the Imperial Cabinet ; but, under the provision made by the Government, the Lord Lieutenant was bound to give his assent to those Bills. There was another class of Bills which should come under the consideration of the Imperial Cabinet, and that was Bills of an oppressive character. On this point he might appeal to the supporters of the Government—some of them, at all events. Some of them had admitted that there might be danger in that direction. One hon. Member—the Member for Cardiff—had said it was highly probable, judging from the methods and spirit which animated many of the Irish Members, that the Irish Legislature would pass laws which would be very painful and objectionable to the Imperial Government. He (Mr. Butcher) agreed with the hon. Member ; and he thought the best safeguard was to have the measures submitted for consideration before becoming law. The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had before now said that it was not improbable the Irish Legislature would pass foolish measures. That was a statement in which many hon. Members, he was sure, would be inclined to join with the right hon. Gentleman. He said, therefore, that on this question, at least, the Government ought to give way. They had had the assurance again and again, that in the event of some law being passed which the Irish Legislature ought not to pass, the veto would be sufficient to meet the case. He would simply remind the House of the remarkable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. On Clause 2, on the question of the veto, he said there must be an effective supremacy of the Imperial Parliament ; and he went on to point out that one of the modes of upholding that supremacy was through the machinery of the Imperial veto. And he said, further, that if a Bill of an oppressive or unjust character were passed by the Irish Legislature, the present Bill laid down the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to refuse the assent of the Crown, on instructions from the Crown, acting on the advice of the Imperial Cabinet.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) : Quote the passage fully.

*MR. BUTCHER said, he had not the whole quotation here. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that foolish legislation might be passed, and that it would be a misfortune, but one with which the Imperial Parliament ought not to deal. In that he thought that House should not follow the right hon. Gentleman, if it was his opinion that in that case there would be no reason for the interference of the British Cabinet. Let him give another instance. In Committee they had a discussion as to the power of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and the Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) said that if the Irish Legislature were to hurry through a Bill suspending the Habeas Corpus Act when the circumstances of the time did not justify it, the Ministers of the Queen would be empowered to advise Her Majesty not to sanction the proceeding. Ministers would, no doubt, be so empowered, but, unless they accepted this Amendment, they would be empowered in theory but not in practice ; and the Lord Lieutenant would be told by the Irish Ministry to give the assent which it would be the desire of the Imperial Government he should refuse. In these circumstances, seeing that it was possible the Irish Legislature might pass foolish and unjust Acts, seeing that the President of the Local Government Board had spoken in that sense, and that it was their desire to make this provision effective, they should, he thought, adopt this Amendment. All that was asked for by the Amendment was that some time should be allowed for the Imperial Government to consider a Bill before it finally passed into law. If this was not done, the veto, which the Government said should be effective, would become a delusion and a sham.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words—"Provided that, except upon instructions given by Her Majesty, no such assent shall be given by the Lord Lieutenant until the expiration of 40 days after such Bills have been passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. and learned Member bases his Amendment on the ground that the Irish Legislature is likely to do foolish things.

MR. BUTCHER: Foolish, oppressive, and unjust.

MR. J. MORLEY: He quoted my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, but he did not tell us that my right hon. Friend drew a distinction between foolish things and what he called "bitter, unjust, and oppressive things"; and, of course, the Imperial Government would interfere in the case of oppressive or unjust legislation such as he imagined. I do not believe that the Irish Legislature is more likely to commit acts of folly than any other similar Body. But, even if I did believe it, it appears to me that if Legislatures are to be suppressed on the ground that they may do foolish things, or that they have done foolish things, I think the doors of this House of Commons would soon be closed, and those of another place would be closed still sooner. Yet that is what he founded his Amendment upon! His real motive we perfectly understand. The real object of the Amendment is to invite, by delay, the interference of the Imperial Parliament and the Imperial Government in Irish Bills and affairs, and, by so doing, to undo all that the Government hope to achieve by the passing of this Bill. Does he really mean that the Acts passed by an Irish Legislature should remain over in this manner? Take an ordinary case—that of a Cholera Bill. Does he really mean that such a Bill should remain for 40 days? Or take the Appropriation Act. Does the hon. Member say that that is to remain for 40 days standing over?

MR. J. MORLEY: My objection is that the proposal is entirely unnecessary in these days of post and telegraph. Neither the Lord Lieutenant nor the English Cabinet would want 40 days to turn over in their minds Bills they would know everything about. The hon. Member has given no kind of reason for this Amendment, except a reason which cuts at the root of the whole Bill.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) said, it was rather a fine distinction that the Chief Secretary had drawn between foolish acts and unjust and oppressive acts. As a general rule, a foolish act would be found to be unjust and oppressive to someone. When the right hon. Gentleman came to put his fine distinction into operation he would find it much more difficult than he imagined. The right hon. Gentleman said it would not take 40 days to find out about these things; but was that so? There would be no direct communication between the Lord Lieutenant and the Home Government; and it would, therefore, take some time to get the necessary information. The Central Authority would be left to the ordinary sources of information—that was to say the newspapers—to make themselves acquainted with what was going on in Ireland. With regard to these matters, then, it would be of advantage to give a little time. The Chief Secretary said that emergencies might occur, in which case it would be very inconvenient to wait 40 days; but express provision was made for that in the Amendment; besides, the occurrence of an emergency would be a thing which would be well known at home. Anything like a Cholera Bill the Home Government would be prepared to assent to at once. But why should not the people of Ulster have an opportunity of bringing before England the fact that an oppressive and unjust Bill was about to be passed so that the Lord

Mr. Butcher

Lieutenant might be prevented from giving his assent to it? No one could say what disorder might not result from resistance to an unjust law. The adoption of such an Amendment as that before the House, however, would tend to the smooth working of the Act, and give a reasonable time to the minority in Ireland, either by agitation or direct communication with the Central Authorities, to point out that some law was being passed which they considered unjust.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, this Amendment was another attempt to reduce to some kind of order the chaotic condition in which the Bill was left with regard to the Lord Lieutenant. During the consideration of the last Amendment they had endeavoured to find out whether the clause carried out the views of the Government, and whether the Lord Lieutenant should have power to veto the Bill without consulting anyone, or to choose whom he should consult; but the Government never deigned to answer their arguments. Perhaps they deemed that it mattered little in what condition they left the Bill. Under the circumstances, he did not think it was worth while to go to a Division. Nor was it worth while to press the Government to explain their views, or to modify their Bill in accordance with the efforts of the Opposition to reduce chaos to order.

Question put, and negatived.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, he rose to move an Amendment which consisted of two provisos; these provisos were quite independent the one of the other, and he proposed to move them separately. Under the first proviso it would be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, in pursuance of instructions from Her Majesty, to veto particular portions of an Appropriation Bill. The object was not so much to enable the Lord Lieutenant to veto particular money items in such Bills, as to enable him to meet the possible case of an Irish Parliament passing an Appropriation Bill with a rider attached, and thereby compelling the Lord Lieutenant either to accept this rider, which might be of a most objectionable character, or else to take the step of vetoing the Bill, with the effect of throwing the whole work of administration into confusion by withholding the necessary supplies from the Executive Government. The practice of tacking riders dealing with general legislation to Appropriation Bills would be generally condemned by the House, and the only question arising was this—was it likely the Irish Parliament would have recourse to this device? The experience of the United States was a guide, and that experience went to show that the apprehension was by no means chimerical. Within the last 50 years the device of tacking riders to Appropriation Bills had been used in the United States by the Senate to coerce the House of Representatives, by the House of Representatives to coerce the Senate, and by both Houses (by Congress) to coerce the President. The last cases were, of course, most in point in the discussion of this proviso. Twice within the last 30 years had attempts been made by Congress to coerce the President by attaching pieces of general legislation to Appropriation Bills. In 1867 it was successfully attempted by Congress against President Johnson, when Congress tacked on to the Army Appropriation Bill a provision investing General Grant with the supreme command of the Army. Again, in 1879, the attempt was made against President Hayes, who had resisted certain legislative proposals which had reference to the Southern States. Congress thereupon attached to the Army Appropriation Bill, and to two other Appropriation Bills, the proposals which had been previously rejected, endeavouring in this way to force the President to acquiesce. In that case the President was strong enough to veto the Appropriation Bill, and Congress was obliged to yield. On that occasion President Hayes's veto message, according to the work of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, argued strongly against the whole practice of tacking other legislation to a Money Bill, and, concerning this practice, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) adds that—"It has caused great abuse, and is now prevented by the Constitution of many States."

Of course, it might be argued that, although the experience of the United States undoubtedly did show that resort to this device was not impossible, yet in this country we had had no experience of the kind; and why, therefore, should we anticipate it would be the source of trouble in Ireland? The two cases were entirely different. In the United Kingdom the position of the Sovereign under the Imperial Constitution was entirely different to what would be the position of the Lord Lieutenant under the Bill. The Sovereign acted on the advice of a single Cabinet, responsible to Parliament, with the result that in this country the veto of the Crown had practically ceased to exist. When the veto was exercised only on the advice of the Ministry who were responsible to Parliament, no necessity for exercising it could arise. But the position of the Lord Lieutenant would be quite different. He would have to act on the advice not only of the Irish Executive Committee, but also of the Imperial Cabinet. He would have to serve two masters. So far as the Lord Lieutenant acted on the advice of the Irish Executive Council the veto power would be as extinct in Ireland as it was in this country, and it would only become operative when exercised on the advice of the Imperial Ministry. When the Lord Lieutenant vetoed a Bill on the advice of the Imperial Government he obviously would exercise the power in opposition to the Irish Parliament and Executive; and therefore it might be accepted as certain that if the veto were ever employed, it would certainly be resented by the Irish Advisers of the Lord Lieutenant, and, being so resented, it would be probable that the Irish Executive would take whatever means they had in their power to evade the veto. To take an illustration. Suppose the Irish Parliament and Ministers desired to pass a Bill to suspend trial by jury in Ulster, and that the Lord Lieutenant, acting on the advice of the Imperial Government, vetoed the Bill. The Irish Parliament and Government might, in order to coerce the Lord Lieutenant, tack the operative clauses of such a Bill on to an Appropriation Bill, and under such circumstances the Lord Lieutenant would be exactly in the dilemma described. He would have to accept the Bill with its objectionable rider, or he must face the alternative of depriving the Irish Executive of necessary funds, and thereby throwing the administration into confusion. There was no doubt this device might be resorted to, and lead to serious difficulties in Ireland. Everything turned on the reality of the veto. Her Majesty's Government professed their intention that the veto should be real and operative, and if they were sincere they ought not to leave to the Irish Legislature the power of resorting to this simplest of all methods for rendering the veto inoperative.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words—"Provided that, in case of Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, in pursuance of instructions given by Her Majesty, to give or withhold the assent of Her Majesty to particular provisions of such Bills."—(Mr. Gerald Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very sorry that the hon. Member has found it necessary to renew the subject.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: We never reached the Amendment at all in Committee.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Yes; on the 6th July.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It was discussed on the 6th July, and I am extremely sorry to have to inflict on the House a repetition of what I said before. I am not assuming that the matter is now raised in precisely the same terms; but the arguments and the substance are the same as before, just as they have been in nine-tenths of the discussions of the last few days. With respect to tacking, it is not altogether easy to define. What is meant by tacking? If it is the combination in one Bill of a number of provisions which have been customarily dealt with on a number of Bills with a view to shut out the discretion of the other branch of the Legislature by that combination, the House of Commons made a most effectual tack in 1861, when it entirely departed from the former practice of passing Money and Tax Bills one by one and sending them to the House of Lords one by one. In 1861 we advisedly and deliberately adopted the practice of combining them all in one Bill for the purpose of excluding discussion in the House of Lords. It was a very grand instance and most important in its results, for it virtually extinguished the whole legislative function of the House of Lords as to finance. Supposing such a case as that were to occur between the two Chambers in Ireland, it would be in the power of the Viceroy, under the proposed Amendment, entirely to frustrate the effort of the popular Chamber to defend its own privileges, because he might strike out such items as he thought fit from the Appropriation Bills, and thereby compel the Lower Chamber to send them up as separate Bills, and so deprive the popular Chamber of its only effective remedy against the interference of the other Chamber in financial matters. Now, it appears to me that that, of itself, is a vital and fatal objection to the Amendment. It will be seen that under the power given by the Amendment the great measure adopted in self-defence by the House of Commons against the House of Lords in 1861 might have been entirely frustrated by the Crown. The hon. Member said that powers analogous to these are in operation in certain States of America. No doubt he is right, but we cannot safely copy particular provisions from the legislative systems of foreign countries without considering the differences between their system and ours. [Cheers.] I am obliged for that expression of assent, and hope I shall have a renewal of it when I explain what I mean. The case of the United States is totally and fundamentally different from the case we have before us. Here we have on one side two Chambers, one being the taxing Chamber, and on the other side the Viceroy. In the States of the United States on the one side stands the Legislative Body and on the other the Governor, also elected by the people.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Does not the Imperial Cabinet represent the people?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In a totally different sense. It has not been elected by the people for this purpose. There have been in this country Cabinets that have lasted for 10, 15, or 20 years. The Cabinet comes in existence through the national will, but by a totally different machinery having no direct relation to the people. It is consistent in the American States that they should have these two organs, both coming from the people, in the same way, for a limited time, and should set one to correct the other. But it is really different, when one organ comes by remote and intermediate delegation from the people, to give that organ authority over another directly elected by the people and chosen for a particular purpose. Will the hon. Member give that power to the Crown in this country?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have no objection.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for that candid concession. The hon. Member would have no objection to enact that the Crown in this country, on receiving an Appropriation Bill, may strike out all such items as it pleases.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Acting on the advice of the Cabinet.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Oh, certainly; but the hon. Member would have no objection to undo what was done in 1861, and to restore to the House of Lords power over the House of Commons. Why is that to be done? In my opinion this would be a most serious invasion of the legitimate power of the Representatives of the people, whose first duty it is to have control over the taxation of the people. This is a matter with which the hon. Member says he does not wish the Viceroy to interfere. Having regard to the practice of tacking, it is dangerous to deal with the subject by legislation; it is far better to leave the question to the practical working of our institutions, and to the influence of legitimate public opinion upon them. It is the business of the Irish Executive to adjust their views to those of the Legislature while Bills are passing through the Chambers; that is the Constitutional system as it works all over the world. The case of the United States, where an elected Governor is placed in opposition to an elected Chamber, is totally irrelevant.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have often listened with astonishment to the replies which are thought adequate by Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to Amendments moved in all seriousness in this House; but I confess that my feeling of astonishment never grew to greater heights than during the speech which we have just heard. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman said that this Amendment was exactly like nine-tenths of the Amendments we have been discussing for many weeks.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That it was a repetition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman said that; but, of course, I accept it from him. But this is not a repetition. I asked a friend, while the right hon. Gentleman was speaking, to fetch me the volume of The Parliamentary Debates that deals with the question; and, although I have only been able to glance at it, it is perfectly clear to me that the Debate which took place in Committee, and has been alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, was not analogous and did not deal with the same matter as this, while this certainly is not a repetition of it. The Amendment to which the right hon. Gentleman refers was moved in Committee by my noble Friend the Member for Rochester (Viscount Cranborne). That Amendment undoubtedly proposed that the Lord Lieutenant should have the power of vetoing portions of Bills. The noble Lord, however, never once in his speech, as far as I have been able to read it, touched upon the question of Money Bills or tacking. The right hon. Gentleman who replied to him did not touch on that question either. When one of my friends suggested that it was a case in which the Irish Legislature might deal with portions of Money Bills he was reproached by the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) for having dragged in Money Bills. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) said—

“The present Amendment does not refer to Appropriation Bills, but to a different matter altogether, and there are very material differences.”

Well, in the face of that the right hon. Gentleman got up and reproached us with having raised again on Report a question which had been settled in Committee. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Well, the right hon. Gentleman must settle these differences of opinion with his Colleague. I will pass by the most unjust, and I had almost said improper, tones levelled by the right hon. Gentleman at us across the Table, and will come to the substance of his reply. The right hon. Gentleman went back to certain incidents which occurred in this House in 1861, and said that this House, in order to prevent the House of Lords having any legislative jurisdiction over questions of taxation, adopted a new method of arranging its Money Bills. I have two observations to make on that point. The first is that the arrangement of Money Bills cannot be described as tacking. The right hon. Gentleman said truly enough that it might be difficult to define tacking; but it is certain that a mere Consolidating Money Bill in the House of Lords is not tacking. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think, in spite of what fell from my hon. Friend, that he had in view some kind of dispute that was likely to arise between the Lower and the Upper House—if upper and lower are proper terms in which to describe these two Chambers—with regard to Money Bills. My hon. Friend was not dealing with disputes between the two Houses, and he distinctly said so. Therefore, the analogy of anything that occurs between this House and the House of Lords, even had it been relevant to the discussion, which it was not, would have been quite outside the particular kind of danger my hon. Friend desires to guard against. The right hon. Gentleman said the Viceroy might take advantage of this clause to interfere between the two Houses and to involve the Upper House in a contest with the Lower House. Whenever we suggest that the Viceroy would take action of this kind we are asked why we should suppose that the Viceroy would be so idiotic, and only this evening the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) made a vehement speech on this attractive subject. The right hon. Gentleman supposes that the Viceroy, acting with the advice of an Irish Administration, dependent as it must be upon the will of the Lower House, will interfere in some quarrel between the Lower and the Upper House in order to sacrifice the legitimate rights of the Lower House to the privileged Upper Chamber which is proposed to be created by the 6th clause. The right hon. Gentleman lost sight of what I think is really the most important portion of this question. He has told us over and over again that the veto is to be a reality. He has told us that protection to minorities is to consist in the exercise of the veto by the Lord Lieutenant in necessary cases on the advice of the British Administration. If the Lord Lieutenant is to be controlled in the exercise of the veto by this practice of tacking, what becomes of the veto as the safeguard of the minority or of the popular interests? We want to know how the veto can be a reality if you admit tacking to its fullest extent? The Irish Executive, I will assume for the sake of argument, bring in a Money Bill and tack on to it some administrative proposal of an iniquitous character, oppressive to the minority in Ireland or destructive of some Imperial interest. The Lord Lieutenant will be incapable of exercising the veto on that Bill without disorganising the whole administration of the country and stopping Supply. Is that fair; is that what you want; is that what you call having an effective veto? My hon. Friend behind me does not propose by this Amendment to deal with the Upper Chamber in Ireland as against the Lower Chamber. What he proposes to do is to leave the Lord Lieutenant free, if he chooses to take the advice of the British Ministry, to veto the obnoxious part of the Bill without throwing the whole of the Public Service of Ireland into absolute disorganisation. With interest and astonishment I listened to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, repeated three times in the course of his speech, that the principal functions of the Lower Chamber in Ireland would be to impose taxation. That is an entirely new view of the functions of that Chamber thrown before us at the very last stage of this Bill; and not only is it in direct contradiction to everything that has ever fallen, either from the Government or the Irish Members before, but it appears to be in direct contradiction to the provisions of the Bill itself, because we have taken care that the one thing the Irish Government shall not do with facility is to impose taxation, almost every convenient method of extracting money from the Irish people having been sedulously reserved by this Bill to the British Government. What becomes of the functions of the Irish Representative Assembly under these circumstances? This is only an illustration of the strange vagaries the Government indulge in when they plunge into these interesting Constitutional questions. But the question I would put to the Member of the Government who deigns to reply in this Debate is, how can you keep an effective instrument in the hands of the British majority if you permit the Irish Government to tack on to any Bill money provisions which are necessary for carrying on the Public Service in Ireland? Perhaps, however, the Government may treat us again to the absolute silence which they resort to where argument fails them.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he thought that the Prime Minister, in approaching the subject, had been too much influenced by his memories of the controversy over the Paper Duties in 1861. These memories had led him to misunderstand the scope of the Amendment, and to confuse it with a proposition of a totally different character that was discussed in full. The Amendment dealt simply with Appropriation Bills, and was designed to enable the Viceroy, acting upon the advice of the Imperial Government, to prevent any spurious addition to the Appropriation Bill. It had nothing to do with the question, therefore, which was involved in the Paper Duties, and still less had it anything to do with the question whether the Viceroy might out of any Bill select provisions which were repugnant to him. There was no proposition involved which would destroy or interfere with the power of the Lower House. Unless, however, some such Amendment were accepted, the power would be placed in the hands of the Irish Legislature of evading the present limitation imposed upon their authority by preventing the vetoing of one of their proposals. This could be done by introducing into the Appropriation Bill provisions which were entirely foreign to that Bill. This was a question which had arisen in the United States and also in our Colonies. Not long ago it arose in one of the Australian Colonies owing to an attempt to put an end to a struggle respecting the payment of Members by inserting a provision for their payment into the Appropriation Bill. The Prime Minister was accurate in point of form, no doubt, when he said that the example derived from the United States was not applicable in this case, because the Governor of each State was elected by the citizens. This merely showed that there was, in the judgment of the Governor, something in the nature of a referendum by which the people might correct the action of the Legislature. In Great Britain the supreme authority was, and would be, representative not simply of the people of Ireland, but of the people of the United Kingdom; and the Ministers of the Crown were as much representative of the people as if they were directly elected. He thought the House ought to protest against the notion that the Ministers of the Crown were not the embodiment for the time being of the national will. They were as truly exponents of the national will as the Representative Chamber itself. The Government confessed that the Irish Legislature was to be a subordinate Legislature, and limitations had been placed upon its power. Methods were pointed out by which such limitations might be avoided. It was now proposed to prevent the evasion of the limitations by giving to the supreme authority the power of regulating and compelling observance of them. The case might be put very simply. The Legislature of Ireland might pass two Bills—an Appropriation Bill and another measure. The Appropriation Bill would be naturally within their rights, and would receive the assent of the Lord Lieutenant; the other might be directly in opposition to the limitations laid down, and would consequently be vetoed by the Lord Lieutenant. If the two Bills were joined together the supreme authority would be placed in the most difficult position of having to decide whether or not to exercise the veto in the composite Bill, and in consequence to throw the organisation and Government into confusion. It was desirable that this difficulty should be avoided. The Amendment proposed a final and satisfactory way of avoiding it, and he hoped it would be accepted.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): It seems to me to be absolutely incredible that the Government should not think it necessary to reply to the arguments which have been put forward. At all events, we know that the bubble of the veto has been finally pricked. It has been shown how it is possible for the Irish Parliament to defeat the veto upon which the Government have hitherto relied. The argument of the Prime Minister did not deal with this portion of the case at all. It simply dealt with the general principle that the Lower Chamber in Ireland is specially constructed in order to impose taxation. That is the new view started by the right hon. Gentleman. The Prime Minister thinks that time is being wasted in discussing this Amendment, and he has taunted us with repetition. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be better coached on another occasion as to what has happened in previous Debates. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has shown that the question was specially exempted from Debate in Committee. Let the House realise the position in which we stand. When we attempt to debate this question we are told by the Prime Minister that it has been debated before.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It was included in the former Debate.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman heard the words of the Chancellor of the Duchy, and it has been shown that the Government has not hitherto condescended to reply to the point. The question is, whether the veto will not be thwarted by tacking Money Bills on to other measures? No answer whatever has been given by the Government; and unless we have an answer, we shall know that the Government avowedly are prepared to see the veto destroyed by means of a loophole in the Bill, when it has been shown to them that, by accepting this Amendment or some similar Amendment, the veto could be preserved. We have always thought that the veto would be a sham, and the time spent in showing that it is a sham has certainly not been lost. It will not be regarded as lost by the electors of this country. I think that for the credit of the Government they ought to attempt to show us how they would provide for this difficulty.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): My impression is that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is wrong in his recollection of the point; for it contained other matters, which were the main subject of debate. Although it is quite true that the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester (Viscount Cranborne) was not the same as this Amendment, the question which arises on this Amendment was brought up in that Debate first by the Member for Leeds (Mr. Gerald Balfour), and then by the right hon. Gentleman, upon the noble Lord's Amendment. Therefore, my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was quite justified in stating that this is not altogether in substance, but to a considerable extent, the same question as arose before. More than that he has not said. I come now to the Amendment itself. The stress of the argument of the Opposition rests upon their allegation that without this Amendment the veto will be useless. I have two replies to make to that argument. The first is that the veto will be used, if a sufficiently grave case arises, whether there be an attempt to "tack" or not. The fact that an attempt has been made to defeat the veto by tacking will not prevent the veto being used. The other argument bears more fully on the case, which has been made in supposing a serious crisis. If a Constitutional crisis of the kind were to arise; if the Irish Legislature were to try to carry a measure which is objectionable and likely to incur the veto by tacking to it an Appropriation Bill, that proposal would necessarily have to be seriously considered long before it reached the stage of being presented as a complete Bill to the Viceroy. It would be impossible, in the sort of crisis supposed, for the Viceroy not to know what was passing, or for his attention not to be called to the serious gravity of the case. It would be his duty at an early stage of the matter to call the attention of his Executive to the necessary results of their action, and in an extreme case to ask the advice of the Imperial Cabinet. If right hon. Gentlemen opposite display illimitable imagination in debating every possible kind of disposition on the part of the Irish Legislature to provoke conflict, and to attempt unreasonable things—and they are no doubt justified in making use of such imagination for the purposes of hypothetical argument, however improbable the case may be—but if what they suggest really happened, it would not be necessary to meet it with the veto, because it would be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant to nip it at an earlier stage. [Opposition cries of "How?"] By telling his Government he would not be a party to it, and by warning them of the consequences that must result if they persist in their course. I will put another point. This Amendment is designed to meet one case only—namely, the case of the Irish Legislature trying to effect their purpose by tacking. That is not the only way by which the Irish Legislature, if they were bent on carrying a measure, might proceed, and the hon. Member for Leeds is endeavouring to shut one door while he is leaving another, and a much wider one, open. There is no particular use in endeavouring to meet a difficulty of this kind, which would involve a Constitutional crisis of the gravest nature, by a particular Amendment directed against one particular form of action, when you leave it perfectly open to the Irish Legislature to attempt to gain the same end in another way, which would be even easier. I will ask the House to consider what the broad effect of this Amendment would be. The Amendment is in substance an attempt to impose upon the Imperial Cabinet the duty of a partial veto in certain cases of Money Bills, in regard to which the function of the popular House of the Legislature is especially sacred, because it is from the popular House of the Legislature that Money Bills proceed, and in respect of which the vetoing authority is only in a remote sense responsible to the Irish people. The Prime Minister observed, in answer to the argument which the hon. Member drew from the experience of the United States, that in the United States the Governor of a State, who is in some States permitted to veto particular items, is himself the creation of the popular will, and that it is perfectly open to the people, if they so choose, to devolve upon the creature of their own will the duty of controlling, even in a matter so eminently the function of the people as the voting of money, the exercise of that right. After all, such a veto is the act of the people, through their Representative, just as much as the act of the Legislature is the act of the people. Here the Imperial Cabinet, on whom the hon. Member seeks to devolve the veto, is responsible to the Irish people only in the proportion which the 80 Representatives of the Irish people bear to the total number of Members in the House. I might illustrate the results of this Amendment by remarking that they would resemble what would happen in the United States if the duty of vetoing parts of a State Appropriation Bill, passed for the State by its own Legislature, devolved not on the Governor of the State, but on the President of the United States, who, of course, is the choice of the people of the particular State in so remote a degree that he could not be regarded as practically responsible to them. We regard this proposal as one to some extent superfluous, and to some extent impracticable. We regard it as opposed to the traditions of British Constitutional Government which we desire to implant in Ireland, as likely to create friction between the people of Ireland and the Imperial Government, and as calculated to interfere with the fair working of the system of machinery on which we desire the Irish Government to proceed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I think the speech we have just listened to amply justifies the gentle pressure put upon the Government with the object of inducing them to give another reply. We should have missed a most useful lesson on the new Irish Constitution had we failed to enjoy the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Before I deal with the arguments of that speech I must put my right hon. Friend right on a question of memory. He says the Prime Minister was perfectly right in saying that this Amendment was substantially the same as one discussed in Committee on the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester (Viscount Cranborne). What did the Chancellor of the Duchy himself say about the Amendment of the noble Lord at the time when it was the subject of discussion? On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman said—"An Appropriation Bill is a totally different matter." He was dealing with the Amendment of the noble Lord, and he put aside the question of the Appropriation Bill as raising a new and distinct argument on the subject. I would remind the Chancellor of the Duchy that on that occasion, while most strenuously expressing disapproval of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester on the ground that it dealt with Bills other than Appropriation Bills, he expressed his approval of it when applied to Appropriation Bills.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Read, read!

*MR. BRYCE: I did not express my approval. I said there were certain merits, but I did not argue it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think the right hon. Gentleman should read his speech before he makes that correction. He said—

"The President, when it comes up to him, might well be authorised to disallow that particular item, but to give his assent to all the rest of the Bill; and no harm would be done by that course being adopted, because in an Appropriation Bill each clause stands on its own bottom."

*MR. BRYCE: That argument referred to the United States. I never admitted that the case of the United States was parallel to that of Ireland.

Mr. Bryce

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Why did the right hon. Gentleman state his approval in the case of the United States of a proposal to deal with the clauses of an Appropriation Bill separately in an argument bearing upon an English Amendment on an Irish Bill? No; I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Duchy to read carefully his own speech. His argument now is—"You propose to deal with this matter in a manner which is altogether wrong—in a manner which has not been adopted in America. In America they have only dealt with Appropriation Bills." Of course, in making that argument he meant to say—"If you had proposed to deal with it here on Appropriation Bills alone, you would have been perfectly justified." The right hon. Gentleman now finds that that argument will not suit his present purpose. This Debate, even when we approach an incident which is likely to occur about 11 o'clock to-night, has not lost its interest. It will, in fact always be memorable in laying before us thus late new ideas of the Government in regard to their own Bill. What does the Chancellor of the Duchy say in his own book? He approves of a proviso in the Constitution, which provides in Article 1, Section 7—

"The President is permitted to vote any particular item or items in an Appropriation Bill."

And the right hon. Gentleman's comment on that passage is—

"Of these changes the third"

—the one just read to the House—

"and fifth were obvious improvements."

Now we have got it that it is an obvious improvement to any Constitution that the President or the Governor of a State should be allowed to deal with a tack to an Appropriation Bill. "But," said the Chancellor of the Duchy, "that is quite different in this Constitution, because in our Constitution the person who would have to interfere represents the Imperial Parliament," and the Imperial Parliament, of course, does not represent the people. That is an interference with the legislative freedom of the Irish Parliament. Yes, Sir; under those circumstances, what is the veto? Here is this precious Constitution, which is to preserve the legislative freedom of the Irish Parliament, and it gives us a veto which the Prime Minister tells us is a real and efficient instrument against any abuse of its power by the Irish Parliament. "Oh, but," says the Chancellor of the Duchy, "to make that veto efficient would be to interfere with popular freedom and the liberties of the Irish people." Here is a confession from the Chancellor of the Duchy that the veto was always intended to be a sham. We know that the Chief Secretary meant it to be a Court-sword; but the Chancellor of the Duchy means it to be a scabbard without a sword at all. The Chancellor of the Duchy goes on to deal with the suggestion that, if the Irish Parliament were allowed to tack obnoxious or illegal Bills to an Appropriation Bill, it would be very difficult to exercise the veto. He says—"Oh, but our right and our power of interference would begin much earlier than that." This is another most interesting aperçu on the Constitutional position of the Irish Parliament which the House has never heard before. What is going to happen, according to the Chancellor of the Duchy? The Lord Lieutenant is going to watch every Bill, Resolution, and Act of the Irish Parliament; and the moment he, on his own discretion, thinks that the ultra vires provision is verged upon, or that it is a kind of Act to which the Imperial Government will be likely to object, or that the Resolution or Bill is such as the veto can by any possibility be applied to, he is to send for his Irish Ministers, and to say—"Look here, my fine fellows, do not waste your time in discussing this, for I have the veto in my pocket, and I shall have to apply it. You must alter the Bill in such and such a way—if you do not do so, bear in mind the whole of your time will be thrown away." Now, can the House conceive of anything more ridiculous than the Constitution conjured up by the Constitutional imagination of the Chancellor of the Duchy? We have always thought that the position of the Lord Lieutenant would, indeed, be very difficult and delicate, and occasionally very painful. But what would be the position of the Lord Lieutenant if this was to be one of his functions, and if on every occasion he was to be interfering with and advising his Irish Executive, and also threatening them with regard to almost every measure they introduced that if they did this or that he would, later on, have to exercise the veto? Then the Chancellor of the Duchy makes one other observation. He says as an objection to the Amendment—"It is quite true that by the means you have suggested this Irish Legislature might evade all the precautions we have taken in our Bill, and all the safeguards adopted for the benefit of the Loyalist minority, which we have again and again assured you would be sufficient for the purpose. But why should you bother about that? There are lots of other ways in which they could be evaded." "While I have been on my feet," said the Chancellor of the Duchy, "I have thought of one." Accordingly the right hon. Gentleman makes us a present of another way in which these safeguards can be evaded. Was there ever such a confession of impotent statesmanship as that which has been made by the Chancellor of the Duchy? I go back for a moment to the argument of the Prime Minister; I will not say much about that, because it was evidently brought forward in complete misapprehension of the meaning of the Amendment which it criticised. The right hon. Gentleman conjured up a hypothetical case, in which he supposed the Upper and the Lower Chambers—I think, considering the constitution of these two Chambers, we might say "the Lower and the Lowest Chambers"—to be in strenuous conflict. A case of that kind is hardly likely to arise. The Government have taken precautions. They have arranged that the electorate of one Chamber shall be, at all events, of the same character as the electorate of the other; and there is no reason to believe that the two Chambers will on any important question have even the slightest family dissension. "But suppose that is the case," said the right hon. Gentleman, "and suppose that the Lower Chamber is endeavouring to make good its great Constitutional right, and in order to promote its views, it tacks some Bill or other on to a Money Bill"—well, even in that event, why on earth should the Lord Lieutenant interfere? Is that a case in which, under any conceivable circumstances, the Lord Lieutenant would be interested in interfering? We are dealing with the Lord Lieutenant now as representing Imperial interests, or, at any rate, those local interests which it is the duty of the Imperial Parliament to protect.

The Lord Lieutenant in that capacity will not want to disallow provisions in an Appropriation Bill if it only involves a domestic quarrel between the two Chambers, and does not raise any question of oppression to the minority, or dishonesty, or anything injurious to the interests of the British Parliament. In all these cases the Lord Lieutenant would have no ground whatever for interference, and it was perfectly certain that he would not interfere. The only case in which the Opposition desire to reserve the interference of the Lord Lieutenant is the case in which the Irish Parliament has brought in a Bill which is either beyond their powers, or held to be by the Imperial Parliament oppressive and unjust; and, knowing that it will most likely be vetoed by the British Government, has tacked it on to an Appropriation Bill. It has been clearly pointed out that in that case we shall be under a great disadvantage. Unless the proposal of the Irish Government is of such a character that we must take any risk rather than allow it to pass into law, the probability is that the Imperial Government will wink at it and allow the irregularity to take place. But if the proposal is so serious that the Imperial Government finds itself obliged to deal with it, then the greatest possible inconvenience will arise, and the irritation necessary to the exercise of the veto under any circumstances will be greatly increased. It will surely be to the convenience and advantage of the Irish people, as well as of the British, if the Lord Lieutenant has the right to veto those parts of a measure of which he disapproves without including all those parts to which no objection is taken. In sitting down I would take note of a remark which the Prime Minister has several times repeated, to the effect that the Irish Lower House would find its highest and most important functions in dealing with the taxation of the people. Well, I suppose I am justified in believing that that goes further than the Irish Parliament, and applies to all other popular Representative Assemblies. Under those circumstances, I am quite sure that the Prime Minister can be counted on as one who, when the House of Commons comes, as it will shortly come, to its most important function—

MR. T. M. HEALY : Question, question !

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. T. M. HEALY (persistently) : Question, question, question !

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! I must ask the hon. Member not to interrupt. The House knows what these interruptions sometimes lead to.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Is the right hon. Gentleman in Order—

MR. SPEAKER : Order !

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I will only finish my sentence. When the House comes to deal with Supply, I hope there will be no interference with the fullest discussion on the part of the Prime Minister.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) ventured to intrude in this Debate for a few moments in order to say a farewell word about what he considered was perhaps the greatest of the many shames which had distinguished this Bill. The proposal to give the Lord Lieutenant and his veto as a protection to the Irish minority had always been looked upon by the minority with whom he acted as a worthless provision. He did not believe the Lord Lieutenant would be even ornamental, and certainly not useful. They would first of all—and perhaps this would be one of the difficulties of the situation—have to get a Lord Lieutenant, and he ventured to say that one of the difficulties would be to get a British gentleman to consent to occupy the post. He concluded that the gentleman who would be asked to fill the post of Lord Lieutenant, and to act in that grave capacity in Ireland, would ask the Government of the day what his functions would consist of, and what his duties would be. Under the Bill as at present drawn it appeared to him that the ostensible object of the Lord Lieutenant would be to keep in order the Irish Parliament. He would ask the House to conceive for one moment the task that would be placed before any gentleman who would be asked, for instance, to keep in order the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy). How would he ever be able to keep the hon. Member for Louth in order except by the permission of the hon. Member, or to keep the hon. Member's friends in order except by their permission.

MR. SEXTON: You will not be the Lord Lieutenant.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he was very glad of that. The Prime Minister, in his speech, as he generally did, asked why should they have any doubts about the good sense and fair play, and the desire to act with impartial justice, of this Irish Assembly. Well, the Irish Assembly would be composed of men—whom they could not exactly say, as they could not foretell the future; but they knew who the leaders would be. They would be the same parties who were now acting so harmoniously below the Gangway—the Party elected entirely by the Roman Catholic priests, and that advanced section which was led by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), whose policy had been described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a Fenian policy. Those were the two Parties which would exist in the future Irish Chamber, and they were not influenced in estimating their future conduct by any effort of their imagination; they judged what they would do, what they would say, and how they would do it and say it, by what they had said and done in the past. That was a fair way of estimating and judging the functions of the National Assembly, which would be composed of men who had described in large letters their intentions in the future when they had the power to carry them out. If the Lord Lieutenant of the future was really meant to be anything but a sham he would be given very considerable powers to act on his own responsibility in restraining the action of this Irish Assembly, which would undoubtedly be actuated by the desires and by the motives of the men who had led a certain section of the Irish people during the past few years. The Lord Lieutenant, if they could ever get an English gentleman to take the post—a thing which he doubted very much—would have to place himself under the supreme authority and guidance of the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy). To get such a man they would have to create a Peer from someone on the Government Bench opposite who was accustomed to that degradation.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the Amendment is a specific one, and he must address himself to it.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON bowed to the Speaker's decision, and would imagine the Lord Lieutenant existed—about which, however, he was extremely doubtful—and that it would be his duty to examine whether any tack was made on an Appropriation Bill which was contrary to his ideas of right and justice. That was really the point. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in his speech entirely misunderstood the drift of the Amendment and the arguments of supporters of it. The Prime Minister had made some 245 speeches during the progress of the Bill and had spoken for some 90 hours, and therefore he, no doubt, got "mixed" up. But passing from the Prime Minister, who got "mixed" up, and coming to the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce), who thought he knew what he was talking about but never did, they had some very remarkable statements from him. This Lord Lieutenant was supposed to be his (Colonel Saunderson's) special protector; and if anything was tacked on to an Appropriation Bill for the spoliation of Ulster or to squeeze the landlords like lemons—which was the policy of the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy)—his protector would have to see if he could not modify the asperity of these particular movements. [An hon. MEMBER: They would be sold out before them.] Yes; but they would never be paid. That was the method—the simple method—which they stated they intended to put in force when they got the opportunity. This Lord Lieutenant, if they could get one, would have the duty of protecting the minority; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) said it was no use bringing in this proviso, as there were other doors in this draughty Assembly by which the ingenuity of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway could escape from any proviso they chose to place in their Bill. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman; but the right hon. Gentleman went on to say the Lord Lieutenant could arrest any attempt on the part of the Irish Assembly to pass unjust legislation. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not tell them how, and he was taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain); but he (Colonel Saunderson) did not think the Member for West Birmingham really took the lesson from that speech that he ought to have taken. When the Chancellor of the Duchy told them that flattering tale of the future success of an Irish Lord Lieutenant he was letting the cat out of the bag as to the methods they intended to adopt in the constituencies before the next General Election. They would tell the constituencies that the Irish minority were amply protected; that there was no necessity for putting anything more particular or definite in the Bill, because the Lord Lieutenant, if anything went wrong in this low and lower House, would be able to arrest it; he would be able to tell them to stop, and prevent it coming to a head. The right hon. Gentleman would tell his constituents there was ample protection afforded in the Bill, and there would be no one to take him up; but in this House the right hon. Gentleman was taken up. He should like to know from his hon. and learned Friend opposite how the Lord Lieutenant under this Bill would be able, outside the clauses of the Bill, to go down proprio motu and arrest the Irish Assembly in a course he might rightly believe to be contrary to justice, and in a direction which this House would absolutely refuse to accept or to justify? It would be absolutely impossible that he could do so, though it might pass muster upon hundreds of Radical platforms. How, he wanted to know, was it to be carried out? How were they, the Irish minority, going to derive any satisfaction from the promise of the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) that in case the Irish Legislative Assembly, which would be a Home Rule Assembly, a Land League Government and a Land League Parliament, acted contrary to the intentions of the Bill, they were to be arrested by some innocent Lord Lieutenant going over to Ireland? Even if they found the man, he did not know how this future Irish Legislature was to be arrested in any violent action which they were bound to take up according to their promises to the Irish people. Was the Lord Lieutenant to send the Usher of the Black Rod to the Irish House to tell them to stop? How was he to address the Assembly? If he did do so, he would find it the worst Assembly he ever saw in his life. The protection which the Lord Lieutenant was supposed to afford to the loyal minority by influencing the future Irish House of Commons was a figment of the imagination of the Prime Minister introduced into the Bill to gull and delude the British people into the idea that the Bill did supply to the Irish minority some authority on which they could hang their hopes in the future. He (Colonel Saunderson) denied that the Lord Lieutenant and his veto was any protection. So far as he was concerned, and so far as those for whom he spoke were concerned, he could only say they might sweep away the Lord Lieutenant and his veto, and they would dislike and hate the Bill, and seek to overturn it, as much then as they did now.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who was always more interesting than instructive, or—to use his own phrase—more ornamental than useful, had given them another of the many proofs he had afforded of his ability on any occasion to deliver an animated speech which had no relation to the subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was about as consistent as usual, for whilst in one part of his speech he said he doubted whether they could find a Lord Lieutenant at all, at another point he said he might be swept away. The hon. and gallant Gentleman did not study the matter in debate. He (Mr. Sexton) did not think he had read the Bill.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I have.

MR. SEXTON said, in that case he had forgotten it, because if he had read the first paragraph of Clause 21, three lines which would not tax even the terrible memory of an Irish landlord, he would have found that every subject of the Queen “shall be qualified to fill the office of Lord Lieutenant.” The hon. and gallant Gentleman doubted whether they would find an English gentleman. They need not necessarily find an English gentleman. If they were driven to an extremity and found it hard to get an English gentleman, there were many Irish gentlemen who would gladly take the office, for he never heard of an Irish landlord who refused £20,000. The hon. and gallant Gentleman suggested, on the question of the Irish landlords, that if they sold their land they would not get the price for it. Well, they had the experience of the past before them, and no Irish landlord had yet sold his land without getting an excellent price for it. Perhaps they had better come to the Amendment. He doubted if the hon. and gallant Gentleman said anything which was capable of being made the subject of debate. No one hearing the animated declamation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and other hon. Gentlemen, and the salvoes of cheers and laughter with which their speeches were greeted, would think that this was a proposal to apply to the Legislature of Ireland a provision which was utterly unknown to the British Constitution. It was unknown here. The Sovereign here, even if the veto was revived, could not say "yes" to one part of an Appropriation Act and "no" to another part. The veto was an indivisible power, and the Representative of the Sovereign must say "yes" or "no" to the whole Bill, and could not divide the Bill into parts, one part of which might be passed into law and the other part rejected. In the three or four score years that had elapsed since Parliaments were established in other parts of the Empire this question might have arisen. He did not know whether or not it had. Local Parliaments might have endeavoured to tack on to an Appropriation Bill and to force upon the Representative of the Crown provisions which would otherwise be vetoed. If such a case had ever arisen, apparently it had been settled without reference to any such cure as was suggested here. The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) to-night spoke in what he (Mr. Sexton) thought was a strictly Constitutional sense when he said that it would be open to the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, when the popular Chamber proceeded to tack on to an Appropriation Bill any provisions, objectionable either from the point of view of Imperial interest or natural justice, or because they were oppressive to the minority in Ireland—it would be open to the Lord Lieutenant to warn his Ministers of the consequences. The hon. and gallant Gentleman, in his usual dramatic style, suggested that it would be difficult for the Lord Lieutenant to address the House. Why need he address the House? He need only send for a Minister. There would be daily communication, of course, between the Lord Lieutenant and his Ministers in Ireland. Suppose he saw the Irish Chamber proceeding to tack on to an Appropriation Bill a provision to place an undue tax on Ulster, or to endow a Church, or any other provisions ultra vires or unjust, he would send for a Minister and say to him—"There is no doubt that if you talk on these provisions to this Appropriation Bill you stand in danger of having the whole Bill vetoed." Such a warning from the Viceroy would be perfectly Constitutional. Ministers would confer upon that, and then they would be placed in this position—that if after the warning given to them they persisted in putting in the Appropriation Bill any incongruous matters they would bring the Government of Ireland into the danger of having its whole system deranged; and if they persisted and passed this hybrid Bill the Lord Lieutenant would have the right to dismiss them from Office and to call in a new Ministry, who would present an Appropriation Bill as a separate Bill. If the Lord Lieutenant could find no Ministry to fulfil the conditions which he thought proper the Lord Lieutenant would be authorised to dissolve the Chamber; and he (Mr. Sexton) submitted to this Assembly that if Irish Ministers, by their obstinacy, refused to follow the usual Constitutional course of passing an Appropriation Bill confined to money solely, they would come before the electors of Ireland as persons who, by their obstinacy, and by their departure from Constitutional usages, had put the country to the trouble of a General Election, and brought about the derangement of the Public Service. Who would be the more concerned in guarding the Public Service in Ireland—the Irish Ministers or the English Ministers? What money would be in question? The Revenue of Ireland, and the special Revenue of Ireland. Some hon. Members might be of opinion that an Imperial contribution would be a part of the appropriation grant. It would not. The Treasury had the power to take Ireland's contribution out of the Revenue of Ireland before it was paid into the Irish Consolidated Fund. The money to be administered in the Irish Chamber would be Irish Revenue for Irish uses only; and if Ministers, by a side wind, attempted to foist upon the Lord Lieutenant in an Appropriation Bill provisions which had nothing to do with money, or improper provisions relating to money, they would be placed in the position that the necessary disposition of the Revenue of Ireland would be deranged, and, in his judgment, they would incur a heavy penalty at the hands of the country. That he considered ample security. If the Bill passed into law the veto then would come into play, and he had not the slightest hesitation in saying if, against a previous warning, Ministers in Ireland persisted in forcing such a Bill upon the Lord Lieutenant, that the Lord Lieutenant would be entitled to apply his veto to the whole Bill. No serious derangement of the Public Service need follow. The Irish Chambers would be bound to carry on their Session. They would be obliged to continue the Session, and as the salary of every public official in Ireland was dependent upon the passage of the Appropriation Bill. Ministers would have no option but to proceed with the Appropriation Bill alone, and leave out the other provisions. The consequence would be that, after some inconvenience and some delay, Ministers would be obliged to proceed in a Constitutional way. Now, for the hundredth time in this discussion, they found an Amendment before them which was not commensurate with the point of grievance or danger. The grievance was only where the Appropriation Bill included an incongruous provision. If this Amendment was carried, whether it included such a provision or not, the Lord Lieutenant and the Imperial Cabinet would be entitled to take their pens and run them through each provision of an Appropriation Bill which did not meet their pleasure, although the money in question would be the special Revenue of Ireland for the purposes of Ireland only. From the point of view of common sense or of self-interest, he, as an Irishman, would much prefer to deal with the Revenue of Ireland in Committee of Supply in this House rather than submit to such a system under which—after officers had been appointed, after liabilities had been incurred, and after the two Chambers in Ireland had gone through the length of transacting Votes of Supply for the year, and placing them in an Appropriation Bill—Ministers, 400 miles away, would be entitled to take their Bill, dealing with their money for their own purposes, to take up the function of a public auditor in regard to a Corporation and surcharge the Irish Legislature for whatever they pleased. Members of all Parties would recognise that the proposal was farcical.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, this was one of a class of Amendments intended to render the veto a really effective veto, and to give effect to the Preamble, which professed to preserve the Imperial supremacy. The hon. Member for Kerry said that if the power sought by the Amendment was conceded the Lord Lieutenant might run his pen not merely through the particular item in the Appropriation Bill which was contemplated by the Mover of the Amendment, but through other items. The hon. Gentleman forgot that on the face of the Bill, in theory, at all events, the Lord Lieutenant had power to run his pen through the whole of the Appropriation Bill if he received instructions in that respect. The Amendment, in the face of it, seemed an eminently reasonable one. It was contemplated that the Appropriation Bill might have bound up with it something which ought to be vetoed. It seemed to him, therefore, a most simple and obvious expedient that the Lord Lieutenant should be able to veto that which ought to be vetoed without, at the same time, vetoing that which ought not to be vetoed. Not only that part of the Amendment, but the other part of it, was, as a matter of fact, in accordance not merely with the American precedents, but also in accordance with Colonial precedents which had been established and maintained for the last 40 or 50 years. In almost every one of the Colonial Acts there was a provision that the Governor might, if he pleased, send a Bill back to the Assembly before he gave his consent, requiring that certain Amendments should be made in the Bill; and that provision had been found convenient in practice, not only by the American Legislatures, but by our own Colonial Parliaments. This Amendment was designed to carry out that which had been for years past the professed intention of the Government—namely, that the Legislature set up by the Bill should be a subordinate Legislature. Years ago the Prime Minister said it must be an essential feature of any Bill that the Imperial supremacy should be effectively maintained. At the last Election they heard for the first time that the model of Imperial supremacy was to be of the same kind as that exercised over our Colonies. That declaration, he confessed, in his own constituency secured him many votes; but even the declaration that the vague kind of supremacy exercised over Colonial Legislatures was to be exercised over the Irish Legislature had been departed from by the Prime Minister in the course of these Debates, and they were not even to have the same kind of supremacy as that which was exercised in the case of the Colonies. The idea of legislative subordination which the Prime Minister started years ago and maintained up to the beginning of these Debates had grown into the notion of legislative freedom. How did the right hon. Gentleman reconcile the fact that he had gained the majority, such as it was, in this Parliament, upon the faith of his intention to create a subordinate Legislature, with the professions he had made in the last two or three days that the intention was not legislative subordination, but legislative freedom? He hoped that, even at the eleventh hour, the Government would recognise the reasonableness of the proposition now put forward, and would accede to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton), on behalf of Viscount Wolmer, moved the following Amendment:—

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words,—“Whenever any Bill which shall have been presented for Her Majesty's assent to the Lord Lieutenant shall by the Lord Lieutenant have been assented to in Her Majesty's name, the Lord Lieutenant shall forthwith transmit to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State an authentic copy of such Bill so assented to; and it shall be lawful at any time within one year after such Bill shall have been so received by the Secretary of State for Her Majesty by Order in Council to declare Her disallowance of such Bill; and such disallowance, together with a certificate under the hand and seal of the Secretary of State, certifying the day on which such Bill was received as aforesaid, being signified by the Lord Lieutenant to the Irish Legislature by speech or message to the said Legislature, or by proclamation in the Irish Government Gazette, shall make void and annul the same from and after the day of such signification.”

He said that he had an Amendment on the Paper in almost similar terms to this, the only difference being that he had suggested two years as the probationary period instead of one, as was suggested in the present proposal; and, of course, as he was now moving the Amendment, he must support the period of one year. There was this much to be said for the Amendment. It was put down on the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill, and it was the first to be shut out by the guillotine arrangement on the 6th July. It might be said that the Amendment was discussed on the previous occasion; but it was only under discussion for the space of half-an-hour, and considering how important the subject was there was no need to offer any apology for again bringing it before the House. As far as he had been able to make out, the Amendment he now moved had been adopted in the Constitution of every one of our Colonial Possessions, and not only so, but they held this particular safeguard in great esteem. During the previous short discussion on this Amendment there was one argument only advanced against it; and that was that the difference in distance between Ireland and the Colonies made this provision, though useful in the case of the Colonies, entirely unnecessary for Ireland. He ventured to submit that the question of distance did not affect the value of the provision, because in these days of rapid communication a few odd thousand miles made very little difference. As he had said, statesmen in the Colonies attached very great importance indeed to this safeguard. In March and April, 1891, there was a Federation held of all the different Colonies; and at the close of that Convention there was carried—practically unanimously—a clause in almost identical terms to that which he was now moving, the only difference between the delegates being whether the term should be for one year or two years. Sir Samuel Griffiths spoke very strongly in favour of keeping this provision in their Bill; and Mr. Marmion, who at that time represented Western Australia, said—

“So long as we give to the Queen the power of appointing the Governor General, we ought to allow her some exercise of discretion as to the salary her appointee shall receive. Under this Bill the connection between the British Crown and Australia generally is so very slight that we ought not to do anything calculated to weaken it. The time will possibly arrive quite

He respectfully claimed that as they considered this so valuable in the Colonies, and as this Parliament was to have the right of control over the Irish Legislature, they were entitled to have this Colonial safeguard put into the Bill. He really did think the Government would be acting wisely in adopting the Amendment. If they were to exercise control, surely it would be better to exercise it in the way tried in all our Colonies and proved to be a success, and which would enable the Imperial Parliament or the Queen in Council, advised by her English Ministers, to give a Bill a trial, and if it worked well to let it continue, and if it worked badly to veto it, without that direct veto from the Imperial Parliament which, without doubt, would lead to great friction. They could imagine countless instances in which the Lord Lieutenant might be unwilling to veto a Bill and yet be unwilling to give it assent. If this proposal were adopted he would be able to give it one year's trial, and if it worked well he would let it continue, whilst if it was a failure he would exercise the power of making it void. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words,—“Whenever any Bill which shall have been presented for Her Majesty's assent to the Lord Lieutenant shall by the Lord Lieutenant have been assented to in Her Majesty's name, the Lord Lieutenant shall forthwith transmit to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State an authentic copy of such Bill so assented to; and it shall be lawful at any time within one year after such Bill shall have been so received by the Secretary of State for Her Majesty by Order in Council to declare Her disallowance of such Bill; and such disallowance, together with a certificate under the hand and seal of the Secretary of State, certifying the day on which such Bill was received as aforesaid, being signified by the Lord Lieutenant to the Irish Legislature by speech or message to the said Legislature, or by proclamation in the Irish Government Gazette, shall make void and annul the same from and after the day of such signification.”—(The Marquess of Carmarthen.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, the Government could not accept the

The Marquess of Carmarthen

Amendment of the noble Lord, and he would briefly state the reasons why they could not accept it. He did not lay any particular stress upon the fact that this question was discussed—if not at very great length, at some length—on the 5th July, and the proposition was then negatived. It was, of course, for the Opposition to consider whether, during the short remaining time at their disposal, they should utilise their opportunities to discuss topics on which the House had already expressed an opinion, or whether they should break new ground. The reason why the Government objected to this Amendment was this—the Bill proposed to give to the Irish Legislature within a certain defined area, and subject to certain definite limitations, the power of legislating; and it was the policy of the Government that the Irish Legislature should have within that sphere freedom, but not independence. That was to say, that on these matters, subject to the limitations proposed by the Bill, they should have effective powers of legislating as they considered right, subject always to the interference on definite instructions of the Lord Lieutenant. He had to ask the House, did not the provisions of the Bill afford ample opportunity for considering beforehand whether any Bill should receive the Royal Assent or not without introducing the provisions of this Amendment? The noble Lord proposed that in the case of a Bill which was within the province of the Irish Legislative Body, and which had passed both Houses of the Irish Legislative Body, whatever that Bill might be, yet after the passing of that Bill—after effect had been given to it, upon the faith of which action had been taken, engagements entered into, and obligations undertaken—at the end of the year that was all to be brushed aside and the Bill declared to be null and void. Consider the complications that might follow from that course. That would be a very extreme step to take unless a very clear and obvious necessity existed for following it, and he thought the House would see that it was a proposition which ought not to be adopted unless that clear and obvious necessity was made out. Was there any such necessity? There was daily communication by post with Ireland, there was telegraphic communication, and there were the daily organs of the Press. Was it conceivable there would not be full and ample means of information long before the Bills became law which would be sufficient to guide the judgment of those concerned? Although it might not be the intention of the noble Lord who moved it, the Government regarded this Amendment as an invitation to the Imperial Parliament and Cabinet to do that which they deprecated doing except in cases of extreme necessity—namely, to interfere with Irish legislative action within the domain of the powers conferred by the Bill.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, it appeared to him that the Attorney General had not given the slightest attention to the facts on which the noble Lord based his support of this Amendment. They had been told again and again that the model taken for framing this spurious Constitution had been that of the Colonial Assemblies. They had the fact that in most of the Colonies this very provision existed; that it had been acted upon for years; that no possible inconvenience arose from it, and yet they were told that although they could all work under a provision of this kind, it would be an indignity to the Irish nation, and such an invasion of the privileges of this not independent, but free, Legislature, that it was not to be tolerated for a moment. Surely the rational and sensible thing to do was to introduce that kind of provision which had worked well in the Colonies, and bring the Bills over here in order to allow time enough to consider their scope and working, and to give an opportunity of dealing effectively with them. Unless the Government could show why a provision which had worked well and was approved in all our Colonies should not be applied to this other subordinate Legislature, the Opposition had not received that answer which was due to them.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) moved the following Amendment:—

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words—"The prerogative of mercy shall not be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant on behalf of Her Majesty, except upon the advice of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State."

He observed that the time for a considerate and rational answer on the part of the Government to any proposition had passed away. He had some satisfaction in thinking that he had the honour of being possibly the Member to propose the last Amendment that would be submitted to the House before the grotesque operation of that night was undertaken, and he should be able to tell his constituents that an Amendment which he believed to be of first-rate importance had been made the subject of the procedure with which they were threatened. He thought it would be a very useful object-lesson, and of valuable assistance to him in demonstrating the thesis which he should have to present to them. The Amendment was necessary as a consequential Amendment on one which had been before the House during the discussion of the Bill. Allusion had been made in the course of the discussion to the powers of the Lord Lieutenant in regard to certain subjects, and as to whether those powers were properly defined by the Bill as it now stood. He (Mr. Forster) did not propose to confine himself to the reserved subject mentioned in Clauses 3 and 4. He was anxious to point to some of the patent absurdities that appeared on the face of the Bill, in the hope that the Government might be induced to relieve him with regard to the Amendment which he brought forward. He had no sanguine hope, however, at the present moment. The question was whether or not it should be in the power of the Irish Legislature to exercise the prerogative of mercy, depriving this House of the power it now exercised with regard to that prerogative. It would, no doubt, be said that it was an ungracious thing to seek to deprive a Legislature of the power of exercising this prerogative; but he had no scruples whatever in making that proposition for taking the prerogative away from the Party to which he was opposed—a Party which never had shown mercy to any man opposed to it, a Party which had been the most unmerciful and cruel in the history of the country. He wished to show how this matter worked out. He would take the case of the dynamite convicts, upon whose behalf it had been said by the Home Secretary that the Lord Lieutenant was bound to receive the Petition of the Corporation of York, although the cases were cases with which he had nothing to do, and in regard to which he could not exercise his prerogative, these persons being in English and not in Irish gaols. He wanted to come to the cases of convicts similar to those convicts in Irish gaols. They had had a pretty plain statement this Session from the Home Secretary with regard to these felons; and the right hon. Gentleman announced the view of, as he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) believed, the majority in the House, that these prisoners were properly detained, and that they should not be released. But were they prepared to set up a state of things in which the Home Secretary would be overruled, and these persons would be free from the control of the judgment of the House? It had been suggested that a statement of that kind required some qualification, as these felons were convicted on charges which brought into play the provisions of the Bill—that they were convicted of treason-felony, and that that was a subject reserved from the control of the Irish Legislature; but he had to remind the House that there were many cases of which that could not be said. The House would remember the case of the Manchester murder—the case of the murder of Sergeant Brett. The prisoners in that case were not indicted for treason-felony, but for wilful murder. Then they had the case of the Phoenix Park murders. The prisoners in that case also were convicted of murder. Were they going to give the Irish Legislature power to set free prisoners convicted of that and of similar crimes? Time after time sympathy had been expressed with these convicts in the columns of United Ireland—the warmest expressions of sympathy had been published in that journal; and it was rational and reasonable to suppose that the statements given in the journal of the Party opposite (the Irish Members) in Ireland, and addressed to their followers, would represent their views. The case of the Phoenix Park murders, like other cases that could be named, was not an Irish case solely; it was that of an Irish official and an official of the United Kingdom, and affecting the United Kingdom. Were they, then, prepared to grant the power to exercise this prerogative in such cases, or were they willing that such powers should be kept in the hands of the Imperial Government only? It would be said that it would be a great inconvenience to deprive the Irish Legislature of the power of exercising the prerogative in certain cases—that there were many cases which must necessarily arise in which it would be convenient that this power should be exercised without appeal to the Imperial Government. But, in his opinion, the greater included the less, and he desired that they should be safeguarded, so that the class of persons to whom he referred should not be let loose upon England and Scotland. Under this Bill Irish Judges and juries would be in sympathy with the views of the Irish Legislature, and persons convicted by them would be convicted with the full approval of the Government. They had to remember that there were two Parties in Ireland. They had had failures to convict in recent cases. There was a part of Ireland where the operation of the law was automatic; but in other parts they had a paralysis of the law. According to the code which prevailed in Irish society outside Ulster, men were regarded as guiltless who, while committing no crime against the Irish people, perpetrated outrages against the English and Scotch people. There was only one part of Ireland—the North—in which they could rely upon getting an honest verdict in such cases. It was reasonable to think that, while the prerogative of mercy remained with this House, it would be exercised with due regard to the feeling that prevailed throughout the United Kingdom as to what was and what was not criminal. This was not the first time the matter had been under discussion. It had been discussed in connection with Colonial Legislatures and Executives, and there had been a delegation in regard to it; but the Colonies had no part in the deliberations of this House. This Bill did nothing that was analogous to the Colonial case. The Irish Members would sit in this House, and would have their full share in deliberations on the subject of the Queen's prerogative. Another question was how they were to deal with persons who had fled this country, and who did not dare to face the tribunals of this country—men who had always sympathised with the Irish Nationalist Members, and who had been in personal contact with some of them, and who knew that if they returned to this country they would be convicted by the tribunals of the country. These men might return. Under the circumstances what, he asked, would be their position? They knew perfectly well that if brought before a Court in Ireland, and convicted of the offence charged against them, they were certain of having the prerogative of mercy exercised in their favour. He did not want to go into detail, but it was within the knowledge of the House that there were many who had fled the country within the last 10 years—men whose return would be regarded by the great majority of the people of England, of Great Britain, with regret and apprehension—men who had encouraged and inflicted an amount of injustice upon the Queen's subjects which they did not wish to see repeated. Those persons were in sympathy with those who would be the first Ministers of Ireland under this Bill. The question was, would they give the prerogative over to those Ministers, or would they keep it with the Imperial Parliament. He believed this was a reasonable Amendment, and he would like to hear something of a clear and definite character from Her Majesty's Government touching a matter which vitally concerned those whom he represented, and those whom he did not represent—but for whom he might say that they had suffered for the crimes committed by those men, and would suffer still more if this power was entrusted to the Irish Legislature. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words, "The prerogative of mercy shall not be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant on behalf of Her Majesty, except upon the advice of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State."—(Mr. Arnold-Forster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. MORLEY: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member who has moved this Amendment began by saying that the subject would afford an object-lesson to his constituents and to the constituencies of the country. He declared that it would illustrate the suppression of free speech, which the necessity of bringing this Debate to a close compels us to enforce. Sir, I desire no better object-lesson. The hon. Member appears to forget that this very Amendment was discussed fully and amply on the Motion of the hon. Member himself on the 4th of July, when every argument which he has brought forward to-night was used by him.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I was closed before I could put the Amendment.

MR. J. MORLEY: On the 4th of July this Amendment was proposed. He made the Motion on that date, and it was discussed through many pages of Hansard, and a great many important and conspicuous speakers representing all quarters of the House took part in the Debate; and, as I have said, every single argument brought forward now was brought forward on that occasion. I desire no better object-lesson than the resuscitation of this Amendment on the Report stage, after its having been fully discussed and divided upon in Committee. This proposal is a type of what has been going on all through these Debates on the part of the hon. Member and others. The hon. Member said he wished to hear from us the view we are prepared to take of this matter; but I would remind him that on the occasion to which I refer the hon. Member got a rational and considerate reply from two or three of my right hon. Friends sitting on this (the Treasury) Bench.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I withdraw, Sir. I was mistaken.

MR. J. MORLEY: And the hon. Member asked us to divide, with the result that the numbers at this time were 250 for the Amendment and 293 against it. Here we are to-night again asked to discuss the question, devoting precious time to a matter which was deliberately negatived by a large majority in July. Surely the majority was large enough; and surely the majorities on Report have been large enough for the hon. Member? Now, Sir, I will not try to rise to the height of the hon. Member in giving what he would call a rational reply to his speech in moving the Amendment. I cannot give any new argument, but I will repeat some of the arguments brought forward on that occasion. The hon. Member asks the House to withhold from the Lord Lieutenant the power of exercising the prerogative of mercy or of remitting sentences in any case without the authority of the Secretary of State in this country. Anyone who has had experience in the Irish Government knows that by far the majority of cases in which the Lord Lieutenant is advised to exercise the prerogative of mercy are cases of so trivial a character that anyone would be ashamed to go to the trouble of sending over to the Secretary of State in this country in order to see whether the prerogative of mercy should or should not be exercised—as, for example, whether a fine should be reduced from £4 to 10s., or whether a person should be imprisoned for a fortnight or the sentence remitted altogether. Does the hon. Member seriously contend that small matters of administration of that kind ought to be handed over to the Secretary of State here—with, possibly, Motions for Adjournment upon them in this House? That is not the spirit in which this Bill is proposed. We will suppose that the hon. Member has thought out carefully the subject of the Amendment as regard cases of a serious character when the action of the Lord Lieutenant might produce serious effects. But does he not realise what we have done? What we have done is this:—We have given to the Irish Legislature the power of making its own Criminal Law, with restrictions, and of arranging its own rules of criminal procedure. The hon. Member's argument is that, while apparently granting that the Irish Legislature may be fit to make its own Criminal Law and to inquire into the principles and practice of criminal procedure, the Lord Lieutenant is not to be allowed to mitigate sentences or to exercise all those functions of the prerogative without reference to the Secretary of State here. I do not believe that the hon. Member, on reflection, will seriously contend that the Government ought to adopt this view. It is a new scheme; and after granting these powers, are you going to prevent the Government tempering justice with mercy? All Governments do it, and, of course, you must allow the liberty of considering all the social circumstances that must be taken into account in every case. I agree with the hon. Member that a case might arise in which there might be a class of offenders whom it would be desirable that the Lord Lieutenant, on the advice of the Irish Ministry, should not have the power of relieving from some of their punishment. In that case, no doubt the Secretary of State and the Government of the day would limit the power of the Lord Lieutenant in the instrument of delegation. But the hon. Member would tie the hands of the Secretary of State. By the Amendment he could not delegate the prerogative of mercy. So far from giving power, the Amendment limits power. It is a violation of the whole principle on which the Bill is framed, and, if adopted, it would lead to difficulties which would give rise to a most unworkable situation in the administration of the Criminal Law. I must, therefore, say for myself and my colleagues that we cannot assent to the Amendment.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER rose in his place, and was understood to say, by way of personal explanation, that he had brought the matter forward again because he attached great importance to it, and he had for the moment forgotten that it was so fully discussed in Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot agree with the general principle laid down by the Chief Secretary that whenever a matter has been discussed in Committee it ought not to be re-discussed on Report. We have certainly not shown ourselves actuated by a desire to repeat discussions that have taken place in this House. We have steadily kept in view the recommendation of yourself, Mr. Speaker, from the Chair, that it would not be desirable, in view of the brief amount of time at our disposal, that we should unnecessarily enter into a discussion of questions which have been already adequately discussed. Sir, we do not admit that because a thing has been discussed it should not be discussed on Report. That would be an alteration of our whole Parliamentary system, to which I would not give my assent. We have one hour left for the discussion of the remaining 36 clauses of the Bill—

MR. J. MORLEY: There are only 36 clauses in the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I had the Schedules in my mind. We have only one hour in which to discuss the remaining clauses of the Bill; and even the Government, with their peculiar views on Debates, will hardly think that that is adequate for the purpose. There is one important Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Londonderry (Sir T. Lea), and I should regret that the Debate should come to an untimely close before an effort has been made to discuss it.

SIR H. JAMES : I should like to ask the Chief Secretary whether it would be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to give a free pardon, not to convicted persons, but to any person who may have committed, or who may be suspected of having committed, any offence in Ireland in past times, so as to enable him to return and take his place as a free citizen and even as a Member of the Legislature of Ireland ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I think the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that the Crown has at the present moment power to pardon any one particular person. The whole question consequently will be whether the Advisers of the Crown think it right in framing the instrument of delegation to give the Lord Lieutenant such a power, and that will entirely depend upon the view of the Imperial Cabinet of the day.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that as the right hon. Gentleman and the Legal Advisers of the Cabinet were responsible for these matters just now, it was fair to ask him how far he would extend the delegation of the prerogatives of Her Majesty ? He would point out that there were 282 Amendments on the Paper, including the one under discussion. Upon 264 of these they were not to be allowed to vote or speak—only the sacred Amendments of the Government were to be voted upon.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. FISHER (Fulham) said, he wished to move an Amendment which, perhaps, if not the most important on the Paper, was, at any rate, not without importance. He wished to add to Clause 5 the following proviso :—

“ Provided that such power of giving or withholding the assent of Her Majesty to Bills shall not be exercised by any executive officer or officers for the time being appointed in the place of the Lord Lieutenant.”

If the scheme brought forward by the Government had been meant for work and not for show, the Government would have paid attention to the making of some provision for the discharge of the duty of the Lord Lieutenant in the event of his resignation or inability to perform his functions, and they would have borne in mind that the Lord Lieutenant under the Bill would have entirely new functions to perform. Though this matter had been discussed in Committee they had not arrived at any conclusion, and he could not help thinking that when the Government had accepted an Amendment moved in Committee many Members thought it an extraordinary thing to put the veto into commission. The object of the Amendment was that the power of veto, which was, after all, the very keystone of the Bill, and the arch upon which the liberties of the loyal minority rested, should not be exercised by any person or persons who might for the time being be appointed to act for the Lord Lieutenant. He would point out that in the American Constitution—which was not framed under such extraordinary rules as those which would prevent the discussion of Amendments to the present Bill after 11 o'clock to-night—provision was made for a deputy in the person of the Vice President. The American Constitution went further, and made arrangements for some other person to take the place of the Vice President if neither the President nor the Vice President could act. The Prime Minister had said that the Imperial Parliament would undertake responsibility for the discharge of the duty if the Lord Lieutenant was unable to act, but the House was being constantly told that the power of the veto of the Lord Lieutenant was to be the security of the loyal minority as against oppression and possible injustice on the part of the Irish Legislature, and what he now desired to know was by whom that power of veto was going to be exercised ? They ought not to leave the matter open for settlement on some future occasion. The Lord Lieutenant ought not to be allowed to nominate some mere creature of the Irish Legislature to exercise that power. If the right hon. Gentleman said that the Amendment did not provide for the exercise of the veto on the part of anybody when the Lord Lieutenant was unable to act, he would ask him if he would accept at the end of the Amendment the following words :—

He did not think that the performance of the functions of the Lord Lieutenant, under the conditions he contemplated, should be left to a haphazard arrangement.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "Provided that such power of giving or withholding the assent of Her Majesty to Bills shall not be exercised by any executive officer or officers for the time being appointed in the place of the Lord Lieutenant."
—(Mr. Fisher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE was understood to say that the Government had assented to a proposal to enable the Lords' Justices to act in place of the Lord Lieutenant; and he did not understand why it was that, having gained that point, the hon. Member now desired to impose so stringent a limitation as that contained in the Amendment. It was not desirable that the functions of the Lord Lieutenant should be placed in a condition of paralysis. In the absence of the Lord Lieutenant for a short time, owing to causes of high necessity or to illness, it was necessary that the Lords Justices or someone should have the power to perform acts which might be necessary for the public welfare. A case had been put in which it might be necessary for the Lord Lieutenant to act forthwith, as in the case of the Explosives Act, which was passed through both Houses of the present Legislature in one day—indeed, he remembered another case where a Bill not only passed through both Houses, but received the Royal Assent in one day. That was done for the public convenience and advantage. The Lords Justices were not casual persons picked up here and there. There had been a suspicion that there would be some jobbery on the part of the Irish Executive, and that some improper personage might be named a Lord Justice in order to exercise the veto, but sufficient protection against an abuse of that kind was to be found in the Queen's Patent of appointment. If it was thought that there might be a wholesale delegation of the powers of the Viceroy, while it would not be wise to provide by Statute against some delegation of the powers, so that the necessary business of the State might not be stopped and delay caused by the unavoidable absence of the Lord Lieutenant, no Government would assent to a wholesale delegation of his powers.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, he wished to move to add at the end of the clause—

"Provided always that in assenting to any Bill whereby the rules of the National Board of Education in Ireland at present in force may be altered, or to any alteration by the said Board of the said rules, the Lord Lieutenant shall act on behalf of Her Majesty."

All persons interested in the question of education knew that the present system in Ireland should be allowed to proceed undisturbed in its present position. It had made great advances of late years, and the people of Ireland were not ungrateful to the late Government for the assistance they had given in their Bill of 1892. Seven-eighths of the schools in Ireland were now entirely free from all fees. The system was undenominational, although it had gone a long way towards being denominational. When a similar question to that raised by the Amendment was under discussion the Prime Minister said that—

MR. T. M. HEALY : I rise to Order. Is the hon. Baronet in Order in referring to a Debate on another Bill in the same Session ?

SIR T. LEA said, that he was quoting what the Prime Minister said on the present Bill two weeks ago. The Prime Minister said that if the Irish Legislature carried the denominational principle to any length they pleased they would certainly come into conflict with the provisions of the Bill relating to undue preference. It was, therefore, quite clear that the Prime Minister intended that the present system of undenominational education should be continued, and further proof of that intention was afforded by the restrictions contained in the Bill, particularly Sub-section 4 of Clause 4, which said that the power of the Irish Legislature should not extend to—

"Prejudicially affecting the right of any child to attend a school receiving public money, without attending the religious instruction at that school."

Many of them had seen the great advantage of the present mixed system of education in Ireland. He had listened to Professor Fawcett 20 years ago on the advantages of men of all religious denominations being educated together—particularly in Ireland—and he believed the only way in which they would overcome the acerbities of Irish life, and the bitterness of religious feeling, was by a system under which men of all parties and creeds were trained together. Nearly half the schools in Ireland—that was to say, 3,817, were mixed schools. In Ulster there were 990 schools under Protestant management attended by 10·5 per cent. of Catholic children, and 878 schools under Roman Catholic management attended by 10·9 per cent. of Protestant children. In the other three Provinces the number of Protestant children was very small—no more than 2·8 in Munster, and 3·9 in Connaught—and it would be impossible that they could be educated under any other system than that of mixed schools. To put an end to that system would be to drive the Protestant families out of the South of Ireland. It had been stated in the course of the Debate that the Education Board of Ireland would have power to abolish the Conscience Clause. If that was so, the system of mixed education was doomed, and Roman Catholic families in the North and Protestant families in the South would have to seek their living elsewhere. He, therefore, contended that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to prevent the National Board of Education from in any way changing the present system.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 3, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "Provided always that in assenting to any Bill whereby the rules of the National Board of Education in Ireland at present in force may be altered, or to any alteration by the said Board of the said rules, the Lord Lieutenant shall act on behalf of Her Majesty."—(Sir T. Lea.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON: The Amendment of the hon. Baronet contains two propositions, one of which refers to legislative action and to the application of the veto by Imperial authority to Irish legislative action; and the other invites this House to sanction the principle that, after the granting of Home Rule to Ireland, the Imperial Government is still to be saddled with the responsibility of directing and advising the Lord Lieutenant to intervene and to overbear the will of the Irish Government in regard to an internal matter between the Irish Government and one of the departments of administration in Ireland. The proposal is a novel one. I do not remember that I have heard it made before, and when the hon. Baronet says that he apprehends—though I know not upon what ground—that there may be an injury done to religious feeling in Ireland in connection with a department of primary education, I have to remind him that by the Charter of the National Board of Education the Board is equally composed of Catholics and Protestants—10 Catholics and 10 Protestants—and that as the charter will continue in force, that arrangement would remain, and in that arrangement I think a sufficient protection may be found for the interest of all denominations in Ireland. The hon. Baronet makes a very bold and sweeping proposition, because he asks the House to agree that in sanctioning any alteration whatever by the Board of National Education in their rules the Lord Lieutenant shall act as representing Her Majesty. I am sorry that at this moment I have not the rules of the Board of Education in my hand, but I have sent for them, and I dare say before this Debate concludes some one or other of my hon. Friends will bring under the notice of the House these rules, and enable hon. Members to understand to what function the hon. Baronet desires to commit the House. The rules of the National Board are not numbered by dozens or scores; they are numbered by hundreds. They have attached to them voluminous and complicated appendices. The system of the National Board of Education includes not only the appointment, qualification, and examination of teachers, the appointment and qualification of Inspectors, the building of schools, the building of non-vested schools, the hours of secular and religious instruction; but the general curriculum of education, the management of agricultural schools, and a variety of other subjects, and upon all these matters rules have continually to be made, revised, and repealed by the Board of Education. The proposal of the hon. Baronet is that in regard to all these hundreds of rules revisable from time to time, when the Board—composed of competent Irishmen, embracing some of the most distinguished and learned gentlemen in the country—Judges, clergymen, and others—alter any of these rules, repeal any of these rules, or make any new rule, they are to have their decision overborne by the Imperial Ministers. The hon. Baronet's proposal is that the question of the alteration, revision, or repeal of any rule shall not be sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant, even upon the advice of his Irish Ministers, and even when the opinion of the Board of National Education is unanimous; and that the unanimous opinion of Irish Ministers and the unanimous opinion of the National Board shall be overruled, and that the English gentleman whom you send over to the Castle shall come over to London and submit to the gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench—no doubt the most accomplished gentlemen in the country, but gentlemen probably not knowing much about Ireland—submit to them the question whether or not there shall be an alteration of the rule as to what shall be the amount of the grant for a school in Ireland, or what knowledge of arithmetic shall be possessed by a third-class teacher sanctioned, and to ask these 12 English gentlemen to pour contempt on the Irish Ministry and upon the Department of State authorised to conduct the system of education. In the wording of his Amendment—

—the hon. Baronet displays his habitual inaptitude of expression, because if the question were only the assenting to a Bill, of course it would be all right. What the hon. Baronet means is, that in considering the question of his assent or refusing his assent he would act as representing Her Majesty. Does the hon. Baronet bear in mind, so far as the Bill is concerned, how abundant, how more than ample, are the provisions contained in the Act for the protection of religious feeling in the matter of education? He has cited some of them, and it is not suggested that they are insufficient. In Clause 4, Sub-section 2, we have it that the Irish Legislature must not pass any law imposing any disability or conferring any advantage or benefit on account of religious belief; and in the next sub-section, protecting any child attending a school receiving public money from any disability because of non-attendance at religious instruction within the school. I have not heard a suggestion that that is not sufficient. The hon. Baronet has not said it. We have it, therefore, already in the Bill that the Irish Parliament cannot, by passing a Bill, do anything to prejudice the rights of any member of the community in the matter of education. If the Irish Parliament pass a Bill imposing disability on Protestants or Presbyterians, or affecting the right of any child to attend a public school without attending the religious instruction imparted at the school, I admit that the Lord Lieutenant has the right to veto it. The Amendment of the hon. Baronet is open to two objections. The first is that the rule of the National Board, which it may be desired to make, may be unobjectionable to everybody in Ireland. Why in that case should you refer to Imperial authority? But even if the Bill were objectionable, I say that the Imperial Ministry, even without the Amendment, would have power to direct the Lord Lieutenant to veto the Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I observe, Sir, that the shorter our time grows the longer are the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The speech, however, to which we have just listened can be put into two sentences. The Amendment of my hon. Friend, according to the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), ought not to be supported, in the first place, because the rules of the National Board of Education are very numerous and very complicated, and because to engage in any supervision of those rules would be to throw on this House and on the Lord Lieutenant a task altogether beyond their capacity. That was the hon. Member's first argument. His second argument was that already under the Bill this task is thrown on the Lord Lieutenant. It is perfectly evident that the two branches of the speech of the hon. Gentleman are absolutely inconsistent one with the other. As a matter of fact, it does not matter how complicated are the rules of the National Board; they are not more complicated than the rules of our Council for Education, and all that Parliament would have to look to in regard to any proposal of the kind contemplated by the Amendment would be whether it would be likely to affect the unsectarian character of the education. All other changes in the rules, everything affecting the teachers and the curriculum, would be passed over at once, and I would undertake to say that any intelligent Lord Lieutenant, on dealing with a Bill of the kind, would be able to decide in half-an-hour whether or not he ought to exercise his veto. I am not going to continue the discussion further than to say that this is an Amendment the discussion of which is, under the circumstances, of no importance. We have no time to deal with the matter by discussion or by argument, but it is of importance to have a vote and a Division List on the subject. We are extremely anxious to see who are the Members who will support the proposal of this Bill to place it in the absolute power of a Parliament, the majority of whose Members will be elected under the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood, to deal with the present undenominational and mixed system of education as they please.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, it seemed to him that the more restricted the time became the more the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) talked. He could have excused the right hon. Gentleman's rising at that hour if he had done so in order to explain his letter to Mr. Duignan. If there was one question on which the right hon. Gentleman was, according to his letter to Mr. Duignan, prepared to trust an Irish Parliament it was the question of education. The Nationalist Members would have gladly yielded the right hon. Gentleman a longer portion of the time of the House than he had occupied if he had utilised it for the purpose of unbosoming himself in explanation of that letter. The right hon. Gentleman, with that fulness of knowledge which, as far as he (Mr. Healy) knew, was confined to Birmingham alone, had been good enough to say that he desired that the rules affecting religious instruction should be referred to Her Majesty. He (Mr. Healy) understood that when these Amendments were placed upon the Paper there was a Council of the Unionist Party, and the right hon. Gentleman said to those present—"Look here, my fine fellows, this is what I want you to do," and then, bringing his great mind to bear upon these most difficult questions, he directed exactly how the Amendment should be drawn. Was it not a remarkable thing that, with the extraordinary knowledge which came from having been the Mayor of an important city—[Opposition cries of "Question!"] He hoped hon. Gentlemen would not, in view of the short time allotted to him, fill up the interstices of his speech with disorderly interruptions. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman had not suggested to the hon. Baronet—he believed the whole Unionist Party were now Baronets—to the hon. Baronet the Member for South Derry (Sir T. Lea) that he should have directed his Amendment to the real question. There was one rule of the National Board of Education, at any rate, that he (Mr. Healy) asked that Nationalist Members should be allowed fair play upon, and that was the rule as to bees and poultry management. At that hour he would not discuss the question of bees. He found that the alphabetical index alone to the rules of the Commissioners of Education extended over 40 closely-printed pages. There was a rule as to the management of infants. What had Her Majesty to do with infants? The House had heard of the famous breach of promise of marriage case in which the counsel had only one letter to rely upon, and that letter contained the words "chops and tomato sauce." The present case was stranger still. Amongst the rules mentioned in the index were rules respecting optional subjects for town schools, optional subjects for girls, average attendances, applications for aid to establish National schools, result fees, lunatic asylums, and so on, for over 40 pages. Some of the rules even extended to the question of Biblical education, including, he presumed, the antecedents of the famous Herod. On the whole, it appeared to him that the Unionist Party, in passing over their Amendments in order to reach that of the hon. Baronet, had not done themselves justice. They had been gagged, forsooth, and yet they passed over Amendments such as that of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Carmarthen), whose abilities in blocking Bills they were all happy to recognise, and such as that placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division (Mr. W. Kenny). He could only express his regret that the Debate should have come to a conclusion in a bog, so to speak. He deplored the fact that this wholly unimportant Amendment should have been used to occupy the time of the House. One word as to the merits of the Amendment. The right hon. Member for Birmingham said that while the rules generally might be passed over that dealing with religious instruction was upon quite a different basis. Everybody remembered that early in the Session the noble Lord the Member for North Tyrone (Lord F. Hamilton) brought in a Bill to deal with the subject. That Bill having been rejected with the aid of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) it was now proposed, by a side wind on the Home Rule Bill, to effect the same object. And this was the gagged Party who, having passed over important Amendments, wasted the time of the House over the question of bee and poultry keeping. He regarded the Amendment as a slur on the Commissioners of National Education. Was it likely that Lord Monck, who was one of the framers of these rules, would needlessly alter them? Was it likely that Lord Morris would prejudice the Protestants of Ireland by making an invidious alteration in the rules? Could any fault be found with Sir Patrick Keenan? Then there was the Right Hon. W. F. Cogan. What was the matter with the Right Hon. W. F. Cogan?

Mr. W. Johnston rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (continuing) said, it was an extraordinary thing that a gentleman who complained of the gag attempted to closure him. Then he took the case of the Rev. J. Stubbs of Trinity College. This was a typical case. [Cries of "Divide!"] The Rev. J. Stubbs was a gentleman of learning and distinction, and he hoped some Member for Trinity College would rise to defend him. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] As the name of Mr. Stubbs was so offensive to the Tory Party he would take the case of Judge Shaw.

It being Eleven of the clock, Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 21st August, interrupted the Debate, and put forthwith the Question on the Amendment:—

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 227.—(Division List, No. 282.)

Whereupon, in pursuance of the said Order, Mr. Speaker proceeded successively to put forthwith the Questions on the several Government Amendments of which Notice had been given.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Several of the said Amendments were agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 39, after the word "Act," to insert the words "shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, and."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 190.—(Division List, No. 283.)

Another Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 23, after the words "thinks fit," to insert the words "after considering any representation that may be made by the Irish Government."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 228; Noes 190.—(Division List, No. 284.)

Other of the said Amendments were agreed to.

Motion made, "That the Bill be read a third time upon Wednesday next."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Whereupon, in pursuance of the said Order, Mr. Speaker put the Question thereon forthwith.

Question agreed to.

Ordered, That the Bill be read the third time upon Wednesday next, and be printed. [Bill 448.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary whether the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill would contain the Bill extending the time in which leaseholders in Ireland might apply as to the fixing of fair rents?

MR. J. MORLEY: I was in error in what I said earlier in the day about this Bill. That Bill will be included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) hoped that sufficient time would be given for the discussion of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, as it would contain a large number of most important measures.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 28th August 1893.

TOOK THE OATH.

The Lord Byron.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) BILL.—(No. 255.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, this Bill is not very extensive in its nature, but it touches a point which is not without importance. The object of it is that all children should be required to remain in the elementary schools until they are 11 years old. At present the position of the matter is somewhat complicated. Children cannot be employed in factories until they are 11 years of age; but children who are to follow other employments may obtain release from attendance at school a year earlier. The period of attendance and the requirement of a certificate of discharge from attendance are regulated by bye-laws of very varying terms. By some the Standard required to be attained is as low as the Third Standard; but in most cases it is a higher Standard. But a scholar of 10 who has passed the Third Standard cannot, on that account, be released from attendance. There are two good reasons for making the alteration proposed by the Bill. One is that it is highly desirable that the rule as to the age at which children should be employed should be uniform, and ought to be fixed in all cases. The other is that the age of 10 is too early for children to leave school, and that they ought to be kept at school a year longer. Even though scholars may not pass in a higher Standard by remaining at school, it is obvious that another year's schooling would be of great advantage to them. As originally framed, the Bill applied only to complete exemption from school attendance; but as it comes up to this House it has been amended so as to apply also to cases of partial exemption or half-timers. I mention that, because the Bill has been understood outside as applying to total exemption. The Bill now applies to certificates of both entire and partial exemption. I think it makes a satisfactory change in the law, and I hope the Bill will meet with your Lordships' approval, and that you will give it a Second Reading.

—(The Lord President.)

*LORD SANDFORD said, the Bill was a step in the right direction. He was only sorry and somewhat surprised that in the present state of enthusiasm for education at the Council Office the Lord President, having before him the Report of the late Departmental Committee upon the various changes required in the conditions of school attendance, had not gone a good deal further. Both the majority and minority upon the Royal Commission advised that 11 should be the minimum age at which children should get partial, and 13 total relief. The difference between healthy and unhealthy employments ought properly to be regarded in determining the age at which children should be released from school attendance—healthier employments entitling them to earlier release. Because children under 11 were prevented from being employed in factories, workshops, and mines, he did not see any reason why they should be debarred from field employment. He referred to that point, which in the Memorandum prefixed to the Bill was made the chief ground of its introduction, in order that the change made by this Bill on other than educational grounds might not hereafter be pleaded as a reason for further limiting the age and labour in rural districts. There was no doubt that the conditions of labour in this and other countries were being largely modified, and the adoption of a higher age than 11 for factory work ought not to shut out a variation in favour of healthy employments. If in this country, as in Germany and France, children were to be kept out of factories up to 13, he did not want this Bill to be quoted hereafter as a precedent that they must therefore be kept till that age out of healthy employment in the fields. That was the only criticism he wished to make on the Bill. With regard to total exemption the Bill was rather half-hearted. It would affect about 10,000 children directly, in districts where compulsion ended at 10, and indirectly about the same number, who reached the Fourth Standard before the age of 10. It was a good principle laid down in the Bill that children should not be released from school too early, but should stay on to enable them to complete their Fifth Standard. The Fourth Standard was too low to justify the entire release of children from day school instruction. He had had some doubt whether partial employment in agriculture should not be allowed at the age of 10; but it was removed when, having communicated with high authorities on educational matters in the rural districts, he found that neither employers nor parents objected to fixing the higher age of 11. He hoped the time would soon come when the whole situation might be reviewed in connection with the introduction of secondary education, and then he trusted they would be able to get rid of all bye-laws, and to adopt the Third and Fifth Standards, which prevailed in Scotland, as the uniform conditions of partial and total exemption.

LORD KNUTSFORD: My Lords, I must express my hearty concurrence in this Bill as an important step in the direction in which I have always wished to see elementary education carried out. When I had the honour to be Vice President I desired to take a step in this direction; but the opposition I met with was too great for me. I am heartily glad to find that opposition is now diminished. I hope the Government will pay attention to the observations of my noble Friend, and I imagine they will be as glad as he to see the Third and Fifth Standards adopted.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I may have been misunderstood by the noble Lord. He seems to think I lay too much stress upon the uniformity which this Bill would maintain between children employed in factories and elsewhere. I think that is an advantage; but I wish to guard myself against being supposed to hold as a principle, any more than the noble Lord, that the age at which children can be employed in healthy occupations can be determined by uniform rule. It is quite obvious that the question of the education and employment of children in different trades, in reference to which considerations of health arise, must be based upon different principles. I merely wish to guard myself by making that observation, and I am glad that noble Lords opposite approve of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Moved, "That the Lord Playfair do take the Chair in Committee of the Whole House this day in the absence of the Earl of Morley."—(The Lord President, [E. Kimberley]); agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (SWINE FEVER) BILL.—(No. 254.)

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he had some Amendments to this Bill which would be moved in Standing Committee.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT REQUIREMENTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Lord President how he justified the action of the Education Office with regard to the British and Foreign School at Holyhead, and the schools at Tilston and Clutton in Cheshire? Before addressing himself to the question of which he had given notice, he desired to remove a misunderstanding on the part of the noble Earl the Lord President as to what took place on the last occasion when he put a question to his noble Friend, who was reported to have said that he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had compared him to a chimney sweep. No wonder he had been unable to understand that, for there would have been no point in it. Having known the noble Earl for 51 years, it was impossible he could have used towards him an expression implying a person without education. Perhaps his noble Friend had done him an injustice of another kind, feigning to misunderstand him, as a rhetorical artifice. What he said was that a Tory editor had expressed to him the hope that the noble Earl would remain in his place for fear of a less good man occupying it; and he himself added that he would have preferred to have one of Mr. Frederic Harrison's chimney sweeps in the noble Earl's place, because he would not then have been able to shelter the Vice President. Perhaps the noble Earl had not time to read the magazines, or he would have known that Mr. Frederic Harrison had suggested that the Prime Minister might swamp that House by sending up 100 chimney sweeps, but that these would soon lose their political principles, and would require to be reinforced by another 100. He hoped he had satisfied the noble Earl, whom he had no wish in the least to offend. Coming to the question on the Notice Paper, he would ask the noble Earl for an impartial hearing. The school at Tilston was built much larger than was required for school purposes, in order that it might serve for village meetings; it was put down in the books as capable of containing 142 children, and the attendance was only 60 odd children, including three or four under three years old. The last Report of the Inspector was very favourable: the master was good, and came from a Board school at Clapham; for four months the managers were unable to get a schoolmistress, but her place was filled during that time by two young women of 18. The managers had some difficulty in meeting the expenses; but notwithstanding that, and that the size of the school was so far in excess of the places occupied, the Education Office was demanding structural alterations that were not required. They exacted cloak rooms, although the pegs for cloaks at one end of the school were seven feet from the nearest benches, and 24 feet from the nearest benches in use at the other end. The Department also required ventilators to be placed in the roof, although there were two circular windows in the gables at each end near the roof, and five large panes which opened in the large windows. He had seen all the maps fluttering on the walls, so that no complaint could be made of want of air. These alterations, he was told, would cost £50. Formerly the Education Department supplied plans for schools, as he knew, for he obtained them when he had occasion to build a new school, and no one would complain if the Department issued new plans every year for use when required for new schools; but it was unreasonable when much expense had been incurred to call upon schools to change square for round, and to call for ventilators in a roof like those of a cow-house where there were circular windows for the same purpose. He had seen a school about four miles North of Chester with a kitchener for warming the children's dinners; it might be expected that the Department would immediately require kitcheners to be placed in every school, or that it might order them to be removed from objections to the savoury smell of the dishes distracting the attention of the children. As to Clutton School, he had not seen the official letter stating the demands of the Department, neither could he ascertain them when he called there last Thursday; but he had been told that the Department asked for cloak-rooms, porches, and thicker walls. The landowner concerned with this school, and whose estate paid £14 a year to it, said that this sum and the grants never cleared the expenses; but he complained principally of the bullying ways of the Department. These two schools in Cheshire were voluntary schools, with Church teaching, which accounted for these tyrannical and peremptory requirements; but there was no accounting for the threats of suppression launched by the Department against the British and Foreign School at Holyhead, since its religious teaching was entirely denominational, or of that invertebrate Board school kind, that no persons who cared for religious instruction would give anything to uphold that school. The grievance was, therefore, entirely financial. The Department insisted on structural alterations which would cost £200 or £300, which there was no probability or possibility of obtaining. In that case what was the Department going to do? Would it order the School Board to acquire a new site and to build a new school at the expense of the ratepayers of Holyhead, who were poor enough already, and was the existing school to be made derelict at the caprice of the Department and the consulting architect? This architect wanted more windows in the gables, and most likely did not know that Holyhead was said at the Meteorological Department to be the place where the winds were most violent in the Kingdom. The walls and roof of this school looked new, though it was built in 1848, at a cost of £567, to hold 350 children. In 1858 a new class-room was added at a cost of £292. In 1878 the premises were re-arranged at a cost of £174—all voluntary subscriptions; and this year the school had been put in proper repair at a cost of £50. The friend of the Vice President, Mr. Lyulph Stanley, had visited this school last year, and said that with some repairs the building was good. He had offered the only piece of ground he possessed adjoining this school for an infant's class-room; but it did not satisfy the Department; and the other adjoining land belonged to Jesus College, Oxford, which did not wish to sell it. But what necessity was there for enlarging this school? There were vacant places in the National school and in the Board schools; and if there were not, the simplest course would be to build a new school in some other part of the town. But the Board schools could hold more, and the National schools were by no means full, and the mountain-side Board school was comparatively empty, owing to an inefficient teacher. The consequence was that the mountain children crowded up the British and Foreign and other Board schools in the town. This would not happen if the mountain school were efficient as it used to be. No doubt the British and Foreign School was too full; but no one looking at the town, and knowing the present supply of accommodation, could fail to think it sufficient if fairly distributed. When the Department dictated such lavish expenditure by people who were severely taxed by the so-called "free education," it was no wonder that such official tyranny should arouse feelings of execration, perhaps soon to burst out into imprecation against the Vice President, and which might reach the Lord President when people got to know that he not only left him a free hand, but also supported him. He had heard persons casting about for the motives which could possibly influence the Vice President in making these exactions against other than Church schools, and suspecting that the influence was that of some Builders' Union or the good of the building trade. This, of course, was idle nonsense; but he wished it were so, as that would be a more human motive, and, on the whole, less exasperating, than this purposeless tyranny. He had recently heard that the Vice President had not spared Wesleyan and Baptist schools. He certainly appeared to have inscribed over the portals of his office Christianos ad leones, which, in modern English, meant "Christians must go to the dogs." There were others who explained his action by the doctrine first brought to Europe by Pythagoras, and who conceived that his soul once animated one of the lions that devoured the early Christians in the Roman amphitheatre, and then passed into the Emperor Julian. When M. Louis Veuillot, the editor of L'Univers, was alive, he wrote with so much vigour against the ideas which now reigned in the Education Department, that one of his readers said that if the early Christians resembled M. Veuillot, then he pitied the lions. It was time that we had in this country a writer of similar energy to restrain the Education Department. Earlier in the Session he had called the attention of the Lord President to the number of suicides. He did not mean to press the great increase of suicides, since much of that might be due to physical causes, such as the great heat; but he asked if the noble Earl had noted the letter of Ernest Clark, and other foolish and wicked incitements to suicides, in the columns of The Daily Chronicle, one of the chief supporters of the Government, which The Spectator called "Toying with Suicide," and he asked if the noble Earl felt no responsibility for the future increase of those crimes, which must inevitably follow from the irreligious education which the Vice President was endeavouring to force upon and spread over the country?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I must first beg my noble Friend to accept my most humble apology for not having understood his rhetorical figure; and, therefore, I at once disclaim what I may have said with regard to the "chimney sweep." I may say that I did read the article of Mr. Frederic Harrison, and, therefore, I ought to have understood my noble Friend's reference; but the fact is that he introduces so many tropes, rhetorical figures, and even denunciations of everybody, that it is sometimes rather difficult to follow him. He has called me, for instance, to-night a tyrant ; but the next time we meet he will, no doubt, tell me that he has known me for 51 years ; that it is impossible he could intend to impute that to me ; and that he hopes I will not take offence. Well, I have known my noble Friend for 51 years, and I will only say that I do not think there is anything he could say of me at which I could take any offence whatever. The truth is that my noble Friend has Vice President on the brain. He attributes to everything my right hon. Friend does a diabolical ingenuity, the last proof of which is that since the Vice President came into Office my noble Friend finds that there has been an increase of suicide. When I hear it stated that I have a Colleague whose policy is so disastrous as to lead to an increase of suicide, I ask myself naturally what can it all mean ; and I think I have found an answer in the fact that my noble Friend is under the persuasion that anyone who promotes education in any school which is not a voluntary school is an enemy to all religion. That is a most strange doctrine, and one to which, for my own part, I cannot subscribe. But my noble Friend has answered himself to some extent, because he said that Mr. Acland did not confine his attention only to Church schools, but extended it to British and foreign and other schools also. I can assure my noble Friend that the intention of the Department is to apply the Rules which they think necessary for the promotion of education with perfect impartiality to all schools, whether Church or voluntary, whether connected with the Church of England, or the Wesleyans, or any other denomination. The duty of the Department is simply to administer the law fairly and reasonably in the interests of all parties. I will now come to the matters to which my noble Friend has specially called my attention. With regard to the school at Holyhead, the Inspector reported that the school wanted improvements. My noble Friend asked what would happen if the improvements are not made. If it should turn out on examination that the improvements are absolutely necessary, and are not made, my noble Friend knows very well what will follow. With regard to the school at Tilston, the Inspectors have reported that the accommodation is not sufficient, and one of the requirements is a proper cloak-room. Up to the present the Department has not received any answer from the Managers. If the Managers will write to the Department stating their views their explanation will be fully considered. With regard to Clutton, a cloak-room, among other things, is wanted, and I am told that the walls are only 9 inches thick. Anybody who knows anything about building must be aware that a wall only 9 inches thick is very unsatisfactory. A wall properly constructed should be 14 inches thick. The Department has called upon the Managers to make the walls somewhat thicker ; but it is not intended to impose any disability upon them because of the thinness of the walls. I am perfectly well aware that Inspectors are not always in favour with the Managers of schools ; but the Department must trust the Inspectors they employ. No doubt it is annoying to find, after what is called for has been done, that an Inspector points out something else which requires to be remedied. When people are called upon by the Inspectors to bring schools up to a proper standard a certain amount of dissatisfaction must be expected. All I can say is that I will give my most vigorous support to the Vice President in his efforts to bring the schools up to their proper requirements ; at the same time, I have spoken to my right hon. Friend on the subject, and he desires as much as myself that these things should be done in a fair and reasonable spirit. Each case must be judged by itself. I do not think the cases brought forward by my noble Friend show any violent or tyrannical action on the part of the Department ; but I can assure him that, whether we be called tyrants or not, in the interests of the children to be educated we are resolved to see that the requirements of the law are fully and entirely carried out.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he was glad to hear from the noble Earl that the representations of the Managers would be considered, because the Inspectors were not wholly to be relied upon. He had heard great complaints of them from different parts of the country. He did not say that the noble Earl was a tyrant, but that the Department was tyrannical. What was complained of was that the noble Earl did not look into these cases himself. The law was laid down by the Education Act of 1870; but the Department seemed now to assume to make Codes for itself, which were imperfectly discussed in Parliament. They had no right to force children of three years into the schools in order to save their mothers the trouble of taking care of them. As to the thickness of walls, Lord Harrowby referred to that in the Notice he had put on the Paper for the consideration of their Lordships.

QUESTIONS.

MALLWYD CHURCH OF ENGLAND SCHOOLS.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has received a representation from the Vicar and Churchwardens of Mallwyd, as Managers of the Mallwyd Church of England Schools, in the County of Merioneth, claiming that at the renewal of the agreement with the School Board they should be recognised as the only legal Managers of the school; and, if he has, what reply he has given to the representation?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Rector of Mallwyd was informed by the Department on 9th June last that the arrangement for transfer of the school which had been approved by the Department was made in pursuance of a resolution duly passed by the Managers of the school as defined by Section 3 of the Education Act of 1870. A letter was subsequently received from the Rector and Churchwardens protesting against the recognition of any persons other than themselves as Managers, to which in view of the previous correspondence, which went fully into the matter, no further reply was considered necessary. I may add that the Department is not empowered to decide who are the legal Managers of any school.

UPPER BAGGOT STREET POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that the post office in Upper Baggot Street, Dublin, is not a telegraph office; that Upper Baggot Street is the centre of a most populous and flourishing district in the suburbs of Dublin, and that there is no telegraph office nearer than that at Ball's Bridge, at the extremity of the district, and that at Lower Baggot, in the city; and whether, in view of the great inconvenience which the traders and other inhabitants of the locality suffer by reason of such want of telegraphic accommodation, he will consider the propriety of establishing a telegraph office in Upper Baggot Street?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The district to which the hon. Member refers appears to be fairly well served with telegraph facilities; and I do not think that the expense of establishing an additional office would be justified.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS AND PARLIAMENT.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): In the absence of the hon. Member for North Hackney, I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any, and, if so, what, Departmental Rule which forbids Post Office employés to approach the House of Commons directly, or to sign a Petition to the House, with reference to any grievance, after having unsuccessfully petitioned the Postmaster General in reference thereto?

MR. A. MORLEY: There is no such Rule.

THE GENERAL SIGNAL BOOK.

MR. MACDONALD: In the absence of the hon. Member for North Hackney, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there has been any revision of the Regulations in the General Signal Book, with reference to speed signals, since the Howe Court Martial?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Certain points relating to signals, including the subject of the hon. and learned Gentleman's question, are now under consideration at the Admiralty.

THE CASE OF MR. SAMPSON, OF THE SLIGO POST OFFICE.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any complaint was made to the Post Office Authorities at Dublin or Sligo of the conduct of Mr. Sampson, an official in the Sligo Post Office; if so, what was the nature of the complaint, and by whom made; and whether any investigation was held; and, if so, what was the result?

MR. A. MORLEY: The complaint made to the Postmaster of Sligo related to the alleged action by Mr. Sampson in attempting to proselytise a servant girl who is not in the service of the Department. I would refer the hon. Member to a reply I gave to him on July 24.

THE EVICTION OF JOHN MACKAY, NEWRATH.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): In the absence of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John Mackay, of Newrath, Waterford, who was evicted from his holding on Saturday, 12th August; and whether he is aware that Mr. Mackay applied to have a fair rent fixed, but that the application was refused on the ground that the lease under which he held was made by the present landlord's father in excess of his powers; that the landlord thereupon served a writ of ejectment, and proceeded to eviction, although Mr. Mackay and his ancestors had occupied the holding for generations, and had executed all the improvements upon it; and that all his interest and improvements have been confiscated on the technical ground mentioned; and, if so, whether the Government intend to propose an amendment to the law to prevent the recurrence of such cases?

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): At the same time, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Mr. John Mackay, as reported in The Waterford Star, and copied into the daily paper, who was recently evicted from his holding at Newrath near Waterford; whether he is aware that Mr. Mackay, during the lifetime of the late landlord, served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed, but before it came on for hearing the landlord died, and his son, Mr. John H. Jones, the present landlord, came into possession; that, on the ground that his father was only life owner of the lands by a deed executed at his marriage, which provided that his tenancy in the lands ceased at his death, it was argued that the tenant's tenancy terminated at the same time ; and that the landlord's contention has been upheld by the Land Sub-Commission and the Chief Land Commission ; and whether, considering the vital interest of the question to large numbers of tenants in Ireland, and that the tenant was refused leave to go to the Court of Appeal, the Government will afford facilities for testing in the superior Courts the ruling of the Land Commission on this important point ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The facts are generally as stated in this question, and in the similar question standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Waterford. I am informed by the Land Commission that the legal point involved was decided six years ago by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in the case of "Massy v. Norse," and that it has since been followed by the Court of Appeal in other cases. On the 24th March last an application was made on behalf of the tenant to the Court of the Land Commission for liberty to appeal to the Court of Appeal ; but the Land Commission Court, in exercise of its discretion, refused the application on the ground that the only legal question raised had already been decided by the Court of Appeal.

MR. CLANCY : Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of making a change in the law ?

MR. J. MORLEY : It seems to me that the consequences of this decision defeat the intention of the Parliament which passed the Act of 1881. This is not the moment to say whether the time has arrived for a change in the law ; but I am quite sure this was not the kind of thing intended by Parliament.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this decision affects at least 100,000 tenants in Ireland ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not know how many it affects.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS AT BANGOR, COUNTY DOWN.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now state what is the amount of loan which has been applied for by Mr. R. E. Ward, for making harbour works and other improvements in Bangor, County Down ; what is the date of the first application made in respect of this loan ; whether Mr. Ward has offered, in addition to the usual mortgage of the harbour dues, security by way of first charge on property at least three times in value the amount of the loan ; and whether he will see that no technical difficulty as to title will further delay the advance of the loan for making these urgently needed improvements ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The application was first received through the Board of Trade in August, 1892, but was refused on the ground of insufficient security. Correspondence as to collateral security followed, and the security of certain estates was offered by Mr. Ward in addition to that of the harbour dues. The Public Works Loan Board have been since the 18th May in correspondence with Mr. Ward's solicitors as to his title. There is no technical difficulty so far as the Board are aware, and any delay that has occurred has been on the side of Mr. Ward, who has only to supply the information asked for.

THE BUNDORAN MAILS.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the contract for the carriage of mails by the post car between Bundoran Junction and Bundoran has expired by reason of the death of the contractor ; and, if so, will he give directions that tenders be invited for such mail service for a specified period, so as to insure due economy coupled with punctuality ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The contract referred to has expired, and in making any new arrangements I shall not fail to pay due regard to economy and punctuality.

SAMOA.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, as stated in The Times report of the recent hostilities in Samoa, whereas two German men-of-war were in port at the time, no British man-of-war was present, if required, for the protection of British interests ; and having regard to the fact that a conflict between the forces of Malietoa and Mataafa had been impending for some time, why a British man-of-war was not present in the harbour of Apia?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): As I informed the hon. Member on July 27, the three Treaty Powers did decide to send ships of war to Samoa with the object of putting an end to political disturbance. H.M.S. Katoomba arrived at Apia on July 16, and found that an engagement had taken place between the forces of Malietoa and those of Mataafa some eight days previously, which had ended in the defeat of the latter and his retreat to the Island of Manono. The combined English and German Squadron at once proceeded to the scene of action. Mataafa and his adherents surrendered, and the war was terminated without a shot being fired by the ships.

FORT GEORGE WATER SUPPLY.

MR. W. WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any intention of sending a regiment to Fort George; if so, has the difficulty with regard to the water supply been overcome?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The proposal to send a battalion to Fort George has had to be abandoned for the present, owing to the unsatisfactory state of the water supply at that station. A scheme for improving the water supply is now under consideration.

H.M.S. "MAJESTIC."

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, in the Majestic, how many days' coal will the bunkers (proper) contain for steaming at full speed; and when so coaled, and otherwise equipped for sea, what will be her greatest draught of water?

\*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: (1) For continuous steaming over long periods at sea, at least 6,000 horse power should be developed, corresponding to a speed of about  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots. The bunkers proper would hold coal for about 11 days' steaming. (2) The answer to the second paragraph is, 29 feet 3 inches.

\*SIR E. HARLAND: Is  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots the full speed?  $17\frac{1}{2}$  knots has been mentioned.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I have given the figures as  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots; but there is no doubt a higher speed will be obtained.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): Does that consumption include expenditure for auxiliary engines, such as those for electric lighting, which require a large quantity of fuel?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I have no doubt that that has been taken into account.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman, with the Admiralty at his back, cannot tell us how many days' coal the vessel steaming at full speed will carry?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: In the terror of all the hon. Member's Amendments to Supply this has been a busy morning, and I am afraid I omitted to notice that the hon. Baronet had put down the words "at full speed" in his question. I apologise for the omission.

THE CORDITE DISPUTE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a Memorandum, stated to have been addressed to the Director of Artillery on 20th August, 1888, and published by request in The Times of 24th August last; whether it was so published at the request of the War Office; whether, if so, the War Office will publish the reply made to it by the Director of Artillery; whether it was signed by all the members of the Committee when it was first brought to the knowledge of the Secretary of State for War; whether the Regulations suggested in paragraph 13 were afterwards determined upon; and, if so, were they, or the purport of them, disclosed to the private inventors submitting their explosives for examination, and will he lay them upon the Table; and what was the date of the half-yearly Report in which the Memorandum is said to have been included?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the Memorandum published in The Times of August 24 last. This Memorandum was not published at the request of the War Office. Sir F. Abel wrote to me asking whether I had any objection to his sending it to the Press, and I replied that I had none. No official reply has been recorded. The Memorandum was signed, as is customary, by Sir F. Abel, as President, Explosives Committee, and not by the members of that Committee. With regard to paragraph 13, new Regulations have not yet been finally determined on, although the matter has been under the consideration of various Departments of the Government for some time. The Memorandum was included in the half-yearly Report dated December 31, 1888.

MR. HANBURY: Do I understand that no official or semi-official reply was given by the Director of Artillery to whom the communication was made?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No official written reply appears to have been made. What happened was this. The Memorandum was received; a great many Minutes were written upon it, and questions were started upon those Minutes which appear to have diverted the attention of the officials of the Department from the Memorandum itself. I can trace no official reply.

MR. HANBURY: Is it a fact that no official sanction was given to the view enunciated in the Memorandum?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No official reply having been sent, no written or official approval or disapproval of the Memorandum was given. What may have been communicated verbally I cannot, of course, say.

THE BENGAZI SLAVE TRADE.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the 13 slaves stated, in the Paper presented to the House relating to the Slave Trade in Bengazi (Africa, No. 7, 1893), to have been clandestinely placed upon the Ottoman steamer Bahu Jedid, were released by Consul General Holmwood during the detention of that steamer at Clazomenæ; whether he is aware that the Slave Trade is being diverted from Zanzibar to Bengazi, and that great cruelty and loss of life occurs in bringing slaves to the latter port from Wadai and other places in the interior; and whether the export of slaves by Ottoman steamers is a violation of the Treaty engagements of the Ottoman Empire; and, if so, whether he will require those engagements to be rigidly enforced at Bengazi as well as elsewhere? At the same time, I will ask the hon. Baronet whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Reports on the Slave Trade in Tripoli received from the British Consul at Bengazi in 1887, 1890, 1891, and 1892?

*SIR E. GREY: Her Majesty's Consul General at Smyrna made representations to the authorities, and was informed by them that only eight negroes were on board the steamer on its arrival at Smyrna, and that they were all in possession of certificates of manumission. In answer to paragraph 2, I have to say that the information we possess will be found in the Reports which will be laid on the Table. No legitimate opportunity is lost of bringing to the notice of the Ottoman Government any breaches of their regulations and of their engagements prohibiting the export of slaves, of which Her Majesty's Consuls become aware. In regard to the last question, I have to say that these Reports will be laid, except those for 1887, which will be found in Slave Trade, No. 1, of 1888.

MR. SNAPE: The Paper presented to the House spoke of 13 slaves, and the reply to my question only mentions eight slaves. Can the hon. Baronet say what became of the other five?

*SIR E. GREY: We telegraphed for information in connection with the hon. Member's question, and the reply only mentions eight slaves as having been found on board. We must await the arrival of the Report for fuller information. The difference in number will be inquired into.

EXAMINING OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in reference to the two examinations held under the Treasury Minute of 24th March, 1891, for the position of First Class Examining Officers of Customs, he will state what percentage of marks was fixed as the qualifying standard in each examination, and whether this percentage was required on the aggregate of the marks obtained, or for each separate subject; and whether he can supply the House with the number of officers having over 20 years of service who have attained this standard in each examination?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The details of these examinations having been by the Treasury Minute expressly left to the sole discretion of the Commissioners of Customs, I do not think I could properly add to the replies which I gave on June 20 and July 13 to similar questions. Two officers promoted to the first class on the results of the first examination and one promoted on the results of the second had over 20 years' service.

THE PROPOSED NEW BATTLESHIPS— A QUESTION OF NAVAL POLICY.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend proceeding with the construction of two iron-clads larger than those built under the Naval Defence Act; whether, since the sinking of the Victoria, his attention has been called to the criticisms of experts at home and abroad questioning the expediency of building additional ships of this monster class; whether, before committing the nation to the enormous expenditure involved in the construction of such large vessels, he will cause an inquiry to be made into the capability of their lower structure to prevent capsizing in the event of one or more compartments being filled with water; and whether he is aware that the lower structure of these ships with existing top-hamper, when pierced, may, as in the case of the Victoria, under steam disturb the centre of gravity and thus cause them to turn turtle?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The description presented to Parliament of the two new battleships shows an increase of 10 feet in length and 750 tons in displacement over the Royal Sovereign class. The breadth and mean draught are the same. The causes of the increase are described in that Paper. The Admiralty have not failed to consider the criticisms to which the second paragraph of the question refers, but are clearly of opinion that it is necessary to build these two ships of the dimensions already settled in view of the strength of those which, in case of war, they might have to meet. The matters mentioned in Paragraph 3 are necessarily fully dealt with in working out all details of ships of war. The Admiralty see no reason for any special action in this case. The last paragraph raises questions of opinion on which the Admiralty, if they understand the views stated, are not disposed to concur with my hon. Friend.

THE BOYLE NIGHT POSTMAN.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General can he state why Mr. Joseph Kilkenny, night postman in Boyle, has been suspended from the discharge of his duties; is he aware that Mr. Joseph Kilkenny is universally regarded in the town as the most courteous official connected with the Boyle Post Office, and that there is a general belief that he was suspended by the Local Authorities merely because, being a Catholic, he protested against certain proselytism that was being carried on in the office; and will he promptly inquire into the matter, and have this man immediately re-instated in his position if there be no charge against him, or otherwise have a full and public investigation of the entire circumstances of the case?

MR. A. MORLEY: I understand that the suspension of Joseph Kilkenny was not connected with his religious opinions. He was suspended for insubordination in refusing to furnish an explanation when officially required to do so. After an expression of his regret he was allowed to resume duty on the 22nd instant, and the incident may be considered as at an end.

APPORTIONMENT OF NAVAL EXPENDITURE.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what portion of the probable estimated expenditure for 1892-3, in respect of H.M.S. Renown, Hazard, and Hussar, was actually incurred prior to the commencement of the current financial year; and what portion, if any, of such expenditure was incurred prior to 1st September, 1892?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The amounts actually expended in 1892-3 were:—Renown, £12,527; Hazard, £14,965; and Hussar, £8,871. An extremely small fraction of this outlay, in the case of each ship, was incurred before September 1, 1892.

THE CASE OF JAMES BUTLER, OF STROKESTOWN.

MR. BODKIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if anything has been done in reference to James Butler, ex-constable, who lost his arm by the accidental discharge of a comrade's rifle, who was, in consequence, dismissed as disabled from the Force, and is now residing, in a condition of absolute destitution, near Strokestown, in compliance with the promise made that his case would be inquired into with the view, if possible, of supplementing his pension?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Irish Government are now in communication with the Treasury on the subject.

THE CASE OF ABRAHAM MITCHELL.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Dumbarton): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the case of Abraham Mitchell, recently a grey cloth Inspector in the employment of Messrs. William Stirling and Sons, and for some years a member of the Cardross School Board, who was sentenced at Dumbarton Sheriff Court on Saturday last, the 19th instant, to 30 days' imprisonment with hard labour for inciting and employing Robert Brown, then a clerk in the employment of Messrs. William Stirling and Sons, to steal a grey cloth standard book; whether it is true, as reported, that previous to his arrest Mitchell was offered freedom from prosecution if he would sign an acknowledgment of having fraudulently obtained the book and an apology for his ungrateful and unworthy conduct; whether it is true, as reported, that the only direct evidence against Mitchell was that of Brown, who admitted that he had taken the book in question and handed it to Mitchell, but added that he had been told that if he did not sign a declaration making the charge against Mitchell he himself would be sent to gaol; whether the witness Craig swore that she had taken a standard book from the works about the time when search was being made for the book alleged to have been stolen, and had afterwards returned it; and whether, in fact, the book alleged to have been stolen was discovered in Messrs. Stirling's works; and whether, in view of the facts of the case, he will consider the propriety of reviewing the sentence?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I have obtained a Report from the Sheriff who tried the case, and I will answer the questions put by my hon. Friend upon his statement of evidence adduced at the trial. It appears from the Sheriff's Report (1) that it was not proved that Mitchell was offered freedom from prosecution upon the terms suggested; (2) that it is not the case that the only direct evidence was Brown's; and (3) that what the witness Craig said was that one of the workers had given her a standard book for a night to show her friends. The book which Mitchell was charged with having stolen, after being missed from the works, was found in them on the morning before the trial in a condition which showed that it had just been replaced. As the case depends entirely on the credibility of the testimony, I am not able to interfere with the conclusion arrived at by the Judge who saw and heard the witnesses.

*MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): Were not these proceedings instituted by the Procurator Fiscal under instructions from the Crown Office in Edinburgh?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir.

*SIR C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been drawn to the fact that this Procurator Fiscal is a partner in a legal firm practising in this district, and during the recent election intimately associated with the gentleman who instigated the prosecution; and will he take steps to put an end to the practice of Procurators Fiscal being mixed up in private practice?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: My attention has been called in several quarters to the connection between this Procurator Fiscal and a private firm. I think this is a most glaring instance of a state of things which the Government, by recent appointments in several counties, have succeeded in putting an end to.

*MR. HOZIER: I want to be perfectly clear on this point. Was the Procurator Fiscal acting on instructions from the Government Authorities in Edinburgh?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Certainly.

THE BOMBAY RIOTS.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India will lay upon the Table of the House the Reports received by him from the Government of India with regard to the recent riots at Azamgarh, Balia, Rangoon, Bombay, and other places in India between Hindus and Mussulmans; and whether he will direct the Government of India to appoint a mixed Commission of official and unofficial members to investigate the causes of such riots, and report on the best means to be adopted to remove these causes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): The only Reports, other than telegrams, as yet received by the India Office, are on the riots in Rangoon. There is no objection to laying them on the Table if moved for. A telegram was received from the Viceroy on the 4th July regarding the Azamgarh riots; and telegrams were received on the 12th, 13th, and 14th instant from the Governor of Bombay regarding the riots in Bombay. These latter were communicated to the newspapers. The Secretary of State has not yet received official Reports on the riots in the North-Western Provinces and Bombay. As my hon. Friend is aware, religious riots are of almost annual recurrence in India; and the Secretary of State does not, as at present advised, think it necessary to direct the Government of India to appoint a Commission, as suggested by my hon. Friend.

SECOND CLASS EXAMINING OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS.

MR. STEWART WALLACE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, considering that in the Customs Department second class examining officers are employed in assessing duty on goods which are highest on the tariff—namely, tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, while officers in the first class of that grade are employed assessing duty on goods which are the lowest on the tariff—namely, wines in bulk at 1s. per gallon; and, in view of the fact that casks of spirits and wines gauged on importation by first class examining officers are checked and regauged, in case of error, prior to their delivery to the merchant by second class examining officers, usually selected for this work on account of their age and experience, he will consider the possibility of allowing these officers to be promoted to the first class?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The rate of duty chargeable on any article is not a measure of the intelligence and experience required for, or of the difficulty involved in, the assessment. Weighing tobacco is a simple, and, to a great extent, mechanical, duty, whereas the work of correctly ascertaining the holding capacity of casks on importation, which forms part of the work of import gauging, requires considerable technical knowledge and experience. The duty of checking the contents of a cask ascertained by the first class examining officer falls properly upon the surveyor at the time of importation, and not on the examining officer who may examine the cask prior to delivery for duty.

MEDICAL RELIEF IN EAST LONDON.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Samuel Ely Hobbs, a dock labourer, lately residing at Love Lane, Ratcliff, who died at the Bromley and Stepney Sick Asylum of inflammation of the lungs, accelerated by destitution and privation; whether he is aware that there is only one doctor to the Union, which contains the parishes of Limehouse, Stepney, and Ratcliffe, and that the wife of the deceased was two days before she could obtain the medicine prescribed by the parish doctor; and whether immediate steps will be taken to remedy the present system?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): My attention has been called to the Report of the inquest in the case referred to. The Local Government Board have applied to the Coroner for a copy of the depositions, and they are at present in communication with the Guardians of the Stepney Union with regard to the case.

THE SCOTCH SUSPENSORY BILL.

MR. HOZIER: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland when the Government intend to introduce the Suspensory Bill for the Church of Scotland?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Government do not propose to proceed with it.

*MR. HOZIER: But is not this Suspensory Bill one of the measures to which, to use the words of the Prime Minister himself, the Government are "pledged in the solemn form provided by the Queen's Speech at the beginning of the Session"?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member can draw his own conclusion from my words.

*MR. HOZIER: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government intend to introduce the Suspensory Bill for the Church of Scotland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): We have taken note of the Bill which has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow. The Government are inclined to view the Bill with favour, and, considering the circumstances, we have no intention of proceeding with the Suspensory Bill of which notice was given in an earlier part of the year.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman's answer also apply to the Welsh Suspensory Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In the case of the Welsh Suspensory Bill, I have not observed the introduction of any other measure promising a satisfactory settlement of the question. If the hon. Gentleman is prepared to give us such a measure, having a good and fair promise of being a settlement, we shall be prepared to consider it.

MASHONALAND.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have arranged to send a force for the protection of British Colonists in Mashonaland in view of the threatening attitude of the Matabeles?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The duty of preserving peace and order in the territory under the control of the British South Africa Company attaches to the Company under the Charter; and of this they were more than once informed by the late Secretary of State. Sir H. Loch informs the Secretary of State that Mr. Rhodes, Managing Director, says that the Company "ask for nothing and want nothing," and Her Majesty's Government have no reason to believe that the Company is not in a position to fulfil their responsibilities. Her Majesty's Government have strongly deprecated any aggressive movement on the part of the Company, and Sir H. Loch has informed them that no offensive movement is to be made without his authority, and his action has been approved by Her Majesty's Government. I may add that, telegraphing on Saturday evening, Sir H. Loch has informed us that there is no confirmation of the newspaper reports of renewed raiding of the Matabele in Mashonaland. He also informs us that he hears that Lobengula is sending Indunas to Palapye; and Sir H. Loch took the opportunity yesterday of sending a message to Lobengula by some Matabele boys who were returning to Buluwayo to the effect that he would be glad to receive the Indunas if they came with words of peace and friendship.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): May I ask whether Sir Henry Loch or the British South Africa Company is the chief authority in deciding to attack the Matabeles?

MR. S. BUXTON: The British South Africa Company have full responsibility for peace and order in their territory; but under the Charter there is authority to the Secretary of State, in case of any dispute between the Company and the Chiefs in their territory, to interfere if necessary; and under that authority Sir Henry Loch will not allow any aggressive movement on the part of the Company until the whole case has been put before him.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Does not Sir Henry Loch's interference involve the employment of the forces of the Crown?

MR. S. BUXTON: I hope not. The object of the interference is to prevent any forward movement on the part of the Company.

REGISTRAR GENERAL'S RETURNS FOR LONDON.

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Death Rate and other Returns from the Office of the Registrar General could be given for London in Divisions instead of for the Metropolis as a whole?

SIR W. FOSTER: The weekly Returns issued by the Registrar General give in respect of each registration district in London the total number of deaths registered, together with particulars as to the number of deaths from different zymotic diseases and other particulars. Similar information is furnished in the quarterly Returns issued by the Registrar General, and in the Annual Summary tables are given showing the death rates in five groups of districts in London, together with the death rates from all causes and from certain selected causes in the same groups, after distribution of deaths in institutions to the districts to which they belonged.

CHOLERA IN HULL.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, on the 24th instant, a boy, named James Henry Fortman, aged 11 years, died of Asiatic cholera at Havelock Terrace, Dansom Lane, Hull, in the midst of a densely populated part of the town; and can he inform the House how the disease was imported or where it originated?

SIR W. FOSTER: Dr. Mason, the Medical Officer of Health for Hull, reports that "No case of Asiatic cholera has been imported into the Port of Hull; that he "Can obtain no information of any opportunity the deceased had of contracting that disease;"

and he adds—

"The cause of death, in my opinion, was due to English cholera."

MR. MACDONA: Has the Senate of Hamburg issued Orders prohibiting importation to, or transport through, Hamburg of rags and old linen because of the fear the Senate has of their carrying the infection of cholera with them?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The hon. Member has given notice of a Motion with reference to this matter, and on it I shall be prepared to defend the conclusion at which the Local Government Board have arrived. The question has occupied our careful attention; but I cannot enter into the discussion of it now.

POST OFFICE SERVANTS AND THE PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE.

MR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in accordance with the promise contained in the letter of 10th September, 1892, written by his direction, he has consulted his Colleagues with reference to the claim of the Postmaster General to reserve to himself the right to consider on its merits the question of the position of the servants of the Post Office in respect to the Parliamentary franchise; and, if so, with what result?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is eminently desirable that there should be uniformity throughout the Civil Service, and that the servants of the Post Office should be upon the same footing as those of the other Departments in respect to the franchise. As regards the Parliamentary franchise, there can be no question that its exercise is absolutely free from external interference, although, of course, it is subject to the general obligation which affects the public servants, in common with all other voters, to use the franchise for the public good. Questions may be raised, on which I have no judgment to give on the part of the Government, as to how far, for example, it is desirable for public functionaries to make use of their position as voters for the purpose of obtaining from candidates promises or engagements tending directly to the advantage of public servants in respect of pay and promotion. These are matters which we deem not undeserving of consideration; but still they do not form the subject of any decision on the part of Her Majesty's Government in the nature of a restraint. The only restriction by the custom of the Public Service on persons employed is that persons in the permanent employment of the State shall not take a prominent or active part in political contests, and it is not intended in future that any other restrictive rule should be imposed on the service of the Post Office. As regards public meetings not of a political character, but relating to official questions, the Postmaster General has decided to withdraw the restrictions at present in force. But in the Post Office, as in other Departments, it must be clearly understood that the right must be exercised subject to a due regard for the discipline of the Public Service.

THE MIDDLESEX MAGISTRACY.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is correct that the Middlesex Clerk of the Peace demands and obtains fees amounting to about £10 10s. for the admission of each and every Justice to the Middlesex Bench; and, if so, whether he is right in making such charges?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The Clerk of the Peace informs me that he does not demand or obtain fees amounting to £10 10s., or any such sum, on the admission of Justices. I am in correspondence with the Clerk of the Peace on the subject.

HOW TO SHORTEN LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to Resolutions suggested for adoption by both Houses of Parliament by a Select Committee of the House of Lords on Public Business which sat in 1861, to the effect that it is expedient, in certain cases, to adopt an abridged form of proceeding with reference to Bills which shall be again brought before this House, after having been passed by it in the immediately preceding Session of the same Parliament; and that, on a Resolution being moved that it is expedient again to pass, and to send to the other House for its concurrence any such Bill, the Question shall be put whether the House will agree to the same, and on such a Resolution being agreed to the Bill to which it relates shall be forthwith sent to the other House for its concurrence without any further question being put or any debate allowed; whether Lord Salisbury took action to the same effect in 1869; and whether, in the present state of Public Business, he will consider the advisability of proposing some similar form of abridged procedure?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I believe that the facts are accurately recited in the question of my right hon. Friend. The House of Commons has shown what I think on general grounds is a judicious indisposition to interfere with its excellent Rules as to Bills, which have been found very well adapted to ordinary times. But we undoubtedly appear to have passed the happy era in which those excellent Rules were altogether sufficient, and it may be necessary under the new circumstances which have been pointed out by the question of the right hon. Gentleman that the Rules should be carefully considered by the Government. However, the moment has not yet arrived for that reconsideration. For the moment my answer seems to me to be sufficient.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

MR. FORWOOD: Will the Secretary to the Admiralty say if it is intended to take the Navy Estimates again to-morrow?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Certainly, if I am not so fortunate as to get them through to-night.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

NAVY ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,797,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Personnel for Shipbuilding, Repairs, and Maintenance, including the cost of Establishments of Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the Notice he had on the Paper for a reduction of the Vote applied particularly to salaries and allowances for the dockyards, and he proposed to limit himself to that subject, and not to go into the general question of shipbuilding. He did not quite know why the Admiralty had put down Vote 8 out of its proper order, unless it was that they wanted money. He rather fancied they had been running very close in that respect, and he hoped they would not for the third time this Session plead the necessities of the Public Service in order to justify the application of the Closure. If the Government desired to avoid lengthy discussions upon the Vote they should give the Committee the fullest information which it was in their power to give upon the different matters which the Vote dealt with. This year, however, the Government had thought it right to give the most meagre information with regard to those matters, and ordinary Members of the House of Commons, as well as the English public, were kept in complete ignorance of what was going on in our various dockyards, and had no means of gaining information in regard to a Vote such as this. It was very different in the United States, where the Intelligence Department of the Admiralty usually published a large volume, which gave everybody a full and clear idea of what was being done. The Navy Estimates Committee which sat five years ago, and whose proceedings were recorded in a Blue Book, elicited some very valuable information, but most of that information had since become obsolete; and he hoped that next year, in order to save the time of the House, the Government would agree to the appointment of another Select Committee on the Navy Estimates, so that hon. Members might obtain all the information they desired as to the Votes. In the present year a good deal of attention had been devoted to the question of labour in the dockyards, and this fuller knowledge was consequently all the more desirable. But to return to the branch of the subject to which his Notice of reduction more particularly applied. At the time when evidence was given before the Committee, to which he had already referred, Professor Elgar was the Director of Dockyards, and he was evidently impressed with the idea that a great deal might be accomplished to improve the conditions under which work was done in the dockyards.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Would not the question of labour in the dockyards be properly discussed on another branch of the Vote—on Sub-head B?

MR. HANBURY replied that the item "salaries and allowances" included labour, and he submitted that he was perfectly within his right in referring to the Director of Dockyards. He did not propose to trench on Section B. Professor Elgar recommended one or two reforms, and he would like to know what effect had been given to the recommendations? For instance, he suggested that contract ships should leave the contractors' yards as nearly ready for sea as possible. Certain vessels for the Australian Squadron had been sent out from the contractors' yards almost ready for sea, with the exception, of course, of their guns and stores, and he desired to know if the same plan was being adopted in regard to all contract built ships? The old system had the further disadvantage that it made it wholly impossible to draw a comparison between ships built in dockyards and those constructed in private yards. There was evidence that the cost of ships built in the dockyards was enormously increased, owing to the time spent in obtaining their guns and gun-mountings, and also through constant changes which were made in the designs after the vessels were commenced. This could not happen in private yards. He hoped that in future more forethought would be shown, that guns and gun-mountings would be ready directly they were required, and that designs of ships would not be tinkered with and altered from day to day. He trusted, too, that the present Director of Dockyards was of the same opinion as the late Director on these points. Another matter which, in his view, ought to be brought more directly under the eye of the Director of Dockyards was the amount of unnecessary repairs to ships. There ought to be proper means for making a fair comparison between the cost of a ship built in a dockyard and the price of a similar ship built in a private yard. To do this a hard-and-fast line would have to be drawn between shipbuilding and repairs, and they would have to separate the charges for clerical work and for police which were not borne by a private yard. The men in the dockyards ought to be spurred on by competition. He was afraid that there was a good deal of old and obsolete machinery in the dockyards, which would not have been retained in private yards for a single year, and which hampered the men in the efficient performance of their work; and this ought to be got rid of. In private yards the sub-division of labour was far more complete, and in this respect, again, the Government yards were at a great disadvantage. Professor Elgar had pointed out that one great obstacle to cheap building was to be found in the personal qualifications of the general officers of the dockyards, who did not show the energy and administrative ability which was displayed in the case of managers of many private yards. Even if there were competition between one dockyard and another, and between private yards and the dockyards, they would be hampered by the fact that all the Government officials at the Dockyards were a close Corporation, and men were set to do work there for which they were in no way qualified. In the case of a private yard the designs were drawn out at the Admiralty, and the Admiralty sent down a man to see that the designs were carried out, the building and designing being kept entirely distinct. The Naval Constructor was not in any way responsible for the building of the vessel, the designing and building being kept entirely separate, and the same principle ought to obtain in the dockyards. But nothing of the kind happened there, and the result was very unsatisfactory, because it led to frequent changes in the designs. Another evil which followed from that close corporation was that young men from the Naval College, after having been in the dockyard five years, were qualified to take the rank of foremen; and thus men who had no real practical knowledge, and were, in fact, only scientific designers, replaced practical foremen. The late Director of Dockyards was of opinion that these men, being a close Corporation, got too much into the way of a machine, and ships were kept waiting in consequence. The fact was that there ought to be one man, totally distinct from the designing, who ought to be as responsible for the building of a ship as a similar official in a private yard. He hoped that some such system would prevail in the future. He now came to the question of salaries—Sub-head A. With regard to Admiral Superintendents, it would, he admitted, seem at first sight that an Admiral was the last man who would be qualified to build a ship. No doubt the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Eastbourne (Admiral Field) believed an Admiral to be qualified to do anything in connection with a ship. In these matters he felt we had gone too far. We had gone, in fact, to a ridiculous extent in employing Artillery officers in the Ordnance Department, for instance. He had, however, come round at last to the conclusion that Admiral Superintendents were necessary, because in the dockyards they had to deal with the question of ships' stores as well as repairs to ships, and Admirals were better qualified than civilians to deal with such matters. But he could not see any reason for maintaining the Department of Staff Captains. Five years ago the Director of Dockyards told them that that Department was wholly unnecessary. The sole employment of these officials seemed to be to see after the mooring of vessels; and he really could not understand why for that purpose such an expensive establishment should be kept up. Next, he wished to call attention to the large number of salaried men upon the Vote. Salaries and allowances amounted to £162,000, which was a growth of nearly £4,000 since last year; but, instead of increasing, this Vote ought to diminish. The number of men with salaries was 15 per cent. of the whole, and it was out of all proportion to the number of salaried men in private yards. If the supervision in the dockyards were perfect, something might be said in favour of the system; but Professor Elgar, the late Director of Dockyards, said that the work which was inefficient was the supervision, which was done principally by salaried men, whereas in private yards the supervision was done by men with wages. The argument in favour of salaried men was that they would have no personal interest in overtime; but there was no connection between the two matters. The large number of salaried men caused not only inefficiency, but a great deal of discontent and heart-burning on the part of the men who received wages. That was the opinion of Professor Elgar. Another subject to which he wished to direct attention was one which affected, unfortunately, other Departments of the Public Service, and that was that of money-lending in the dockyards. At the Enfield factory it was put a stop to by the Secretary of State for War two years ago, when it was found that the men who were testing the materials were, by reason of loans, to a large extent under the control of the very men whose work they had to test, and in consequence work was passed which ought not to have been passed. This money-lending system was most mischievous, and many cases had come before the County Court Judge at Sheerness, who recently made some startling remarks in granting a debtor an administration order, stating that

"wished the dockyard authorities had no money-lenders in their establishment."

He hoped the Admiralty would do its best to put an end to this most vicious system. Another question he had to deal with was that of houses in the dockyards. On that, too, Professor Elgar had expressed a strong opinion, because he felt the existing system tended to create trouble. He thought houses ought not to be provided in the dockyards for any but the chief officials, and it would be infinitely better if the houses were done away with, and a fair allowance made in lieu of them. A much more important question was whether there were too many dockyards. Dr. Elgar had very strongly expressed the opinion that some of the dockyards were superfluous, and had suggested that even Pembroke was unnecessary. The dockyard to which, however, he made special reference was Sheerness, which cost between £60,000 and £70,000 a year. This was, he believed, only a repairing yard. [Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: No!] However that might be, Professor Elgar, who was trained in the dockyard, said he could see no advantage in having both Sheerness and Chatham, and the cost of Chatham would not be increased by doing away with Sheerness.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): Sheerness would be useful for the purposes of mobilisation in the case of war.

Mr. HANBURY said, that that might strengthen the argument in favour of the maintenance of the dockyard; but Professor Elgar was speaking of it as an establishment in time of peace, and he (Mr. Hanbury) thought they had yet to be convinced that the remaining dockyards might not be sufficient for mobilisation in time of war.

COMMANDER BETHELL: When were these opinions expressed? Was it not just after Professor Elgar had been appointed Director of Dockyards?

Mr. HANBURY said, the opinions were expressed in 1888, and Professor Elgar was appointed in 1885. So he had had three years' experience.

SIR E. REED (Cardiff): He was educated in the dockyard?

Mr. HANBURY, continuing, said, that showed he had had very considerable experience, and yet he declared he could see no advantage in having both Sheerness and Chatham, and the establishment charge of £80,000 a year might well be saved. He came next to another dockyard, about which Professor Elgar said he would like someone to tell him what was the reason for its existence. He referred to Haulbowline. [Nationalist cries of "Oh!" and groans.] He fully expected those groans; but in these matters political considerations ought not to exist, either as regarded labour, or as to the number of dockyards which ought to be maintained. Perhaps some of the hon. Members below the Gangway would give reasons for maintaining that dockyard, which really had never been completed. He had only one further comment to make. Dockyards ought to be kept for National purposes, and not used, directly or indirectly, for gaining votes for any particular Party, as he was afraid had been the case in the past, and as had recently been admitted to be the case in French dockyards. He hoped that in future such considerations would not be allowed to influence the policy of the Government. Certainly most of the dockyard seats were held by supporters of the present Administration, and he hoped the result would be that plenty of work would be given to the dockyards, so that sufficient employment would be found for the men, and they would have no repetition of those complaints of idleness for which there had been so much cause of complaint in recent years. Now that the Government had every reason for giving good work to the dockyards, he hoped they would not allow the old tendencies of Liberal Governments to prevail, but would do their best to keep the Navy up to the high standard of efficiency which was maintained by the late Government, and which certainly had the effect of raising the reputation of the late Government very highly in the opinion of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,000."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

*LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I understand that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. E. Robertson) proposes, on the next sub-section of this Vote, to make a statement with regard to certain alterations respecting the pay of the various branches of employés in the dockyards. If he does that, it is quite clear that the discussion will naturally drift to the important question of what wages are, and will be, at the dockyards. I am anxious, before we get to that subject, to raise the question of the shipbuilding policy of the Government. I have placed an Amendment on the Notice Paper for the purpose of specially calling attention to that part of the Vote which relates to new shipbuilding; but this part of the Vote applies to the salaries of all the officers who are interested in the superintendence of new construction; and, therefore, I think it will economise time if I take this opportunity of speaking to the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The two great branches of Naval Expenditure which always require special attention in this House is that which relates to the provision of men and officers, and that which concerns the provision of material. As far as the first great branch is concerned, the present Board of Admiralty have, I believe, done their best to give effect to the policy of the late Board, and I have no complaint whatever to make on that point, except that I think they have taken scarcely sufficient funds. But when I pass to the shipbuilding programme, particularly that part of it which relates to the new scheme, I am bound to say I am more than confirmed in the opinion I have already expressed on two occasions that Her Majesty's Government have taken insufficient funds this year for the accomplishment of the object in view. I stated that they were at least £200,000 short of the total amount, and only to-day we have Papers distributed to us which show that my estimate was a correct one, because they contain the striking announcement that the laying down of one of the few big ships Her Majesty's Government proposed to lay down this year, and which really form the mainstay of the shipbuilding programme, is to be postponed. I was somewhat sceptical at the time as to the accuracy of the statement made by the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) that they are spending more this year than last year. I have since investigated the matter, and find that he is in error. Of course, it is not of much importance, but it is material in showing that the Financial Secretary is under an erroneous impression. Pages 174 and 175 of the Estimates show that the total amount of new construction for 1893-4 is £2,398,606, whilst the amount last year was £2,443,321, showing an excess over the provision this year of £45,000. When we turn to the next item, "reconstruction and repairs"—and the two classes of expenditure must go together—we find that the amount last year was £901,000, against £796,000 this year, showing a diminution of £105,000. There is thus a total deficiency of £150,000, compared with the provision of the preceding year. My complaint of the present Board of Admiralty is not merely that the funds they have provided are insufficient, but that they have shown an indecision and a procrastination in making up their minds as to what they are going to do, which is, perhaps, worse than the other fault. The present Board have been good enough to speak in commendatory terms of the policy of the late Board, and to inform the House that they are carrying out their policy. That is not the case, and I think that if a steady reversal of the policy of the preceding Government is going on the sooner the fact is known the better. I must ask the Committee to allow me to speak at some little length on this point, because I regard this as the most important Debate we have had on shipbuilding since the introduction of the Naval Defence Act. The principle which underlays that Act was that the naval strength of this country should be equivalent to the combined strength of any two foreign Navies. That was no new principle. Various First Lords of the Admiralty expressed that opinion before I did, but none of them took practical steps to carry it out. The policy assented to by Parliament in that Act was that, hereafter, the expenditure on the Navy should be conducted in accordance with a certain standard, and not be controlled by the personal vagaries of those who happen to be in Office, or the casual financial exigencies of the moment. The standard was to be based on the wants of the country, which were to be regulated by the expenditure on foreign Navies. The obligation to maintain the Navy at a strength equal to the establishment of two foreign countries did not come to an end with the Naval Defence Act of 1889. That Act was merely the form in which effect was given to the principle. After consultation with the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, we came to a decision as to the number of fresh ships it was necessary to at once add to the Navy for the purpose of bringing it up to the required standard. We charged that amount to the Consolidated Fund. We kept upon the Estimates which were annually presented to Parliament the amount which, in our judgment, was necessary to make good the wear and tear of the establishments, and also to meet any of the augmented expenditure which might be sanctioned by foreign countries. The policy to which the late House of Commons gave its ready assent, and to which, I believe, this House of Commons would give its assent, was that the sum of money annually necessary to meet the waste of the Navy should be sacred from the attacks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Treasury of the day. The Naval Defence Act was a warning to him that that was the last branch of expenditure which in times of depression ought to be attacked. The Naval Defence Act was much criticised by gentlemen opposite; but I think no one will deny its great success. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury)—who has, I think, always been an impartial critic of Naval Administration and Expenditure—has expressed the opinion that the principles laid down in that Act have been carried out efficiently and economically. We contended when the Act was introduced that it would result in a rapid and continuous progress of construction; that it would prevent ill-considered alterations in design, and would lead to a much closer adherence to the Estimates than was the case under the older and more dilatory system. Those expectations have been realised. No doubt there has been an increase of our original Estimates, but they can be easily and satisfactorily explained. The total excess over the sum allotted by the Naval Defence Act to shipbuilding is £1,127,000; but, on the other hand, there has been a saving of £442,000, making the total excess £685,610. That excess was not due to misapplication or improvident Estimates. During the operation of the Naval Defence Act, the wages of dockyard artificers were considerably raised, and consequently an expenditure of £170,000 was incurred. We also had to provide a sum of £150,000 to meet the provision of boats and small craft attached to big vessels. That class of expenditure had never before been included in new construction; but, inasmuch as the Naval Defence Act contemplated that the ships mentioned in it were to be fully equipped and completed for sea, the Auditor and Controller General had held that the cost of those boats must be provided under the Act. Deducting these two unforeseen excesses, the total excesses came to only £365,000, and for that we gained an advantage in the increased size of the older vessels. I think we may fairly say that the fact that there is an excess of only £365,000 on a gross expenditure of £21,000,000 reflects great credit on the permanent officials of the Admiralty. The work under the Naval Defence Act was largely diminished in 1892. That was a somewhat critical period in the shipbuilding history of this country. Unfortunately, in that year a General Election took place, and a change occurred. The new Board of Admiralty, no doubt, found themselves in a position of some difficulty. They had to master a large number of complicated facts, ranging over several years. They had, moreover, the misfortune to have to deal with several serious accidents which befel several of the larger ships of the Navy, and their attention was naturally distracted by these accidents, and by the Court Martials which followed. They had a further disadvantage, in which I fully sympathise, for they had to deal with a Chancellor of the Exchequer having a falling Revenue without having any Act of Parliament behind them to protect them. At the beginning of 1892, I was urged by several of my naval friends to try an elaborate and fresh scheme of naval shipbuilding, for the purpose of gradually taking the place of that which was then lapsing. I felt, however, it would be hardly proper to undertake such a task on the eve of a General Election. If that Election had gone favourably for the Government of the day, we should have been able to elaborate our own scheme, and to push it on with rapidity. If, on the other hand, the Election had gone against us, and a great scheme had been left for our successors to deal with, they might fairly and legitimately have said that they could hardly make themselves responsible for a scheme in which they had not been consulted about, the whole expenditure of which they would have to bear. Accordingly, I abstained from laying before the House any large scheme. I made the most careful investigations, however, as to what was necessary, and I laid before the House a modest programme, for the purpose of making good for one year only the wear and tear of the Fleet. The following is the language in which I described that programme in a Memorandum I laid before the House:—

"The new programme commencing modestly, comprising at present only three battleships and 10 torpedo boats, but in the course of the next 12 months I propose to extend and elaborate a much larger scheme for submission to Parliament next year, so that the material may be bought and the arrangements made for a fresh start early in 1893-4."

Before I left Office I placed on record, both privately and publicly, what were the intentions of the late Board of Admiralty. Those intentions were to lay down three fresh battleships in the year just terminated, and to lay down two more in the present year. The present Board of Admiralty have been in Office for a considerable period. During that period they have had plenty of opportunity of elaborating their plans, and laying before Parliament their shipbuilding scheme. I am bound to say that, making all allowances for the difficulties they have had to encounter, singularly little work has been done in the 12 months. I was anxious not to embarrass my successors in embarking on any expenditure which the Estimate I left behind me would not meet; but the Board of Admiralty of the late Government were absolutely unanimous in the opinions at which they arrived. These opinions were that the number of battleships I proposed for last year and this year were the minimum necessary to keep the Fleet up to the strength which the Board had fixed. I cannot admit that any change of opinion has occurred since on the part of my old Naval Colleagues; and if there has been any change of policy, it must be owing to the change of Government, and to the fact that there is a different civilian element now associated with the First Lord of the Admiralty. It is a very difficult task to adjust and dovetail a new shipbuilding programme into an old one. It is sound policy to try and keep your expenditure from year to year as even as possible, and to keep the dockyards at the same level with as few fluctuations as possible. Therefore, to fit a new shipbuilding programme into an old one requires a great deal of care, and the closest possible supervision of details; and unless this is done, and a scheme is mapped out for years to come, inevitable financial disturbance would subsequently occur, and will result either in wholesale discharges at the dockyards or in very large increase of the Estimates. I looked very carefully into the weak parts of our Navy, and I found that a great addition which the Naval Defence Act had made to the strength of the Navy had given us a superiority as far as cruisers were concerned. But foreign nations had laid down a very considerable number of battleships; and it was necessary, if we wished to keep pace with them, that we should add considerably to the number of battleships we are building. I also found that we are short of torpedo boats, and that the number of small crafts we possessed contrasted very unfavourably with those of certain foreign nations. I proposed, as far as I could, to remedy these deficiencies by laying down the battleships I have mentioned, and by placing orders for the provision of a certain number of torpedo boats. Twelve months have elapsed since the present Board of Admiralty came into Office. I do not know whether they are aware how invaluable that time would have been had proper use been made of it. As it is, the result of nothing material having been done—no doubt from the causes I have mentioned—has been unquestionably to put us in this position: that unless a strong and determined effort is now made in two or three years our supremacy will undoubtedly be endangered, and certainly wholesale discharges will have to take place at the dockyards. It has often been said that our strength is so great that the loss of a ship or two is immaterial, and that we can afford to pass it by without making immediate efforts to replace it. If the Committee will be good enough to give me their attention, I think I shall be able to show that this is altogether an illusion. I made a most careful analysis before I left the Admiralty of the strength of the British Navy and of the Foreign Naval Powers, and we were fortunate enough to arrive at the unanimous decision as to the different classes of vessels at home and abroad for the purpose of accurate analysis and comparison. That classification was the basis of the statement I made in 1892-3, and I assume it is still in force, because I cannot believe that any change of Government could in any way have resulted in the repudiation of the classification unanimously accepted by the experts when I was at the Admiralty. Taking that classification we found that, so far as second-class cruisers and smaller vessels are concerned, we have an unquestioned superiority over the combined vessels of any two Powers. When we come to first-class cruisers and armoured cruisers we have a slight superiority over the combined forces of any two Powers. But the essential part of the matter, and that on which our superiority depends, is the relation in which our battleships stand to other battleships. Nothing has been more clearly proved by that distinguished naval writer Captain Mahon, and nothing is more clearly accepted by naval men of all countries than that, comparatively speaking, little damage can be done to the commerce of any nation as long as its fighting power is supreme at sea. But let it once lose that battle for supremacy at sea, and the loss cannot in any way be compensated by any number of cruisers. Therefore it is most essential, when we talk of our strength as compared with that of foreign nations, that we should be perfectly clear in regard to the vessels which will have to bear the brunt of the fray. Taking the coast-defence vessels, and comparing them with those of the two most powerful naval nations, Russia and France, we find ourselves in a position of inferiority. Then we come to second-class and first-class battleships. I am in a difficulty in dealing with them, because I cannot allude to documents of a confidential character. But Lord Brassey is good enough to give to the public an annual which is of very great value, and which is extremely accurate and carefully done. I will take the battleships of England, France, and Russia, as given by Lord Brassey, for the purpose of emphasising my argument that at present we have not that superiority in battleships which many people imagine. We undertook that in 1894 there should be a superiority; but what we have now to look at is not 1894-5, but the years subsequent to that date, and it is from that point of view that I ask the Committee to allow me to somewhat closely analyse the figures. Lord Brassey, on pages 202 to 204 of this year's Naval Annual, gives the present number of first-class battleships belonging to England at 35, whilst France's number is 16, and Russia's 11. In the case of second-class battleships England has 13, against 14 for France, and four for Russia. I agree with the numbers, but I differ altogether from the classification. If the classification be an accurate one, and according to most modern ideas, a very large reduction has at once to be made in the assumed superiority of first-class English battleships. There are certain criteria by which first-class battleships are to be judged. They must have great offensive and defensive power, and the offensive power should consist of speed and powerful armament, and the tendency of modern times is to attach more importance to secondary or subsidiary armament than to guns of a large calibre, because the rapidity of fire of the smaller guns is such that their fire can be concentrated into any given area with great effect. For the purpose of defence the vessel should be defended by armour, affording protection both to the hull, guns and gunners. Vessels deficient in these attributes cannot be classified as first-class battleships. I have, therefore, in the first place, out of the list of 35, taken the five échelon turret ships, Agamemnon, Ajax, Inflexible, Edinburgh, and Colossus. Three of these vessels are very slow, and none of them have any subsidiary armament which is in any way protected; and when we look at their fighting qualities, compared with those of other vessels of later date, it is impossible to classify them as first-class modern battleships. Then we have to deduct four more, the Devastation, Thunderer, Dreadnought, and Vulture, all excellent vessels of their time, but which, again, are somewhat antiquated in their disposition of armaments, and none of which have any subsidiary armaments. Then there are three more, the Alexander, Superb, and Téméraire, two of which were excellent broadside vessels at the date at which they were built; but, so far as their armaments are concerned, they have muzzle-loaders some 15 years old; and the third is another powerful cruiser which did not come within the first-class. These three vessels certainly ought not to come in the category of first-class modern battleships. In addition to these 12 has to be added the Victoria, which was recently lost. If you deduct these 13 vessels from the 35 here enumerated, you only get 22 as the present total number of first-class battleships appertaining to England which are both built and being built. I apply exactly the same test to the French and Russian ships. Out of the list of 16 French ships given by Lord Brassey, only one, the Redoubtable, can be struck out. That brings the first-class battleships of France to 15; and applying the same test to the Russian vessels, there is only one that can be eliminated from the 11—namely, Peter the Great, leaving 10 first-class belonging to Russia; so that we find, applying an accurate classification and test to the battleships belonging to the chief Powers, that England has only 22 as against 15 for France and 10 for Russia, making a combined total for the two Powers of 25 against our 22. Of course, these 12 vessels which I have taken out of the category of first-class battleships can be added to the list of second-class battleships; and the result of my calculations, which formed the basis of my Estimates last year, is that, whilst our second-class battleships and coast-defence vessels may be put on an equality with the second-class battleships and coast-defence vessels of the two Powers, we are three short as regards first-class battleships, comparing the number at our disposal with those of two Powers in combination. How is it that we are three battleships short? For this simple reason: The present Board of Admiralty declined to commence two battleships which the late Admiralty Board added, and we have lost the Victoria. If the policy of the late Board had been carried out, and we had not lost the Victoria, we should only just have had an equality of 25 battleships compared with the two combined Powers; but as our ships were larger, and we build more rapidly, we might say we had a certain superiority. But a further division has to be made in the battleships. At the present moment we have this disadvantage: Out of the 22 vessels, we have 19 either afloat or in the last stage of revision, while France has 10 and Russia five in that condition. The weakness of our position is that, while these Powers have 10 vessels building, we have only three. Therefore, unless the present Board of Admiralty set to work resolutely and increase the number of battleships proposed to be laid down, in two or three years we shall be in a position of inferiority. I do not know whether this is intentional or not, but the action or inaction of the Board has not been in accordance with their statements in Parliament. Lord Spencer, in his statement, enumerated the reasons which influenced him in laying down new ships in 1893-4. He said—

“In 1893-4 it is proposed to lay down in the dockyards some new ships in order to maintain the strength of the Navy with a due regard to the ships in course of construction by other Naval Powers, and to the actual waste which goes on in our own ships.”

Since that Memorandum was written the Victoria has been lost, and questions have been put both in this House and in the House of Lords as to whether it is the intention of the Government to replace that ship. The reply in each case has been that our margin of superiority is such that it is not necessary to take notice of a single ship. But we have no superiority; and if the principle is to make good actual waste, how much more necessary is it to replace a ship that has suddenly disappeared. What is going on abroad? There has been an increase in the French Estimates this year of £675,000 for construction and repairs, and Russia is spending £160,000 more than last year; but our Estimates under this head are £150,000 less than last year. Therefore, it is self-evident that Lord Spencer has not adhered to the reasons given by him as influencing his shipbuilding policy, and that we are most unquestionably going backward. Among the Papers issued to-day is one giving the designs of two cruisers, and it is stated at the close of the Paper that it is not proposed to go on with one of them this year. Why? £57,000 was taken in these Estimates for the purpose of commencing that cruiser. The reason is that the money is wanted for something else.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Will the noble Lord read the reasons given in the Statement?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The reason given is that during the present financial year it is intended to advance more rapidly than was at first intended the construction of 14 new torpedo-boat destroyers provided in the programme. [Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Hear, hear!] But I am afraid these new torpedo-boat destroyers were not to be commenced until some of the ships which had preceded them had been completed, tried, and tested. Have they been tested? No; therefore, it is perfectly clear that this is a mere reason to cover the position taken up at the beginning of the year by the Admiralty.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The noble Lord has no right to assume that.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have a right to assume that the Admiralty mean what they say. I have a right to assume that when the Admiralty published Estimates, which for months were on the Table of the House, they intended to adhere to them. What is the amount taken for each of the torpedo-boats? £3,000, and it is intended to spend a little more than £3,000.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The noble Lord has no right to put in the words "a little more."

LORD G. HAMILTON: The words that are used are that these vessels will be advanced somewhat more rapidly, and I assume from that that a somewhat larger expenditure will be incurred than this £3,000, which does not in any way meet the sum which is taken from the new constructions, and which I do not believe will be altogether devoted to the more rapid construction of these vessels.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the intention of the Government was what might easily have been inferred from the Paper laid before Parliament—namely, to devote what was saved from postponing one of the cruisers to pushing on more rapidly these torpedo boats.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to give me the latest form of the Estimates. In these there is a statement relating to these 14 vessels, and it appears that the orders for these vessels have not yet been placed. I understood—and I think the Financial Secretary will not contradict me—that these vessels were not to be placed out until a trial had been made of the vessels laid down last year. Am I correct?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The noble Lord is speaking under an entire misapprehension. It is intended at once—and the first steps have already been taken—to place these orders. It is necessary to push on these torpedo destroyers rather than the second of the new cruisers, and the money proposed to be spent this year upon one new cruiser will be spent upon these torpedo-destroyers.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Wait until the end of the financial year, and I think it will be then found that £57,000 will not be entirely absorbed by the torpedo boats to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes. But I have not yet done with the finances of the Admiralty. The Howe is being repaired night and day. I believe the Estimate for her repairs is very large—I assume £40,000 or £50,000. Where does that money come from? There is no provision whatever in the Estimates for repairs to the Howe; therefore, the money must be taken from some other purpose for which it has been appropriated and devoted to another purpose not stated in the Estimates. When the Naval Defence Act was under discussion my hon. Friends on this side the House will recollect that one of the arguments used by gentlemen who sat on that (the Government) side of the House was that they should not take away from Parliament the control over the Naval Expenditure. All the gentlemen who made use of that argument were, as a rule, ex-Treasury officials, and what they meant by Parliamentary control was Treasury interference. Just let us contrast the position the House is in with regard to these Estimates with the position it was in as regards the Estimates prepared under the Naval Defence Act. In every single case under the Naval Defence Act it was necessary to lay before them full details of all designs of ships before the House would assent to and give sanction to their commencement and prosecution, and every year there was an exact statement made with regard to every single vessel, and the expenditure once sanctioned could not be appropriated to any other purpose whatever. After the Admiralty had been a year in Office they proposed to transfer the expenditure, according to the statement of the Financial Secretary, to one cruiser to take the place of the battleships. We gave way as regards the battleship; and the Board of Admiralty having laid down that it was absolutely essential five battleships should be commenced in the two financial years, the present Board of Admiralty converted that five into three, and two cruisers, and now one is converted into a torpedo-boat. It seems to me that the Board of Admiralty have not thoroughly known their own mind, and an indecision and vacillation have characterised their proceedings which, I am afraid, will be very detrimental to the Dockyard Establishments. Now, Sir, let me recapitulate what changes have taken place since the late Board of Admiralty left. We proposed to lay down three battleships last year. One only has been laid down. Two battleships, it was arranged, were to be commenced in November last, and the present Board postponed this undertaking until March. Since then they have postponed the other two battleships, which, I believe, have not been commenced yet, and to-day we got very good designs of two new battleships—the Majestic and the Magnificent—which were practically assented to in all their main features 12 months ago, and when I left the Admiralty I placed it on record that these designs would be ready in three months. If the Admiralty considered it necessary to begin three battleships last year and two this year, why have they delayed this necessary work? If these designs had been presented to Parliament earlier, of course the ships would have been commenced earlier. A large sum is taken in these Estimates for the commencement and construction of the Magnificent. Does the Financial Secretary think that money will be spent? The amount is £180,000, and in order to spend that money the vessel ought to have been commenced in the summer months, when the working hours are longer. April, May, June, July, and August have passed over, and, as far as I am informed, that vessel has not been commenced yet. You will not, therefore, be able to spend that money, which can be appropriated to other services, which was not the case under the Naval Defence Act. Looking through the Estimates, I can come to no other conclusion than that the Board of Admiralty took insufficient funds in the first instance. This is a year of great financial depression, and I think they have had the heavy hand of the Treasury upon them, and have been compelled to divert sums from their original purpose. This is a somewhat technical matter; but there is another branch of the subject which may, perhaps, interest gentlemen present even more than that I have already mentioned, and that is, what will be the result of this delay and procrastination upon the Dockyard Establishments? I will leave my right hon. Friend (Mr. Forwood) to deal with this subject, because he has made a calculation with reference to every detail of every ship which it is proposed to lay down. The Committee will bear in mind that new constructions vary very much in the proportion of material and the amount of labour they require in the different stages. The new ships, in the first stage of construction, require a large amount of material and employ a small amount of labour. In the middle stage the material corresponds to the labour, but in the final stage a small amount of material employs a large amount of labour. If the Committee will look at page 174 of the Estimates, I can there make my meaning and contention very clear to them. Roughly speaking, the wages of an artificer in the dockyards amount to about £70 or £75 a year. I will take it at £70, because that is a convenient figure. If you divide £100,000 of wages by 70 it gives 1,450 men. If the Committee will bear those figures in mind, they will see that the total amount of new constructions, so far as payment of labour is concerned, is £833,000. If £100,000 of wages employs 1,450 men, £833,000 will employ about 12,000 men, and these 12,000 men constitute the great bulk of the Dockyard Establishment. Of these 12,000 men and of these wages of £833,000, 10,000 men, or £697,000, are engaged in the final stages of the work of the ships under the Naval Defence Act, and £136,000, or 2,000 men, are employed on new constructions as to which I am blaming the Admiralty for not more rapidly advancing. If the Committee will look at the third column, they will see the amount of material which has been issued in order to employ these men. They will see that £300,000 of material employs 10,000 men in the final stage, and that an issue of £290,000—which is practically almost the same amount—only employs 2,000 men in the first stage of shipbuilding. Next year nearly the whole of your labour will be taken out of the category of completed ships and put in the first category—that of commencing ships. I have made a calculation, and I find that only 2,000 men out of 10,000 are employed under the Naval Defence Act, and can be employed in that work, and that 8,000 men, or £500,000, will have to be transferred to the other stage of shipbuilding—namely, the construction. These 8,000 men, representing in wages £500,000, require at least £1,000,000 worth of material to keep them in employment, and the inevitable result will be, either there will have to be wholesale discharges of dockyard men or the bills for materials must run up by hundreds of thousands of pounds. I am not making this statement hastily. My right hon. Friend and I have had a great deal of experience in dockyard matters, and we were compelled during the time we were at the Admiralty to watch personally, month after month, the state of employment and how the issue of material corresponded with the amount of labour. What the present Board of Admiralty ought to have done was to have pushed to their utmost the new constructions, and possibly have delayed that other part of the work—namely, the completion, which gives so large an amount of employment in proportion to the material which is used. The dockyards at the last Election voted against the Party to which I belong because we did not accede to certain requests of theirs, but still I think we could guarantee them—I personally could—that there should be no wholesale discharge of men. There might possibly have been a gradual reduction of numbers which could have been effected by stopping the entries, but I never contemplated anything like wholesale discharges.

THE CHAIRMAN (interposing), observed that he scarcely thought this matter arose on the present Vote.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Item A includes the whole superintendent staff—Admirals, Inspectors, and shipwrights, and all those who check labour and issue materials. I only wish to speak once, and I thought it better to raise my point now. Some six or seven years ago there was some dissatisfaction in connection with the dockyards. I had the unpleasant task of revising them, and the discharge of a considerable number of workmen was inevitable. That was a most unpleasant duty for me, and there is none I should be more unwilling to undertake again. But unless the Admiralty considerably accelerate their new constructions, I am perfectly confident that in the course of a year or two their policy will lead to extreme difficulty in giving employment to the bulk of the men in the Dockyard Establishments, and, therefore, the result of the delay of the Government and the Board of Admiralty in starting the new scheme of construction and pushing it on will not only endanger our supremacy two or three years hence and bring us below the standard of strength which four years ago was deliberately fixed by Parliament, and which ought to be maintained, but will also result in great disorganisation in our dockyards. When we consider how admirably the Dockyard Establishments have responded to the calls made upon them—what they have effected by economy and the excellent work they perform—I do think it behoves the Admiralty to look very closely into this matter, and do everything so far as they now can which will prevent the results which I anticipate. I am rather surprised the Financial Secretary should not have taken my observations in a kindly spirit, as my experience at the Admiralty—and I think it was the experience of all who came here to represent the great spending Departments in the late Government—my experience was that observations of a much more hostile character were addressed to us. I certainly wish to speak—not so much in a tone of censure as in that of an adviser—and the suggestions I have to make I make in all seriousness. I suggest to the Admiralty that they should bring in a Supplementary Estimate for the purpose of making good the expenditure upon the Howe which was never anticipated.

AN hon. MEMBER: And one for the Victoria.

LORD G. HAMILTON: And, in addition, a Supplementary Estimate for the purpose of replacing the Victoria by a new battleship. The designs of battleships which have been laid on the Table of the House, are, in my judgment, quite satisfactory, and I think we might well build one more. I also press on the Admiralty the necessity of going on with the great cruiser if they attach importance to it. Personally. I do not see the necessity of building so many torpedo-vessels and torpedo-catchers. There is no doubt we were deficient in regard to such vessels; but it should be borne in mind that the torpedo-boat is the weapon not of the stronger, but of the weaker, Power; and I think it is far more necessary to build larger vessels than to concentrate our attention on the small vessels which, in any emergency, could be built in a very short time. There is one other subject which, before sitting down, I would say a word or two upon. It is in relation to our shipbuilding programme. The object of every Board of Admiralty is, or ought to be, to so arrange the shipbuilding programme year by year as to make good all wear and tear. Well, I take the list going back three years. In 1891-2 70,000 tons in the shape of new ships were added to the Navy; in 1892-3 110,000 tons; in the present year, 1893-4, 170,000 tons; in 1894-5 40,000 tons are to be added; and in 1895-6 18,000 tons. Yet, Sir, this year, 1895-6, is the year in which, as far as I can judge, the greatest addition of battleships is to be made to other Navies. I think we have cause for complaint in the fact that the Returns moved for months ago have only just been presented—some of them on Saturday, and some only this morning. In the absence of information, I find it difficult to express an opinion on some matters—upon the building of the great cruiser, for instance. I understand it is to be the largest vessel ever built for the British Navy. Its displacement is to be 14,000 tons; but it is to carry, if necessary, 1,500 tons of extra coal, which will make its displacement, when full, 15,500 tons. I am very doubtful whether it is necessary to go to this great size in a cruiser. I have never been in favour of a slavish imitation of the ships built by foreign nations, unless the conditions and circumstances which prompt the building of such vessels are the same in each case. Russia is building enormous cruisers, and those vessels have an enormous coal-carrying capacity. But why is it necessary for Russia to build vessels with gigantic coal-carrying capacity? For the simple reason that if she ever went to war, and those vessels were to prey on the commerce of her enemy, she has only one coaling station, and that is at the other end of the world. We, on the contrary, have got many coaling stations; and, therefore, it is not necessary for us to have ships with unusual coal-carrying capacity. I do not object to the armament or to the speed; but it does seem to me to be, especially at a time when the Board of Admiralty are short of money, and are deliberately postponing the construction of vessels which preceding Boards wished to lay down—it does seem a rather curious policy to indulge in the luxury of this enormous and costly cruiser. I am more in favour of long vessels, and I think it is a little reflection on the designers at the Admiralty that we had never yet been able to get a vessel constructed with a greater length than 380 feet. The building of this new vessel indicates an entire departure in naval policy. Hitherto it has been the practice to spend a limited sum on cruisers, and not to put very many men in a vessel which necessarily is not protected by armour. This new vessel will have a complement of 600 to 700 men. When the Admiralty adopt a new course and a change of policy, it is very desirable that the reasons which induce them to do that should be fully stated. I think the money in this case might be spent to better advantage. I will now conclude my observations.

AN hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

LORD G. HAMILTON: I hope that, as the House is supposed to be composed of gentlemen, people will try and behave as such. I hope the Board of Admiralty will seriously consider the proposal I have made.

I am confident a Supplementary Estimate is necessary, and that if one should be laid on the Table the great bulk of the House would assent to it. The introduction of such an Estimate would be a clear indication that the present Board of Admiralty are, both in spirit and in substance, giving effect to the policy of the Naval Defence Act, while the absence of such an Estimate shows that there is a departure in the naval policy of the country—a reversal of that naval policy which at the last Election met with the almost unanimous approval of the people.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Perhaps it would be convenient if I were to follow the noble Lord in the comments he has made. I may at once state the view of the Board of Admiralty—which is that they have done their best to pursue that which is so desirable in the interest of the country—namely, a thorough continuity of naval policy. The noble Lord, in one or two portions of his speech, referred to the Naval Advisers. The noble Lord must be aware that no Board of Admiralty, no civilians coming to the Admiralty, can disregard the advice of their Naval Advisers; and the course the present Board are taking is one in which they have the concurrence of their Naval Advisers. They have acted in thorough concert with their advisers; and a large portion of the observations of the noble Lord has, therefore, been based on an entire misapprehension. The noble Lord suggests that a Supplementary Estimate should be brought in. It is a very easy thing to make such a suggestion when in Opposition; but the noble Lord must know how difficult it is for a Minister to propose and pass a Supplementary Estimate.

LORD G. HAMILTON: When the Sultan went down we brought in a Supplementary Estimate.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am perfectly well aware of that; but it is easy for him in Opposition to say “bring in a Supplementary Estimate.” It is not easy, and it is not always necessary, for a Government to bring in a Supplementary Estimate. With respect to the expenditure on the Howe, I am happy to say the salvage of the Howe was conducted not only with great skill, but at extremely small cost. The expenditure on that vessel is probably very much less than the noble Lord imagines. It can be met from that margin which there always is upon repairs for ships. It can be met without any postponement of that shipbuilding which the noble Lord and the present Board has at heart.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): What is the amount?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The amount that will be expended at Chatham on the repair of the Howe is estimated at about £40,000.

MR. FORWOOD: And in Spain?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Well, as regards Spain, we have not yet got the account from the Spanish Government. £35,000 was spent on salvage; but the Spanish Government, with great liberality, put their dry dock at our disposal without any charge. I see by the newspapers to-day that the charge amounts to a certain number of pesetas; but the Admiralty have no information upon that subject. The noble Lord also suggests a Supplementary Estimate in respect to the loss of the Victoria. Surely this would be an admission that the naval strength of this country, after all the efforts of the noble Lord, after all the policy of the late Government, after the Naval Defence Act, is so dangerously low, that the unfortunate loss of one ship compels the Government to come at once to the House and say—“We must ask for money to build another ship.” The Board of Admiralty do not think it necessary to rush at once to the House of Commons and ask for money to build a new ship; but the fact that the strength of the Navy is less by one battleship has already been carefully considered and taken into account in connection with the future programme. Then the noble Lord condemns the Admiralty for not going on with both the two great cruisers, while, in the next breath, he throws doubt on the policy of building such vessels at all. My answer to the noble Lord on that point is that the very same Advisers who advised him when at the Admiralty differ from him in that opinion. Not only is the opinion of those now at the Admiralty favourable to the building of these cruisers, but also the opinion of Lord Hood, than whom there is no greater authority in the country. Seeing what is going on in the shipbuilding of other nations, it is imperative that a cruiser should be built which would be superior to any being built in foreign countries. The noble Lord, in a manner not quite worthy of him, declines to believe us when we say that we shall spend the money saved by postponing one cruiser on pushing on the torpedo-boat destroyers. I think he might have accepted the assurance which I gave him across the Table. He also complains that the money is to be spent for this particular purpose of hastening the completion of the torpedo-boat destroyers. The Board of Admiralty are advised and convinced that one of the most urgent needs of this country is to have torpedo-boat destroyers. The noble Lord says the torpedo-boat is the weapon of the weaker State. That being so, the torpedo-boat has to be met. There are many who hold the opinion that the right way to meet torpedo-boats is by torpedo-boats. But we are advised, as the noble Lord was advised, that they should be met by larger vessels. The noble Lord is responsible for a large number of so-called torpedo-catchers, but they do not answer their purpose. They might be able to catch them in a rough sea, but in a smooth sea they are not capable of it. It is absolutely necessary for the security of the country that we should have torpedo-boat destroyers which would be capable of dealing with a swarm of torpedo-boats issuing from foreign ports. Having got to an advanced stage in the construction of six of these destroyers, we have considerable confidence that they will possess the qualities expected of them, and that we shall have the class of weapon that is wanted in the defence of the country—the weapon that is necessary to secure our interests.

MR. HANBURY : How many of them will be required ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I will give full information later in the evening on any details.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) : Will you use the same boiler as now ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : A different type of boiler has been introduced. Greater knowledge has been obtained from the experience of foreign nations in tubulous boilers. Boilers of that kind will be introduced in some of the vessels intended to cope with torpedo-boats ; and we hope, by means of these destroyers, to be able to supply a weapon which, as I have said, is absolutely necessary for the defence of the country, and which is now wanting. I will now follow the noble Lord through some of the other statements in his speech. The noble Lord has suggested that insufficient Estimates have been brought in. He has made that suggestion before ; but the more the experience of the year goes on, the more satisfied we are that our Estimates are sufficient for the year's work. The noble Lord complains that we are not spending sufficient on new construction, but under that head we are spending about the same figure that the noble Lord spent last year—indeed, rather more. The noble Lord accuses the present Board of procrastination, and of a reversal of a policy of the late Board. We have been guilty neither of procrastination nor of a reversal of policy. It is contended by the noble Lord that he provided in the Estimates of 1892-3 for two battleships, and that the present Board did not proceed with them until this year. But how much did the noble Lord provide for these ships ? £30,000 for one, and about £15,000 for the other—a mere commencement. The present Government are now providing £179,500 for one and £81,900 for the other ! Then the noble Lord might have referred to the great efforts that are now being made to push on the completion of the battleships for which he was responsible. The Admiralty hopes to complete them all in the course of the present financial year. Surely that ought to have the noble Lord's commendation. Of those ships the Hood has gone out to the Mediterranean, the Empress of India is completed already, the Ramillies will be completed in September ; it is hoped that the Resolution will be completed in September, the Centurion in January, and the Royal Oak, the Revenge, the Repulse, and the Barfleur will all be completed, we hope, within the financial year. Yet the noble Lord tells us we are doing nothing to continue the policy of our predecessors ! I think, after what I have shown, I am justified in saying that the line he has taken is unjust and unfair, and not consistent with the facts of the case. The noble Lord gave some figures, comparing our ships with those of foreign nations. I cannot accept generally his figures. In construction of battleships we are holding our own, but, no doubt, if we are to go on holding our own, we must go on building, and I am not sorry that the noble Lord has called public attention to that necessity. I may safely say that we have so far done our best to strengthen the Navy and maintain it at its proper efficiency. The noble Lord must be perfectly well aware of the programme that he left behind him. As the noble Lord has brought this matter forward, I feel justified in pointing out that we are closely following the programme with respect to battleships left by the late Board of Admiralty. I will not give the exact figures to the Committee unless the noble Lord challenges me, because he may have some objection to their production; but I may say that we are constructing already a very considerable proportion of the battleships which he proposed to construct between the time that programme was drawn up in 1892 and April, 1898. We have already in hand three battleships out of those mentioned in that programme, and we propose to go on very much on the lines of the programme, always remembering that we have lost one great battleship. That fact will not be lost sight of. I think the noble Lord, remembering what we have got on record as his own programme till 1898, ought not to have treated so severely what we are now doing. The noble Lord said he laid before the House, after the operation of the Naval Defence Act had come to an end, a modest programme for one year, and he made an apology for not passing another Naval Defence Act. I think the new Board may be excused for doing in their first year very much what he did, for the year after the Naval Defence Act, for shipbuilding. I will not now enter into the subject whether there should be a Naval Defence Act or not. He knows that on that subject we do not agree with him. We may, however, fairly claim that we are doing much the same as he did. Like him, we are laying a modest programme for one year before the House. As to the question of labour in the dockyards, I think that will come much more conveniently under Sub-head B. We are now discussing the salaries of the officers. I may say, however, that the noble Lord's calculations on the subject of dockyard labour are, as far as I know, entirely fallacious. We have a most careful Controller of the Navy who has given the most attentive study to the question of providing continuous employment in the dockyards and avoiding large discharges, and it is our intention to give continuous employment and not to have large discharges.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): No discharges are anticipated?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: No, Sir; but I believe this question will be better discussed on Sub-head B. There is no intention of making discharges; in fact, our policy is entirely the opposite. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) asked me a certain number of questions which I hope he will excuse me for dealing with very shortly. I cannot agree with him that it is desirable to alter the present system by which contract ships are finished in the dockyards. I think the noble Lord opposite would have a good deal to say on that subject. My hon. Friend is very inconsistent, because a very few minutes after he had been arguing against giving work on the contract ships to the dockyards he spoke in favour of keeping the dockyards in full work. With respect to guns and gun-mountings, I must reserve my observations for Vote 9. When the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hanbury) sat on the Committee some years ago, he learnt that there was a great deal to be desired; but I do not think that he will find that ships are now completed without having guns and gun-mountings ready for them. On the subject of repairs, he asks that the Director of Dockyards should give a personal eye to these matters. If the hon. Member knew the system in force, I do not think he would have any anxiety under this head. He would know that every repair goes under the review of the Director of Dockyards and the Controller, and even so poor an authority as the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty. He would find that unnecessary repairs are minimised as far as possible. I do not say we have reached perfection in this matter. I agree that those interested in particular ships have a strong desire to see all kinds of repairs effected in them, some of which are hardly necessary. My hon. Friend knows that that is the case; but the present system of carrying out repairs is an efficient check upon that tendency. Then my hon. Friend says there is no effective competition between the dockyards and private shipbuilding yards. In my opinion there is such a competition going on between public and private yards, and the former come very well out of the contest, inasmuch as battleships are built in them more cheaply than in the private yards.

MR. HANBURY: Does that take into account the profit of the private contractor?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That, of course, is included in the contractor's price.

MR. WOLFF: And depreciation of work?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Yes. Depreciation is taken into account in the indirect charges for dockyard ships. With regard to the Staff Captains, I do not think it has ever been contemplated to abolish those persons. As to the houses in the dockyards, I will inquire into the matter. The hon. Member has complained that we have too many Government dockyards, and he especially singled out Sheerness Dockyard and Haulbowline for condemnation; but the fact is that that dockyard has special uses for defensive purposes, and would be found most valuable in time of war. My hon. Friend is mistaken in supposing that no ships are built at Sheerness. It is a good place for building vessels of a small size, and some very fine ships have been built there of late. But on these points I see the hon. Member for the Faversham Division ready to fall upon him from behind, and the Irish Members from below the Gangway. So I will only express my regret at having been compelled to take up the time of the Committee so long.

*MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) ventured to say that the right hon. Baronet had entirely misconceived the drift and meaning of the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord G. Hamilton). They had been made in that spirit of fair criticism which the Navy Estimates should receive, and the Navy Estimates were likely to have that full and fair criticism this evening for the first time for six years. [Laughter.] The right hon. Baronet (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) ironically cheered his statement that there had not been a full and fair debate on naval policy in the last six years. St. Patrick's Day and other circumstances had intervened, and the Estimates had passed through the House almost unchallenged. He was one of those who believed—from his experience of the Public Service—that nothing strengthened the hands of a Minister more than the idea that all questions must be submitted to the criticism of the House. The right hon. Baronet had said that it was easy for the Opposition to suggest a Supplementary Estimate; but it was a very difficult thing for the Government to bring one in. He had proceeded to say that a Supplementary Estimate was not necessary in the case of the Howe, because they would be able to provide for that exceptional expenditure out of savings. Well, the dockyard expenditure, he gathered, would be £40,000, the salvage would amount to £35,000, and there would be a charge in Spain as yet unascertained; but it would not be placing it at an extravagant figure if he put it at £25,000. So that he calculated there would be a charge on this year's Estimates of £100,000, which the Secretary to the Admiralty had mentioned in a casual sort of way would be met out of the ordinary Repairs Estimate. But that meant no less than 25 per cent. of the total Repair Vote asked for, and he doubted if there was such a margin as to allow this to be done. The right hon. Baronet had said it was not necessary to rush into new ships, as we were not short of vessels. He claimed that he was keeping up the continuity of naval policy of his predecessor, and that the amounts provided in the Estimates of last year for two battleships—neither of which had been commenced—were sums for the mere commencement. And then the right hon. Baronet had told them that he hoped to complete the battleships of the Naval Defence Act this year; that credit ought to be given to the present Board of Admiralty for what they had done; and that the line of argument taken by the noble Lord was not fair. He (Mr. Forwood) had quoted all this to show that the right hon. Baronet had not appreciated the point made by the noble

Lord. The point of his noble Friend's speech with regard to new ships was that it would be impossible to continue the policy laid down unless next year the Chancellor of the Exchequer—whoever he might be—was prepared to provide a much larger sum for material and contract work than was asked for in the present Estimates. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in his place. If the right hon. Gentleman should be—as he did not believe—in Office next year, he would have to provide excessive Estimates, arising out of the present want of appreciation of the necessity to have work in hand for the labour which ceased to be employed under the Naval Defence Act. He was aware that the policy of the Naval Defence Act had always been questioned by right hon. Gentlemen opposite; but the principles of that Act were the only ones upon which the dockyards could be conducted on a business-like footing, unless they were to have large discharges of men in one year and large engagements in the next. The Naval Defence Act provided that the moneys which it was estimated would be expended on vessels in a given year, and which was voted but unexpended, should, instead of being refunded to the Treasury and re-voted, be paid into a fund available for the next year's expenditure. Another point of the utmost importance to the economical and good administration of the Service was that the Act contained a proviso allowing advances by the Treasury for payments on account of armour-plates and other costly materials, which advances were repayable out of the Vote of the next year. In 1890-1 contractors earned for machinery and materials which were to be employed in the construction of dockyard-built vessels £200,000 less than was provided in the Estimates, and, on vessels built by contract, the sum earned by contractors, by reason of the slower progress of the ships, was £1,000,000 less. Now, if it had not been for the provision in the Naval Defence Act to which he referred, the Estimate for the year 1890-1 would have been £1,200,000 more than was necessary, and that sum would have had to be surrendered to the Treasury and in the next year the taxpayer would have been called upon again to provide it.

THE CHAIRMAN : I do not see how this arises on the present Vote for Salaries and Allowances. The policy of the Naval Defence Act is not before the Committee.

MR. FORWOOD said, he bowed to the ruling of the Chair; but he only desired to show that the present proposals of the Government, viewed in the light of the experience derived under that Act, were not framed as they should be, and were not sufficient for the labour and material required in the construction of the new ships—it could only result in great disturbance of the Estimates of future years. Shipwrights and others would be liable to be discharged unless better provision were made for a proper sequence in the construction of ships. In the construction of a vessel, the amount of labour and material which might be required varied very considerably from year to year, and the difficulty was to keep an equal ratio between them, as far as possible. He should be able to show, he thought, that the present proposals did not meet that at all. The cost of labour, including the work of Inspectors and shipwrights, in constructing a battleship, amounted to about 25 per cent. of the total cash outlay, excluding guns and incidental charges; while, on cruisers, the proportion was about 35 per cent. The proportions, however, as already stated, varied from year to year. For example, under the Naval Defence Act, for every £450 or £500 spent in the first year on the construction of a battleship, employment was found for only one man; while, in the second year, the expenditure of £300 to £400 gave employment to one man. As regarded cruisers, the figures were £350 and £300 for the first and second years respectively. If all the ships were commenced, as they probably would be under the present programme of the right hon. Baronet, there would be little employment for the Inspectors of ships and shipwrights in the first year, while an abnormal amount of labour would be required in the second and third years. The total expenditure on the completion of the Naval Defence Act and in commencing new ships was shown to be £1,890,000, which included £818,000 for labour. Taking this latter amount at £75 a head, this meant the employment of 10,900 men. But the Estimates only provided for labour and material on the basis of £170 for each man employed, which was clearly much below the normal requirement, since it required an annual average expenditure of £300 to employ one man on an ironclad and £250 on a cruiser. This was due to the special circumstances of a large number of vessels completing and few being begun. This must lead to a serious disturbance of the Estimates for next year if the number of men in the dockyards were to be maintained, unless a great increase were given in the Material and Machinery Vote. He would now examine the probable effect upon the future of the policy adopted by the present Board of Admiralty. The mistake had been in not commencing the work earlier, as intended by the late Board, and in not putting in hand a sufficient amount of new work and ordering material this year to properly absorb their labour in the next and following years. The total labour bill in this year's Estimates on new construction was £433,000, of which £700,000 was devoted to the completion of the vessels under the Naval Defence Act. Next year, however, these vessels would only want labour to the value of about £135,000, leaving a balance of labour available for other new construction to the value of about £700,000. They were commencing ironclads which would cost £2,300,000, and cruisers which would cost £850,000. The labour on the ironclads would represent a sum of £560,000, and on the cruisers £300,000. In the present year the labour bill on these new ironclads would be only £100,000, and on the cruisers £30,000, so that future years would have to provide £730,000 for labour to complete the Board's new programme. The success that had attended the late Board had been in the rapid construction of vessels, and he could point out the enormous saving to the country that had accrued from this rapid completion of ships. In 1891-2 and 1892-3 it would be found that 26 ships were completed at a cost of over £4,000,000, which was £100,000 less than the sum asked from Parliament. Compare that with what was done in previous years. The Collingwood, the Edinburgh, the Howe, the Impérieuse, the Colossus, and the Conqueror took an average of seven years to build, and cost £348,000 more than Parliament was told they would cost, whilst the ships built under the late Board—

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea) asked if the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in discussing the late Shipbuilding Programme?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think he is in Order in discussing the shipbuilding, as this is the Shipbuilding Vote; but he would not be in Order in discussing the wages of the men.

MR. FORWOOD said, he was endeavouring to keep as close to the Vote as possible, and the Vote now under discussion contained a large amount of expenditure for the wages of the men engaged on the ships. He wished to impress upon the Admiralty the importance of pushing on the work, and to show the saving which followed rapid construction. If they were to retain in the employment of the Admiralty the same number of men as were occupied to-day in new construction, they would have in 1894-5 to lay down new vessels which would absorb something like £300,000 value of labour; and the result would be that, in consequence of the delay in the construction, the Admiralty would have to come to the House next year or leave to their successors' Estimates from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000 more than were borne by the present Votes. It was difficult to separate the cost between one part of the programme and another; but Vote A included charges for men employed in connection with the contract programme. Under that programme the House was committed to an expenditure of £2,250,000 for vessels to be built by contract; but by the omission of the Terrible the amount might now be taken at £1,650,000.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: No, Sir; the right hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken.

MR. FORWOOD said, if he was making a mistake it was because the figures were not given; these Estimates were quite incomplete, and it was impossible to find out what amount Parliament was to be committed to in connection with the vessels to be put out to contract. The right hon. Gentleman had supplied him with some information, from which he had endeavoured to estimate the cost of those to be put out to contract, and he had estimated the cost of the Terrible and the Powerful at £600,000 each, and he believed he was under the mark in fixing that figure. If he was right, the total cost of the ironclads, cruisers, and torpedo boats proposed to be put out amounted to £1,600,000 less the Terrible; and if he was wrong his error arose from want of information in the Estimates. Perhaps the right hon. Baronet would say what the Estimates would be of the vessels to be put out to contract, after deducting the Terrible?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The right hon. Gentleman will see that if the Admiralty postpone for a few months the building of the Terrible it makes no difference in the amount to be put out to contract—it simply alters the order in which the vessels are to be built.

MR. FORWOOD said, he was sorry he had not made his meaning clear. His point was simply this—that the vessels which they were going to put out to contract would cost £1,650,000. Of the total amount to be spent on contract work the present Estimates provided for only £470,000, leaving £1,000,000 to be provided for in future years, while the financial difficulties of the future would also be enhanced by the postponement of the bulk of the cost of the repairs to such ships as the Warrior, Monarch, Phaeton, Agincourt, and Comus. This year, £186,000 was to be taken towards the construction of these ships, leaving £263,000 still to be provided. It appeared, therefore, that everything was being done in connection with the Naval Estimates this year to make a great show and to give small performances, throwing upon the future a disproportionate amount of cost. It was only a repetition of previous policy of throwing these large charges on future years. If that was not done, there must be a large displacement of men in the employment of the Government at Her Majesty's Dockyards, and a large increase in the Naval Expenditure.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to give notice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that next year there is to be a great increase in the Naval Estimates, and was good enough to assure me that I should not be in that position, and, therefore, I may take a disinterested view of this question, and that notice may be given to whomsoever it may concern. But he laid down a principle in which I very much concur—that nothing can be worse in connection with the Estimates than the practice of making a great show and leaving the cost to be paid by the future. Well, that was exactly the position which the late Government bequeathed to us. There was a great show made under the Naval Defence Act; but very great care was taken that the people who passed that Act should not pay the cost of the vessels. The hon. Member says that we shall want £1,500,000 more next year, and still more the year after. Yes; and what is to become of the £1,500,000? It is to go in paying the debts of the late Administration. Curiously enough, this is the very amount which they have charged on the Consolidated Fund for the ships built under their programme; and for two years we shall have to pay £1,500,000 to discharge the debts the late Government have incurred. No one could be a better authority on this question than the hon. Member. The policy of the Naval Defence Act was a policy which, I hope, no Government will hereafter adopt, and which certainly the present Government will never follow. A worse financial policy it is impossible to conceive, and then we are told that there is to be a great increase of the Naval Estimates. We protested, when in Opposition, against this policy of shoving off the cost upon another generation. We protested against this reckless finance, and certainly we have not the smallest disposition to follow the example. We shall have enough to do to pay off the debts of the late Government. The hon. Member said the Chancellor of the Exchequer must meet greatly increased Estimates. That was not the policy the late Government adopted when they came into Office. The first object of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was to reduce the Navy Estimates by nearly £1,000,000.

LORD G. HAMILTON: No.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, it was £800,000. The noble Lord, in the speeches he made on the condition of the Navy, said—

“I am happy to say that, in consequence of the condition in which the Navy has been placed by my predecessors in Office, I am able to reduce the Navy Estimates.”

And I am certainly right in saying the sum was about £800,000 in the first Budget, and about £1,000,000 in the second. They justified their reduction on the ground of the great efforts made in previous years. No doubt it is the duty of every Government, to whatever Party they belong, to take care that the supremacy of the British Navy shall be unquestioned. That is the principle which we all accept, and the policy of the Government will be governed by those considerations. But we must have regard to the condition of the Navies of other countries. I have always made it a special subject of interest to inquire what are the relations of the British Navy to the other Navies of the world, and I would undertake to say that the superiority of the British Navy was never so great as it is now.

MR. HANBURY : To any one Navy, or to two ?

*SIR W. HARCOURT : To a good many of them. I have taken very great care to investigate the matter; and if you examine as to the great battleships, those of 10,000 tons and upwards, you will find that, with reference to their tonnage, their numbers, their speed, their capacity, as compared with other Navies of the world—the Navies of France, Russia, the United States, and Germany—the superiority of the British Navy was never so great as it is now. Again, when you compare the great cruisers of this country with those of other nations you will find Great Britain possesses an immense superiority. One thing the Government are not going to do. They are not going to propose to build a number of ships and leave their successors to pay for them. That was the policy of the Naval Defence Act. The battleships will be completed before the 1st of April, 1894. There is a matter of importance in this respect. One of our greatest battleships has been completed in three years; but I see from the Estimates as to the French Navy that they make a special boast that a battleship was completed in five years. That shows the great advantage which this country possesses in the point of construction. The right hon. Member who has just spoken has, no doubt, given his notice to the right hon. Gentleman sitting beside him (Mr. Goschen), and I have spoken as an entirely disinterested party.

Sir W. Harcourt

*SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff) thought the Secretary to the Admiralty might have waited until he had heard what the Committee had to say; but there was one advantage to be derived from the discussion that had so far taken place, and that was that after the speeches they had listened to they would not be so much trammelled in their observations. He hoped, however, the Committee would not infer from this that he intended to make a long speech, for, on the contrary, he intended to address himself only to one or two points. The noble Lord the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton), in appraising the value of our own and other Navies, laid down the proposition that what they had to consider was first their offensive, and secondly their defensive power; and the noble Lord went on to remove from the first-class ships a number of vessels on the sole ground of their being without a minor armament, without a number of small guns. It was essential to the argument of the noble Lord that he should have gone on and have dealt with their defensive powers; but on that question, unfortunately, the noble Lord said nothing. On this point, however, he (Sir E. J. Reed) had a word or two to say. The Chancellor of the Exchequer a few moments ago assumed we had a good Navy, and spoke of the number and speed of the vessels and various other matters; and there seemed to have grown up a habit in this House of believing that anything they put together in the form of a steel structure and called a first-class battleship was really a contribution to the naval strength of the country. He wished once more to dispel that delusion. A few years ago a strange class of vessels was introduced into the British Navy, and as soon as it became known to some of them they were denounced as dangerous structures which might end in disaster to the country. Many Members would remember the exciting Debates there were on the subject. The character of the Debates was indicated by this remark in The Standard in 1887—

“ Mr. Reed's objection to the Inflexible, as the world pretty well knows by this time, is that when the unarmoured portion of the vessel has undergone extensive damage the ship will capsize. The idea of a great ironclad turning keel uppermost is extremely harrowing.”

Sir Spencer Robinson, writing in The Times eight years ago, said—

“Do not let us forget we have 11 first-class ironclads built and building, on the principle of armoured central citadels with unarmoured ends, these ends being more than half the length of the ship, and we have the highest authority for saying that, with the armoured citadel intact and an unarmoured end destroyed, the ship is in imminent danger of upsetting.”

He quoted these extracts to show that when the catastrophe occurred the other day to Her Majesty's ship Victoria, it was nothing unexpected or unforeseen that happened. That happened which every Administration for years past had been told would happen. An unarmoured end of a ship suffered injury, and the ship capsized and went to the bottom. He saw indications that attempts would be made to attribute this catastrophe to some of the doors of the watertight compartments having been left open. He did not know whether the Committee would take it from him or not—and they need not unless they pleased—but he told them it was nothing of the kind which brought about the catastrophe. He believed it was not from any cause of that kind that the Victoria capsized. She was bound to capsize with the injury she received. There were other ships that were equally bound to capsize if they were injured in the same manner, and under similar conditions. The reason was that, instead of the armed citadel being the major part of the structure, and the unarmoured ends of the ship being the minor portion, they had chosen to make the unarmoured ends the major part of the structure, measuring more than half the entire length of the ship. The ships that were likely to capsize in a similar manner if they received like injury, in peace or in action, were the Agamemnon, the Ajax, the Anson, the Benbow, the Camperdown, the Collingwood, the Colossus, the Edinburgh, the Howe, the Inflexible, the Rodney, and the Sans Pareil. If any of these were badly injured in their unarmoured ends they would inevitably capsize and go to the bottom. He did not know how many ships the country should require to sacrifice before they took warning. He must recur again to the fatuity of pretending that watertight doors could be so kept closed as to save vessels of this character. What was forgotten was that the whole of this unarmoured part of the ship was occupied. Between the decks the principal space was the residence of the crew, the place where 600 men had to live, and below that were the places where the work of the ship had to be carried on. Because they had chosen to make that the residential part of the ship, exposed as it was, he would defy any naval architect—including the hon. Member opposite the Member for Belfast (Sir E. Harland)—to devise a vessel like the Victoria with bulkheads so that the men could live in the ship and the service of the ship be performed with all watertight doors kept closed. It was absolutely impossible. Therefore, those who went on producing ships of this character knowingly imperilled the lives of 10,000 seamen. The probable loss of the Victoria was foreseen; and if any of the other ships he had named similarly collided with a ram they would doubtless go down in the same manner. He wished to read a few sentences which had been spoken four years ago by a naval officer, who was now a Superintendent of one of Her Majesty's dockyards, as a reason for not troubling himself further about this matter—

“I do not propose to follow Sir Edward Reed through his diagrams here. I do not know that he is a better judge of the risks of battle than we are. He may be, perhaps; but if we are prepared to accept the risks he points out to us, and the fearful pictures of drowning men and bursting boilers, and so on, why not? He is not going to fight in the ships. If we like to risk drowning for the sake of being able to hit harder, as Lord Charles Beresford put it, Lord bless my soul, let us have the risk, and let us be the judges! Do not say anybody is a better judge of what we have to risk than we are.”

All he would say was that neither the House nor the country could pretend, when another catastrophe like the Victoria occurred, that they knew nothing about these things. At all events, if the House and the country cared anything about their vessels and their seamen, they would do something to prevent the recurrence of these great catastrophes. He would turn to another subject of quite a different character arising out of the remarks of the Secretary to the Admiralty. In discussing the question of the dockyards the Secretary to the Admiralty stated that dockyard ships were more economically produced than contract ships. The other night he had asked why the Estimates for four first-class protected cruisers had been so much exceeded, and it was stated in reply by the Secretary to the Admiralty that there had been alterations of design, additions, improvements, and increase of pay. There were nine ships to be begun in 1889 and 1890. Four were sheathed with wood and copper, and, as alterations were made in them, he would leave them out of consideration. He would take the case of the unsheathed vessels. There were five unsheathed vessels of the Edgar type. Two were built in the Royal Dockyards and three by private contract. The Estimate for the Edgar was £364,000 and for another vessel £349,000. The Estimates included incidental charges, which varied enormously. It would be a convenience to know a little more about these charges. The prices of the ships built under the private contracts were £334,000 in one case and £337,000 in the other. So the cost by private contract was £30,000 less than the Admiralty's own Estimates. The Admiralty, having made contracts £30,000 less than the amount to be expended on their own ships, next ascertained that their Estimate for their own ships was £37,000 less than was required. The Secretary to the Admiralty explained that this increase was due—first, to additions and improvements made to the ships during their construction; and, secondly, to the increase in wages. The increase in wages was only £4,000. Consequently, £33,000 had been expended on additions and improvements. These additions and improvements had likewise been forced on the contractors, who had naturally applied for some corresponding allowance. But the Admiralty had refused to give them more than a third of the sum they had themselves expended on additions and improvements, with the result that the contractors were, if not practically ruined, subjected to a loss of a most shameful kind. He could not understand the principle on which the Admiralty had acted in these matters. He had himself been engaged for many years in carrying out contracts, and the principle he had always acted upon was this: that whatever was just and right under the interpretation of the contract should be enforced, but that the moment the contractor was called upon to do something that could not have been contemplated at the time of the making of the contract the proper thing was to pay him. He certainly thought that in these cases the Admiralty should take into account the extra outlays they had imposed upon the contractors.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) asked whether the hon. Gentleman's figures included the dockyard charges on contract ships?

SIR E. J. REED said, the figures he gave comprised not only the contract price of the hull and machinery, but also the charges for work to be done in the dockyards on delivery. He did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer quite understood the point raised by hon. Gentlemen opposite. They did not, in his opinion, say they would press the Government to spend more money next year, but they pointed out that there was in the Dockyard Establishments a large mass of labour which the Government, being supported by the Dockyard Members, did not wish to interfere with; and they said that if the Government did not in time start the building of ships, they would have to make provision for the material at a heavy loss or get rid of that labour. He would recommend the right hon. Gentleman not to resist that argument, but to regard the question as one requiring business investigation. He was sure that if the right hon. Gentleman considered the matter in that light it would be properly dealt with.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I rise to say a word or two in reference to the extremely important observations which have fallen from the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed), which I think ought to be immediately taken notice of. The hon. Member is undoubtedly in error if he thinks the country does not care for the lives of its seamen or the loss of its ships. The hon. Member, who is a distinguished member of the shipbuilding profession, attacked these ships in the past. Now a ship has gone down, and the hon. Member has read out a list of ships and has informed the Committee and the country that they exhibit the same errors of construction as existed in the Victoria, and that the same fate may await them under similar circumstances. I do not know what the Government may think; but it seems to me, in view of that statement, that there must be a thorough and searching inquiry without delay into the cause of the loss of the Victoria. The Government, I am sure, will feel, from the views which I have expressed on previous occasions, that there is not the slightest wish on my part, and certainly not on the part of anyone on this Front Bench, to interfere in any way with regard to the time, mode, or circumstances of that inquiry. But I venture to appeal to the Government whether it is possible to allow statements such as have been made on the responsibility of the hon. Member for Cardiff to go forth, and to inform the country and foreign countries, and, above all, our sailors, of the dangers alleged to be in those ships. I do not press Her Majesty's Government for an answer on the spur of the moment. The matter is far too serious to be made in the slightest degree a Party dispute of. Therefore, I do not wish to embarrass the Government by putting a question which they are not prepared to answer; but I think they will agree, and the Committee will agree, that it is a subject that cannot be passed over lightly, and I doubt that it will be possible for the Government to give a satisfactory reply without an inquiry. That subject outdistances in importance anything else that has been touched upon in these Debates. But there is one other matter upon which I should like to say a few words, and that is with regard to the gap the loss of the Victoria has made in our battleships. I think the gap made in the strength of the Navy by the loss of the Victoria has been treated too lightly by the Secretary to the Admiralty. In my opinion, the loss of one out of 22 battleships is a very heavy one. While the late Government placed a large programme before the country, we nevertheless felt we had not increased the Navy by one unnecessary ship. It was not a maximum programme. It was a fair programme; and I say that whatever may be the position of the Government at the present moment, the country will expect the Victoria to be replaced in the constructive programme of the future. I should like to reply to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said about the Naval Defence Act. I am perfectly ready at any time to have the whole argument of the Naval Defence Act out with the right hon. Gentleman. For my own part, I can say that there is no Act to which I have been a party with the success of which I am more satisfied than that of the Naval Defence Act, and we have received it from the mouths of our opponents, for the right hon. Gentleman has given us the pleasing information that every ship included in that programme will be completed in the year 1894.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But not paid for.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have an answer to that retort. I am coming to it. It has been shown, therefore, that it is possible for the Admiralty, if carefully tied, as it is tied by the Naval Defence Act, to have done with mere fiddling with ships, changing and altering them in different directions, and really to carry out a programme. The Naval Defence Act has saved money and time, and it has been a complete administrative success. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says the late Government has left the present Board a legacy of two annuities to pay. Does the right hon. Gentleman know what was left to the late Government when they came into Office? There were left liabilities of £6,000,000 in uncompleted ships. The late Government left completed ships and two annuities of £1,400,000.

SIR W. HARCOURT: You diminished the Naval Estimates £1,000,000 in each year.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not since the naval programme was begun. What the late Board did in the two previous years has nothing whatever to do with the naval programme which we established. I did not intend to say a single word with reference to the Naval Defence Act, but that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made an unnecessary excursion into the past.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It was made by the right hon. Member for Ormskirk.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman says that we diminished the Estimate in the beginning of our Administration, and then established the naval programme. Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that the Administration, of which he was a distinguished Member, during its early years diminished its Navy Estimates; then The Pall Mall Gazette insisted on a naval programme, and the Navy Estimates were put up again? An example was, therefore, set us by the previous Administration, who first diminished the Naval Estimates and then increased them. I am very sorry to trouble the Committee with this matter at all, but I could not allow the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement that we left him two legacies to pass unchallenged. If we put on those annuities we at the same time put on the taxes to pay for them. If we left £1,400,000 to pay we put on special taxes—the Estate Duties—which, within £100,000, pay for these annuities. Therefore, what hon. Members opposite said in the country with regard to the late Government pledging the future and putting burdens on their successors was entirely wide of the mark, considering that we imposed the taxes necessary to pay for these ships. There is only one point more. As the hon. Member for Cardiff pointed out, we do not wish to force any large increase either in construction or expenditure upon the present Board of Admiralty. What my right hon. Friend here pointed out was that as the Estimates are drawn you will be put in this position: that you will have either to diminish your dockyard labour, or you will be obliged, in order to find work for them, to spend very largely on materials. In any case you will decrease the resources of our dockyards, instead of adding to the power of the country by building new ships. I do not think my right hon. Friend has put this matter unfairly to the Government, and his remarks have been reinforced by the hon. Member for Cardiff, who is an impartial critic of all Administrations.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) said, that as a Dockyard Representative he wished to say a few words on this Vote. First of all, he entirely agreed with the complaint of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cardiff (Sir E. Reed) of the extreme inconvenience of the Minister in charge of a Department rising to make his reply before Members generally were heard. The consequence of that course in the present instance was that the Committee had been entertained with a great many Front Bench speeches, and that though this Dockyard Vote had been four hours under discussion not one single Dockyard Member had been heard. Before he came to the subject on which he particularly wished to address the Committee he desired to protest, on behalf of his constituents, against the extreme inconvenience of postponing the discussion of these Votes until August. Of course, he was well aware that the Naval Dockyards were only suffering the same inconvenience as the other interests of the country—naval, military, commercial, and agricultural—owing to the insane attempt of the Government to force on an unwilling country their scheme for the destruction of the Empire. He was perfectly certain that not only dockyard constituencies, but other constituencies, resented this neglect of their interests, and that that resentment would be shown in no uncertain way at the next General Election. He had intended to speak on the classification of dockyards; but as the Chairman had previously ruled that that subject would more properly come under Sub-head B, he would only say that he entirely endorsed the complaint made by the Secretary to the Admiralty in the late Government in regard to the inexplicable delay on the part of the Government in presenting their Report on this matter. He had frequently urged this question on the attention of the Government, and had been assured on one occasion by the Civil Lord of the Admiralty that the Report would be out before Whitsuntide; but it was only now that the Report on this very important question had been placed in the hands of Members. His hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had surprised him by advocating the abolition of Sheerness Dockyard. His hon. Friend added that no doubt he, as the Representative of Sheerness, would be prepared to defend the continued existence of the dockyard. Well, he was prepared to defend its continued existence, though he had not for one moment thought that such a question would be raised as the abolition of Sheerness Dockyard, and still least of all that it should have been raised by an hon. Member sitting on the Conservative Benches, for it was not in accordance with Conservative policy. Some years ago the question was mooted whether it was possible to do away with Sheerness, and the answer then given by the late Conservative Government was that under no circumstances would they contemplate the removal of Sheerness Dockyard. That view had been endorsed by the present

Mr. Goschen

Financial Secretary to the Admiralty, for the hon. Gentleman had referred to the suitability of Sheerness for many purposes. If he had been completely unprepared to defend Sheerness he would have found ample reason for the continuance of the dockyard in the speech of his hon. Friend himself. What evidence had his hon. Friend brought forward in support of his contention that Sheerness should be abolished? The evidence of one gentleman, Mr. Elgar, who for seven or eight years had been Controller of the Dockyard. He did not dispute the capacity, the ability, or the energy of Mr. Elgar; but what had Mr. Elgar said about Sheerness? He said he was in favour of the discontinuance of Sheerness Dockyard, unless the Naval or Military Authorities said that it was necessary for mobilisation purposes in time of war. That was precisely what the Naval and Military Authorities did say about Sheerness, and that was a sufficient reason why the continuance of the Dockyard was absolutely necessary. His hon. Friend the Member for Preston had based his reason for the abolition of Sheerness on the statement that no ships were built there. If that were accurate it might be a reason for the abolition of the dockyard, but it was absolutely inaccurate. Not only had ships been built there, but at the present time some of the most useful vessels of the Navy were being constructed there. He thought that his hon. Friend, before he made a proposition of such importance, should acquaint himself more carefully with the facts, and arm himself with a little more authority than the authority of one official, whose utterances really were more in accord with his view than the view of the hon. Member for Preston.

*MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) said, he believed that in regard to Naval Expenditure the present Admiralty Board had no intention whatever of reversing the policy of the previous Government, although the Liberal Leaders when in Opposition had found considerable fault with the Naval Expenditure of the late Board of Admiralty, with this exception, that the so-called battleships and cruisers were to be larger—in his opinion a mistake. They also intended building six swifter torpedo catchers, whilst ignoring altogether the work of our neighbour in regard to smaller craft. He thought the Government should take into consideration the necessity of providing the Navy with a number of these boats equal to the number possessed by the French Government, who had now 250 of them in use. It was stated the other day by the Secretary of State for War that it was impossible for the country to maintain more than one Army Corps. It, therefore, became more essential to maintain the Navy in a most efficient state, depending as the country must for power at home and abroad for supremacy upon its naval and mercantile superiority over that of other Maritime Powers. He was desirous of ascertaining, if possible in specific terms, the naval policy of the Government. Was their programme based upon comparative lines with regard to the strength of Foreign Navies? Had they thought out a programme for the naval offence and defence of the Empire, in all its ramifications and parts; and, if not, he should like to hear what was their policy? He would instance Channel defence and offence, and the protection of trade routes. Would the Admiralty indicate how the various squadrons had been told off and grouped for this purpose? Unless this could be done, he was bound to conclude that the Government and the Admiralty were without a system. He would like to know whether the nation possessed a Navy double that of France and another Naval Power? for upon this they had had no authoritative Return, save that issued the other day on the Motion of the late First Lord, which failed altogether to give correct information regarding the comparative force of this and other Maritime Powers. He joined issue with the Admiralty on their policy with regard to huge ships, which he regarded as a fraud and a delusion. The only purpose for which they could be employed in time of war was for coast defence. Before building more huge battleships the Admiralty ought to make further inquiry with regard to their machinery and vulnerability; but, in his opinion, it would be far better to devote the money which one of those vessels cost to building four smaller vessels of the cruiser class, with which, he believed, future battles at sea would be fought. For ocean fighting they must depend on swift protected cruisers, armed with quick-firing guns. He condemned huge vessels and guns because of their complicated and delicate machinery. With regard to the range argument, battles were not likely to be fought in the future beyond the range of human vision, as in the Naval Manœuvres off Newcastle, where the Admiral reported that he shelled Newcastle at a distance of nine miles. The most recent opinion of the American Press was against these huge vessels, and the Victoria disaster made him think that in the event of war they would be nothing less than death-traps. Henceforth, instead of trying to build enormous unwieldy craft, whose only merit was thickness of armour, greater attention must be paid to speed and mobility. Thickness of armour only provided against one of the dangers to which a warship was liable, and the one which was steadily decreasing in relative importance—an attack by guns. The ram must hereafter play an important part in naval warfare. Why should they follow other nations in a policy condemned by experts at home and abroad? As the Power needing the first and most powerful Navy in the world, we ought to strike out a line of policy for ourselves instead of following nations with less experience than ourselves. All recent experience condemned the building of any more huge battleships, and pointed to the construction of ram cruisers and torpedo-catchers, not of the Polyphemus type—which had proved a failure in her design, unfit for sea, and useful only for coast defence—but rather of the type of the Blake and Edgar. As he had said, in the event of war huge battleships would prove to be nothing less than death-traps. Some of them only carry four days fuel; the proposed new vessels, at full speed, only six days. This meaning that every second or third day they would have to return to their base for coal. Coal at sea could only be supplied in smooth water, thus proving that for ocean fighting we must have a totally different type of ship.

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, it would be felt by the Committee that there was a greater necessity for discussing the Navy Estimates and all that concerned the naval programme than ever there was before. Last year there was practically no discussion of the Estimates at all, which arose from the situation that then existed. He did think when they came to discuss the Estimates of the year, and matters of so high an importance as the naval programme, they might to some extent be spared the irrelevancies of the Front Benches. They had had that night wrangles as to the merits of different Governments and different programmes, and they had had irrelevancies, more especially from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He only wondered the President of the Board of Trade did not join in. He would only deal with one of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statements, in order to show with what complete indifference, not to say contempt, the House might treat any statement regarding seafaring matters from one so little qualified to speak on such subjects as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman said that comparing the Navy of this country with the Navies of other countries we were far and away ahead of them, and he compared our vessels of 10,000 tons and over with, among others, the warships belonging to the United States of America. He might just as well have compared them with the vessels of Switzerland. The United States had not a single vessel of 10,000 tons, and they did not mean to have one. They were building two new battleships, but not one would reach 10,000 tons; therefore, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came forward with all his magniloquence and asked them to compare their vessels of 10,000 tons with non-existent ones, all he did was not to bring a serious contribution to that Debate, but to show his ignorance of the subject he was talking about. In any battles of the future our part of the fight must be carried on on the enemy's coasts. They should not attempt to enter into an enemy's country, but should skin him alive on his outside—on his shores. By means of the Navy they could coerce an enemy in the very remotest corners in the land. In the last war with France, sugar was driven up to 7s. per lb. in France, whilst we could purchase it for 3d., 4d., and so on. That was what they wanted to do with the Navy—namely, to affect the material resources of the enemy. He did not care if he killed a few men belonging to the enemy, for if he made him pay 7s. per lb. for sugar he was his victim. Besides sugar, other articles of merchandise rose in proportion, which went to prove his position—that with the predominance at sea they could command and coerce the land without using soldiers or any elements of a war force. But what did they find in this maritime country, which was dependent upon its Navy? That whilst in the Estimates the Navy was put off with £15,250,000, the Army received £20,750,000, more than half the sum allocated, but, instead of that, the Army had devoted to it one-third more than was expended on the Navy. These proportions ought to be reversed. He did not say that they should settle a very long or continuous programme of shipbuilding, because every month witnessed very considerable improvement in shipbuilding and in the art of navigation. But the fact that improvements were constantly being made did not dispense us from laying down ships. Before going further he wished to say that it did seem to him that it was a pity the First Lord of the Admiralty did not sit in that House instead of in another place. If he were in that House he could deal with the matters relating to his Department. He trusted that before long the Secretary to the Admiralty would return to the House, as he wished that gentleman to hear what he had to say. He should be in his place to answer any questions put; but as he was not, and as he was the responsible Minister, he (Mr. Bowles) begged to move that Progress be reported.

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot put that Motion.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: In the absence of the Minister concerned with the Vote, I move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have just told the hon. Member I cannot put that Motion.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he had not understood that that was what the Chairman had said. He would, therefore, proceed, in the absence of anybody whatever competent to attend to his speech or to answer it. [At this point Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth returned to his seat on the Treasury Bench.] The right hon. Gentleman said he wished to put the English Navy in a condition which would render it equal to any two other

Navies in Europe. As the right hon. Gentleman was now at last in his place he wished to remind him that he had distinctly committed himself to that view—that the Navy of England should be superior to the combined Navies of any two other countries. In that opinion the right hon. Gentleman told them he was supported by Vice Admiral Sir A. Hoskins, K.C.B. That was the view of the late Lord of the Admiralty and the present Lord, and how had they begun with regard to it? Had they now a sufficient superiority over the combined Navies of any two other nations? He could show that they had not; and that even if they had now, it was certain they would not have two years hence, assuming that the plan which the right hon. Gentleman had laid down were pursued. Fortune had diminished their Fleet by one ship, and the right hon. Gentleman had diminished it by another. They were not only deprived of the Victoria, but the Secretary to the Admiralty had announced that the building of the Terrible was to be abandoned. That left them worse off by two ships. He (Mr. Gibson Bowles) objected to putting too many eggs in one basket, and he did say that it was better to build three small vessels than two large ones. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not understand Members insisting upon the necessity of replacing one ship; but, behindhand as they were, and in view of the progress other nations were making, it was absolutely necessary that the Victoria should be replaced at the earliest possible moment. He could not forget what Admiral Hoskins had said with regard to the relative superiority in which they ought to stand. They must go on the same basis as before, but they should keep as far ahead as possible. The right hon. Gentleman said it was very easy for men in opposition to talk about a Supplementary Estimate for the Victoria. If the Secretary to the Admiralty came down to the House and asked for another £1,000,000 for the Navy he would get it without a dissentient voice being raised. Not a finger or voice would be raised on the Opposition Benches against it. In this country anything that the Government wanted for the Navy they could get. Let the right hon. Gentleman take heart of grace; let him come down tomorrow and tell them he wanted

£1,000,000 for another Victoria, and he (Mr. Bowles) would answer he should have it. He would answer for the House of Commons, because he was perfectly certain that nothing was easier in this country than to get any money that he reasonably demanded for the British Navy. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed) had called attention to the cost of building ships of the Edgar class in the dockyards and in private yards. The Edgar was estimated to cost £364,000, but in reality it cost £401,000, while an exactly similar class of ship built by private contract cost £334,000. The hon. Member for Cardiff used these facts to show the hardship inflicted on the contractors; but he (Mr. Gibson Bowles) would use them in another sense—to show the enormous extravagance of the dockyards. He thought the time had arrived when we should take into consideration whether we had better not build all our ships by private contract. He could not conceive what answer would be given on this point. There had been extravagant expenditure in this case. The hon. Member for Cardiff alluded to the loss of the Victoria, and contended—as he (Mr. Gibson Bowles) contended—that after they had wept for the dead it was their duty to learn the lessons that were to be learnt from that awful catastrophe. He (Mr. Gibson Bowles) was rebuked the other day by the Secretary to the Admiralty for asking whose duty it was to call up the engineers and stokers on the Victoria when it was seen that there was imminent danger of the ship foundering. He was told his question was a reflection upon someone on the vessel. He now asserted boldly that it was the duty either of the Captain or the officer of the watch, or whoever was in charge of the ship, when the ship was in imminent danger of foundering, to call up all the men in the engine-rooms and stokeholds.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss that question now.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, very well. He should pass to the question of construction. As he understood the system they had adopted, they had committed very grave and very fatal blunders with regard to the principle adopted of late in their battleships, and those blunders had almost all been copied from foreign nations. They had gone exactly contrary to the rules of common sense with regard to their cruisers and battleships. They put all the weight on the top of the ship, and then they wondered that she “turned turtle.” Although the enormous increase in the weight of armour protected the men at the guns, as well as the crew generally and the machinery of the ship, they were left absolutely unprotected against what they feared most—the ram and the torpedo. He thought their object in naval construction should be to seek to develop the offensive rather than the defensive power of their ships. He would rather have a ship and weapons that could hit hard than one that would escape being hurt itself. He believed that what their sailors most valued was the power of hitting their enemies. That was the principle upon which they should proceed—giving that power; and he would impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of carrying out that principle. They ought to extend it as much as possible. There were one or two other matters which he should like to mention, but the hon. and gallant Admiral below him (Admiral Field), as representing the Navy, wished to address the House, and he would not detain them longer. He trusted the Government would see the necessity of allowing them to discuss these important questions at greater length than they appeared to be willing to grant on this occasion.

MR. W. ALLAN (Gateshead) said, he had listened with very great interest to the speeches which had been made on this Vote, and he had been interested especially noticing the number of Members who possessed information of a valuable character with regard to ship-building matters and naval architecture. One point that struck him occurred in the speech of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury). There was a very simple way out of the difficulty pointed out by the hon. Member with regard to dockyard management. The Government ought to make the dockyards tender for ships in the same way as private yards, and ought only to give them the contract if they were cheaper than such private yards. He would allow no repairing work to be given to dockyards unless the head manager gave a tender for that work. With regard to the hon. Member for Cardiff, he thought in his condemnation of certain classes of ships he was acting too much as a nautical Jeremiah. He (Mr Allan) would impress upon the Committee that if a ship were struck by a ram she was rammed, and her stability was destroyed.

SIR E. J. REED: No.

MR. ALLAN said, yes; she became like an inclined plane, and the working of her screw drove her down. A ship had foundered under him, and he had watched the process of her descent to the bottom.

*SIR E. J. REED said, the ironclad Vanguard had floated for an hour after being struck; she only sank because the water-tight doors between the large engine and boiler rooms were open.

MR. ALLAN said, he presumed she was moving at the time?

SIR E. J. REED: Yes.

MR. ALLAN said, if the Victoria had been rammed suddenly while standing she would have gone down head foremost, and would not have tilted over. It was very easy to say that they should have vessels built one way instead of another. He would ask, what was to be done about the displacement? Would it be possible to get speed with increased displacement? They could not have everything in a man-of-war all at once—speed, and offensive and defensive power. They could only improve things bit by bit. That was all that any country could do. The junior Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) was of opinion that the warships were far too big; but he (Mr. Allan) did not believe that—he thought they were not big enough. It was impossible to get a higher speed unless they increased the length of the ships so as to give room for the engines. The weakest spot in the Navy was the cramping of the engines into a small space in order to increase the speed. The future ships of Great Britain would be big ships, although they might be very difficult to handle. Now, what had been done under the Naval Defence Act? He looked at this matter, not from a Party point of view, but from a national point of view, and he considered that, their Fleet being their first line of defence, it ought to be invincible. What had the Act done for them? He found that under the Act there had been built 10 ships of 10,000 tons displacement, nine ships between 10,000 and 5,000 tons, 83 ships between 5,000 and 2,500 tons, and 18 ships below 2,500 tons. These figures showed, certainly, that a large number of small ships had been built under the Act. He did not wish to take up any more time. There had been a great waste of time—such a great waste that he almost shrank from intervening in the Debate; and he should not, therefore, detain the House for another moment. He cared not who sat on the Front Ministerial Bench; he cared not who was in Opposition; for his impression was that the soul of British patriotism lived with equal strength in the breasts of Members of both Parties. There need be no fear for the future of the British Navy whoever was in Office. The endeavour would always be to maintain the naval strength of this country equal to that of any two combined Powers in the world.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he was sure they were all greatly pleased by the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member who had just sat down, than whom no one had had a wider experience and had a better right to speak on these subjects. Naval men, who remembered the hon. Member's career, were proud to think that he had been associated with them, and trusted that he would continue to give them the benefit of his commanding abilities. The remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) he would not analyse. Much that the hon. Member had said he (Admiral Field) did not approve of. For instance, he did not approve of what the hon. Member had said as to the naval construction of big ships. Those remarks grated on the ear. Then the hon. Member was rather hard on the Secretary to the Admiralty for not being present when he (Mr. Gibson Bowles) was speaking. The right hon. Baronet was, no doubt, better engaged elsewhere—in the dining room. The hon. Member also expressed regret that the First Lord of the Admiralty was not in the House of Commons, but in the House of Lords. It was, however, not fair to complain on that head. There was no good reason why Members of the House of Commons should monopolise all the chief Offices of the State. The hon. Member had made some ironical remarks about his (Admiral Field's) representing the Navy; and if he did not represent the Navy he did not know what on earth he represented. He could tell the hon. Member that naval men did not share his views. They were thankful to the Board of Admiralty, presided over by the nobleman referred to, and to the high-minded gentleman opposite and his talented colleague. No doubt the position of these gentlemen was difficult. The Secretary to the Admiralty had defended himself very ably from the remarks of the noble Lord the late First Lord of the Admiralty, though in a rather irascible manner. It was to be regretted that the right hon. Baronet had not more of the spirit of naval men, so as to be able to take the attacks of an opponent in good humour. Some important remarks had been made by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed). The hon. Member complained that there were in the Navy 11 ironclads of the type of the Victoria—that was to say, with unarmoured ends. The hon. Member asserted that vessels such as this were dangerous to the lives of officers and men. Well, this was no new matter. The hon. Member himself had called attention to the subject before, and he had been answered before. The hon. Member made similar remarks when the Inflexible was being designed, and he was instrumental in causing the construction of that vessel to be postponed for many months. A Committee of experts were appointed to consider the question of the stability of the Inflexible. The Report was not in favour of the view of the hon. Member for Cardiff, but in favour of the ship being built according to her design.

SIR E. J. REED: But the Committee most earnestly urged the House to build no more vessels of the kind until great changes had been made; but the Admiralty did build more, and the Victoria was one.

ADMIRAL FIELD: They did not condemn the design.

SIR E. J. REED: They did.

ADMIRAL FIELD: No; they did not condemn the design, although they advised that no more should be built. As to the ships of the Victoria class, there they were. Did the hon. Member propose that anything should be done to make them better? Did the hon. Member say that if there had been an armour belt round the Victoria there would have been any difference in the result?

SIR E. J. REED: If the vessel had had an armour belt there would have been 500 times the resistance to the inroad of the ram.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, of course, this was a question for the experts in naval construction, and he hoped the hon. Member for Belfast, who was so well qualified to speak on the matter, would give them his opinion. His own belief was that the impact of an immense vessel like the Camperdown going at six or seven knots an hour would be such that the vessel rammed could not survive. As a matter of fact, the ships were not built to stand collisions, but to resist shot and shell. This was the object aimed at, and it had yet to be shown that shot and shell going into the unarmoured ends of these vessels would compromise their stability. He did not think the remarks of the hon. Baronet would shake the confidence of the officers and men on board these ships. As everybody knew, they carried their lives in their hands when they went into battle, and everyone knew that no ship could be designed which would not endanger life in some form or other. As to appointing a Committee of Inquiry, he did not think that this was at all necessary, for we had long ceased to design vessels of this class; and, doubtless, the hon. Baronet would admit that the design of the first-class ironclads now left nothing to be desired. Coming now to the remarks of the Secretary to the Admiralty, he noted that the right hon. Baronet spoke of the present Board as preserving the continuity of our naval policy. He (Admiral Field) was not, however, satisfied that continuity was really being preserved. Lord Hood of Avalon, who had been quoted, advocated the carrying out of a progressive scheme of shipbuilding; but there was nothing progressive in the scheme of the Government, for of the three line-of-battleships spoken of two belonged to last year's programme. The right hon. Baronet deprecated Supplementary Estimates. Did he mean that there was to be no proposal to replace the Victoria? He believed the Naval Lords, if they could speak here, would say that the Victoria should be replaced. He should, certainly, hold that view until it was contradicted by the right hon. Baronet. The Naval Programme was certainly deficient in not taking into account vessels which were lost by accidents. Of course, in war time, if ships were lost it was expected that the enemy would suffer in proportion, and that, therefore, the balance of strength would not be disturbed. But vessels lost in time of peace should be replaced. The right hon. Baronet had laid much stress upon the value of that part of the programme which related to so-called torpedo-catchers, and he had said that the desire of the Admiralty to provide these vessels had caused them to postpone the building of a cruiser. They would not thank the right hon. Baronet for that. If the torpedo-destroyers were wanted so were cruisers. As to these torpedo-destroyers, the late manoeuvres had shown that so far those which we possessed were too slow for their work. He had heard that in one case a signal was made to the commander of a torpedo-catcher to prepare for higher speed in 20 minutes, which ought to have been ample time; but the answer signalled was—"I cannot do it; it will take me 40 minutes to prepare for higher speed." These vessels were valueless. They were admirable to look upon, but failures in practice. The reason, as stated by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. Allan), was that they had not enough reserve boiler power. New torpedo-catchers of a superior type were needed; but he hoped that in constructing these the Admiralty would not confine themselves to one pattern, or carry out the work all at once. Naval men would rather see one or two constructed rapidly and tried before others were built. He remembered that 50 torpedo boats were built in a hurry from one pattern. When they came to be tried it was found that they were not fit to take to sea with their bottle-nosed bows, and all of them had to be altered at a heavy cost. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), one or two of them had put his (Admiral Field's) back up. They had heard some of them before, therefore the matter was not new. The hon. Member was a reformer, no doubt, but he was anxious to reform what had already been reformed. His remarks would apply to the state of things which existed in 1884 or 1885;

but improvements had been made since then. He had talked about abolishing the Admiral Superintendents of the Dockyards—or rather the hon. Member had begun that way. He (Admiral Field) had looked at the hon. Member, and he had given up some of the remarks he had evidently intended to make. The earlier part of the hon. Member's view would be reported and the latter part would not, so that a false impression might be conveyed to the public, who were inclined to regard the hon. Member as the friend of the Services. He would ask the hon. Member to read the evidence of Sir James Graham, the Duke of Somerset, and other civilians, as to the desirability of retaining the Naval Superintendents. The hon. Member had proposed that they should dispense with Sheerness Dockyard. The great body of naval opinion, however, was in favour of retaining Sheerness Dockyard, as it was essential for purposes of mobilisation. They could not mobilise the Fleet in two harbours only—Portsmouth and Plymouth; they wanted Sheerness also. The hon. Member had also questioned the desirability of retaining Haulbowline Dockyard. Naval men would be in sympathy with Haulbowline. They were glad that it existed, and in war time especially it might be very useful for ships of the Navy, and even of the Mercantile Marine. A warship might find it very convenient to go there for repairs, and for this purpose it would be no difficult matter to transport shipwrights if necessary. With regard to the general question, they were told that the Government would not do more than carry out their general programme. Naval men desired to see the Victoria replaced. He did not feel himself competent to pronounce an opinion on the policy of the Admiralty in building the two enormous cruisers which they had heard about—the Powerful and the Terrible. It might be right. The Russians had two, if not three, such vessels. The French were, he thought, building two. Such vessels might, therefore, be necessary in the British Navy. He was glad that the Admiralty were making 45-ton guns instead of those of larger calibre, and making provision for a larger supply of guns which could be loaded by hand. He should like to hear the opinions of experts as to whether the engines and boilers were sufficient for the work they had to do; and it seemed to him that where our ships failed was in being unable to carry sufficient coal. Another point which naval men were naturally anxious about was as to the reserves. When the present programme was completed—about 1895—this country would have about one-third more ships than the French, which was not enough. But a very strong opinion had been expressed that no time should be lost in placing our Navy beyond comparison with that of any two Powers. That, however, was not at all the standard which should be aimed at. It was simply a phrase. The true standard should be based on the work which our Navy had to do. This should be carefully thought out, and a programme arranged accordingly. Sir George Elliot had pointed out that we ought to have a reserve of at least 10 battleships and 10 cruisers; and Lord Nelson, who was supposed to know his business, had remarked, on leaving our shores, "Look to your reserves." It never seemed to have dawned upon the intellect of any Government that it was necessary to have reserves. But the experience of the last Manœuvres had shown that we must provide against losses. The torpedo boats had succeeded in torpedoing eight vessels; and if that could be done in the Irish Channel when every precaution was being taken to avoid it, what might not be done in war? He would here quote from an authority for whom hon. Gentlemen opposite would have regard. The late M. Thiers once expressed his impression of the naval enterprise and policy of this country by saying—"One ship lost, one ship launched." He evidently thought that this was our policy, and we should certainly make it our policy. They should have a certain well-determined standard, and never allow the Fleet to fall below it. We were dangerously weak in the Mediterranean. Russia, by some arrangement with France, was said to contemplate having a naval force in those waters, and it was also rumoured that France was going to make a naval port near Tunis. If this project should be carried into effect, and war should break out between England and France, if we had no reserve in the Mediterranean, it might become necessary for us to withdraw from there, falling back on Gibraltar, and leaving Malta to defend herself. He thought he was justified in complaining that not a single word was said in the Estimates about the new torpedo catchers, although those vessels were urgently wanted. There were many lessons to be learned by the late Naval Manœuvres; but the Chairman would stop him if he referred to some of them. He thought the Admiralty ought to commend the young officers in the torpedo-boats for the gallant way in which they did their work, especially Lieutenant Prowse. They had no doubt heard of that young officer, who in the late Manœuvres, by disguising men in a fishing boat, had torpedoed the Narcissus. He was told that the Captain was angry, and threatened to have the young officer put in irons. In his (Admiral Field's) opinion, however, the commander of the torpedo-boat deserved better treatment; he should have been invited on board, and asked to a champagne supper. The young officer claimed his prize, but was bullied into relinquishing it. There were not a sufficient number of torpedo-boats at Gibraltar or Malta. It was all a question of money; therefore they would only growl and accept the inevitable. He believed the right hon. Baronet opposite and his colleagues at the Admiralty were as desirous as he (Admiral Field) was of doing more, and would do more if they had the power. But their master sat beside them in the form of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, unfortunately, they might as well appeal to a rock as to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

*SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.) said, he objected to the Vote of £261,000 for the Majestic and the Magnificent, and in referring to those two vessels he must ask the right hon. Baronet (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) to rest assured that he approached the consideration of the matter in no Party spirit. He should have made the same observations if he had been sitting on the other side of the House. As a matter of fact, he had not had the opportunity of expressing his views on this class of vessel, seeing that they were constructed under the Naval Defence Act, and were decided upon before he had the honour of a seat in the House. In addition to the reason afforded by the lamentable disaster which had recently occurred, he thought he had abundant ground for drawing attention to these vessels. His objection to these two vessels which it was proposed to build was, first, that the vessels presumably would be built on similar lines to the other ships of the same class—that was to say, in the absence of information to the contrary—which he had done his best to obtain—he assumed that the lines of these ships would be similar to the lines of the others. He assumed that the coal bunkers would be arranged similarly to those in other ships of the same class, and considered such an arrangement extremely dangerous, because in case of collision it was almost impossible to close the watertight doors, and the ship would probably capsize. The next point he would call attention to was the ram of these vessels. An immense amount of money was spent in producing something which looked like a ram, but which was practically useless and not deserving of the name. As he had said, he had been unable to obtain precise information from the right hon. Baronet as to the coal capacity of these ships. The statements which had been submitted to the House with regard to these two ships were to the effect that good provision would be made in them for coal, and that they would carry more than the Royal Sovereign. Still, he had a right to assume, as no precise information was forthcoming, that the ships would carry no more than 900 tons. Assuming that that was the case, their coal supply would be only equal to three days' full steaming, or 1,260 knots, which would mean arriving at Gibraltar or at Riga with empty bunkers. He considered that, having regard to the services which our Fleet might be called upon to render, it was necessary that the vessels should have a greater coal capacity than this. One of these ships on reaching Riga would be absolutely useless unless followed by a number of colliers of equal speed with herself. It seemed to him that such a vessel should be able to steam at the rate of 17 knots to Malta, consuming 1,350 tons, and should then have one day's coal in her bunkers. She should be able to steam to Cronstadt, consuming 950 tons, and should then have two days' coal in her bunkers—sufficient to enable her to assume the offensive or defensive. At 15 knots she should be able to go to Halifax, consuming 1,200 tons, the donkey engines and electric engines all having their supplies. She should arrive at Halifax with one day's coal in her bunkers. She should, therefore, be able to carry 1,550 tons, whereas provision had only been made for 900 tons.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the hon. Baronet was mistaken in supposing that capacity was only provided for 900 tons. That was the capacity on the designed load-draught.

*SIR E. HARLAND said, that when they were handed a specification in which it was stated that the ship's draught would be 27½ feet, they presumed that that would be the draught when the vessel was loaded and equipped ready for service, and he held that such a ship was not equipped and ready for service with only 900 tons of coal in her bunkers.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the arrangements in these ships were different to those made in the older vessels. They would be able to carry a much larger quantity of coal.

*SIR E. HARLAND: How much more?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I cannot say at a moment's notice.

*SIR E. HARLAND said, he had asked questions on the subject at question time to-day, and was sorry that he had not been able to obtain the information he sought. He had been obliged to reason the matter out for himself. If more coal was put into the vessels, unless they were increased in size, they would be sent to sea in a very inconvenient condition.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the only result would be that the vessels would be a few inches deeper in the water.

\*SIR E. HARLAND said, his contention was that the vessels should carry 650 tons more coal; and if the right hon. Baronet thought that that would make a difference of only a few inches in the draught of the ships he was very much mistaken. It would make a difference of over two feet. To carry 1,550 tons, instead of 900 tons of coal, the bunkers of each ship would have to be two-thirds larger than was intended. 8·7 feet in the length of the ship ought to give a carrying power of 290 tons, or one day's supply, so that if they increased the length of the ship by  $19\frac{1}{2}$  feet, it would give them 650 tons—or, say, 20 feet, which would give an additional coal capacity of 666 tons. If the amount of coal which appeared to him to be necessary were carried, and the length of the ship were increased by 20 feet, that would make the dimensions 410 feet by the 75 feet proposed. They could not place too much importance on this matter of coal. He could imagine one of these vessels with a number of torpedo boats and torpedo catchers all looking to her, like young pigs to a sow, to provide them with coal. Such a ship could not expect to be followed at a speed of 17, or 15, or even  $12\frac{1}{2}$  knots by a fleet of colliers. These vessels must be their own colliers. They could not imagine a more lamentable thing than a splendid ship of this kind with empty bunkers. Her position would be pitiable. She would be at the mercy of the enemy to be rammed at leisure, and would be treated practically as a conquered vessel. He thought, therefore, that of all measures taken to insure the safety of battle-ships, that of making provision for giving them an ample supply of coal was the most important. Without steam these vessels were mere logs in the water. They had no masts; only something in the nature of a pole for signalling purposes. Could they conceive anything more helpless than one of these ships would be, in the presence of an enemy, with empty bunkers? It might be said, as an objection to increasing the length of these ships, that heavy cost would be entailed. Then make them, say,  $420 \times 73$ —with six inches less draught. They would be better seagoing vessels—steadier and able to make much better weather. But coal, and to spare, in the bunkers should be the first consideration. He spoke especially of bunkers, because they had been told that other vessels of this class had spaces near the bunkers where they could stow large quantities of coal. Well, setting aside the fact that that would make the vessel draw more water, imagine the condition of a ship with these various outlying holes filled with coal coming into collision, or meeting with an accident which would render it necessary for the officer in command to order the watertight doors to be closed. All these bunkers would have watertight doors between them and the stokeholes, and these various outlying holes would have the same. If the order were given "Close bulkhead doors," what would it mean? Why, that the stokers would be able to get no more coal; and if the ship were on the offensive or defensive, in a few hours she would be helpless. What should be done? They should arrange the bunkers in the way in which they were arranged on merchant ships, where there were bunker doors letting the coal out of the bunkers into the stokeholes; but those doors had nothing to do with the bulkheads of the ship. Unless they had bunkers of the proper size, and properly arranged, there would soon be melancholy results to chronicle. He could not emphasise too strongly the importance of this coaling question. It was absurd to suppose that a large ironclad could always count upon re-coaling in the open sea. The operation was difficult in fair weather, but a ship might be in the centre of a fleet of colliers without being able to obtain a single ton of coal if there was anything like a sea on. It was foolish to suppose that slow-going colliers could keep an ironclad supplied with coal at sea. Even when the difficulty of coaling at sea could be overcome the supplies would have to be obtained from quick-sailing merchant ships; and, instead of its being said that the Royal Navy protected the Merchant Service, it could then be said that the Merchant Service protected the Royal Navy, because the coal which the merchantmen would bring would be far more useful to the man-of-war than shots in the locker. For his own part, he would rather have a ship with plenty of coal, but without powder and shot, than a ship fully armed, but with empty bunkers. In the former case the vessel could use its ram, but in the latter case the ship would be at the mercy of the enemy. With regard to short ships—a point the hon. Member for Gateshead touched on—they had got into the fashion of designing ships as short as possible, forgetting that the shorter they made them the more they would cramp the engines, the boilers, the turrets, the bunkers, and the stores. They injured the sea-going qualities of the ships in the attempt to make them as nearly round as possible. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir E. J. Reed) had had experience of building a round ship,

so that in this country we were not likely to hear much more about them——

SIR E. J. REED : I do not know what the hon. Baronet refers to.

SIR E. HARLAND : I was under the impression that the hon. Baronet designed the round vessel for the Russian Government.

SIR E. J. REED : I had no more to do with it than the hon. Baronet himself.

*SIR E. HARLAND said, he was sorry he had made the mistake. With regard to rams as at present constructed, he thought they were not fit for their purpose. They could not have a better illustration of this than the condition of the Camperdown after its unfortunate collision with the Victoria. Although these ships were going at slow speed, the result of the Camperdown ramming the Victoria was that she nearly sank herself. In warfare, in all probability, the ram would be used at a speed of 12 knots. At such a speed as that the blow given to the Victoria would in all probability have been fatal to the Camperdown. He saw no mechanical difficulty in the way of designing a ram which, with perfect safety to the vessel carrying it, would enable a ship to send half-a-dozen ironclads to the bottom in a day. At present the ram was a steel snout, weighing perhaps 150 tons, but without the necessary backing. He would suggest that better designs should be adopted ; also that the Admiralty should utilise some of our old wooden men-of-war now lying in a tidal harbour by placing 2-feet thick armour on their sides and then construct a ram that would penetrate that armour without damage to the ram. Until they put their ram to that test they would never construct a satisfactory one. They spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in constructing ships with rams, all of which were really worse than useless for ramming purposes. They built their torpedo boats with bottle-nosed rams. Not only did this interfere with the sea-going qualities of the boats, but as to the utility of the ram, if they ran into an old 200-ton wooden collier, they would merely crush themselves up. A man might just as well run full tilt at a wall with a thimble on the end of his nose and imagine that it would save his face. He would urge the Government not to put rams of the old design on the new vessels they were about to construct. He did not wish to disturb the programme which the Admiralty had set themselves to carry out ; but if it were practicable, he should like to see them build a pure and simple ram. They had one—the Polyphemus—but it was a wretched attempt, which did not deserve the name of a ram. Let them build a perfect ram, and, for once, ignore the idea of powder and shot. Let them see what they could do with such a vessel. So sanguine was he as to the value of such a ship that he would undertake with a good ram to destroy more of an enemy's ships than the heaviest armed ironclad afloat could destroy with shot and shell. That brought him to the very lamentable disaster, the recent loss of the Victoria. In ramming the Victoria the Camperdown should have received no injury whatever, as she was only going at five or six knots an hour. That was very slow speed—merely drifting. The results of the collision showed the tremendous momentum acquired by these battleships ; and a ram going at 15 or 16 knots ought to crush through an armour-clad, even if its armour were a couple of feet thick, without those at the stern of the ram knowing what had happened. In fact, the enormous iron plates, which were a protection against shot and shell, would only make the case of a vessel that was rammed worse. The armour-plate a couple of feet thick, which would stand a shot from a 100-ton gun, would be simply crushed in at once by a blow of a ram. He therefore thought we were not yet sufficiently impressed with the importance of the ram as a weapon of war. The plating behind the ram of the Camperdown was so thin that it was burst in by merely scratching against the Victoria. The hon. Member for Cardiff said that if these vessels were cut into by a ram they were bound to capsize. But the Camperdown only settled a little at the bows, but without any list.

*SIR E. J. REED said, the Camperdown had not been run into, and that he had never declared that an injury to the stem of a ram before the collision bulkhead would mean the capsizing of the ship.

SIR E. HARLAND said, it depended entirely on how the vessels were arranged.

SIR E. J. REED : Do you know how they are arranged ?

SIR E. HARLAND : No.

SIR E. J. REED : Well, I do.

*SIR E. HARLAND: I know how they ought to be arranged. The hon. Member, continuing, said, that at any rate he did not hesitate to say that the watertight doors played an enormously important part in the matter. The House had not yet been given the most important information about the sinking of the Victoria, and that was information as to the condition of the bulkhead doors. The Victoria went to the bottom entirely on account of something being wrong with the bulkhead doors. His own impression was that the order to close the doors was given in what would have been sufficient time for the closing of modern bulkhead doors, but was not sufficient for the closing of the old doors of the Victoria. There were doors which were capable of being closed instantaneously; and it was lamentable that the Admiralty should not have adopted those doors or have inquired into them. For 18 years the Admiralty had had opportunity for seeing how such doors worked; and if those doors had been on the Victoria, he had no hesitation in saying that she would have been afloat to-day. The injury received was not sufficient to sink the vessel, and she had no business to sink. It was not fair to the House of Commons that while all the evidence at the Court Martial on mere matters of discipline should have been put before Parliament, everyone was kept perfectly ignorant on the most vital question of all—that of the condition of the bulkheads. For some years past great stress had been laid on the advantages of side bunkers filled with coal. It was said that they were admirable shot protectors. He wished to know whether experiments had ever been made with projectiles through chambers representing side bunkers in a ship filled with coal, and whether the coal in those chambers offered the slightest resistance to such projectiles? His own impression was that coal was the poorest article that could be used with which to keep out water or turn a shot; and that something of a spongy character, such as india-rubber, or even shavings, would be much more effectual for the purpose than coal, which surely could offer very little resistance to shot or serve to stop the inflow of water.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) said, he did not intend to detain the Committee long, as most of the matters on which he had intended to speak had been dealt with by his colleague in the representation of Belfast. He did not agree with the statement of the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty as to the amount of coal consumed by a war vessel. He thought the amount very much understated. He expressed his approval of the designs of the new cruisers. They were the best things he had ever seen designed by any Government in power, and he hoped they would be proceeded with as soon as possible. The Secretary to the Admiralty had also said that the cost of vessels built in the dockyards was less than that of vessels built by private firms. He ventured to think, however, there must be a considerable difference in the incidental expenses of the public and private yards. Indeed, the hon. Baronet the Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed) had pointed out that these incidental expenses ranged from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 20 per cent. When a private firm got a ship from the Admiralty to build, a certain number of Inspectors were sent down. The private shipbuilder could not do a single thing without consultation with the Inspector, and in nine cases out of ten the Inspector did not know what to do, but had to get an answer from somebody else at headquarters, and the result was frequent delays and unnecessary expense. Again, there was hardly a private manufacturer—at all events, those in a large way employing skilled hands—who did not pay the ordinary wages approved by the Trade Unions? That, he believed, was not the case in the dockyards.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not referring to the Amendment under discussion. It is not in Order to deal with the wages on the present Vote.

MR. WOLFF said, he thought he was straying a little; but then the discussion had strayed a good deal already. The only other matter he wanted to touch upon was the torpedo-catchers. He asked whether these catchers could not be so improved as to enable them to catch torpedoes?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, he trusted his right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would not regard him as a public or a private enemy for interposing in the Debate. He said that, because it had been his duty last week to ask a few questions in regard to these matters on which he should say he had not yet got the information he required ; and his right hon. Friend, in replying to these questions, insinuated that he was rather trespassing on matters with which he had no connection. He assured his right hon. Friend that his only desire in asking these questions was to obtain information, and not to criticise in any way the conduct or action of his right hon. Friend. He did not speak without book in these matters, because for many years he had been brought into close relations with the dockyards, and had given them his most careful study. Something had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer about the Naval Defence Act. He was not going to discuss the question on general principles ; but he said that anyone who looked at the Navy from his point of view must consider that the Naval Defence Act was the greatest boon ever conferred on the Navy. It was true that the expenditure of £11,000,000 under the Administration of Lord Northbrook was a great boon to the Navy ; but it was not to be compared to the Naval Defence Act, and it would be most unfair to suggest that the country had not reaped permanent advantages from the improvements made in the Navy. Again and again the necessity for a fixed and definite programme had been made evident. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had remarked that there never had been a time when the forces of this country were more fit to be compared for efficiency and power with the forces of other nations. That statement, however, was not based on fact. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to put the question to any naval authority of the country with a knowledge of the conditions of Foreign Navies. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would get for an answer that he could hardly have made a statement on the Navy more contrary to recorded and obvious facts. The facts were—he took them from the Return furnished to the House by the Secretary to the Admiralty—that we had now built or were building 60 ironclad ships ; but France and Russia combined had 70 such ships. So that we were within reach of the date when we would see ourselves outnumbered by those Powers to the extent of 10 ships. Of ships in commission Great Britain had 27, and France and Russia combined had 29. In face of those facts he maintained it was the duty of the Admiralty to take immediate steps to replace the Victoria. The Secretary to the Admiralty had said that it was not an easy matter to come down to the House and submit Estimates to replace the lost ship. The right hon. Gentleman had got a straight and satisfactory answer from the noble Lord opposite (Lord G. Hamilton). The noble Lord had said that it might be hard, but that it was a thing that could be done, and a thing that had been done. He believed that if they had had the information the day he asked his question, the right hon. Gentleman would have found that the opinion of every naval man was that the right thing to do was to ask the House for £1,000,000 sterling for a ship to take the place of the Victoria ; and he was convinced that if a statement of the true facts of the case were made, there would be no difficulty either with the House or with the country to repair the great loss which had been sustained by the sinking of the Victoria. The other day he asked the Secretary to the Admiralty how many ships had been begun by the present Government ; and, though he would be the last person in the world to suggest that his right hon. Friend would mislead anyone, the answer he received was most misleading to the House and to the country. He was told that 13 ships had been begun since the present Board entered Office. The fact was that two ships, and two only, were in any way due to the initiative of the present Government, and even they were small torpedo boats of 200 tons each. The Renown was a ship for which money was taken by the last Government. They were told that it was laid down on the 1st of February ; but, as a fact, prior to the commencement of the financial year no less than £14,500 had already been spent on the Renown. She ought to have been begun at the end of last year ; but owing to the dilatoriness of the present Government she was not taken in hand. Then there were five other ships which it was claimed were commenced in the present year, and yet in the previous financial years sums varying from £13,000 to £15,000 were voted and expended upon them. All these matters should be capable of Departmental explanation. There were three great cruisers, the Minerva, the Talbot, and the Eclipse, supposed to have been begun by the present Government, whereas the appliances had not even been laid down for them. They were not commenced in the ordinary sense of the word. He believed he might truly say that in the whole naval history of this country a twelvemonth had never before gone by when nothing had been begun for the Royal Navy by the Government in power. He spoke the other day about the deep-sea harbours on the other side of the Channel. He mentioned them now because they were ancillary to the great scheme of construction which the French Marine were about to carry out. In the harbours of Brest and Dunkirk nests of torpedo boats were to be located, and they were protected and organised in a wonderful way. We had only made one attempt to respond to that method of offence on the part of France. We had built a large number, too large a number, of torpedo-catchers, but there was not a single one of those vessels which would run 20 knots. He had taken great pains to get information on that point. A large number of them would not, on the average, run 14 knots, and they had been an almost absolute failure. Their boiler power was quite inadequate, and until their boilers were replaced, or the ships replaced altogether, we were absolutely without an answer to the great torpedo attack with which we were threatened in the Channel. He wished to see somewhere in the Estimates some provision made for altering these torpedo-catchers. He had never been able to see that this country was too poor to get what it wanted in the way of naval construction. These torpedo-catchers were wanted and cruisers as well, and he did not think the Government had a right to refuse them until the House of Commons had said that the country was not rich enough. He trusted that the Government would persist in its intention to build two cruisers, and that it would reconsider the question of abandoning the construction of the Powerful. A Return had been presented to the House, the most remarkable portion of which was the financial summary at the end. This Return showed the dangers to this country and the responsibility which it incurred, the tonnage afloat, the value of the sea-borne commerce, and the expense, not only to this country, but to other parts of the Empire, of our sea protection. He feared that England was in danger of losing the commanding position it had occupied, and of falling back into a kind of naval slough from which the Naval Defence Act, so long as it had been in operation, had fortunately dragged it.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he was sure that hon. Members who had been in the House during the past two hours had derived great advantage from the speeches delivered by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. Allan) and others. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had brought a very serious charge against the present Board of Admiralty, because, if his statements were true, he had proved that the official Representative of the Admiralty had claimed that 13 new ships had been laid down by the present Board, thus leading the House to assume that these vessels were due to the initiative of the Government, whereas they were in great part included in the old Naval Programme. It was perfectly plain to anyone who had watched what had happened with regard to naval construction that the Treasury had completely overmastered the Admiralty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, for reasons which might seem to be excellent to the Government, had controlled the Admiralty, and the result was that practically the construction of no new ships of any size or importance had been undertaken. No new battleships and no new first-class cruisers had during the year been laid down by the Government. Of course, he was not speaking of vessels included in the Naval Programme of 1888. The two principal questions that had been discussed were the question of whether the present strength of the Navy was inadequate, and the loss of the Victoria and the practical destruction of some of the ships intended for ramming purposes. In reference to the practical construction of our ships, he held that the Navy at the present moment was below its proper strength, and the Mediterranean Squadron was below its proper strength, and that that deficiency had been increased by the loss of the Victoria. They had the other day an event of great significance, which, so far as he knew, had never occurred before. A powerful French Fleet went round the ports of the Levant, visiting Alexandria and Smyrna, among other places. In point of numbers that Fleet, he believed, was equal to our Mediterranean Fleet, and, in addition, there was a strong reserve squadron at Toulon. What did that mean? Every circumstance showed that there was on the broad lines of policy a close understanding between the two great Powers with whom if we were ever involved in troubles abroad—and it was to be hoped the day would be long postponed—we might expect to be engaged more than with other Powers. They knew that the Russian Fleet in the Black Sea had been enormously increased of late; and, at the same time, they saw a powerful French Fleet cruising round the Levant. What meant that? In the event of an outbreak of hostilities in the Mediterranean, where at present the centre of naval gravity was established, we should be obliged for a time to abandon our position, and concentrate our naval forces at Gibraltar until reinforcements arrived. That was a serious question, requiring close attention on the part of the Admiralty, and when they found a Government in power 12 months without laying down a single battleship, and resting tranquil and unmoved under the loss of one of its largest and most powerful battleships, it was time to consider whether some steps should not be taken to remedy the indifference, if not worse, of the Government. The only answer that had been given to the complaints with regard to the loss of the Victoria he ventured to characterise as most puerile. The First Lord in another place stated that the loss of the Victoria was not to be met by a Supplemental Estimate, because it would be ridiculous to assume that the power of the British Navy would be seriously impaired by the loss of a single ship. The same answer had been given that night, and he could only say that it was a childish, inadequate, and absurd statement. Everyone knew that the Navy was not too strong, and that the naval programme of the late Government was not too great. It was a great advance, and it was made to counteract and correct the long period of neglect between 1868 and 1874, and between 1880 and 1884, when the Navy was allowed to sink far below its proper strength; and when a battleship, representing 4 per cent. of the ships of the Fleet, was lost, the only proper answer why it should not be replaced would be to show that without it we should be in no serious danger when our Navy was compared with those of France and Russia combined. He quite agreed as to the importance of an inquiry into the causes of the loss of the Victoria. That was a question which ought to be thoroughly sifted. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Sir E. Reed), who spoke with the authority of a Naval Constructor, had made a series of significant and important statements on the subject. He did not say he agreed with all these statements. They were questions on which experts differed, but they were very grave questions which must affect a large number of our ships and the confidence of our sailors, and it was, therefore, of extreme importance that inquiry should take place. With regard to the policy of the Admiralty in building two new large cruisers, the question was an open one whether or not it was wise to expend their money on great ships which were practically unarmoured. What they wanted at this moment was what the country wanted in 1888—namely, a definite and progressive naval programme. The programme of 1888 was practically exhausted. A great effort had been made to place the naval strength of this country on a proper footing, or, at all events, on a greatly improved footing. A great sum of money was voted for the purpose, and was spread over a number of years, so that they got a maximum of result with a minimum of expense. That policy had been reversed. The present Government had really no policy, no definite programme. They were simply making a show of building ships, whereas they were doing nothing. They were putting off the provision of new ships and the settlement of a new programme for another year, in the hope that something would turn up. They were allowing the supposed exigencies of the Budget to overcome the necessities of the Navy. The Admiralty had been mastered by the Treasury. The proportion between labour and material, which was so important, was not being observed, and the result was that the present Administration were laying up a great store of difficulty for themselves. He did not agree with the criticisms of the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) on the subject of large ships. He believed that as in the past so in the future, the naval supremacy of countries would be decided by the big ships. Cruisers, of course, were of the greatest importance for the protection of commerce, and for the keeping up of communication, and for no country were they more important than ours; but, undoubtedly, the Power that would command the seas in future would be the Power that had a predominance of battleships, and in view of that fact he maintained that the present naval policy of the Government was wholly inadequate.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am sure we are greatly indebted to the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down for giving us a forecast of the kind of speech he intends to deliver on the various platforms of the country, a speech with a good deal of rhetoric, but a very small amount of accuracy.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to point out the inaccuracy?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I will pass from him and come at once to some important speeches, and first to the speech made by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed). I confess I regret the lengths to which the hon. Member went. The hon. Gentleman mentioned a list of ships in the Navy which he described as being dangerous ships. I will not use all the language he applied to them.

SIR E. J. REED: I said that they had the same material defect as the Victoria, and that they would behave as she did under such circumstances.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Quite so; and that is a very grave accusation. My hon. Friend stated that what happened in the case of the Victoria was what every Administration had been told would happen. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the accusations he brought forward on previous occasions against the ships were not that they would capsize if pierced below the protective deck—far below the water line—by a ram, but the objections he brought forward were to the effect that shell fire on the upper part of the unarmoured structures would cause the vessels to sink. These objections were the subject of an investigation by a Committee at the Admiralty, presided over by Admiral Hope, including Dr. Woolley, Mr. G. Rendel, and Mr. Froude. There is nothing new in the matters which the hon. Gentleman has brought forward to-day. They were fully considered at that time by that Committee; therefore, I think I may be excused from going into them now. I am perfectly prepared to do so if it should be thought desirable, but I only point out to the Committee that the objection taken in the year 1877 by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff was an objection totally different from that which he is now endeavouring to tell the Committee he has long entertained.

SIR E. J. REED: I used no authority of my own. I read from The Standard newspaper, which distinctly stated my complaint was that on the occasion of severe injury to the unarmoured ends of ships they capsized. The right hon. Gentleman is completely misrepresenting my argument.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Then I shall have to quote from the hon. Gentleman himself. This is the letter upon which the proceedings of the Admiralty and the Report of the Committee had their origin. It is signed "E. J. Reed," dated May 16th, 1877, and is to Mr. Barnaby. What the hon. Gentleman then stated was this—

"After what has passed between us, I need hardly say that my objection is confined strictly to the point that, whereas you believe the cork chambers with the cork in them will remain more or less intact during a protracted action, I fear and believe that, exposed as they are to the attack of the enemy's shell fire, they would be speedily and completely destroyed, and in that case the ship's stability would be gone, and she would capsize."

That was the objection which my hon. Friend at that time urged to these ships. That question was fully investigated by the Committee. I have their Report here, and it will be found among the Papers presented to Parliament in 1878. I decline, therefore, to go into that old controversy. The hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for Belfast (Sir E. Harland) has contributed a very valuable and interesting speech to this Debate. He pointed out certain facts which, I think, are somewhat overlooked by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff. The first of these points was the immense energy of the blow which was struck by the Camperdown on the Victoria—such a blow as was probably never before struck by one ship upon another. The energy of that blow was such that the hon. Baronet alleges—and I think there will be many who will agree with him—that even if that end of the ship had been armoured down to her keel, or the blow had been struck upon armour instead of being struck on the unarmoured part of the ship below the protective deck, still the armour would have been smashed in, and the ship would have received the wound she did, or something very much like it. There is a good deal of evidence in support of that view. The Vanguard and the Grosser Kurfürst were both armoured ships, and in both these cases that happened which happened in the case of the Victoria, and both ships went down. It should also be remembered that the spur or ram of the Camperdown penetrated some feet into the hold of the Victoria through her thin plates. This wound below the protective deck was inflicted before ever the upper part of the stern of the Camperdown could strike the part of the Victoria's side which an armour belt would have protected, according to my hon. Friend (Sir C. Reed). I do not want to enter into details. We have not yet before us the full facts in respect to what actually happened in the case of the collision between the Camperdown and the Victoria. The evidence only reached this country on the 5th of August. That was on the Saturday before the Bank Holiday. It was only, therefore, on the 8th August that it was possible the evidence could be taken in hand; and owing to the necessity for its being examined in manuscript by the officials at the Admiralty before it could be passed on to the printers, it has not yet reached even the members of the Board. Until we have that printed, until we have examined the voluminous evidence and seen a Report upon that evidence from the experts of the Admiralty, it is impossible for the Admiralty to say exactly what kind of an inquiry shall take place. That the Admiralty will inquire very thoroughly into the subject the Committee need have no doubt. So serious, so disastrous, so deplorable an event as the loss of this great ship, and the large number of lives which were unfortunately sacrificed, cannot take place without the Admiralty feeling that heavy responsibility rests upon them, and that responsibility, I can assure the Committee, they will discharge. Whether a further special inquiry will or will not be necessary we cannot decide until we have studied that evidence and until we have the Report before us. When we have considered and decided that matter we shall give the earliest information to the House. I noticed with pleasure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), said he would not press the Admiralty as to the mode or time or exact nature of the inquiry, and he only urged the necessity of an inquiry. That necessity is recognised by the Admiralty; but we do claim complete freedom according to the facts which we shall ascertain as to the exact mode, time, and nature of the inquiry. I will gladly pass from this subject to the other points mentioned in the course of the discussion. I am sorry, on account of the time at my disposal, that I shall only have to deal with them very cursorily. It is a little difficult to meet the wishes of all hon. Members. If I intervene early, complaint is made that the Representatives of the Government occupy the whole time, and if I intervene at a late stage the limited time will not permit me to answer fully all the points that have been raised. The hon. Member for Cardiff asked me some questions about the expenditure on the Edgar. He very kindly said he would communicate with me, and I will take care that he shall receive the information he asks for. But there were some fallacies in the points he brought before the House which I will clear up now. First of all, the Dockyard Estimate was not in existence when the tenders for the contract ships were received. The hon. Member thought we had this higher Estimate in our hands when we accepted these lower tenders from the contractors. That is not the case. Then with respect to the extras, as to which he seems to think we have treated the contractors rather hardly. I have to inform him that the extras were adjusted item by item on the basis of prices asked for each item by the contractors. However, I will gladly give him all the particulars he desires. The hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) referred to the Crescent in connection with the dockyards, and he treated the Edgar and the Crescent as sister ships. I should have thought my hon. Friend, with his great naval knowledge, would not have fallen into that mistake. The Crescent is one of the Royal Arthur class, and is a vessel of 7,700 tons, whereas the Edgar is a ship of 7,350 tons. If he had carried his eye one line further in the naval programme contained in the Estimates he would have found these figures. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) made a few strictures upon the policy of the present Board; but I observed that he agreed with us on important points, and he congratulated us on not binding Parliament to a programme stereotyped in advance. He asked me a number of questions with respect to Naval Defence ships, which were rather of a character which would be better given on paper than by word of mouth. Meanwhile, I can assure him that the ships completed are not consigned to any limbo, but are either in commission or in the Fleet Reserve, so that in the event of emergencies they can be placed in commission in the smallest space of time. He further asked me whether in laying down our programme we adopted the definite and understood view that our Navy should be equal to that of two Powers combined. I have already answered that question earlier in the Session. There is no difference between us and the late Board on that subject, and we certainly hold that the British Navy should be equal to the combined Navies of two foreign Powers. I do not think my hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Admiral Field) has left me a great deal to answer, and he himself destroyed the arguments of some of his own friends. He tells us that Lord Hood is in favour of a progressive scheme. There is no difference of opinion in that respect between Lord Hood and the present Board of Admiralty, but we do not think it necessary prematurely to publish our scheme. We think it necessary to publish a scheme for the year, and we are not pursuing a policy of having no scheme for the future, or of not contemplating building any ships in future. The other points he has mentioned are being thoroughly considered by the Admiralty and attended to.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I asked if it was intended to replace the Victoria.

\*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I have already dealt with that point this evening. As to our position in the Mediterranean, I am very glad to be able to give my hon. Friend some information, and I am pleased to tell him that our Fleet there with respect to battleships will presently be stronger in quality than it has been for a long time. The Hood has virtually replaced the Victoria. And the Anson, Ramillies, and Rodney are soon to replace the Colossus, Inflexible, and Edinburgh. The Board of Admiralty have, moreover, come to the conclusion that for a considerable time the Mediterranean Fleet has been below its proper strength in respect of cruisers. A strong opinion was expressed by Sir G. Tryon, whose weight as a great naval authority I am sure that the House will continue to recognise, that it was necessary to strengthen the Fleet in this direction, and, within two or three months, this will be done. With respect to the remarks of the hon. Baronet opposite on the subject of the Magnificent and Majestic, I am sorry I failed to give him exactly the information he wished for in reply to questions, and I will endeavour to supply the deficiencies now. When I referred to a speed of  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots, I must remind the hon. Baronet that is about what may be considered the ordinary full speed for long distances. It is not intended to take battleships for long distances at a greater speed than  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots; therefore, the figures which I gave are practically such as apply to full speed for long distances. With respect to what the hon. Baronet says as to coal being all in bunkers, we entirely agree that that is very desirable, as far as possible, and I can tell him that, in addition to the 900 tons which each of these ships will hold, they are capable of carrying an additional 850 tons in bunkers. The effect of that will be to immerse the ship by only about 16 inches more. She would start the voyage 16 inches deeper than her ordinary depth, but as the coal was consumed she would obtain her normal depth. The hon. Baronet described the rams in existing warships as useless, but I am afraid our experience of the effect of rams does not lead the Admiralty to the same conclusion. The effects obtained have, no doubt, been accidental, but they have resulted in immense disaster. The Admiralty are at present investigating the effects on the rams and stems of the Camperdown and the Forth, both very remarkable cases. With regard to the value of coal as a protection against projectiles, experiments have been made by the Admiralty, and it has been found that no material offers a better dispersing resistance to projectiles, or destroys their effects better than coal in a ship's bunkers. I am very much obliged to another hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Wolff) for the observations which he has made in support of our great cruisers, and I would answer the point he has raised as to why torpedo gunboats do not catch the torpedo boats. The principal defect lies with the boilers, but as a result of experiments which we are preparing to make, we hope that we shall be able to replace some of the boilers in the torpedo gunboats by tubular boilers. We hope that with improvements these vessels may yet have a useful future before them. As to the torpedo boat destroyers, we have already obtained such satisfactory reports that we are able to proceed at once in ordering some more, but before we have proceeded very far we shall have experience of the actual performance of the torpedo boat destroyer at sea. I now come to the complaints made by the third Member for Belfast, who in succession took part in this Debate, (Mr. Arnold-Forster). In the first place, I can assure him that there was no delay with respect to the Renown. The Renown was to be built at Pembroke, and she was taken in hand as soon as possible in view of the work that had to be completed at Pembroke under the Naval Defence Act. And here I would interpose a remark to this effect: It seems very strange that strong accusations are brought against us about not doing this or that which is new, or not having laid down new ships when the fact is that our programme was laid down for us by our predecessors up to a certain number of months ago. We have stuck to the programme; and not only so, but we have hastened the completion of that programme. We have hastened the completion of the battle-ships, and we ought to receive the gratitude instead of the criticism of our predecessors. My hon. Friend complains of the information I gave him, in reply to a question, and he says that the information, in his mind, was of a different character to that which was indicated by his question on the Paper. He tells me now that what he had in his mind was to ask what entirely new vessels of our own planning and designing we had laid down; but there was nothing of that sort in the question he put on the Paper. His question asked how many ships of the Royal Navy had been commenced in the dockyards or elsewhere since September 1, 1892, and what were their names and the dates they were commenced. I answered him briefly, and I handed him a list afterwards which contained the full information he asked for; and although I did not answer the question he had in his mind, I certainly answered the question he had on the Paper. I have now endeavoured to answer all the points that have been brought before me, and I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his Amendment.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he had been waiting since 4 o'clock to make some remarks on the Amendment, since which time the Debate had been taken up with matters altogether foreign to the Amendment. He wished especially to call attention to the practice of officers in the dockyards lending money to others in the same employment, a system deserving of the strongest condemnation, and which ought to be put an end to, especially in the interests of the poorer members in the dockyards. Another matter was that relating to the Admiral Superintendents. These officers cost £5,649; he was informed that there was no occasion for these officials whatever, and that the spending of the money was an absolute waste.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PISTOLS BILL.—(No. 425.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) hoped the House would allow this Bill to be read a second time. It met practically with the assent of both sides of the House; it dealt with a serious public evil; and all the objections to it were objections that could very readily be met. The Government were perfectly prepared to give a reasonable time before the Committee stage was taken, and he trusted the House would agree to the Second Reading.

Objection being taken,

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I am bound to say I think there are a great many objectionable features in the Bill—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The further progress of the Bill is objected to.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, the clause he objected to was that relating to the right of search by the police.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue various Expiring Laws."—(Sir J. T. Hibbert.)

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) wished to know if they would have time to discuss the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill this year? It contained matters of very great importance touching upon the whole question of election, the Ballot Act, illiterate voters, all of which were most contentious matters, and would require discussion.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, all the matters included in the Bill were old matters, which had been passed in the Bill for 20 years or more. There might be some new points, but the general subjects were not at all new. He did not see, therefore, why the Bill should be put down specially so as to give time for discussion. There would be the usual time for discussing it like other Bills of the same character. He would undertake that the Second Reading should not be brought on before Friday, which would give the hon. Member a chance to see the Bill in print.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will it be the first Order on Friday?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Certainly not.

MR. BARTLEY: Then I object.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) suggested that the First Reading stage might be allowed to pass, so that they could see the Bill in print.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) also recommended that the present stage should be taken, and then hon. Members with the Bill in print could see what it contained.

MR. BARTLEY said, he would withdraw his objection on the understanding that on the Second Reading stage they had time to discuss the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir J. T. Hibbert, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Attorney General.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 451.]

SALE OF GOODS (re-committed) BILL [Lords].—(No. 441.)

Considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (No. 2) BILL [Lords].—(No. 437.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Second Schedule.

Question proposed, "That this be the Second Schedule of the Bill."

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

NAVAL DEFENCE ACT, 1889.

Resolution reported—

"That it is expedient to authorise the grant, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of sums not exceeding in the aggregate £1,350,000, for the completion and equipment of ships under 'The Naval Defence Act, 1889,' and to amend the said Act."

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mellor, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, and Mr. Edmund Robertson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 450.]

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 431.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

THE PATRONAGE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire): I beg to give notice that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will, to-morrow, at the commencement of Business, move the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule for the purpose of concluding Vote 8 in Supply.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Would it not be better that the Government should suspend the Twelve o'Clock Rule for the rest of the Session?

[No answer was given.]

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 29th August 1893.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

COMPANIES WINDING-UP BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, the object of this brief Bill is to make an Amendment in the Winding-up Acts for the purpose of supplying a defect which experience has proved to exist with regard to the winding-up of Companies. Under the Winding-up Acts there is power to make an order for payment of money by a director guilty of misconduct, or in default; but there is a difficulty in enforcing that by bankruptcy proceedings, which cause delay and sometimes injustice. This Bill proposes simply to remedy that evil.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SHERIFF COURTS CONSIGNATIONS

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD PLAYFAIR, in moving the Second Reading, said, this was simply a Treasury Administrative Bill in reference to money paid by suitors which sometimes accumulated in the hands of Sheriffs. The Bill provided that after seven years unpaid consignations should be paid over to the Queen's Remembrancer or Lord Treasurer. It gave, at the same time, the right to any person who might not have claimed money to demand it from the Queen's Remembrancer.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) BILL.—(No. 255.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, I have to move an Amendment in Clause 3. It is merely to make it in accordance with what has already been passed, and is, in fact, consequential.

Amendment moved,

In Clause 3, page 1, to leave out ("wholly exempt") and insert ("exempt wholly or partially as the case may be").—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee.

LADIES' HALL, BANGOR COLLEGE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH called attention to the circumstances under which the Ladies' Hall, at Bangor, in connection with the University College of North Wales, had been closed by the action of the College authorities; and asked the Lord President of the Council what steps could be taken to remedy the injury which had been done to the Lady Principal, to the directors and shareholders of the Ladies' Hall, and to the cause of women's education in Wales? He asked for the indulgence usually accorded to one who addressed the House for the first time, while he called attention to a subject which not only involved injustice to individuals and to several persons who had devoted time, labour, and money to the higher education of women in Wales, but also vitally affected higher education itself, especially for women, in the Principality. It was necessary to begin by distinguishing the three Bodies concerned. There were Directors who were the Governing Body of the Ladies' Hall at Bangor; the Senate, consisting of the Principal, Professors, and permanent Lecturers of the College, who were charged with matters of discipline and education; and the Council, who were the supreme Governing Body of the University College at Bangor. As the result of an inquiry by a Departmental Committee into higher education in Wales, University College was established in 1884, and to the establishment of that College all classes of the community contributed their aid with remarkable unanimity. By the end of the year more than £37,000 had been subscribed; and with this sum and a grant of £4,000 a year from the Treasury the College was opened. In 1886 several ladies and gentlemen interested in the higher education of women in Wales joined together to provide, under a resident Lady Principal, board and residence for female students wishing to study at Bangor College. They formed themselves into a company and leased a property from Lord Penrhyn, and they spent more than £4,000 in furnishing the women's hall. The College authorities declined to take any share in the financial responsibility for this undertaking or in framing regulations; but they recognised the women's hall. The College authorities, he was informed, declined to take any responsibility of any kind either in regard to financial liabilities or the regulations for the women's hall; but they had recognised the hall by recording that—

Relying upon this and upon the bona fides and common sense of the College authorities, the Directors opened the women's hall in 1888. The hall prospered under the superintendence of Miss Hughes, and it numbered 28 students. The Directors were about to spend £2,000 in providing increased accommodation, when the difficulty arose which led to the action for libel at the recent Chester Assizes, in which Miss Hughes recovered £350 damages and costs, and completely vindicated herself from the charge of maligning a lady student, which had led the Council to revoke the licence to the women's hall. The main facts were recited in the Charge of Mr. Justice Charles to the jury. He said the Court absolutely and entirely cleared the character of Miss Hughes from the charges which had been formulated by the Senate, and that she was justified in not appearing before it, a letter having been written to her which Mr. Justice Charles said looked very much like a writ. The learned Judge further said that the inquiry which had been held by the Senate had been conducted without the slightest regard to the ordinary form of judicial proceedings. Justice had been done to her character, and he now asked that the same justice should be done to others. The Directors, much as they felt the grievous injury which had been done to the cause to which they had contributed so much time and money, were willing to let bygones be bygones; but they asked that Miss Hughes should be reinstated in the position from which she had been wrongfully thrust by the Council on a charge which had been declared by a Court of Justice to be unfounded. In another place the Vice President of the Council had stated that this was a matter of internal discipline, and therefore could not be inquired into; but in a State-endowed College it was difficult to understand how any public inquiry could be held that did not relate to the internal management and life of the College. The right hon. Gentleman who gave this answer was making for himself quite a reputation by the zeal he displayed in examining and inquiring into the minutest detail of the smallest elementary school-room; and why his zeal should cool down when he was asked to deal with the larger subject of a State College was a matter difficult to explain. Owing to the action of the College authorities six members of the Council had withdrawn, among them being the Duke of Westminster and the Lord Lieutenant of Anglesea, who was a leading Nonconformist in Wales. The injustice which had driven them away from the College for which they had done so much would, if not remedied, injure the future of that Institution, and would destroy the co-operation which had resulted so beneficially in the past. He therefore desired to ask the Lord President whether any inquiry would be held into this matter which he had ventured to bring before the House?

The Bishop of St. Asaph

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am afraid I can only repeat the answer given by the Vice President, in which I entirely agree, that the question relates to an internal disciplinary matter in which the Government have no jurisdiction. I will not go into the question in regard to Miss Hughes. There has been an unfortunate quarrel, but the College authorities are invested with certain powers, and they have thought fit to exercise those powers. It was for them to judge whether it is desirable that this hall in which the ladies resided should or should not be connected with the College; but it is not a matter in which the Government are called upon to order an inquiry. With regard to the remarks from the Judicial Bench which have been referred to, without in the least impugning the learned Judge's Charge, I would point out that it was not the action of the College authorities but of a newspaper that was before him for trial, and I decline altogether to be bound by opinions expressed by the Judge in such circumstances upon a matter which was not before him for trial. I can only say that we deeply regret that this trouble should have arisen with regard to an admirable institution, and I sincerely hope that means will be found to adjust matters in difference for the future usefulness of the College. And I would remark that it is not absolutely necessary that Miss Hughes should remain the head of the Ladies' College, and that very likely if some other lady could be induced to undertake the duty a licence would be granted. But I repeat this is not a matter in which the Government can be called upon to interfere, or, indeed, to express any opinion.

THE BISHOP OF BANGOR begged to express his disagreement with the view of the Lord President that this was a purely disciplinary matter. He did not contend for a moment that the Senate had not full power over the discipline of the College; but this was a much wider question. Around the Colleges at Bangor, Cardiff, and Aberystwith were grouped various halls for male and female students connected with the Church and with the various denominations and sects, and it would be a great hardship, if under such circumstances as these, their licences were to be withdrawn. There was no charge whatever brought against the Directors of this hall, nor against the students; but simply because there was a disagreement between Miss Hughes and the Senate of the College, the Senate acted on their own judgment, and practically claimed the right of dismissing the head and withdrawing the licence from any institution connected with the College. Difficulties had arisen in this matter out of which he could not see any way except by the Government granting an inquiry into the whole subject. By that means the College would be enabled to work for the common good. He hoped, therefore, the noble Earl would reconsider the matter before it was too late.

LORD PENRHYN, as one of the Governors of Bangor who had withdrawn his name from the Council in consequence of what had taken place, said there could be no question that a very grievous wrong had been done in this case, and he pressed the Government to reconsider their determination and grant an inquiry. He could not agree with the Lord President that this was a matter in which those connected with the libel action were alone concerned, and not the College, for the libel action would never have been heard of had it not been for the course taken by the authorities in calling upon Miss Hughes to apologise for what she had not done, and then arbitrarily ordering the hall to be closed, so that Miss Hughes had lost her position. It was no light matter to alienate so many friends of education in North Wales, and he respectfully urged upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity for an inquiry.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: My Lords, I should like to say a few words upon this subject, because I do not entirely agree with the noble Earl who occupies the position I formerly held. I quite admit that, as President of the Council, he has no jurisdiction in the matter whatever; but as a Member of the Government which grants the large sum of £4,000 yearly to the College he has a very distinct interest in seeing that that money is properly administered. That seems to me to impose a duty upon the Government where a matter of this kind is brought to their knowledge—not a purely disciplinary matter within the College itself, but one outside; the authorities having put an end to this institution upon grounds which cannot be supported. That was done upon evidence which, as Mr. Justice Charles said, was not at all ordinary judicial evidence. It seems to me that in a case of this sort the Government might very well give the matter careful consideration whether, before making their grant to this College, they should inquire what its position is in relation to this subordinate hall. It seems to me to be a most unfortunate position for these Colleges that there should be nobody to check anything they do; that they should be allowed to enter the University entirely as independent Members; and that the Ministry itself should not have the power of checking any excesses upon their part. I think the Government, therefore, should carefully inquire into this matter and the position of the College before they supply it with further funds.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, I think the noble Earl is inviting the Government to undertake a somewhat dangerous task. The discipline of the College in these respects—namely, the granting and refusing licences to particular halls—has been committed by the law to the Governing Body of the College; and if in every case in which it may be considered that the Governing Body of a College have come to a wrong decision in exercising the powers committed to them, the Government which is not made the superior Judge over their proceedings, and to whom an appeal might have been given from their decisions, were to interpose and say—"Before making the grant which has been determined upon by Parliament as proper to be given to this College, we must inquire how the Senate have exercised the powers which the law has committed to them without appeal," it would be a very dangerous precedent, and one which the noble Earl might be the first to regret in relation to other matters. What I would suggest is that if wrong has been done bad blood would be more likely to be put an end to if after what has passed an appeal was made to the Senate to reconsider the position it has taken up. I quite admit that what has taken place furnishes very substantial grounds to the Senate for listening to such an appeal, and I hope they will be manly enough and generous enough to reconsider the matter on fresh evidence.

[The subject then dropped.]

COLLEGE CHARTER ACT, 1871 (UNIVERSITY OF WALES).

RESOLUTION.

THE BISHOP OF CHESTER moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the assent of Her Majesty be withheld from the Draft Charter of the proposed University of Wales until such portions of the aforesaid Draft Charter shall have been omitted as prevent the inclusion of St. David's College, Lampeter, in the County of Cardigan, as a constituent College of the aforesaid proposed University of Wales."

He said, the object of the Motion was not the rejection of, but to improve the Charter by broadening its basis. Its aim was first the good of higher education in Wales; and, secondly, of St. David's College, Lampeter, which had been a Chartered College for 65 years. Its first Charter, the Charter of Incorporation, was granted in 1828; its second Charter for conferring the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, was given in 1852; and its Arts Charter in 1865. Under its Arts Charter the Arts Degree was made to move as far as possible upon the old lines of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The College itself could never appoint more than one Examiner, the others being appointed by the Vice Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1880 a Committee of Inquiry into higher education in Wales, under the presidency of Lord Aberdare, was appointed. It was a thoroughly impartial Body, and the result of the inquiry was to the effect that a Welsh University should be established, and that Lampeter should be included in it. Since then the educational power of the Institution had become at least twice as great as it was in 1881, when Lord Aberdare's Departmental Committee reported, and when he had himself the honour of being Principal. It had grown in every part, and had been affiliated to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and had largely availed itself of that affiliation. Its whole education had broadened, and therefore if the College deserved to be included in 1881 it was doubly fit to be included now. The first reason for including it was the benefit that would accrue to higher education in Wales. It would be good for the Welsh University that Lampeter should be included. It would be something that Nonconformist ministers and the clergy of the Church should in future have this bond of union—that they belonged to a common University. It had been the policy of Lampeter all along to welcome co-operation with the other Colleges of the proposed University upon equitable terms. Those who might be responsible for the exclusion of Lampeter would leave a root of bitterness in Welsh life, social, political, and religious, if they compelled clergymen to have different sympathies and interests as regarded their University from their Nonconformist brethren, and that would be the case if Lampeter was left in a position of isolation. If the Charter became law in its present shape it would form a mischievous precedent for the Gresham University, and would bear hardly on King's College, London. What were the reasons for not carrying out the recommendations of Lord Aberdare's Committee, and admitting Lampeter to the Welsh University? One of the reasons adduced added insult to injury, for it was said that Lampeter had made no application, and was now too late. It had on every occasion expressed its desire to become a member of the proposed University on fair terms; but it declined to have its claims retried by an incompetent tribunal. The Shrewsbury Conference, held to consider the question of the Welsh University Charter, was not recognised by law, and it was not recognised by Lampeter. It was a Conference dominated by the three existing State-aided Colleges. He was glad that their Lordships had just previously had an object-lesson in the judicial temper exhibited by one of those Colleges, the College of Bangor. Why should Lampeter have gone to the Conference at Shrewsbury cap in hand to ask the representatives of those three Colleges to be admitted as a member of the proposed University when it knew that admission would be refused by them except on thoroughly inequitable conditions? The Professors had in the proper way petitioned the Privy Council to be heard; but doubtless for sufficient reasons that request was not granted, and this was the first opportunity the College had had of getting its claims fairly tried since 1880. As their Lordships knew, the Draft Charter had lain on the Table of the House during a month so unpropitious that it was a marvel the College had been able to state any case at all. The refusal to include Lampeter in the Welsh University was worse than ill-grounded. It was said that this College was heterogeneous, that it represented the old University types of Oxford and Cambridge, and that it was a tutorial and residential College. This was an objection of mere academic pedantry, and not one springing from a broad view of College life. Among other objections urged against the inclusion of Lampeter, it was stated that the constitution of the College would not amalgamate with those of the three other University Colleges, and that Lampeter was almost a purely Theological College—that the Arts were subordinated to the Theological Course. It was true that from the first Lampeter maintained that it would be absurd to establish in Wales a University which ignored theology. What was required in Wales was that great freedom should be given to the constituent Colleges of the University to teach theology upon their own lines, frankly recognising the undogmatic and the dogmatic conscience alike, and that the University examination should be undenominational. One fact alone would show that the Arts were not subordinated to Theology in the College, and that was that at the last examination three-fourths of the papers sent in were non-theological, even for candidates going out in theology, and had reference to the Arts. But the real reason why the College was to be excluded from the University was because it was connected with the Church of England. That was at the bottom of the whole matter, and the fact must be acknowledged. If the College wished to override the other Colleges, and was anxious to exclude the Colleges of any other denomination, there might be something in the objection; but there was no such intention, and Lampeter would simply come in as one of the other Colleges—not as one out of three as proposed by Lord Aberdare's Committee, but as one out of four. Lampeter was more likely to be overpowered by the other Colleges than to overpower them. Their Lordships probably knew how things were tending in Wales in regard to matters of religious controversy. A movement was in progress throughout elementary education which, unless it was stemmed, would find its way into higher and University education. In the Board schools in Wales the Bible was subjected to the same treatment that Lampeter was in regard to the Welsh University—it was excluded. The Report of 1888 showed that out of, in round numbers, 300 Board schools the Bible had been banished from 123; it was simply read in 119, and in 290 of these schools there was no religious examination. As to intermediate education, the Act passed by the late Government, with the best possible intentions, was simply being warped and distorted by an aggressive and intolerant denominationalism in Wales. To speak of Cardiganshire alone, such was the intolerance of denominationalism, that though a school had been established there acknowledged on all sides to be efficient, and to which Nonconformists readily sent their children, it was now proposed to penalise the parents of Nonconformist children by compelling them to send the children to distant schools rather than allow them to hold their exhibitions at the school established and maintained by St. David's College. The spirit thus displayed in intermediate education would soon find its way into the higher education of Wales. On May 2 last Dr. Martineau wrote a very remarkable and valuable letter in The Times dealing, in a very different way, with the subject, in which, among other remarks, he said—

"This fascinating theory of 'a common Christianity' on which the essentials are to settle, after leave of absence has been given to all else, will not work. . . . A religious man cannot cut his theology into pieces and deal it out in fragments selected by deference to others' belief."

Dr. Martineau also used those words which, he ventured to say, might be written in gold for their Lordships' recollection—

"Hold fast the protection for the undogmatic conscience; add an equal provision for the dogmatic."

The Bishop of Chester

Lampeter had no wish to interfere with the religious principles of any other College, but claimed that it should not be excluded from the Welsh University because it held fast to its own religious principles. Their Lordships should remember that what was being done in this matter in Wales would, before long, be repeated in England. Therefore, this question was not a small one of a merely local character, but it was one of such importance to the whole country that it demanded the serious consideration of their Lordships.

Moved to resolve—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the assent of Her Majesty be withheld from the Draft Charter of the proposed University of Wales until such portions of the aforesaid Draft Charter shall have been omitted as prevent the inclusion of St. David's College, Lampeter, in the County of Cardigan, as a constituent College of the aforesaid proposed University of Wales."—(The Lord Bishop of Chester.)

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, with regard to the statement made by the Vice President of the Council in another place in answer to a question put to him, that the Visitor of Lampeter College had made no representation on the subject of the proposed Welsh University, that he had been a Visitor for many years, and the reason why he had made no official representation was that he had never been called upon to do so, although he had on several public occasions expressed his strong opinion that Lampeter ought to be included in the University, believing that, on the whole, it would be to the advantage of the College that it should be included. He might add that the Petition presented to the Privy Council by the Principal and Professors of the College was unofficially and informally submitted to him, and had his full concurrence. He desired to make that statement now, because his silence upon that occasion might have been misconstrued. The question had been asked of what advantage would it be to the College of Lampeter to be included as a constituent member of the proposed University? He frankly confessed that he had had many debates with himself on the subject, but had at last come to the conclusion that the balance of advantage was on the side of inclusion. It was a question for the authorities of the College, and they desired to be included. Although the College would lose something by inclusion, it was the duty of the authorities to waive any objections they might have in view of the advantages which would accrue from its inclusion to the University when that institution should come into being. If there was to be a University for Wales, that University should be as efficient, as national, as liberal, and as comprehensive as possible. It would do the University infinite injury to have so important an element as the College of Lampeter excluded from it. He feared that the effect of the exclusion of Lampeter would be to perpetuate divisions that unhappily existed, and he did not understand why efforts should be made to exclude the College unless they were made for partisan purposes. It was in the interests of a section that the exclusion was advocated. He protested strongly against this attempt, to use an American word, to gerrymander a place of higher education. The proposed Charter in many respects seemed to be the work of a doctrinaire, there being a great deal that smacked of academic pedantry about it. If it became law, it would be very distasteful to a large minority at least of the inhabitants of Wales, and certainly very distasteful to a large majority of the educated people of that country.

*LORD ABERDARE said, having presided over the Departmental Committee in which this Charter was prepared, he had listened with great regret to the grave imputations cast upon it by the right rev. Prelates who had spoken. They had told the House there was a desire on the part of the Committee to exclude Lampeter. The Committee had the assistance of the late Principal of Lampeter, Chancellor Edmondes, a man of great ability and admirable judgment, whose loss he deeply deplored, and afterwards with his successor, Principal Owen. Though in close communication with him from November, 1891, down to January last, he really could not ascertain what Lampeter desired in the matter. For 14 months this question was constantly before him, and during that period he was, of course, in frequent communication with representatives of Lampeter, and yet he could not ascertain what Lampeter desired. In fact, he did not know now. The recommendation of the Departmental Committee was that the College should give up the power of conferring Degrees in Arts, and to this day he did not know whether or not it intended to surrender that power which distinguished it from other Theological Colleges.

THE BISHOP OF CHESTER said, that no other idea had ever entered the minds of those connected with Lampeter than that if the College became a constituent part of the University it would give up its own power of conferring degrees.

*LORD ABERDARE said, that the intimation which now came from the right rev. Prelate had never been expressed before, and great doubt had been felt on the point, for many of the leading Churchmen who gave evidence before the Departmental Committee argued with considerable force that the present Charter of the College ought not to be surrendered. The only clear statement of opinion he was then able to get upon the matter was from the late Principal Edmondes, who said he thought the University Charter ought to be an enlargement of the Charter of St. David's. The Dean of St. David's and others thought that the existing Charter ought not to be interfered with, but that if the rest of Wales required a Charter for a University they should have it. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of St. David's) himself doubted whether it would be to the advantage of the College to part with its Charter; and the Bishop of Bangor, then at the head of one of the largest and most important schools in Wales, went further, and said there ought to be no alteration in the present state of things, while objecting to the enlargement of the Charter of Lampeter on the ground that he had no great faith in the work it was doing. In answer to Question 15,983 in the evidence, the right rev. Prelate said—

“It strikes me it must be very difficult for examiners to come down and examine half-a-dozen, apart from others, and to see that they have reached the same standard as men from Oxford and Cambridge, who are doing a different class of work. The class of boys who go to Lampeter is not the best class of boys in Welsh schools, and I do not see how the degree can be of equal value to those of Oxford and Cambridge, nor do I think the Lampeter men themselves have set a high value upon the degree."

The Departmental Committee held sittings in every county in Wales, and all the leading men in the country had given their opinions upon the question of the provision of higher education for Wales. Since then Welsh opinion had become in many respects largely modified. When the Committee made their recommendation there were 64 students at Lampeter, and the only other College was the undenominational one at Aberystwith, where there were 57. It was quite uncertain what advantage would be taken throughout Wales of the foundation of another College. But since that time—1881—the number of students at the undenominational Colleges had increased rapidly, having risen to 677, without reckoning medical students, whose numbers so often swelled the rolls of public Colleges. The circumstances, therefore, had greatly altered. Again, Educational Committees had been appointed all over Wales to inquire into the best method of establishing a system of intermediate education; the various problems connected with higher education had been widely discussed, and clearer ideas prevailed as to their solution. Nobody would think at the present moment of suggesting the solution recommended by the Departmental Committee of enlarging the Charter of St. David's College; and the question now was whether a University should be founded in which Lampeter should or not find a place? He would have been glad had it been possible to enlarge the Charter of Lampeter; but that was at present impracticable. When Lampeter was founded it was a strictly Theological College, though subsequently liberal arrangements were made for those who were not members of the Church of England; but in spite of that he would ask, without wishing to say anything against an institution that had done so much good, was it or was it not true that it had never had the confidence of the Nonconformist Bodies? Parents were afraid of the genius loci, and that their children would adopt the opinions of the majority. Some Nonconformists, no doubt, had taken their degrees there; but he believed that the right rev. Prelate who opened the Debate, and who had himself done so much for the success of the College, could reckon on his fingers the number of Nonconformists who had availed themselves of the teaching of the College. Then, again, the Visitor had powers that were utterly unknown in any other College, and altogether its constitution was entirely different from that of the other three Welsh Colleges. He denied the statement that the decision of the Committee had been affected in any way by the odium theologicum. He was quite certain if the Governing Body of Lampeter were other than it was, if it had not an autocrat—he admitted a wise and benign autocrat—in the Visitor, if it had anything like a broad liberal constitution, it would have been very difficult to have found any just reasons for excluding Lampeter from its share in the University. Of course, it must show that its work was as good as that of the other three Colleges, and he quite admitted that its Professors were a very able body of men; but, possibly from want of adequate means, several of them had to take charge of two subjects, and it was hardly possible that with such a division of labour their work should be as effective as was the case in the other three Colleges who had large and ample staffs, each man dealing with his own subject. If Lampeter was to be included, what were they to say to the eight Welsh Theological Colleges in which the Arts were taught with varying efficiency? He doubted whether any of them would come up to the standard which would be required. The effect of admitting a number of Colleges with varying standards would be that the standard must be lowered in order to meet them all. Their Lordships would see the difficulties which surrounded the matter, and that considering the present position of Lampeter, considering its government and past history, it would have been hardly possible to admit it consistently with their duty, and with the principles on which the lines of the Charter were drawn. The amplest provision had been made in the Charter for the admission of other Colleges hereafter. He could not say that at this moment Lampeter stood on the same educational footing as the other three Colleges, and he lamented the necessity under which the Committee laboured of not admitting it; but he did not think that, consistently with what they thought an University degree should be, they could safely do so without incurring the result of lowering the standard.

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH said, the noble Lord had apparently changed his own opinion very largely since 1880, which was no doubt a very long time ago; and surely he would not claim the luxury of a change of opinion for his own side exclusively. The noble Lord had told them that he repudiated anything like theological or political feeling, and hoped that they would not be introduced into the matter, and then he said that they could not include Lampeter because it had not gained the confidence of the Nonconformists. He was not aware that Church Colleges were likely to gain the confidence of Nonconformists. What was asked was that Lampeter should be excluded because it was a Church College. Then the noble Lord also said that Lampeter had not asked to be included. It was quite enough that they came there and asked to be included in the Welsh University. Again, it was undoubtedly a good thing to have a Visitor, and the difficulty which had arisen in reference to the ladies' hall at Bangor would never have occurred if there had been a Visitor there with the same power as the Visitor possessed at Lampeter. The Bishop of St. David's had authorised him to say that a scheme had been prepared under which it would be easy for Lampeter to be included in the Welsh University, and the authorities of the College were quite willing to submit it for consideration when an opportunity occurred. Lord Aberdare, whose great services to the cause of education in Wales he ventured to recognise, had not met the point that they had not been treated fairly in the matter, and that Lampeter had not been excluded on the ground that it had not done splendid work in the past.

LORD ABERDARE said, he had not denied it.

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH hoped, in conclusion, that the House would not consent to the Charter being passed as it stood.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it was not denied that Lampeter had done good work, but the noble Lord said it should be excluded because it had not conciliated and secured the affections of the Nonconformists.

*LORD ABERDARE said, he had never made that statement, and would not have put it forward, considering it an extremely inadequate reason.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the noble Lord had certainly made some statement to that effect as one of the reasons he put forward—that Lampeter had not succeeded in obtaining the affections of a large number of the Welsh people.

*LORD ABERDARE said, he gave that as a reason why they should shrink from enlarging the Charter of Lampeter, but not for the exclusion of that College from the Welsh University.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the noble Lord had apparently put his arguments a little out of order if that was what he meant, but he certainly gave the impression that that was one of his main grounds. No sufficient reason had been given why Lampeter should be excluded. What had been said, and with a great deal of force, was that Lampeter was slow in making up its mind, and that was a very good reason why they should hesitate to include Lampeter. At the same time, Lampeter did send in a Petition, and did distinctly ask to be included. It even went so far as to say that it was willing to surrender its Charter—to surrender the power of giving degrees. It was, therefore, a little hard upon Lampeter for the noble Lord to say the College had declined to give up its Charter.

LORD ABERDARE said, his statement was that it had never been suggested during the whole time the Conference and Committee were going on that there was any willingness on the part of the College to surrender its Charter. It was after everything was closed that that proposal was heard for the first time.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was glad to have drawn out that remark, because certainly the noble Lord's argument seemed to go the length of saying that never until that day had any intimation of willingness been given. It was only natural that they should hesitate, for they had the privilege of granting their own degrees, and they were considering as to joining a University where the great majority would probably be by no means friendly to their views. But when they petitioned the Privy Council there was no further question about the matter. The College might have been a little late, but there could be no doubt they had desired to be included for some time past. One argument brought forward was that Lampeter had not as good a staff as the other three Colleges, and therefore was not able to do as good work, though it was admitted to have done good work in the past—that the other three Colleges were in a position to do much better and higher work in the future. That argument did not amount to very much, because the claim to large numbers had been completely knocked to pieces. It had been pointed out that the large number of students attending other Colleges than Lampeter had been arrived at by adding together all sorts of attendances at classes; but he would like to know the number of those who took degrees, for, after all, a College was to be tested not by the number of students attending a few lectures, but by the number who went through a definite course of instruction. The noble Lord had spoken of unwillingness to lower the standard of the University by letting in Lampeter; but nothing could lower it more than letting in a mixed multitude, who were simply taking a few courses here and there with no definite object to which a test could be applied. He was sorry that Lampeter did not make up its mind sooner; but it was no reason for condemning it to perpetual exclusion that it had hesitated to take a step which involved a large self-sacrifice. Nothing could induce it to surrender its Charter but the belief that it could do useful work in the new University. Other Colleges should not have been included in the Charter unless they could show they were doing good work. The Church of England did not ask for any special privilege to be granted to her, or to be treated on a different footing from any other Religious Bodies; but she did ask that there should be fair play all round. In the interests of the highest education, that which looked to true cultivation as the supreme purpose for which a University existed, it would be a great gain to the University of Wales to extend its borders in such a way as to include the College of Lampeter.

*LORD KNUTSFORD said, that as one of the Privy Councillors to whom the Draft University Charter was referred, he desired to state the reasons upon which they acted in approving that Charter with some Amendments, although they did not see their way to then including Lampeter College as a constituent College of the new University. Lord Aberdare had very fully and clearly stated the reasons why the Shrewsbury Conference and the Committee were not able to include Lampeter; and, therefore, he need only explain why the Privy Council could not do so. Sufficient consideration had not been given to the Reservation Clause which would be found at the end of the Charter, which was inserted by the special order of the Privy Council when they found they were not able to admit Lampeter. By that clause power was reserved not to the University, as in the case of the Victoria University, but to the Queen to admit, by any supplementary Charter or Charters, any College or Colleges she might be advised to include. Therefore, when the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London spoke of the "perpetual exclusion" of Lampeter, he could hardly have read through the Charter. There was no difficulty in the way of Lampeter being admitted at any time when the relations of that College to the University were settled. But those who advocated the immediate inclusion of Lampeter were conscious of the existing difficulties in the relations between that College and the other Colleges and the University; and under the consciousness of these difficulties, the simple course of setting to work to remove these difficulties and then applying for a supplementary Charter did not commend itself to the opponents of the Charter; and the result had been considerable vagueness in action on their part. First it was proposed to move a humble Address to Her Majesty to withhold her assent to certain portions of the Draft Charter. The portions of the Charter that were objected to were not mentioned in the Motion, nor was the object of making those alterations stated, and nothing could be more vague and uncertain than the Resolution. The next form the Motion took was to substitute for an Address to Her Majesty the pious opinion of their Lordships that assent should be withheld until portions of the Charter that prevented the inclusion of Lampeter were omitted. The object of the alterations of portions was stated, but again it was not stated what portions they were. It had been assumed in the course of the Debate that in the Petition presented by Lampeter it was stated that Lampeter was willing and ready to give up her privileges and to alter her Charter; but that was the very first time that willingness had been heard of. In the Petition of Lampeter to be admitted into the University which was before the Privy Council, the petitioners only stated that they were prepared to submit Amendments in the Draft University Charter so as to provide for the inclusion of St. David's College, but not a word was there said about giving up their own privileges or desiring to alter their own constitution. On these points there had been a good deal of misapprehension. It was admitted that the time had arrived for the establishment of a University for Wales, and for giving effect in substance to the recommendations of the Committee of 1881, although, as Lord Aberdare had shown, the state of things had so changed since that time that the scheme then suggested could not be adopted in detail. There could be no doubt that the three University Colleges, whose success had been as conspicuous as that of Lampeter, should form the nucleus of that University. When the Draft Charter was prepared, circulated, and discussed, the authorities of Lampeter had not made up their minds what course to pursue. The right rev. Prelate, the Visitor, had admitted that he was not consulted, and that he had great doubts, even up to the present time, what course to advise; and it was most remarkable that during all this time, and though the terms of the Draft Charter had been known so long, no direct resolution for the admission of Lampeter had been moved at any public meeting or by any Public Body. And as had already been pointed out, at no time had there been any statement, until this evening, that the authorities of Lampeter College were ready to give up any privilege, or assent to any alteration of the Lampeter College Charter. The Privy Council had then before them a Draft Charter, which had received, not a unanimous approval, but a large and distinct approval from the leading educational authorities of Wales, as was shown by the statements in the preamble of the Charter. He apprehended that in these circumstances it was their duty, unless there was something which they thought radically wrong running through the whole scheme, to approve of it in substance, and not to interfere with the details as to the constitution of the Governing Bodies, and so forth, though of course correcting any details that were against the interests of the University, or which were unworkable. It was also their duty to consider carefully the protests against it, which were few in number. In passing, he might observe that these Petitions mainly raised objections to the condition of residence being required. This was not the time to argue against those objections, though he thought a full answer could be made. Then the Privy Council had to consider the Petition of Lampeter and the character and constitution of that College. Their Lordships had heard that it was governed by a College Board, consisting of the Principal and tutors (who must be in Holy Orders and graduates of Oxford or Cambridge), and of the Professors. [The Bishop of St. ASAPH: Not all.] They must also be approved of by the Visitor, who had extraordinarily large powers, both in initiation and veto. He made the statutes; he could remove members for incapacity or misconduct, and he had control over the College Board. No one could doubt, from the aims of the founder and the composition of the Governing Body, that it was a Denominational College, and that it was to be primarily a Theological College, and only secondarily an Arts College. That seemed, in fact, admitted in the Lampeter Petition, where it was shown that in the last 10 years more than one-quarter only of the graduates had taken non-theological degrees. Now, he must not be supposed to be contending that a College should be excluded from the University simply on account of the religious character of its foundation. Nor was he inclined in the least to minimise the excellent work which this College had done; on the contrary, he desired to speak in the highest terms of that work. Personally, he should very much like to see this College a constituent College of the University, and he hoped before long it would be so. But it was clear, from what had been said, that the simple admission of the College with its special Charter, form of government, and privilege of conferring degrees, into the University upon the same footing as the other University Colleges would be impossible. And before it could be admitted even on a somewhat different footing, the existing scheme of Lampeter would have to be recast in the direction of making the Governing Body a more representative one, and of placing the College under the independent control of the Governing Body; and, of course, the privilege of conferring degrees must be given up. It was now urged that the Lampeter Authorities were prepared to do this. He hoped that this was the case; but, in the meantime, he earnestly hoped that their Lordships would not accept the Motion, but would allow the Charter to proceed and the University to be created. No injury could be done by delay in the admission of St. David's College, for they could come in by a supplementary Charter. There would be plenty of time to consider and discuss in an amicable way the terms on which the College could come in; but surely the important work of starting this much-desired University ought not to be delayed merely on the ground that St. David's was not at present included.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY moved an Amendment praying Her Majesty to withhold her assent to the Draft Charter until amendment had been made therein. In his view, the Charter as it stood was an unfit instrument to go forth to the world, and to represent to the world the ideal of the University of Wales. The noble Lord (Lord Aberdare) had described it as being on a large popular representative basis. That was so, indeed; but he would like to ask whether that large popular basis was likely to secure the great end for which Universities were intended—namely, the highest study carried on in the most unimpassionate manner? The Council was to be heterogeneous; and the appointment of Mayors, Aldermen, and Burgesses of boroughs was likely to admit persons prominent in politics rather than in educational matters. Not only so, but the teachers in elementary schools were to be represented. The object of a University was to control the lower education, not for the lower education to control the higher, to carry out what might be thought most popular, and to adopt that practical view of education as a thing that must pay for the purpose of getting on in life which those who had the control of our Universities had so constantly to resist.

Amendment moved, to leave out from ("until") to the end of the Motion, and insert ("amendment has been made therein").—(The Lord Bishop of Salisbury.)

THE BISHOP OF ELY begged to support the Motion, and urged that St. David's College ought necessarily to form part of the future University of Wales.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, my noble Friend behind me has stated so fully the reasons at the present time for excluding Lampeter from the Charter that I have but little to add. My noble Friend opposite (Lord Knutsford) has also clearly set forth what were the motives which actuated the Committee of the Privy Council. The Government are only too anxious that the Committee should be an impartial Body, because they naturally desire to do that which is best for the cause of University education in Wales. I wish to point out what has a good deal slipped out of view in the Debate, that St. David's is essentially a Theological College for the education of persons intended to enter Holy Orders in the Church of England. Such a College cannot be regarded simply as a College requesting in the ordinary manner to be admitted into a University, which would be practically a University for general education. We are confronted, therefore, with this difficulty: that if this Theological College is admitted into the University, there will be claims which cannot lightly be set aside from no less than eight other Colleges in Wales giving more or less a theological education. The matter presented itself to the Members of the Committee exactly as my noble Friend opposite (Lord Knutsford) has stated. We are all agreed that there should be a clause in the Charter which would enable the University hereafter to admit other Colleges. The right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Salisbury seemed to think that there is a good deal in that argument, so he thought proper to move to present an Address against the whole Charter, and from his speech I gather that he is against any Charter of any kind.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY said that, in order to get the question in regard to the admission of St. David's settled one way or the other, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I am glad the right rev. Prelate has withdrawn his Amendment. That relieves me from the necessity of dealing with it further. There is nothing in the Charter which prevents the consideration of Lampeter's claim hereafter if necessary, and I think sufficient reason has been shown why the Privy Council should have decided to let the Charter go on. I forget how many months afterwards it was that the petitioners came before the Privy Council with the unsatisfactory and vague resolution which they presented. I hope your Lordships will not agree to the Motion.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : My Lords, I cannot help feeling that to the course taken by the Conference and Assembly alluded to by my noble Friend opposite, in which he took so important a part, must be attributed the settlement of this Charter.

*LORD ABERDARE said, they had made different arrangements; that the Charter before them gave to the Crown the powers which the Draft Charter proposed to confer on the Court of Governors.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : Then I have been misinformed, and I withdraw my remarks upon that point. But the question is, whether Lampeter was or not in a position to become a member of this University at an earlier period, and to have been included in the Charter without difficulty. It seems to me that everything is taken against Lampeter upon its Petition. The Privy Council seems to have been put by that Petition in a state of vague doubt as to what its meaning was. A very easy mode of dealing with that would have been to ask what they intended by that Petition, and there would have been no difficulty in getting somebody to answer for Lampeter and say what they were prepared to do. In the case of the Victoria University, no doubt the application of a College for admission is first made to the University, and if the University refuses there is an appeal to the Crown. Here there is a most extraordinary proposition, which is, that the Crown takes the initiative. Who is to take upon them to admit a College into the University? Is it to the President of the Council? Or, who is to petition for it? It must be assigned to some Department in the Ministry. In what way are Colleges to get in? For my own part, I do not see the great objection which has been raised by my noble Friend opposite with regard to other Colleges. If, with distinct kinds of religious teaching, they give a sufficient literary education to bring themselves within the rules of the University, why should not they be admitted? If they give a good secular education while teaching theology according to their own views, why should not their students be admitted to University degrees like other Colleges which have no religious education at all? I really think we are lingering about it without coming to the real point. I rather gathered from my noble Friend's speech that though he possessed great liberality in his own mind, he was too much swayed by the illiberality of others—that he was himself anxious to see justice done to this College, but that there were others hanging to his skirts who would not let him act as freely as he desired. I think, my Lords, we can expedite that desire by agreeing to the Motion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL) : I will ask noble Lords to consider for a moment this proposal of the right rev. Prelate that assent should be withheld from this Charter. The proposal is, I think, in the highest degree unreasonable; because, mark, the question is not whether Lampeter College is to be always excluded, but whether the establishment of a University for Wales is to be delayed until Lampeter shall make up its mind whether it wants to be admitted or not. According to those who have supported its interests to-day, it has scarcely made up its mind yet whether it will become a part of the University. Having been so dilatory, is it fair to ask that the establishment of the University so ardently desired by the Welsh people shall be delayed until arrangements satisfactory to itself shall be made for the admission of Lampeter? I do not suppose it will be contended that Lampeter College, with its present constitution, could be made a constituent part of the University. In order that it might be so admitted, not only must Lampeter give up its Charter with the right of granting degrees, but it must be constituted on an entirely different basis, and the autocratic powers of its Visitor must be modified. If a scheme has been prepared for the admission of Lampeter, whose fault is it that it has not been published? The right rev. Prelate who is its Visitor is said to have two years ago set about drawing up a scheme; but it has not been made public. There is no document yet before the public or the Privy Council which indicates the modifications which Lampeter College is willing to submit to as a condition of its being admitted to the University. Those who support the Motion are asking you to stay your hand in creating this University, because, forsooth, the authorities of this College could not make up their minds whether they would or not take the preliminary steps and do the preliminary work necessary for inclusion in the Charter. That is the issue which your Lordships have to determine, and those who vote for the Resolution of the right rev. Prelate will say that Wales should be kept waiting for the proposed University until Lampeter has made up its mind.

On question? their Lordships divided:

Resolved in the affirmative.

FEES IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT CROSS asked the Lord President of the Council whether the Education Department had declined to permit the Goodwin School at Carlisle to charge a small fee under Section 4 of the Elementary Education Act, 1891; and, if so, whether he was aware that a large number of parents and guardians of children resident in the district were anxious for a school at which higher-class elementary education could be obtained, and also that the said school should not be entirely free? He said, he had been informed that the school was now ready to be opened, and that the Education Department had been asked to sanction a fee of 1d. per week in addition to the grant, under the 4th section of the Act of 1891, by which power was given to allow a fee to be charged where it would be for the educational benefit of the district. Those interested in the school maintained that the proposal would be for the educational benefit of the district; but he was informed that the Education Department had come to a different conclusion both on the point of accommodation in the school and benefit to the district. He would also ask the Lord President whether he would not be pleased to order further inquiry to be made, because he was told by those interested in the matter (which was all he had to guide him) that there were schools in the neighbourhood which afforded ample accommodation.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It is admitted that there is ample accommodation.

VISCOUNT CROSS said, then that removed one ground of objection. With regard to the other, the educational benefit of the district, a Petition had been sent in to the Education Department stating that—

“The undersigned parents and guardians of children living in the neighbourhood are anxious that the Trustees of the school should establish a high-class elementary day school for infants in the lower standards, and we earnestly hope the Education Department may see their way to sanction the payment of a weekly fee of 1d. in addition to the grant.”

They went on to say that they desired to have a Kindergarten teacher appointed, with the best Kindergarten and other appliances, and that they were willing to pay the fee, for they felt confident it would be of advantage to the children and the district that the school should be so carried on. That Petition was signed by a number of parents who were extremely desirous to have this education in addition to the elementary education which was absolutely free. If it was for the benefit of the district that this sort of high-class infant school should be established, he hoped, before the Department finally made up their minds upon the matter, they would make inquiries. Living as he did in the district, he felt confident that those who had informed the Education Department in the matter had not come to a wise conclusion. The noble Earl admitted they were wrong on the first point, and inquiry would show that they were wrong on the second.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: As to the first point, I do not know who has been wrong. The Inspector's Report is that there is sufficient accommodation. The Inspector says there is no lack of free places in the neighbourhood.

VISCOUNT CROSS said, the letter he had received stated that the Education Department had declined to assent, first, because there was not sufficient accommodation in the district; and, secondly, because the new school would not confer the advantage stated.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The Report upon which we must act says that there is sufficient accommodation. Upon that point, therefore, there is nothing really to be said. The question really turns upon the second point. The Inspector states—

"I cannot say that the school will provide any educational benefit not provided by other schools in the neighbourhood."

It appears to be thought by some persons that if they are allowed to charge a fee they are to provide some very superior kind of school. Proper appliances and everything which is needed will be required to be provided by the Education Department free; and there is no reason why public money should be applied for the maintenance of a school which is unnecessary. If there were any educational advantage to be gained by the neighbourhood by the creation of this school, then it comes under the discretionary power of the Department as provided by the Statute. But we fail to see that any educational advantage will be afforded by this school. It is our duty to see that all schools have proper teachers and appliances, and we do not see why money should be provided out of the Public Revenue for the purpose of supplying more advantages than we are bound to give. Therefore, the general view we take is that it is not desirable that these fees should be allowed, though exceptions should, of course, be made in rare cases. There seems to be a desire in some places to use this loophole to escape, as it were, from the requirement of free education; and, therefore, the Department think it necessary to be very chary in permitting exceptions, though it would do so where it was shown to be for the advantage of the neighbourhood. Those are the grounds on which the refusal has been based, and they appear to me to be in principle sufficient.

VISCOUNT CROSS said, that knowing the way in which this school had been founded at Carlisle in memory of the late Bishop Goodwin, and the strong feeling in the district, he must ask the noble Earl whether he would not direct further inquiry to be made before coming to a final decision in the matter?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I cannot promise that any inquiry will be made by the Department; but I will myself make some inquiries in the matter.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked how it was, as no amending Act had been passed since the Act giving Fee Grants, the Education Department had been able to make these requirements? They were requirements which trenched upon the privileges of the other House, and did nothing but increase the burdens of the taxpayers by adding taxes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 29th August 1898.

QUESTIONS.

H.M.S. "ANSON."

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the statements made in The Times of 27th July, concerning the defective ventilation of H.M.S. Anson; whether it is a fact that, although pipes and valves have been provided, a sufficiency of fans has never been fitted to carry out the proper ventilation of the ship; whether it is intended to fit additional fans when the ship next goes into dock; whether any money has ever been voted for that purpose; and, if so, at what time; whether he will consider if the general ventilation of ships of a low freeboard might be improved by a more general use of cowls fixed on the upper decks, removable at the discretion of the officers of the ship; and whether regulations could be made, as is already done in regard to the ventilation of coal bunkers, to prevent the removal of cowls necessary for the effective ventilation of the living quarters of such ships?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): (1)-(3) Attention has been given to the ventilation of the Anson and her sister ships. Experience gained on actual service indicated that when ships were battened down at sea for some time some additional artificial ventilation was desirable. One or two ships of the class were altered, more fan power being introduced; and in these the improved system was tested, with success. It was then decided to alter the other ships as opportunity offered. The Anson is now in hand. (4) The work was originally intended to be done in the Anson in 1892-3, but had to be deferred. (5) Such arrangements are always carried out as far as practicable. (6) No special regulations are considered necessary. The matter should be within the discretion of the captain.

POSTAL CHARGES FOR NOTICES OF OBJECTION TO VOTERS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether instructions were issued to Postmasters to accept notices of objection to voters, if prepaid with a postal fee of one halfpenny and a registration fee of 2d. in accordance with Postal Regulations; and whether in cases where a prepaid postal fee of 1d. and a registration fee of 2d. has been paid, he will order the repayment of the halfpenny overpaid in each case of objection to the person by whom the objection was issued?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): Notices of objection to voters are transmissible at the halfpenny rate when they comply with the Rules as to circulars—i.e., when they contain no written matter except the date of despatch, the name, address, and description of the sender, the name of the addressee, and any necessary corrections. The Post Office Regulations do not require registration. Some of the notices posted this year did comply with these Rules, but others did not, and the latter were liable to letter postage. It was not considered necessary to issue general instructions to Postmasters on this point; but if the hon. Member will give me the particulars of any cases in which the higher rate of postage has been paid unnecessarily the matter shall be inquired into.

THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND THE ALDERSHOT COMMAND.

MR. BURNIE (Swansea Town): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is correct that the Duke of Connaught has been appointed to the chief command of the Army at Aldershot; and, if so, on what grounds he has been selected for this important position?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): General the Duke of Connaught has been selected by the Commander-in-Chief for this position on account of his fitness for its duties, and from the fact that he is practically the senior available officer. His Royal Highness is an officer of varied experience both in Regimental and Staff duties, and he has filled with credit several high positions, including that of Commander-in-Chief in Bombay.

Mr. ALLAN (Gateshead): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how many months in the year the Duke of Connaught was absent from his duties when in command at Portsmouth?

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Will the Duke receive the salary of a General or of a Lieutenant-General at Aldershot?

Mr. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what he means by saying that the Duke of Connaught is "practically the senior officer" in the Army? Will he also tell us what experience the Duke of Connaught has had in real fighting?

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: When I said that he was practically the senior officer I meant that there were one or two General Officers senior to him, who in one sense might be available, but who at present are discharging duties from which it is not desirable that they should be removed. With regard to the pay, it will be that of a Lieutenant-General, being a Lieutenant-General's command. My hon. Friend asks me how long the Duke of Connaught remained at Portsmouth.

Mr. ALLAN: How long he was absent from his duties there?

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is another side of the same question. From domestic circumstances the Duke of Connaught's family lived out of Portsmouth; but I believe that the Duke was very little out of the district which he commanded, although he may have slept away from Portsmouth itself during some of the time he held that command. As to the last question, I forget—

Mr. A. C. MORTON: About fighting?

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Duke of Connaught, as a glance at the Army List will show, commanded a brigade in the Egyptian Expedition, which is, I believe, the only opportunity he has had during his career of taking part in active warfare.

Mr. A. C. MORTON: With regard to the Egyptian Expedition, will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say how near or how far the Duke was from the actual fighting?

Mr. ROSS (Londonderry): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there is any other officer in Her Majesty's Service who has had as much experience as the Duke of Connaught in all branches of the Service?

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I would not say that there is no other officer. I have already said that the Duke of Connaught has had a most varied experience in different capacities.

Mr. ALLAN: May I ask whether it is according to the Army Regulations that a Commander-in-Chief may live away from his command?

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware what the exact Regulations are in that respect; but, as I have already explained, the Duke of Connaught did not live out of his district. He was not absent from the district in which his duties were discharged, and was constantly within a very short distance of headquarters.

Mr. A. C. MORTON: This is so unsatisfactory that I beg to give notice that I shall call attention to the matter on the Army Estimates.

THE ABERAVON BOAT CATASTROPHE.

Mr. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a very serious accident which occurred on the 6th instant at Aberavon, in the County of Glamorgan, owing to the overcrowding of a boat used for hire, whereby many lives were lost; whether he is aware that complaints have been made in the public Press of the County of Carmarthen that the ferry boats which ply between Ferry-side and Llanstephan in that county are from time to time, especially on bank holidays, so overcrowded as to seriously endanger the lives of the passengers; and whether the boats used by the lessee of the Llanstephan Ferry are registered by the Board of Trade; if not, whether there is any mode of compelling the lessee to have his boats registered, which would limit them to carrying a fixed number of passengers and no more?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): My attention has been called to the regrettable accident to which the hon. Member refers; but the Board of Trade have no control over pleasure boats let for hire. I understand they are subject to bye-laws made by Local Authorities. I have had no complaints with regard to the ferry boats to which the hon. Member alludes. These boats are not registered by the Board of Trade. I am, however, making further inquiries in the matter, and will communicate with the hon. Member when these inquiries are completed.

PENSIONERS IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General how many men in receipt of pensions, on account of service in the Army and Navy and in the Royal Irish Constabulary, are employed at the present time under the Irish Post Office?

MR. A. MORLEY: There is no information at the General Post Office which would enable me to answer the hon. Member's question. It would be necessary to apply to each Office in Ireland, and the inquiry would occupy much time, and would give considerable trouble.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if the number of pensioners employed in the Irish Post Office is large or small?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have no information on that point. Does the hon. Member include the Army Reserve men in the term "pensioners"? We have no special information as to Army pensioners as apart from Army Reserve men.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies why so much delay occurred in presenting the Further Correspondence respecting the Newfoundland Fisheries, repeatedly asked for in both Houses of Parliament, seeing that the last Despatch, and that a short one, contained in the volume is dated 23rd May last; whether he is rightly reported in The Times and other papers as having said, in reply to a question put to him on Friday last, that the action taken by the Commander of H.M.S. Pelican in preventing the inhabitants of St. George's Bay selling herrings except to the French, and in fixing the price of herrings, was "under a discretion conferred by Treaty"; if so, whether the Treaty of Utrecht was intended, and, in that case, which of its words; and how a Treaty could confer any such powers on any person in a self-governing Colony possessing representative and responsible institutions?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): In reply to the first part of the question, the presentation of the Papers appears to have been promised by Lord Ripon on June 29. They were taken in hand at once, and went to the printer on July 14. A month later—August 17—they were on the Table of this House. The right hon. Gentleman is, doubtless, aware that the Papers would receive careful examination by the Foreign Office as well as the Colonial Office, and that communication with the French Government would be necessary, so that there has been no exceptional delay. In regard to the second part of the question, I must have been misreported, for I did not refer to the Treaty, but stated that the Commander in question was acting in his discretion in issuing the order in question, and, as he believed, and as it proved, in the interests of the inhabitants of the district.

SIR C. W. DILKE: In regard to the first paragraph, may I ask my hon. Friend if he is aware that before the promise of the Papers in the House of Lords he stated that they could not be presented in this House with due attention to the demands of the Public Service? That is the point on which I wish to press him.

MR. S. BUXTON: In reply to a question put by my right hon. Friend, I did state it was premature to present the Papers because they were not complete. They were promised on the 29th June in the House of Lords. As much expedition as possible has been observed. The last Paper was dated the 23rd May, and we were not at all sure, and rather expected, indeed, a reply to it.

MR. A. C. MORTON: What does the hon. Gentleman mean by the "discretion" of this officer in fixing the price of herrings?

MR. S. BUXTON: The position is this. Under the Treaty, or rather under the Declaration which accompanied the Versailles Treaty, the French were allowed an unrestricted right of catching their own bait. The Commander in this particular case came to an arrangement with the French that instead of exercising this undoubted right the inhabitants themselves should catch the bait and sell it to them. He believed that to be in the interests of the inhabitants, and as far as the Government knew it had given satisfaction.

SIR C. W. DILKE: But was not the right a concurrent right?

MR. A. C. MORTON: What discretion had the Commander to fix the price of herrings?

MR. S. BUXTON: As I understand it he was acting—or believed he was acting—in conformity with the discretion conferred upon him by the English Government and by the Admiralty in regard to this matter, and in order to avoid all difficulty between the French and the Newfoundland fishermen?

MR. A. C. MORTON: Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to give orders to this officer not to take upon himself any such discretion as to fixing the price of articles of food?

MR. S. BUXTON: The Commander is not under the control of the Colonial Office.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): Could the officer prevent the Newfoundlanders from catching herrings if he wished?

MR. S. BUXTON: Only so far as to prevent them interfering with the right of the French. He believed he was acting in the interests of the inhabitants themselves, and that it would be more to their advantage to catch the bait and sell it to the French than for the French to catch it.

MR. WOLFF: The officer may have believed it was in the interests of the inhabitants, but did the latter think it was in their interest?

MR. S. BUXTON: As far as I can learn, the action of this Commander has given great satisfaction to the inhabitants of the district. We have had no complaints whatever, and we think it was of great advantage. At all events, it avoided all dispute between the inhabitants and the French.

APPOINTMENTS TO POSTMASTERSHIPS.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the practice in submitting to him applications for Postmasterships; whether all applications are laid before him, or only those that meet with the approval of the Heads of Departments or Postmasters; whether any intimation is given to candidates when their applications are withheld from him; whether he can state the number of applications made for the Postmastership of Dalkeith, recently given to the daughter of the retiring Postmaster; and whether the majority of candidates possessed the necessary qualifications, and were in receipt of higher salaries than 24s. a-week, which was the salary of the successful candidate before her appointment to the post?

MR. A. MORLEY: All applications for vacant Postmasterships are submitted to me. There were 76 applicants for the Dalkeith office, 68 of whom were reported upon favourably. All but 13 of the applicants were in receipt of salaries exceeding 24s. a week. Miss Macpherson was the daughter of the Postmaster, and had managed the office for some years past. She had been for 23 years engaged at the Dalkeith Post Office, for the last 10 of which she acted as sorting clerk and telegraphist, and at the time of the vacancy was the senior on the staff. I may add that there was a strong local Memorial in her favour.

THE SALE OF INTOXICANTS ON EXCURSION STEAMERS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): In the absence of the hon. Member for Hastings, I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill of Her Majesty's Government will contain provisions for the local control of the liquor traffic on board excursion steamers at seaside places, or whether the proprietors of those vessels will be permitted, as at present, to obtain their licence to sell intoxicating liquors direct from the Excise Authorities, and without the intervention of any Local Authority?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill strictly applies only to licences issued by Justices, and not to Excise licences. The point, however, to which the hon. Member refers is one very worthy of consideration, which shall be given to it.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): May I ask whether the Local Veto Bill is to come on before the Recess or in the Autumn Session?

SIR W. HARCOURT: That will depend a great deal upon the hon. Member.

WELSH TITHE DISTRAINTS.

MR. REES-DAVIES (Pembroke-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that in a case recently tried before Judge Bishop in the County Court of Newcastle Emlyn, Cardigan-shire, an important point of law was raised and adjudicated upon as to the right of a bailiff to effect an entrance into premises by climbing over fences in levying distrains for tithe, and that a fine of £5 was imposed upon the defendant, who has entered an appeal against the judgment of the County Court Judge; whether he is aware that the Treasury has now taken up the case on appeal for the bailiff of the County Court, notwithstanding that a solicitor had been engaged and counsel instructed on the bailiff's behalf; and whether he will state under whose authority these proceedings were taken; and whether he will take steps to prevent such action on the part of the Treasury in interfering with civil proceedings?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): Since my hon. Friend last put this question, I have had an opportunity of considering the matter in consultation with the Attorney General. The bailiff being an officer of the Court, it appears that the Registrar applied to the Superintendent of County Courts for legal assistance on his behalf in the usual manner, and the application was granted in ordinary course, without any reference either to the Attorney General or myself. We are of opinion that the circumstances of the case are exceptional, the object of the appeal being, as we understand, to test the accuracy of an opinion given by the Law Officers, which was apparently being acted upon by the appellant. The briefs have been delivered, but the Attorney General will give directions that the case shall be argued on behalf of the bailiff, not by the Treasury Counsel, but by the counsel whom he himself originally caused to be instructed.

ABSTRACTORS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in reference to the Rule as to the salary at which writers take up their appointments as abstractors, whether, in one office, one or more men with only a few years' service commenced at £150 per annum, whilst others in the same Department, with nearly 20 years' service, have commenced at very much lower salaries, although the duties to be performed in each case are identical; will he explain why it is that in other Offices, where the duties to be performed are also of an identical nature, some have commenced at £90, plus their bonus; in another Office the commencing salary has been made equivalent to the total earnings during the year preceding appointment, plus bonus; whilst in another Office the commencing salary of men of 10 years' service was fixed at 7s. per day, and for men of over 20 years' service at 8s. per day, although the duties to be performed in each case are of a similar nature; and whether the Government would take into their favourable consideration the cases of men of very long service, and allow all those with over 17 years' service to commence at £150 per annum, or 10s. per day, this sum being equivalent only to an annual rise of £4?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The salaries of abstractors or assistant clerks commence at £80, but copyists appointed to those posts carry with them, according to the ordinary practice of the Service, any higher salary (not exceeding £150) that they are receiving at the time. The salary includes any bonus earned as copyists, and therefore already recognises length of service. The steps taken have been greatly for the advantage of the men concerned, and, as I stated on the 12th of June, it is not possible to make any change.

THE CASTLECOMER COLLIERY.

MR. M'DERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the great dissatisfaction at Castlecomer, County Kilkenny, owing to the large number of men who are now only employed on short time at the colliery there; and considering that this is the principal colliery in Ireland, and that the short time employment is due to the want of proper means of transit, and the consequent accumulation of coal on the banks, whether he will make inquiry with the view of placing before the Treasury the urgent necessity of connecting Castlecomer by railway with the main line to Dublin?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no dissatisfaction among the colliers employed at these coal pits. Some of the men were not working full time at one pit owing to a temporary disablement of the machinery; but at all the other pits the men, I understand, are working full time. The accumulation of coal on the banks is due, no doubt, mainly to the want of proper means of conveyance, and some years ago a scheme was proposed for the construction of a railway as suggested in the question. This scheme came before the Committee of the Privy Council in January, 1885, and it was decided that the evidence did not warrant a recommendation of the scheme, inasmuch as, though the railway might be useful to the collieries, it was really a matter for private enterprise, and its general importance was not such as to warrant the taxing of a whole barony.

THE COLLOONEY AND CLAREMORRIS RAILWAY.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the occupier of the grounds covered by the Collooney and Claremorris Railway voluntarily surrendered their lands nearly three years ago in order to facilitate the construction of the railway as a relief works; that agreements were at that time entered into between the Board of Works and the occupiers saving the rights of the latter under "The Railway (Ireland) Act, 1851," and providing that they should in due course receive full legal compensation which would include a proper abatement of rent; whether, beyond a payment of account made when the lands were surrendered, any further compensation has since been paid; and whether any steps have yet been taken to keep faith with the people, and to give them the full compensation and abatements to which they are entitled?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The occupiers gave up their lands for the purposes stated, on being paid what the valuers then appointed considered they were entitled to, without prejudice to their rights under the Act of 1851 quoted. To appoint an arbitrator under that Act, the Waterford and Limerick Company have to lodge plans and schedules and apply to the Board of Works, and this they are now almost in a position to do. The Board have done everything in their power to expedite the appointment of an arbitrator, and will see that it is done; and every occupier will have an opportunity of going before the arbitrator to claim further compensation, and such abatement in rent as the arbitrator may award and direct.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman consider three years a reasonable period to allow the work to be done?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I think it is a long time.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): What has caused the delay in the appointment of the arbitrator?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I believe the delay has been on the part of the Railway Company in preparing the Schedule.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to compel the Railway Company to do its duty?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I cannot take steps to coerce the Railway Company. The hon. Gentleman had better put that question to the Board of Trade.

MR. FIELD: I will ask it of the President of the Board of Trade.

DRIVERS' LICENCES IN THE METROPOLIS.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, seeing that great inconvenience and frequently the loss of a day's wage is entailed upon the drivers and conductors of omnibuses and tramcars throughout the Metropolis owing to their ignorance of the fact that it is not necessary for them to attend at New Scotland Yard in order to obtain a renewed licence, but that this can be obtained at the police station nearest to the address of the licensee, he will take steps to have this information brought to their notice by means of Circular or otherwise?

MR. ASQUITH: The Commissioner has now under his consideration certain details in connection with this question; and as soon as they are settled steps will be taken to inform drivers and conductors generally as to the course to be pursued in respect of the renewal of their licences.

THE BERKHAMSTED AUXILIARY POSTMAN.

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the duty of an auxiliary postman at Berkhamsted, who attends the office at 6.15 a.m., finishes at 9.15 a.m. after eight miles rough country walking, and who performs a second delivery at 3 p.m. with a 4.45 finish, averaging  $4\frac{3}{4}$  hours daily with a weekly wage of 8s. 6d., or  $28\frac{1}{2}$  hours' work at the rate of about  $3\frac{1}{2}$ d. per hour, entitles him to a full uniform and boots; whether this duty and pay are typical of a large class, who are in receipt of wages less even than the market rate for unskilled labour; and whether he intends, in accordance with former promises, to merge those who are eligible into the establishment, and whilst making redundant those who are not eligible to grant them a better living wage, full sick pay, and uniform?

MR. A. MORLEY: Inquiries are now being made as to the duties of the auxiliary postmen at Berkhamsted, and I will send the hon. Member the information he desires as soon as possible.

IRISH RAILWAY AND BANKING STATISTICS.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will arrange to have the Return of Irish Railway and Banking Statistics for the past half-year, which was laid upon the Table of the House on the 17th instant, circulated amongst Members during the present week?

MR. J. MORLEY: Copies of the Return in question are now to be had on application at the Vote Office.

BOMBARDING CRANMERE POOL.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can now state the result of his inquiry as to the recent bombardment of Cranmere Pool, Dartmoor; and, in particular, whether any measures were taken to warn pedestrians approaching the pool from the direction of Chagford?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Precautions, which have hitherto been found sufficient, were taken. Danger flags were hoisted in the usual places, and in addition advertisements were inserted in the local papers; and a shepherd, a keen-sighted man, employed as a range clearer, was posted on Steeperton Tor, which lies between Chagford and Cranmere Pool. As, however, these precautions do not appear to have been sufficient, the General Officer Commanding the Western District will be instructed to take further precautions in future.

ARTILLERY PRACTICE OFF PLYMOUTH.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to a statement that recently, as the tender Sir Richard Grenville was proceeding to the Cape Mail Steamer Dunottar Castle, upon the arrival of the latter at Plymouth, two projectiles (220 lb. shot) were fired from Fort Pucklecombe across the tender's bows, and a third under her stern, ricocheting in front of the port bow; and that subsequently, as the Dunottar Castle was making for Cawsand Bay, a shot struck the water ahead, and a second fell within 300 yards, creating great confusion among the passengers, and that two other shots followed; and whether any inquiry has been made respecting the truth of these allegations; and, if so, will he state the result of such inquiry?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have called for a Report on the subject of the hon. Member's question.

LORD KINTORE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has yet received a Despatch from the Chief Secretary of South Australia on the subject of the appointment of a successor to Lord Kintore ; if so, will he give the date of the Despatch ; whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies telegraphed to the Earl of Kintore requesting him to continue in the office of Governor of South Australia for one year more ; whether he has received a reply to the telegram ; and whether he is now in a position to publish the tenour or nature of the Despatch or communication from the Chief Secretary of South Australia, and what reply has been given to it ?

MR. S. BUXTON : The Secretary of State learnt with regret some time ago that Lord Kintore understood that his term of office was five years. The regular term for Colonial Governors is six years, and it is very desirable that it should as far as possible be maintained, especially in the case of a Governor who has discharged his duties so ably. The Secretary of State intimated to Lord Kintore his hope that he would remain his full time. No answer has yet been received from him. A Despatch from the Governor (Lord Kintore) to the Secretary of State was received yesterday, and is under consideration. It encloses a Memorandum from the Chief Secretary of the Colony, dated July 11, addressed to the Governor, which is probably the Paper the hon. Member is asking about. No answer has yet been given.

THE DEER FOREST COMMISSION.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether instructions will be given that the facts collected by the Deer Forest Commission with respect to the former and present extension of deer forests and sheep farms, and with respect especially to lands which have been, or might be, occupied by crofters, be not merely recorded in the Report of the Commissioners, but visibly presented in colours, or otherwise, upon map sheets corresponding to those of the Ordnance Survey of the districts visited ?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : The Commission, as they proceed with their work, are in the course of preparing maps, which will fully explain the Report which they will submit.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can now state approximately when the Deer Forest Commission will be able to report to the House on the subjects referred to it for consideration ; whether the Crofters Commission could make such arrangements as will lead to the more rapid progress of fixing fair rents in the districts not yet overtaken ; and whether the Government will take steps without delay to legislate on the Land Question in the Highlands, and thus meet the requirements of the fishing and agricultural population ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : The Commission cannot report at present, but, by the light of the experience of the heavy and important work which they have done, they are considering the best means for expediting their work in the future. The Commissioners have now only 787 fair rents to dispose of. Of these, a large number will be cleared by the end of the year. I fear that it must be evident to the hon. Member that the Government cannot find time at present to introduce crofter legislation.

DR. MACGREGOR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that, in consequence of the delay, the Highland people were losing confidence in the Government—the sympathy of the Conservative Party with that remark was suspicious—and whether nothing could be done to press forward the work of the Commissioners ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : The Commissioners are at this moment engaged considering how they may proceed faster. But they have proceeded very fast indeed. They have thoroughly examined all the Island of Skye and all the great deer forests of Inverness-shire and Ross-shire. They are now engaged in Caithness-shire, and they hope they will have done both that county and Sutherlandshire by the end of this season. I think that is an immense amount of work, when you consider that every one of the Commissioners has visited every one of these districts.

DR. MACGREGOR thought, in view of the fact that the Commission had been appointed nearly a year, it was time something was done.

MR. WEIR asked whether the Commission would include the Island of Lewis in the district of Sutherland and Caithness?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Caithness and Sutherland are the two districts the Commission is next going to deal with. I cannot say what they will do after that.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether the Report of the Commission would be ready for the Autumn Session?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member will see from the replies I have already given that it is absolutely impossible.

THE REPAIR OF MACADAMISED ROADS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been given to the method now being pursued in preparing the macadamised roads in Hyde Park, whereby the road is first lightly picked up and is then covered with a thick layer of stones which are rolled into it by heavy steam rollers without any sand to bind the stones together, the effect of which is to cause the surface of the road when completed to consist almost entirely of stones packed closely together and forming a crust without any elasticity, affording no good foothold for horses, and liable to flake off, leaving holes; whether he will direct this system to be bettered by rolling a certain quantity of sand in together with the stones instead of merely spreading it over them afterwards; and whether he will instruct his subordinates to revert to the principles of road-making by gradual accretions of small stones well bound together, as taught by the late Mr. Macadam?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The hon. Member is under a misapprehension as to the best method of repairing roads. Before the days of steam rollers it was necessary to follow Mr. Macadam's plan of breaking up the stones into very small sizes. But with steam-rollers this would not answer, and it is found far better and cheaper that the stones should be of a larger size. Sand is largely used for the interstices. The work is done under the direction of skilled officers who have made a study of it, and who thoroughly understand their business. They will, I doubt not, be glad at any time to give the hon. Member a lesson in road-making.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But is it not a fact that the foremen in charge of this road-making are strongly in favour of the course I have advocated in using more sand in order to bind the stone and to prevent the road becoming a tessellated pavement? I have not said anything about the size of the stones.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have not consulted the foreman, but I have consulted the officer in charge of the work.

THE "MAJESTIC'S" COAL-CARRYING CAPACITY.

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, in the Majestic, how many days' coal will the bunkers (proper) contain for steaming at full speed; and when so coaled, and otherwise fully equipped for sea, what will be her greatest draught of water?

\*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There are three conditions which may be described as "full speed steaming." Starting with bunkers full, at the estimated rates of consumption, the coal supply would last—First condition: Contractors' 4 hours' trial, with moderate forced draught,  $17\frac{1}{4}$  knots to  $17\frac{1}{2}$  knots—about 6 days. Second condition: Contractors' 8 hours' trial, with natural draught,  $16\frac{1}{2}$  knots—about 7 to  $7\frac{1}{2}$  days. Third condition: Continuous steaming at sea over long distances under working conditions, and with ordinary coals,  $14\frac{1}{4}$  knots to  $14\frac{1}{2}$  knots—about 11 days. The first and second conditions are not such as can be guaranteed to be maintained over very long periods at sea. The third condition is the least that would be regarded as satisfactory. The greatest draught of water of the Majestic, when so coaled and otherwise fully equipped for sea, will be 29 ft. 3 in.

SIR E. HARLAND: What is the number of tons the bunkers hold?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I gave the figures last night. I have not them in my possession at the present moment.

DR. GALLAGHER.

MR. CLANCY : In the absence of the hon. Member for Waterford, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any medical experts have, at his instance, examined into the state of mind of Dr. Gallagher, one of the prisoners now confined in Portland convict establishment ; and, if so, whether he will state their names and the result of their examination ?

MR. ASQUITH : Yes, Sir. Gallagher was, on the 5th of this month, at my direction, examined by one of our most eminent authorities in mental disease, Dr. Hack Tuke. The result of Dr. Tuke's examination was entirely in accordance with the Reports previously made to me by the medical officers of the prison. All agree that the convict exhibits no symptoms of mental unsoundness.

THE TREASON-FELONY CONVICTS.

MR. CLANCY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the case of John Daly and the other treason-felony prisoners now confined in Portland, whether he has considered the question of releasing them in connection with the case of the Walsall Anarchists now also in prison ; and whether it is a fact that the Walsall prisoners were convicted of and sentenced for the same crime as that for which John Daly and the other prisoners referred to were sentenced, though convicted only of treason-felony, and that, while the severest sentences in the former case did not exceed 10 years' penal servitude, the sentences in the latter case were all, or nearly all, sentences of penal servitude for life ; and, if so, and in view of the fact that if John Daly and his fellow-prisoners had been sentenced only to the same term of penal servitude as that meted out to the Walsall prisoners they would be now entitled to their discharge, he will consider their whole case afresh with a view to their release ?

MR. ASQUITH : The hon. Member compels me to repeat an answer which I gave to one of his colleagues a few days ago. As I stated then, each case must be judged upon its own merits and with reference to its own circumstances ; and for reasons which I explained earlier in the Session, and with a full knowledge of the case to which the hon. Member refers, I am of opinion that the time has not come when I can interfere with any of these sentences.

MR. CLANCY : Is the statement in the last part of the question correct ? Would not these convicts, if they had had the same terms of imprisonment as the Walsall men, have now become entitled to their discharge ?

MR. ASQUITH : Certainly, but then the sentences were not the same.

THE MERIONETHSHIRE EDUCATION SCHEME.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) : I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as a Charity Commissioner, whether, considering that the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill of 1889 was amended in Committee so as to permit denominational services in boarding houses, and that Clause 92 of the Merionethshire Scheme prohibits such services, he will refer Clause 92 to the Law Officers of the Crown with a view of obtaining their opinion as to its legality ?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : The clause in the Scheme for the County of Merioneth, to which the question of the hon. Member is intended to refer, is probably Clause 91, and not Clause 92. The Charity Commissioners have no doubt as to the legality of the provisions of Clause 91 of this Scheme, and, consequently, consider it to be unnecessary to adopt the course suggested in the question.

THE IRISH LABOURERS' ACTS.

MR. CLANCY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the Report of Mr. W. P. O'Brien to the Labour Commission on the condition of Irish agricultural labourers, and especially to the portion of that Report which deals with the delays incident to the carrying out of the Irish Labourers' Acts ; and whether he will consider the propriety and expediency of taking an early opportunity of proposing legislation to diminish not only the delays referred to, but the expense attendant on the investigations preliminary to the erection of labourers' cottages?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have read the Reports submitted to the Labour Commission both by Mr. O'Brien and by Mr. Richards. The suggestions for making the procedure at once quicker and less costly seem to have much evidence in their favour. I hope to have an occasion very shortly of giving personal consideration to the subject, and examining whether, even without legislation, something cannot be done by different administrative practice.

ARMY MEDICAL TRAINING.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office, in allotting bearer company and field hospital equipment to various garrisons for training the Medical Service of the Army, will include Netley in the distribution, so that the medical officers for the Indian Army can benefit by instruction there?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The officers of the Imperial Medical Service receive their special training in ambulance and hospital field duties at Aldershot. The question as to the sufficiency of the training of Indian medical officers is one for the Government of India.

CHOLERA IN HULL.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, on the 24th instant, a boy, named James Henry Fortman, aged 11 years, died of Asiatic cholera at Havelock Terrace, Dansom Lane, Hull, in the midst of a densely-populated part of the town; and can he inform the House how the disease was imported, or where it originated?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): As additional circumstances have come to light, the Government have sent down Inspectors to Hull to inquire into the case.

MASHONALAND.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any steps have been taken to provide a suitable military force for the relief of Her Majesty's subjects in Mashonaland should occasion arise?

MR. S. BUXTON: I must refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave yesterday, and I have, at present, nothing further to add.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The hon. Gentleman has misconceived, I think, the object of my question, which is whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to provide a suitable military force in Mashonaland in case the necessity should arise? If he is unable to answer, I will put it to the Secretary of State for War.

MR. S. BUXTON: The answer I gave yesterday to an almost identical question was to the effect that the responsibility for the maintenance of peace, law, and order in Mashonaland rests upon the British South Africa Company. They are prepared, as we understand from Sir H. Loch, through Mr. Rhodes, to carry out their obligations under their Charter. They ask for no help, and no help has been offered them. And the position at the present moment is this—there are no impiis raiding in that part of Mashonaland in which the British South Africa Company have their active operations, and we hope that there will be no necessity for any further action on the part of the Company at the present moment. At all events, Her Majesty's Government under, the Charter, are entitled to object to any aggressive action on the part of the Company. That position we have taken up and shall maintain.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I understand the hon. Member to say that, in the opinion of the Queen's Government, the Chartered Company are responsible for the protection of British subjects in Mashonaland?

MR. S. BUXTON: Yes.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Then the question I should like to ask either the hon. Member or the Prime Minister is this—Are we to understand that the British Government repudiate any share in the duty of protecting the considerable number of British subjects now in Mashonaland, and who may at any moment be subject to grievous danger?

*MR. S. BUXTON: I have already said that the responsibility for the protection of the British colonists in Mashonaland rests upon the British South Africa Company. We understand that Mr. Rhodes, as representing the Company, has informed Sir H. Loch that they are in a position to protect the people under their charge. All the action we have taken in the matter is that Her Majesty's Government have stated that they have power under the Charter to interfere in any quarrels between the Company and the Chiefs, and will not allow any aggressive action on the part of the Company without their first obtaining the sanction of the Government.

Mr. Clancy

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Has the hon. Gentleman seen a letter in The Times of this morning from the Bishop of Derry, in which the perilous condition of the British subjects in Mashonaland was pointed out?

MR. S. BUXTON: My attention has not been drawn to the letter referred to by the hon. Member, but I will take care to read it.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether the House is to understand that the Government of which he is the head repudiate all responsibility for the safety of British colonists in Mashonaland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I think it would be better that I should communicate with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies before I answer that question.

CORDITE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War a question of which I have not given notice, and which I will postpone if necessary—namely, whether, in view of the communication which appears in The Times of to-day, and in justice to all concerned, especially to certain War Office officials whose conduct has been impugned, the right hon. Gentleman will put down for one day next week a special Army Vote in order to bring to a definite issue the questions that have arisen in connection with the cordite patents?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know how the communication to which the hon. Member refers affects the matter; but I recognise the importance of the general question, and I shall be very glad, if possible, to give an opportunity for discussing it. I am, however, at a loss to know upon what Vote the question can be raised, seeing that the Stores Vote has been passed. I will see what arrangements can be made when the Army Estimates come on.

MR. HANBURY: One does not like to have charges of this kind hanging over one's head. Could not the right hon. Gentleman spare us half a day next week?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say what will be the arrangement of Public Business for next week.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Is it intended to take the Army Estimates before the Civil Service Estimates?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Can the Prime Minister tell us in what order the Estimates will be taken?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I should like to have notice of that question.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Ordered, That the proceedings of the Committee of Supply on Navy Estimates, Vote 8, if the Committee be sitting at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

NAVY ESTIMATES, 1893-4.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,797,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Personnel for Shipbuilding, Repairs, and Maintenance, including the cost of Establishments of Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he was well aware of the fact that they could not expect the Government this year to find adequate time for the discussion of the Estimates, but he trusted that they would be allowed to debate matters of emergency. Personally, he had no desire to take up much time. He wished on this occasion to continue the remarks he was making when interrupted by the Rules of the House on the previous evening, and to call attention to the subject of money-lending in dockyards on which the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) dwelt in his speech, and as to which no answer had been given by the Secretary to the Admiralty. The County Court Judge at Sheerness had animadverted very strongly on the practice of lending money which prevailed in the dockyards, and he was sure the Committee would agree that the Government ought to put an end to an abuse of this nature. They had endeavoured to stop gambling in the Army and in the Navy, and now he hoped they would prevent money-lending in the dockyards. To pass to another subject, he wished to say it seemed to him that the office of Admiral Superintendent at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Devonport respectively was a great scandal. He had intended to move a reduction and to take a Division in regard to this, but, owing to the lateness of the Session, he would not now do so. He trusted, however, that the Government would take steps for the abolition of the office at all three places. Economies should begin by getting rid of the idlers at the top of the tree, and not by discharging a few poor workpeople whose wages averaged perhaps 15s. a week at Portsmouth, Devonport, and Chatham. He was told that they had Admirals as well as Admiral Superintendents, and, in his view, the Admirals at the three places named might well be left to discharge any duties which now fell to the lot of the Admiral Superintendents; or, if there really were work to be done, Captain Superintendents, at about half the salary of the Admiral Superintendents, could do it equally well. An Admiral Superintendent cost £1,883 per annum as well as allowances; a steam launch with its crew was provided for this official, who thus became very expensive to the nation. The only excuse he could imagine for having the two officials at Devonport arose during the time when the Duke of Edinburgh held the command there. At that time there were great complaints locally that His Royal Highness was not doing his duty, and no doubt in such a case it was desirable to supply an Admiral Superintendent to do the work for him. But he ventured to say that in the case of all three dockyards the work now performed by the Admiral Superintendents could just as well be done by Captain Superintendents at salaries of £1,125 per annum and residences. A close examination of the Estimates showed that a great deal of money was wasted in this branch of the Service, and it was time that useless expenditure was knocked off. He hoped the Government would do something to reduce it. He was of opinion that the Admiralty should take steps to find out what was wrong with the construction of the Victoria, for it was evident that her officers had no idea that she was going to "turn turtle" and go down so quickly. They had, in fact, no idea of the unseaworthiness of the vessel of which they had charge. The discussion last night was a Jingo Debate, for it really was a demand for more money. They were told by a gallant Admiral that the Treasury was to blame for refusing to grant more money; but he was very glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the courage to say "No," and to put a stop to the reckless expenditure claimed by some Departments. They were, in his opinion, already spending money enough, and he would like the Government to turn their attention to arbitration rather than to the further expenditure of money on the Navy and Army. He was glad that the present Government were spending more on elementary education. On the whole, the Government were to be congratulated on studying the wants of the people instead of recklessly squandering money on the Navy. In his view, the heads of all the great spending Departments ought to be in that House, and not in the House of Lords, though he did not, under the present circumstances, intend to move an Amendment to that effect. There was another matter which he desired to mention, however. He had heard that a launch was being built from public money for the Duke of Connaught, the late Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth. That item was not put fairly and squarely upon the Estimates by the late Government. It was dishonestly concealed. He wanted to know what had become of that launch? Was it a perquisite of the late Civil Lord, or did the present Civil Lord expect to get it? He also wished to hear why horses and carriages were supplied to the Admiralty? Were they required, as he had once suggested, for the Horse Marines? Surely some explanation should be forthcoming in regard to these items. As one of the guardians of the Public Purse he claimed that he was entitled to put these questions, for it was his duty and the duty of the Committee to see that the money of the taxpayers was properly spent.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): I assure the hon. Gentleman I have no expectation of any reversion to the steam launch to which he has referred. In fact, I do not know anything about it, but I will make inquiries.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Was it built or not?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I cannot say, but I will find out. With regard to the Admiral Superintendents, the hon. Gentleman is not, perhaps, aware of all the advantages which these officers confer upon the Service in the matter of economy, and also by the reason of their experience. So far as I know, the Admiral Superintendents are most excellent officers, and any inquiry might be made without impeaching their conduct. As to the third question raised by the hon. Member for Peterborough, I have to say that the statement of the County Court Judge at Sheerness with reference to the money-lending which appears to prevail at that dockyard has not been brought officially to the notice of the Admiralty; but we will take care that the facts alleged are inquired into, and, if the system exists, will do our best to find a remedy.

MR. A. C. MORTON: But was it not the duty of the Admiralty to inquire into such statements by the County Court Judge without waiting for the matter to be brought formally to its notice?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I cannot accept the view that we ought to act upon the obiter dicta of a County Court Judge, or even of a Judge of the High Court. If we did our hands would soon be full. I repeat we will do our best to find a remedy for any evil we discover to exist. I think it would be convenient if I were now to make my statement upon the revised scheme of wages.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): The Debate last night was concentrated on the question of shipbuilding. I desire to speak on that subject also. Would it not be more convenient for me to do so before the hon. Gentleman makes his statement?

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I think it would be convenient for the Committee to dispose of the first item before this statement is made. I understand a great many hon. Members wish to discuss the second item.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Civil Lord of the Admiralty is perfectly in Order. The Amendment moved yesterday dropped last night by reason of the interruption of Debate.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): But, the next sub-head being for wages, can shipbuilding matters be discussed on that?

COMMANDER BETHELL: Shall I be able to make my speech after the Civil Lord has dealt with the wages question? Can I re-open the discussion on shipbuilding matters?

THE CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I have to move a reduction on Sub-head A, and I understand the hon. Gentleman proposes to speak on Sub-head B.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Civil Lord is in possession of the House. No fresh Amendment has been moved since last night.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: My Amendment has been on the Paper for weeks.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member did not rise to move it. Of course, the Civil Lord can give way if he chooses.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am sorry I cannot give way, as I think many Members of the House desire that I should make my statement now. I think I ought to remind the Committee of one or two preliminary facts. On March 6 last the Government accepted the proposition that in dealing with these questions regard should be had to the fact that the Government, while not attempting risky experiments, are nevertheless bound to be in the first line of employers; and, in the second place, they realised that they were dealing not with their own money, but with the people's money, which was largely subscribed by working men. But, while the action of the House thus gave the line to the Admiralty on certain topics, that was by no means the beginning of the matter. Long before that time the Admiralty had instituted and completed a most exhaustive inquiry into all the grievances of the dockyards. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty visited with me every one of the dockyards, received more than 300 Petitions, and heard more than that number of deputations from the men. We listened to the statements which were made with the greatest interest and the deepest sympathy, and both of us parted from the men with, if possible, increased respect and sympathy for them. The evidence so obtained has been printed, tabulated, and analysed, and submitted to a strong Departmental Committee, which included Mr. Bowles, one of the officers of the Admiralty, whose knowledge on this question is probably greater than that of any man living; and Mr. Burnett, the Labour Correspondent of the Board of Trade, whose special acquaintance with labour questions is equally eminent. On the Report of this Committee the Admiralty formulated a scheme, a copy of which has been laid before the House. Two years ago the late Government carried through a scheme of wages revision, the principal author of which was the late Secretary to the Admiralty. I do not intend now to say anything of that scheme, except that the result was an addition of something like £90,000 a year to the wages of the dockyard labourers. The number of men who will be affected by this change, so far as the Admiralty is concerned, is something like 20,000. That is a large army of labour, no doubt, but I would like to point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) that he and others individually represent a number of working men not much short of that total. I am not going to go through the whole scheme, which Members will find for themselves in the Papers which have been issued, but I must remark on two great questions which overshadow all the others. The first is the question of the wages of skilled workmen. There are 4,022 of these men in the employment of the Admiralty, and, with the exception of 147, they are all hired men. The wages of this class of men may be taken at from 17s. to 18s. a week; but I am bound to tell the Committee that, besides these wages, there are incidental advantages which ought not to be lost sight of. I am not going to attempt to put a money value upon these dockyard privileges, because that would only lead to controversy, but I will tell the House what they are. On the whole, the men work shorter hours than men of the same class outside; they have holidays on full pay which men outside have not; they have deferred pay and medical attendance when injured, which workmen of the same class outside do not have; and such of them as choose to stay long enough have a gratuity of £1 a year for each year's service. Another privilege which working men will esteem more highly than the others consists in the fact that their service is practically continuous, and they are not displaced by bad weather or other accidents. I am sure all those who know the feeling of the working classes in this country will agree with me when I say that working men attach importance not so much to low wages as to the uncertainty of having any wages at all at certain seasons of the year. I am bound to say that there is no lack of men suitable for the work required applying for these posts on the present terms. It is, therefore, not because we have to enter into competition with other people that we are induced to formulate these new proposals. We have, however, taking into consideration the principle laid down for us by the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), and more fully carried out by the Committee to which I have referred, come to the conclusion that to maintain the present wages would not be in conformity with that principle. We therefore propose that, instead of the present rates, whilst all other privileges shall be retained, the new main rate for unskilled labour in the dockyard shall be 19s. I call it the main rate, because it will be subject to certain variations. There will be a probationary rate of 17s. for new men, who will, after a certain period of service, step into the standard rate. We had in contemplation the possibility of establishing a special rate for particular localities, having regard to the circumstances, and especially the cost of living, in those localities. My right hon. Friend and myself were most careful in each case to examine into the cost of living, and more particularly into the rent, and nothing could be more pathetic than some of the details we heard from the men, especially at Woolwich and Deptford. We do not see that the circumstances vary enough to entitle us to charge a main or standard rate except in one or two cases. Two of these cases are those of Woolwich and Deptford, where we were satisfied that the circumstances were such as to justify us in giving an additional rate. It ought to be known that the additional cost of house rent charged in these places was a most important element in the consideration of the question. Some of the witnesses told us—and I was shocked and grieved to hear it—that increments previously given to men of their class had immediately been absorbed by landlords in the shape of rent. The Committee will naturally ask whether the rate we have adopted is a fair rate. As I have said, it will be 19s. in general, and it will be £1 a week at Woolwich and Deptford in view of the special circumstances of those localities. It is calculated that the mean rate for outside labour of this sort is 19s. 7d., and I think the rate we have adopted compares well with that, considering the advantages which the dockyard employés possess. The evidence we obtained from the Board of Trade through Mr. Burnett shows that the rate we propose to establish is quite as good and fair a rate as that which prevails in other parts of the country, and particularly in dockyard towns. The total changes we propose under this head will cost £13,700; and we propose, in view of the special condition of the class affected, that the new rate shall begin practically at once—that is to say, on the 1st of October next. I hope and believe that the Committee will agree with us in the standard we have arrived at. I am sure that, on the part of the Government and the House, I may say that this money is given most gladly and ungrudgingly, and with the sincere desire that it may find its way to the quarter for which it is intended—that is to say, to the families of the working men concerned—and that it will not be diverted as an unearned increment into the pockets of anybody. I come now to the second great question with which we have had to deal, and it is a much more difficult Executive question than the last. I allude to the burning—and I may say blazing—question of classification. I do not know whether hon. Members know what classification means. It means that members of a trade are sub-divided into classes who receive different rates of wages, the selection and classification being made by the dockyard officials on the grounds of ability, economy, and service. That system has prevailed in many important trades in the dockyards with general acceptance. I suppose it was for that reason that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forwood), in 1891, fell in love with the principle of classification. At all events, he introduced it or gradually extended it in trades in which it was previously practically unknown. That was the fons et origo malorum. The right hon. Gentleman could not, however, when he introduced it, have anticipated the effect it would produce. The outcry against the system was instantaneous, and it has been continuous. I will not deal in detail with the various trades that were affected for the first time by classification; but I will take one trade which may be regarded as typical of all—namely, the great trade of the shipwrights, who number at present something like 4,000 men. These men are nearly equally divided between the establishment and the hired class. A man on the hired list of the shipwrights may be subject to five rates, varying from 30s. to 34s., or, in other words, a given group of five shipwrights, doing the same work, may one of them be paid 30s., another 31s., another 32s., another 33s., and the fifth 34s. The shipwrights may be said to be unanimous, and vehement in their unanimity, in condemning this system. Many of those who came before us did not hesitate to declare that it was more a matter of principle than of wages with them, and one bold man who was at the top of the list himself went so far as to say that he and others would gladly have their wages reduced if a mean rate were established which everybody would agree to. Their objections to the system are that the same men, employed on precisely the same work and producing the same results, get different rates of wages. They say it may be that a better man, producing better results, gets the lowest rate of wages, whilst an inferior man, producing inferior results, obtains the higher rate. Then, again, they advert to the impossibility of accommodating the work to the system. In point of fact, they declare that the system amounts to a personal rating, or a classification of the men and not of the work. Another point which everybody who knows working men will at once see the importance of is that they say the system opens the door to favouritism on the part of the Superintendents. Of course, the mere possibility of such a thing is most objectionable. They say there is no system of the kind in the trade amongst private firms. I am bound to say that I do not think their statements are unfounded, and, in my opinion, there is substantial justification for the line they have taken. Over and above everything else, we have to face the fact that in this great and important trade, which has been described as the backbone of the dockyard system, you have the men prejudiced against the system of payment and utterly discontented with it, the broad result being that if you are going to have peace in the dockyards you must do away with the classification. However perfect may be the theoretical result of the system, there is no good in forcing even a perfect theoretical system down the throats of the men. We have, therefore, decided to put an end to the system of classification. Now I come to the question of the uniform rate which is to take the place of these varying rates, and I will tell the Committee how we proceeded. The hired men are the men who are most on a level with outside workers, and we first fixed the rate for them, and then deducted from that rate a sum of 1s. 6d. a week for established men, 1s. 6d. being the admitted and acknowledged value to the men of the advantages of the Establishment. We thought it would not be wise to disturb those figures.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) : Half the cost ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : Half the cost the right hon. Gentleman says.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) : Is that irrespective of age ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : It is irrespective of age. The moment a man goes on the Establishment he will get, not his previous wage of 33s., but that amount minus 1s. 6d. We believe that the proper mean for standard rate for hired men amongst the shipwrights is 33s. a week. Here, again, the Committee will have to consider whether this is a fair standard rate for hired shipwrights. I would again remind the Committee that they must not lose sight of the advantages of dockyard employment, which are probably more applicable to the case of men of this class than to the case of unskilled labour. I think the rate we propose is fair, judged by various standards. The mean of the present rates has been determined by calculation to be 32s. 3d. a week, and I would beg attention to the fact that the objection to the present system is based not on the ground of complaint as to the amount of wages, but on objections to the principle of classification. The rate we propose is a generous rate compared with those which, according to our information, prevail in the districts where the dockyards are situated. You may say that shipwrighting is a special business which you cannot expect to find flourishing in ordinary conditions in dockyard towns. I am willing to take that into account ; but still it is the fact that men of that class in the dockyard towns are not receiving anything like as much wages as we propose to give them. You must take into account the shorter hours, and then we are advised by those who have made the calculation that the corresponding rates in dockyard districts will be from 25s. 11d. to 29s. 9d.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) : Is the hon. Gentleman referring to shipwrights employed locally outside the yards ?

MR. E. ROBERTSON : Yes.

MR. KEARLEY : There are none.

MR. E. ROBERTSON : We are informed there are.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): How much shorter are the hours in the dockyards than in outside yards?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: In the dockyards they are 51, and outside they are 54. As to the prices paid in Chatham and Devonport, shipwrights receive there from 31s. to 32s.

MR. KEARLEY: What class of work are these men doing? Are they building first-class battleships?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: We are advised that the same class of men—shipwrights—throughout the United Kingdom receive an average of 34s. 1d. for 51 hours of work a week, which is the time worked in the dockyards. I make a present of that statement to the hon. Member for Devonport. In some cases there are rates considerably above the dockyard rate, as, for instance, in London. On the Tyne the average is 35s., on the Clyde the average of the last statistics is 36s. a week. I think, even taking these figures into account, and considering the advantages of dockyard employment, the rate we propose is a fair rate, and one which carries out the intention of Parliament and of the Government in accepting the Motion. Having got the hired rate, the established rate follows automatically, as it will be 33s. less 1s. 6d.—that is to say, 31s. 6d. Then we propose what has been called, to us, a not very happy phrase, a probationary rate of 31s. for one year. As to the men now on the Establishment, we propose to give them, not a minimum of 31s. 6d., but a special minimum of 32s. The established men are 200 strong, and we think it would be fair to give them 32s.?

MR. FORWOOD: Whatever are their present wages in future they would get 32s.?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Yes. The main rate is to be not 31s. 6d., but 32s. for a man now on the Establishment.

MR. FORWOOD: Uniformly?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am just coming to that. Both in the cases of hired men, and in those of established men, all who receive wages under the standard will be raised to the standard, whilst anybody having higher wages than the new standard will be lowered. Another point of detail in connection with the scheme is that we propose special rates of pay for special and defined work, as is indicated in the Return I have before me. I shall take care to have these special rates strictly defined in the Schedule, so that the men will know what they are doing. All that I have said, except about special rates of pay, applies to all the trades in which classification is to be abolished. The Committee will find them enumerated in the Return. As to the cost of those alterations, the abolition of classification will cost £7,400 a year, which will go into the pockets of the men. The special rate for shipwrights will cost £3,300 a year, and we propose that these changes should take effect from the beginning of the next financial year. Just one observation further I want to make, and that is with reference to an argument which was submitted last night by the noble Lord the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton), and afterwards by the late Financial Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood). They argued that our shipbuilding programme is so arranged that next year there must probably be great discharges from the dockyards. I do not follow them into the calculations on which they base that statement; but I must say I thought at the time, and think still, that it was a statement which had an oblique application. It was not a direct challenge to our shipbuilding programme, but an indication to the dockyard towns that we were embarking in a shipbuilding policy that might end in the men being discharged next year. I will tell the Committee that this shipbuilding programme has been arranged with special regard to the maintenance of continuous employment in the dockyards, and with a special regard to the avoidance of the discharges which the two gentlemen who were lately responsible for the Admiralty, on their own responsibility in this House, indicated must follow. There is not the smallest intention of doing anything of the kind. There have been distinct instructions given to the officers responsible that everything of that kind must be avoided, and the shipbuilding programme has been arranged with a view to carrying out that purpose by the very officials who aided and assisted the two right hon. Gentlemen; and if they have any confidence in these officials they are bound to accept the assurance I give to the House, that the dangers anticipated and even threatened by them are purely illusory, and that the dockyards will be maintained in full employment without any of those discharges with which they threatened the House, and more particularly, I expect, the Dockyard Members. I have now finished my statement, and I have to thank the Committee for the attention with which they have listened to me.

*Mr. KEARLEY (Devonport): In congratulating the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty on the grasp he has shown of the complex subject with which he has only become so recently associated, I desire at the same time to congratulate him upon the skill he has exhibited in avoiding the most germane points in the Motion brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Sir J. Gorst) in March last, upon which this Debate must hinge, and which embraced two principles. One was—

"That no person working in any of the Government Departments which employ labour should be engaged at wages insufficient for a proper maintenance;"

and the other—

"That the Government, as an employer, should so regulate the conditions of its employment as to make itself a model employer of labour."

Some of us who took part in that Debate regretted that there was a lack of definiteness in the Motion; but before the Debate closed, it was clearly forced upon the Government what the effect of the Motion would be. The Secretary of State for War, in accepting the Motion, said—

"That with regard to the question of setting an example, we mean that the Government should show themselves to be amongst the best employers of the country, and that they should be in the first flight of employers."

And later on in his speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I accept in the fullest sense the principle that the terms of Government employment should be beyond reproach."

On that occasion the Secretary of State for War gave a definition of what he termed a proper maintenance, and said very correctly that it depended on the circumstances of the individual to be maintained and the locality in which he resided. I agree with this generalisation, but prefer to put it to the House a little more definitely. What is a proper maintenance? I contend that there cannot be a proper maintenance unless the wage is sufficient to enable a man to house in a sanitary manner—to find in a sufficiency of food and clothing himself, his wife, and family. I do not raise the question of comforts or provision for a rainy day, but simply urge that the Government will not have satisfied the conditions of a proper maintenance unless it meets these vital points. Men should not be compelled to merely subsist, nor to herd in dens of wretchedness and squalor. According to the Government, they had abandoned that policy which is termed by some as that of "The Devil take the hindmost." The Secretary of State for War said that the Government were alive to the spirit of the times. He said—

"We have ceased to believe in what is known as competition, or starvation wages. We have convinced ourselves that starvation wages mean starvation work."

The hon. Gentleman was also candid enough to say—

"It is not a question of generosity or even of humanity, but a question of efficiency, for we cannot get a full day's work unless we pay a full day's wage."

Well, the practical outcome of all this fine talk is that we are asked to accept as a solution of this proviso a standard wage of 19s. weekly. I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that this proposal is not such as it looks on paper. We are to have employees on probation for the first year at 17s. weekly, rising in the second year to 18s. Now, I urge that there must be something wrong somewhere in these conditions, for you contend that 19s. is the wherewithal necessary to provide a proper maintenance, so where is the justification to subject a man to 17s. and 18s. for the first and second years respectively? I declare it to be a case of the horse starving while the grass is growing; and I may say, on behalf of the men, that we shall not listen for one moment to this probationary proposal. Take the ordinary private employer of labour who engages a workman. He does not require to look at a man for a year or two years to find what he is worth, and keep him that time on starvation pay. If a man is worth anything at all he ought to be worth his full wages from the start. I am perfectly sure that your leading men or foremen ought to be able, at the end of a fortnight, to say whether a man is competent or not, and your proposition is simply ridiculous, not only as regards unskilled but skilled labour also; and I urge upon Government to at once abandon the suggestion of probation, which I unhesitatingly term as monstrous. As regards the present Established man, to whom it is proposed to give 18s. a week, I would like to point out to the Government that there are only 70 ordinary labourers on the Establishment, and would therefore suggest that, as it is not your intention to establish any more ordinary labourers, the cost of raising the wages of these Established men to the present rate of 18s. only amounts to £167 per year. So you could, for a similar sum, make a minimum of 19s. weekly everywhere. This would certainly be an improvement on your present proposals, which you can scarcely expect will allay the dissatisfaction, as being practically nothing better than the old arrangement, and it will still be a case of starvation wages. Seeing the small number of men whom you have on the list, the 1s. would make very little difference, and surely you could show your generosity and forego that amount. The Government say that the standard rates may be raised to meet the circumstances of particular localities. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentlemen who will follow me will speak for their own localities, and I desire to speak for mine. You have made an exception on behalf of Deptford and Woolwich, but you have overlooked the fact that Devonport stands in as much, if not more, need of those exceptions. I declare that Devonport is as much in need of relief on the score of rents as anywhere. Are you aware that Devonport is a landlord's town; that it is leased on a plan known as "life leases"; that all the houses are tenement ones? If you are not aware of that fact, I venture to bring it under your notice, and to submit that you ought to give Devonport the same preference which you have shown Wool-wich and Deptford. I am perfectly convinced that it deserves your favour as well as those towns. I urge that as regards Devonport 19s. will not by any means satisfy the proviso contained in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University. The minimum wage for unskilled labour should be sufficient to provide proper maintenance for the men, and not to force them to live in misery. I also raise another point—that the wage of 19s. weekly is not equal to the local minimum of the district. I have in my hand the agreement of the Masters' Builders' Association with the Three Towns Labour Union, which was entered into between these two Associations. The first clause is—"That the wages shall be at the rate of 5d. an hour." The week is composed of 54 hours, and, therefore, a man receives 22s. 6d. weekly. At this rate a man in the dockyard, working 50½ hours per week should receive 21s. The men claim a minimum of 20s. weekly, and yet that reasonable demand is not granted. I repeat again that in Devonport the rents are fabulous. One room costs 4s. a week, and two rooms cannot be obtained under 5s. I speak from experience, for I have visited the houses and seen for myself. Now I come to the second portion of the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, which reads—

"That the conditions of labour as regards hours, wages, insurance against accident, provision for old age, &c., shall be such as to afford an example to private employers throughout the country."

This bears on an important part of your proposals. I take wages first. The only possible way to satisfy this proviso would be to pay the equivalent rate of the Trades Union scale of wages throughout the country. That is the only way you can redeem your pledges. Are you going to do so? The Government must be alive to this fact. Where the employment is not common to the locality, we ask you to pay the full Union rates, making a reduction for those privileges which accrue to those who enjoy the benefit of the Establishment. Those privileges are fully appreciated at their correct value. I shall refer to them later on. With regard to the skilled labourers, these men, in my opinion, are misnamed altogether. They carry out very important work, such as rivetting, drilling, painting, iron casting, and have the care of drilling, screwing, and shaping machines. In private ship-building yards these men are classified as "minor trades," and receive a minimum rate of 25s. weekly. But you pay 75 per cent. of your men who are similarly engaged from 20s. to 22s. a week. I consider that their claims should be far more favourably considered, and that they should not receive less than 6d. per hour, which would give them a minimum rate of 25s. weekly. If outside firms recognise their worth, why should not this be done in the dock-yards? Now I come to the question of classification. You have said in your proposal that you have decided to abolish it and give a uniform rate of wages, and I was prepared, before I studied the details of your scheme, to congratulate you on having accepted the contentions of practical men rather than the speculative theories of those officials and right hon. Gentlemen who desire to maintain a burden which does not touch them. From the examination of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals I do not think he can have investigated the scheme which he wishes that the Committee should adopt. If he will allow me I will investigate it for him. The Established shipwrights' pay ranges from 31s. to 33s. weekly. It is now proposed to have a standard wage of 32s., and yet you say—

"The existing rate of wages will not be disturbed in the case of men who are now receiving more than the proposed rates."

This means continuance of the rate of 33s. weekly to those who now receive it. The standard rate for those below this figure is to be 32s. This only applies to men already on the Establishment. Newly-Established men are to be entered at 31s. 6d. weekly. It is stated in the scheme that classification will be abolished, but I will prove that nothing of the sort will take place, but that there will continue to be many rates. ["Hear, hear!"] [Mr. E. ROBERTSON: Only temporarily.] There are 1,100 men receiving 33s. weekly, and their average age is 40 years. These men will not be retiring to pensions, under the Superannuation Act, until they are 60 years old. Do you call this a temporary arrangement? I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman cannot have considered this question. There are three rates existing at the present time; but if his scheme is adopted, there will be three new rates added, which will make six rates in all. You propose to give 3s. a week extra for special work, but now with regard to these six rates: New men will receive 31s. 6d. weekly, those already on will receive 32s. and 33s. on the higher standard. 31s. 6d. engaged on special work will make 34s. 6d.; 32s. will make 35s.; and 33s. will make 36s. On this ground alone I contend that your statement that you have abolished classification is a mistake, and is not a fact. I tell you plainly, if you think by these means to still the agitation against the classification scheme, you are reckoning fallaciously. The men have been held in check by the belief that you were going to solve this question thoroughly and satisfactorily, and I shall be glad if the hon. Gentleman will throw some light on these criticisms, and if he can prove in the face of them that his proposals abolish classification I shall be indeed surprised. What the men demand is one uniform rate of pay, with no probationary period. Why should there be a probationary rate for shipwrights? I consider that such a proposal is unfair to the trade. Is it not enough that the men have on entry to produce their indentures, go through a practical examination testing their skill, and have to pass the doctor? Yet you ask these men to subject themselves to a probationary term in addition. Doubtless the author of this scheme will have something to say on the subject; so that I desire to put forward my objections, and give him an opportunity of confuting them if he can. The right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary to the Admiralty has always claimed that his scheme was framed to recognise and reward merit, but it has altogether failed to do so in practical working. This scheme has been applied to men who are working at trades in which the work is common to all, and who have been exasperated through receiving different rates of pay. Now I will give an instance: In laying the deck of a battleship every man is bound to do his equal share, and yet under the system in vogue they receive payment varying from 1s. to 4s. a week. This system has never been applied to men working in private yards, and the employés object to its being introduced into the dockyards. The Government has no justification for endeavouring to force down the throats of men a thing which they do not care for. The right hon. Gentleman the late Financial Secretary is a fanatical lover of the scheme. He was the author of it, and I do not suppose that he will easily renounce his child without offering some justification in support of its existence. But the facts are all against him. Take the shipwrights at Devonport. They number 850 men, but all save 28 of that number have signed a Petition protesting against the continuance of such a system. There are 4,100 shipwrights employed at the various dockyards throughout the country, and of that number 3,650 have signed Petitions in a similar strain. I should have thought that the practical protest against classification at the last General Election would have convinced him, and even at the eleventh hour, when we are assisting at the obsequies, I do sincerely hope that before this Debate closes we shall be able to open the eyes of the right hon. Gentleman to the weakness of the scheme. As a last hope of so doing, I am going to quote the opinions of two of his political friends. The first is that of the Conservative candidate for Devonport at the last General Election. Seeing the time at which this opinion was expressed, no one can urge that it was actuated by any hostility towards the right hon. Gentleman. Writing to The United Services Gazette, on the question of classification, this gentleman said—

“Although the rise in pay conceded has been welcomed, yet the whole system of classification which has been introduced has led, and is leading, to universal discontent. Of the First Lord of the Admiralty it is impossible to speak in too high favour, as Lord George Hamilton is a most painstaking and persevering official; but it is against Mr. Forwood, the well-known Liverpool man of business, that the chief complaints of the workers are directed. Mr. Forwood has always been a reformer, and as Mayor of Liverpool some of his reforms were the very reverse of popular with the workers in the city; in the same way, although no doubt his untiring energy and restless mind have begotten schemes of reform and progression in what he believed to be the interests of the workers, they have one and all been disapproved by the mass of the men.”

I will now quote from a speech from a Member of Parliament who is a colleague of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. For-wood), and was a Member of the last Government. Speaking at a jubilation gathering, the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir E. Clarke), who I regret to see is not in his place this evening, as many of his constituents are deeply concerned in the matters we are discussing, said—

“I think I have good reason to believe that the majority, instead of being short of 200, would not be short of 600 or 700—(hear, hear!)—and I know perfectly well what was the cause of the reduction of that majority. It was the same cause which lost them Devonport and Pembroke Boroughs, and two seats at Portsmouth. I met many of my old friends who have worked for me in political matters, whose political friendship for me is not in any degree diminished, whose general sentiments are not in any degree changed, but who said they could not vote for me because in voting for me they would be voting for Mr. Forwood and Lord George Hamilton, and that reduced our majority greatly in the borough. I am sorry that they have lost the five seats alluded to at the Election, but I confess that we deserved to lose them. I am convinced that the course which was taken by the Representatives of the Admiralty in the late Government was a mistaken and an erroneous course, and that it was not a fact that their action was due to discontented and incompetent workmen, but was a sincere and reasonable expression of dissatisfaction on the part of those employed in the Government Service. (Hear, hear!) The Election has taken place, seats have been lost, but the question of organisation and arrangement is not yet settled, and whether I am supporting a Government who are in opposition I shall not lose an opportunity of pressing for the abolition of that system of classification among the shipwrights in dockyards, which is a mistaken system in its invention, is unfair in its conclusions, and which I believe will have to be removed before the difficulties in the dockyards can be got rid of. (Applause.)

Now, Sir, I do hope that this additional evidence which I have given will be sufficient to convince the right hon. Gentleman. I have carefully studied also the statements made by him before the Royal Commission. I can only find two arguments adduced by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of classification that are at all worthy of consideration. The first is that by his system of annual promotions all deserving men can attain higher ratings. The second that the demand for the abolition is not unanimous. I think I can, however, easily clear away these two points. With regard to annual promotions, the Government Returns show that to November last 191 men only, out of a total number of 4,193, received promotion, and a simple rule of three will show it will take something like 21 years before the men can gain anything like the benefit to which they are entitled. The other argument, that the demand for the abolition of the scheme was not unanimous, was the chief one raised before the Royal Commission. It is perfectly true that there are certain trades which have always been classified, and which wish to continue so, but the vital distinction is this—In those trades which have been always classified the work is of so diversified a character and the skill which has to be displayed so varying that it is absolutely necessary to have rates of pay in accordance with the skill required. But these trades in which classification has always existed protest strongly against limited classification, which means that you allow no promotion to take place until a vacancy is caused by death or retirement. This the men the most competent to judge object to, and they say that it is but fair that a man should be allowed to progress according to his ability. Now I come deliberately to the wages of mechanics and artisans. I would remind the Committee that I submit that I am justified in discussing these on the basis of a Trades Union minimum. I shall show my justification for doing so by referring to a passage from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) in March last, on which occasion the Government undoubtedly committed itself to pay the Trade Union wages. The right hon. Gentleman who, it will be remembered, initiated that Debate said—

“That the Government ought to pay their workmen the current rates paid in private establishments.”

The late Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) later on in the Debate said, in referring to this declaration—

“The Secretary of State for War complained that the Amendment of my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Gorst) was not specific. Well, Sir, I think that the Amendment is open to that criticism, but I think that the speech of my right hon. Friend was open to no such criticism. My right hon. Friend was very clear. He said that the rate of wages in the dockyards should be Trades Union wages, the hours of work Trades Union hours. And then he added to these Trades Union wages and hours that the Government ought to provide some machinery for insurance and old age pensions. Now, I think my right hon. Friend was very specific and fair in what he wanted and what he meant by this Resolution.”

Mr. Kearley

I think I am justified in pointing out this fact—that it was only owing to the right hon. Gentleman's superior experience of Parliamentary procedure that he secured priority on going into Committee of Supply for his somewhat indefinite Motion, for on the very first night of the assembly of this Parliament those of us representing dockyard constituencies and other Labour Members met together and decided to force this question of the Government paying Trades Union rate of wages to its employés before the House; but with our innocence of the Rules of Procedure we were groping about the recesses of the ballot box, taking our chances of securing a favourable position for our intended Motion. But, nevertheless, I believe the right hon. Gentleman to have intended by his Motion that the Trade Union rate of wages shall be paid. I take fitters first. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers—the Trade Union to which the best men belong—distinctly lays down in its rules that no member of the Association shall enter dockyard employment at a lower rate than 34s. a week. That is the minimum wage. I think it will be generally understood that all the best fitters are members of this Trade Union. By way of leading up to my point, I had occasion to call attention some few weeks ago to the considerable amount of overtime which has been worked in the Keyham Factory, and I suppose that the Admiralty have endeavoured to diminish that overtime. I do not admit, though, that it has been reduced, but that it has been continuing in a most flagrant form. I mention this here because they have been entering men lately; and although they are aware that the minimum wage fixed by the Amalgamated Society of Engineers is 34s. a week, they have been scouring the “sweating shops” of Devon and Cornwall to enter men at 30s. and 32s. a week. My point is in this question. Are you or are you not prepared to accept the minimum for this trade fixed by the Amalgamated Society of Engineers? And now for shipwrights. We have been told to-night by the right hon. Gentleman that he justifies the new standard rate by the standard of local employment. Who are these men by whom the standard of local employment is judged? Are there any shipbuilding yards in these localities of any magnitude? There is not such a thing existing as a local ship-building firm worth considering. If you really wish to get to the bottom of the whole matter inquire at the great yards where battleships are built what is the pay for performing similar work. The chief places where there are shipbuilding yards, and where battleships are built, may be said to be seven. They are the Tyne, Clyde, Mersey, Hull, Thames, Belfast, and Barrow. At all events, that is a very representative assortment. What do you find is the average weekly pay at these places? I have it on the authority of Mr. Wilkie, the Secretary of the Associated Shipwrights, that the average for the past 10 years has been 37s. 6d., and yet you come here and ask us to accept for those skilled men wages at the rate of 32s. a week. You have the—yes, I will say it—audacity to ask us to justify you in setting up the standard of a few “wasters” existing in dockyard towns. I never heard such a monstrous thing. If you really ask us to accept such a standard, all I have to say is that you must think us very simple individuals. I absolutely decline to take the ipse dixit of any occupant of the Front Bench as to what is a fair rate of wages, unless you can prove that it is as you say—a fair approximation to the amount paid by private firms throughout the country. If you fixed on that standard you would then arrive at a minimum of 36s. a week. They are fairly entitled to that amount; but to satisfy the existing discontent they will accept a settlement of 34s. a week, with no probationary period. As regards the 3s. a week for extra work, the men do not want it, for it will only cause jealousy and favouritism. All they ask for is a uniform wage, assessed by the Trades Union standard. There are the joiners. You proposed to give hired men 30s. 6d. a week, and you state again that you have arrived at your conclusions by the local rates of pay. I think that you will admit that the local building trade of the Three Towns pay their men 7½d. an hour, and as they work 54 hours a week their weekly earnings are 34s. How can you say, I wish to know, that by giving these men 30s. 6d. a week you are placing them on the same rate as outside firms?

You cannot make black white. This trade has always been most unfairly treated by you. It claims justly to be on an equal footing with the highest branches. The Chief Constructors are in sympathy with the demands of the trade for a higher footing. I do hope that when this proposed scheme is considered again, as it will have to be, due consideration will be given to their application that they shall be advanced to a first-class trade, and take the same position as the workers do in outside yards and receive a relative pay. I cannot go into a lengthy examination of all the rates, but I must point out that although the Secretary of State for War undertook that the dockyard service should be without reproach, very many reforms will be necessary before that satisfactory condition of affairs is reached. Answer me these questions: Do you intend to abolish that sweating system of job and task work under which the scale of pay is arbitrarily fixed, and the men are kept in the dark with respect to it? You expect the men, in fact, to exert a supreme effort, as men do when on piecework, and to thankfully accept at the end of the week whatever you like to give them. Let me remind you that you frequently fix the rate so low that, although the men may have been working extremely hard, they frequently do not obtain sufficient money to cover their weekly wages. Then, again, if your money is getting short, you get frightened, and think that it is flowing away too quickly. What is the result? Why, you put the men on what is known as check measurement. By this system the man's work is also measured by the officials on some unknown scale. If less than what you consider by your “Star-Chamber” scale to be a proper amount, he is checked; but if over, as must necessarily occur, he receives no extra pay. He is expected to work at piece-work speed. You claim to be “model employers.” Before you can justify such a title you must abolish such systems as these altogether. There is one more matter to which I should like to draw attention. At Bull Point, when the Ordnance Store Department was transferred to the Naval Ordnance, it was understood that the men should retain their original privileges, and yet when the men received a rise in April last it was made a condition that all their privileges were to be confiscated. I took steps at once to question my hon. Friend the Civil Lord in this House on the matter, and he stated deliberately that this was in exact accord with the agreement into which the men entered at the time of their transference to the Admiralty. I have, however, produced for his edification a copy of the original agreement which they signed, and I ask him now whether he is prepared to maintain the attitude he assumed on the occasion I referred to?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: If the hon. Gentleman will permit me, I will clear this matter up at once. The information on which I acted, and which I am sure was tendered by the officials in good faith, on re-examination proved to be incorrect; and, as I have already informed the hon. Gentleman privately, the privileges will not be interfered with.

MR. KEARLEY: I now wish to draw attention to those privileges which it is urged the men receive through being in the Government service. The men pay at least 5 per cent. of their wages towards their pensions. A labourer at 18s. a week loses the 1s. a week for Establishment, and you must remember that only 25 per cent. of the total employment get pensions. The sum checked from wages really pays for one-half of a man's pension, which, on the word of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forwood), costs the Government less than 10 per cent. Now, in Germany, the State pensions are managed very differently. In that country the workmen contribute one-third, the employer contributes one-third, and the State contributes a third; and as the State and the employer in dockyards is one and the same person, I contend that the Government should bear two-thirds of the cost. Now, about the four days' holiday these men get. Two of the days are ordained by the State Church—which, unfortunately, continues to exist—to be Sundays, or, at any rate, their equivalent. I mean, of course, Christmas Day and Good Friday. These holidays are not really worth 6d. a week. Much has been said about the continuity of employment, and how that if the men are injured during work they have free medical attendance and half-pay, and if permanently disabled they get compensation. Now, Sir, I do not know if this is so very generous. I should be ashamed to think that I did not pay a man in my employ full wages during his illness. I do not believe that men like Armstrong are any less liberal in their terms. There is another question with regard to the hours worked. At present they are about 50 hours a week, and the men are anxious that they should be reduced to 48. If these demands were granted it would not cost the Government 1d. more. It would not be necessary to employ any more men, for the men would be able to work for the shorter period with more sustained energy, and the Government would have the credit of having brought into existence this satisfactory state of things. In conclusion, I must say that the Government have no possible excuse to refuse to carry out the undertakings which they have given. They cannot say that there is not time to introduce a Bill. They have not the excuse that their Parliamentary time is already mortgaged. They have simply to place the money on the Estimates and the House will readily vote it, and I do say that unless you do that you stand convicted out of your own mouths as men who come here and give your Parliamentary word and pledge, but when the occasion presents itself for their redemption you show the worthlessness of your professions.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, he desired to make a few observations in answer to the remarks which had been submitted in support of the proposed abolition of classification in Her Majesty's Dockyards, and in defence of the action of the late Government. Anyone who had heard the speeches of the Civil Lord and of the hon. Member who had just sat down would suppose that the late Government had done a grievous wrong and injury to the dockyard employés. But what were the facts? After a careful inquiry, they had made additions to the rates of pay to the men in the dockyards amounting to something like £72,000 a year. The proposal now made by the present Government was to further increase that addition to some few trades by the sum of £31,000. The benefits given by the late Government were conferred on every trade. The hon. Member who had just sat down had said that the late Government, in distributing the increase, adopted, in the case of certain trades, the principle of classification, which existed in nearly every trade in the dockyards. Now, at the outset, he (Mr. Forwood) wanted the Committee to realise the marked distinction there was between men employed in Government establishments and those who worked for private firms. Apart from the advantages pointed out by the Civil Lord, the former had regular employment and a practical assurance of continuous wages. Moreover, in the private yards, if men did not behave properly, they could be discharged without anyone to question the action of the employer. But that was not the case at the dockyards. A man must commit himself to a very considerable extent, and show a great want of diligence, before it was reported by the officer at the dockyard that he was inefficient and ought to be discharged. Under these circumstances, there ought to be in the hands of the officials of the dockyards a power to reward diligence and merit. Such a power was more important in Government yards than in private yards, where more drastic measures could be taken as regarded the cessation of the employment of any individual. The advantages of the Government service, striking as they were in connection with the hired men, were doubly so in connection with the men on the Establishment. When men were placed on the Establishment they were assured for the rest of their workable days, or until they were 60 or 65 years of age, of continuous employment and a pension unless they were guilty of gross misconduct. There was no inducement whatever to a man, if put on uniform pay, to strive to emulate his fellow working men and do better work. When he first had to do with them it was one of the grievances of the shipwrights that they got to 30s. a week, and there remained; but the present proposal was going to continue that system, merely increasing the amount to 31s. 6d. He felt that there was a strong case to be made out for placing those trades in the dockyards that were not classified before under the system which had prevailed for so many years in connection with other trades. He was going to call one or two witnesses in evidence of the principle adopted by the late Administration in connection with this wages question. The first witness he would call was the hon. Member for Devonport himself. On the 9th May, 1891, the hon. Member made a speech (reported in The Western Daily Mercury) in which he used these words—

“Mr. Forwood, in addition to being the Secretary to the Admiralty, has large interests, I believe, in private yards in Liverpool.”

That statement he (Mr. Forwood) had denied most emphatically. He had no interest whatever in shipbuilding, and the statement had clearly been made to injure the Board of Admiralty of which he had been a Member. The hon. Member had gone on to say—

“Well, I would like to ask him whether he would dare to classify his private labour on a similar principle to the limited and unjust classification as employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards. What his reply might be I will not venture to say, but it has been well said that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander also. What you are demanding and what you will, I hope, continue to insist upon, and what we, as your Representatives, if you return us as such will work for is that the advance in the wages of all dockyard employés in all branches should be a general and an all-round one, estimated and based on the wages which are generally recognised as being the accepted standard of the mechanics and labourers employed in private yards. There should be a general percentage rise all round, and not individualised. I am an employer of labour myself—a large employer—paying wages weekly to between 1,000 and 1,500 employés. What is the basis upon which my firm proceeds in appraising a man's worth for promotion? We first of all lay down the principle of ‘a fair field and no favour,’ and we wish it to be generally understood that a man's preferment and advancement will be dependent on that. In the first place, merit backed up, secondly, by length of service.”

MR. KEARLEY said, if the right hon. Gentleman would excuse him interposing, he would point out that the men in his own employment who were rewarded on the conditions referred to were not engaged in work common to all, but in work which varied according to the necessities of the business. The argument that the right hon. Gentleman was endeavouring to raise was altogether inapplicable. It, in fact, tended to disprove the right hon. Gentleman's contention and prove his (Mr. Kearley's).

MR. FORWOOD said, the colour the hon. Member now sought to give to his remarks was not to be found in the remarks themselves. He had put in the forefront the simple proposition that merit, backed up by length of service, was the principle on which men should be paid in the dockyards. Well, the late Board of Admiralty had given instructions for the foremen in the shops to recommend for promotion those men who deserved it through competency and diligence, regard also being had to length of service. It was stated, further, in the instructions that when the Admiral Superintendent recommended men for increase of pay over the heads of men who had been longer in the service he was to give the names of those whom he passed over, and the men passed over should be at liberty to state their case to the Admiralty. Every effort had been made to insure that the best men should be promoted, and that there should be no favouritism shown. The Civil Lord said he appointed a very strong Committee to consider the evidence which he had taken; but he limited the action of the Committee, and said their object must be to do away with classification. He (Mr. Forwood) did not wonder that, as the hon. Member had said, instructions were necessary. As the hon. Member had very properly said, they appointed a strong Committee. Admiral Fane—Admiral Superintendent at Portsmouth—was the Chairman, a Member of the Committee was Mr. Wildish, Civil Assistant or Constructor—he was not sure which—at Devonport; Mr. Barnaby, Chief Civil Superintendent at Chatham, was another. One would have thought that the opinions of gentlemen practically concerned in the work of the dockyards would have been asked on such a matter as the abolition of classification unfettered and without instruction, and he was surprised that they should have undertaken a duty which he thought must have been against their own convictions. These gentlemen certainly knew much better the circumstances connected with Her Majesty's Dockyards and the practical working of them than the Lords of the Admiralty. But the dockyard men had votes, which was a potent factor in all dealings with dockyard questions. These matters were not approached in the House in the fair way in which they should be approached. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Kearley) was the avowed advocate of the interests of the dockyard men; therefore, his appeals for increased benefits for those men must be discounted. He had quoted the hon. Member. He would now proceed to give other evidence. Mr. Williamson, Director of Dockyards, before the Royal Commission on Labour, was thus examined by Mr. Dale—

“Q. Is it your experience that the wages in the dockyards range lower than those paid in other districts?”

“A. I think not. They now compare favourably with such places as the Clyde and Belfast, &c., the revised scheme of wages having been based upon a fair average wage of the private shipbuilding and engineering trades.”

Then he was asked—

“Q. As regards the classification of skilled and other labourers, have you formed any opinion or not?”

“A. Yes, I have. The so-called classification of skilled labour is as essential in that as in any other body of workmen, not only in the interests of the Service, but in the interests of the men themselves.”

Mr. Wildish was asked by him (Mr. Forwood)—

“Q. Would you make the higher rate uniform, or would you have it on a graduated scale to certain classes?”

“A. Most certainly a graduated scale; I should say the numbers in the higher scale being limited according to the requirements of the work mainly.”

Mr. Stanier, Civil Assistant at Portsmouth Dockyard, was asked—

“Q. You indicated that you preferred a graduated scale of pay to an uniform rate of pay?”

“A. Undoubtedly so; that has been my experience and opinion for many years, and I have had no reason to alter it.”

Mr. Barnaby was asked—

“Q. Do you approve of a uniform rate of pay, or would you prefer a classification?”

“A. I should much prefer a classification.”

“Q. How would you put men in the classes—would you put them according to merit, or upon what rule?”

“A. I have said in my Report.—‘This would enable specially expert workmen being rewarded, advancement to higher rates being generally considered due to ability and servitude.’”

“Q. Would you lay down as a rule a definite term for a man to remain in each class before he was eligible for promotion, or would you leave that an absolutely open question for the officers of the yard to determine?”

“A. I should leave it open. We should soon find out what a man was worth. I should not like them to be bound to any term. Sometimes, for instance, we know when we get a workman that he is an excellent man and worth more than a man to whom we are paying 5s. a day."

That was the evidence given by persons who were responsible for the good administration and discipline of the dockyards—for the quick carrying out of the work, for the proper employment of the men. That evidence, coupled with what the men themselves represented, fully justified the principle adopted by the late Administration in paying each man according to his ability. And in their scheme of classification they took care that a man who did his work properly and diligently had not to wait for a vacancy caused by death for preferment. The instruction to the officers of the yard was that the list to be submitted from each dockyard of men deserving promotion was to be absolutely unlimited. The scheme of the late Government had been in operation. Under the classification scheme 426 men had been promoted up to the 27th of June, 1892, and if the hon. Member for Devonport complained that the number was not larger the fault lay with the present Government. To come more particularly to the proposal of the Civil Lord, as representing the present Board of Admiralty, he (Mr. Forwood) did not for a moment grudge any further advance that was given to the ordinary or unskilled labourer at the yards. Formerly the rate of pay to those men was only 15s. a week. The late Board thought that that was not a fair wage for any man to exist upon, and they increased it to 18s. a week after a probationary period, and the present Board, he understood, were going to increase the amount to 19s. a week. He thought, however, that it was a mistake to make a further special allowance of 1s. a week to the labourers employed at Woolwich and Deptford because of the higher house rents they had to pay. He did not think that they should differentiate between the men at Woolwich and the men at Devonport, for they were as worthy of consideration at one yard as at the other. If the Government gave one yard the 19s. a week they must extend that 19s. to every one of the other yards. They could not differentiate, and, at the same time, give a feeling of satisfaction to the men. This attempt to undo what was done on the best and strongest of evidence had been described by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) as in every sense unsatisfactory from the point of view of the men. He (Mr. Forwood) was not surprised at it. Whereas the joiners received from 28s. to 30s. those already on the Establishment were to receive under the scheme 29s. 6d., and men who came on the Establishment in the future were to receive only 29s. In other words, the joiners were to be docked of 1s. a week in order to abolish classification. He did not think the joiner class would be pleased with such a proposal. The other great class was that of the shipwrights. To-day the maximum pay of an Established shipwright was 33s., and in future his maximum pay was to be 31s. 6d., so that the shipwrights were in future to lose the chance of obtaining the extra 1s. 6d. a week. The hired shipwrights were to be docked 1s. There was an anomaly, because the hired shipwright, whose maximum pay in future was to be 33s. a week, would, when placed on the Establishment, obtain only 31s. 6d., so that he would forfeit 1s. 6d. a week in order to gain the benefits of the Establishment. Under the scheme approved by his noble Friend (Lord G. Hamilton), an experienced man—and only experienced men ought to be Established—only forfeited 1s. a week on becoming Established. The Government were, therefore, not only going to reduce the maximum pay, but were going to penalise those who went on Establishment in order that they might do what their predecessors had done. There was only one other word he wished to say on this matter; he wished to call attention to the numbers affected by this proposal, and perhaps the Civil Lord would tell him if he were right in the inference he drew. The idea was that 10,800 of the men should be paid on a uniform basis, and that the remainder of the men in other trades in the yards, numbering 8,000, should continue in the classification list. That was the effect as regarded numbers. The shipwrights undoubtedly, as he had said before, and now said again, were the backbone of the yard; and if the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) had been in his place he could have assured him that no remarks he had ever made were intended to or meant in any way to detract from the high opinion he had of their character as skilled workmen, or their conduct in the discharge of their duties in the yard ; but the shipwrights were the class who made this demand on Her Majesty's Government, and they had made this demand on the Government because the leaders of the Trades Unions of the country had more influence with this trade than with any other trade in the yard. They heard to-day from the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) a demand that the Admiralty should no longer regulate the rates of pay in the Naval Establishments, but that they should be regulated by the Councils of the Trades Unions of the country. He did not know what answer the Civil Lord (Mr. E. Robertson) was going to make to that demand ; but that was the demand that was made, and it was a very plain and simple one, that the Trades Unions should fix the rates of wages in Her Majesty's dockyards. These rates would have to be fixed, from time to time, according to the fluctuations in the labour market of the country. He did not grudge any Board of Admiralty the task of having constantly to be adjusting the pay of the men according to the fluctuations of the labour market. The shipwrights had undoubtedly been a class very prominent in this agitation. But why should such bodies of men as the engine-fitters and ship-fitters be left out of consideration ? These men were not to receive a single sixpence of extra pay. His opinion was that the engineer and iron ship-fitter was a class of trade certainly not second in importance to that of the shipwrights ; but they and other important trades were left out of all consideration, and only attention was paid to the shipwrights, because, he supposed, they were a little more clamorous. He supposed, also, their votes were given under circumstances at the last Election—admitted by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley)—which required that the promises then made should be fulfilled. So much for the plan as regarded the classification and the labour question of the yards. The Civil Lord, in the concluding part of his remarks, dragged in another matter which seemed to him (Mr. Forwood) quite outside the matter they were discussing ; the Civil Lord brought in the question of the shipbuilding programme, and he challenged certain observations made by his noble Friend (Lord G. Hamilton) last night as to the effect of the distribution of labour and the commencement of new ships in the dockyards. As to the effect upon labour the Chairman ruled him out of Order last night, so that he was unable to proceed into that matter, and he was sorry again to have to attempt to go into it ; but on that point the Civil Lord used rather more vehement language than in other parts of his speech. The Civil Lord stated that he (Mr. Forwood) and his noble Friend (Lord G. Hamilton) had threatened the House with discharges, and that that was the intent and meaning of the observations they made. The intent and meaning of their observations were absolutely contrary to that. What they desired was to give the Admiralty the experience of six years' work at the Admiralty, and warn them that unless they took a certain line of policy those discharges would be inevitable. If they had wanted to obtain any advantage in the matter they would have held their peace and not given any word of warning, because then next year the Government must have inevitably discharged a number of men, and undoubtedly their political opponents would have got the benefit of such discharges. In a few words he must give the Civil Lord the figures, which he thought he would find it impossible to gainsay. The Civil Lord said—"I assure you that there will be no discharges next year." Very well ; he did not want any discharges in the dockyards next year ; but he could assure the Civil Lord that if he went on with the programme as at present laid down there must be discharges, or a very large increase in the Votes for material and contract labour. It was inevitable, and that was the reason they mentioned this matter. He would now give the Civil Lord the figures as to labour. The Estimate this year was £831,000. If the Civil Lord wished to keep the workmen in employment it would require £135,000 to complete the old programme. Then, if the hon. Member wished to make good progress with the ships in the new programme, he would have to expend on labour £366,000, making a total of £501,000 ; therefore, next year he must find employment, if he wished to keep the same number employed as were employed to-day, representing £330,000. What was the case with regard to materials ? By the Government figures it involved £150,000 to complete the old programme; to proceed with new battle-ships would require £891,000, and for contract work the material for their new cruisers would come to £300,000. They would, in addition, require for unappropriated labour, £1,076,000; and the total of these figures summed up to £3,250,000 against £1,900,000, the Construction Vote this year. Therefore, to keep these number of men employed, unless the Admiralty made a complete and drastic change in their programme on new ships—and he was afraid it was too late for them to do that—they would have to increase their Construction Vote by £1,300,000.

MR. BAKER (Portsmouth) protested against Dockyard Members being described in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman referred to them.

MR. FORWOOD: I was simply quoting the remarks made by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley).

MR. BAKER said, the statements made by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) were not acquiesced in by other Dockyard Members. But the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) last night anticipated the argument, and made very similar remarks; in fact, it was not at all an uncommon thing to hear such remarks made; and, as a Dockyard Member representing one of the largest of Her Majesty's Dockyards, he entirely resented such an imputation that Dockyard Members were unduly pressing the claims of their constituents. The duty of a Representative was to attend to the interests of his constituency; and in this particular dockyards were not different from any other constituency. What interest was there in the country that was not directly represented by those elected for the purpose? More than that, the great trade interests, the great Church interests, railway and other interests were all directly represented; but no imputation was passed on the Members that they were unduly pressing claims, or improperly putting forth arguments and statements for and on behalf of their constituents. He could convince the right hon. Gentleman that the constituency he represented was quite free from any such oscillation or taunt as suggested. In 1885, before the scheme came into operation, the constituency was represented by two Liberals. In 1886 a political wave passed over the country, and two Members of a different colour were sent to Parliament. But a recurring wave subsequently sent in Liberal Members, and that, he thought, disposed of the accusation that they were unduly pressing their claims. It seemed to be considered by Members, and especially by Members of the Government, that men employed in the dockyards were treated better than other workmen, both in regard to their wages and their position. That, he thought, was an impossible position for the Government to take up, and it must be remembered that the Government brought these men to the localities, and removed them from all the advantages which they might enjoy in other districts where employers were more numerous. He looked upon the rate of wages suggested in the new scheme of classification as an instalment towards a settlement which should be satisfactory to the workmen of all classes. He did not think that the Government had treated the men with that amount of generosity which they deserved, and next year there would have to be a further instalment paid on that account. The men ought to receive to the full what the same class of workmen received in any other part of the country. Shipwrights throughout the country received an average wage of 36s. 6d. per week: but the shipwrights employed in Government Dockyards would take 34s. and be satisfied, which would mean that the men would each give 2s. 6d. a week for the supposed advantages they now obtained under the Government. The Government seemed to have overlooked the solemn proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Gorst), that the Government would show to the employers of the country an example, and that they would at least start upon the scheme for improving the condition of the working men. If a contractor employed a labourer upon Government work he was obliged to pay 4½d. an hour; but the Government themselves did not give that to their labourers. What the Government proposed to do was to pay their workmen wages 5 and 10 per cent. less than the current rate of wages paid for the same labour in the market outside the dockyards. As to the question of probation it was out of date, and no other employers engaged their hands in such a fashion. He hoped, therefore, there was still time for the Government to make a modification of their scheme in that respect, so that no man should receive less than the average wages paid in like employment throughout the country.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Baker) complains of the imputations liberally cast upon Dockyard Representatives when they intervene in Debates on the Naval Estimates. I have great sympathy with that complaint. I represented a dockyard constituency for 17 years, both when my friends were in Office and when my opponents were in Office, and I do not think I ever got up to make a speech in one of these Debates on this Vote without being sneered at by somebody or other because I was a Dockyard Representative. It is the common lot of the class, and so long as the hon. Member has the privilege of representing a great dockyard constituency I am afraid the sceptical and cynical spirits in the House will indulge in these sneers. I gave notice a short time ago that I would, on the occasion of this Vote, invite the Government to state what practical steps they have taken to give effect to the Resolution which was adopted by the House in March last; and I have to acknowledge my obligations to the Civil Lord of the Admiralty for having, in his Memorandum and in his speech this evening, so clearly and fully explained all that the Government has done. For what they have done I must tender them my most grateful thanks. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) seemed to be afraid that I was not going to stand to my guns, and that I would recede from some of the sentiments expressed by me last March. I can assure the hon. Member and the Committee that there is no such danger. It is only the Members of the Government who are allowed to make the same speech twice over, otherwise I would repeat exactly what I said in March. But, as time is very precious, I do not want to go over the whole ground again, or to attempt anything like the elaborate criticism of the Government proposal which has already been made by the hon. Member for Devonport, in a great deal of which I concur; but I would like to look at the matter from the point of view of the interests of labour generally throughout the country, which are very much involved in this question, and I would like also to point out in what respect the Government has, in my opinion, failed to give effect to the Resolution of the House. I say that the workers in the country generally are very much excited over this question. There was a time, not very long ago, when dockyard workmen were considered to be rather favoured individuals, and when the working classes throughout the country generally felt no very strong sympathy with them; but I think that time has gone by, and that workers generally perceive that they have a most vital interest in seeing that the relations between employer and employé in the dockyards are of a satisfactory character. The workers are really the employers in the dockyards. Their money is being spent; and they control the election of this Parliament, which has the Admiralty under its control, and consequently, if the treatment of the dockyard workmen is not perfectly just, it is the masses of the people of this country who are ultimately to blame. We should look upon the Government, whether they like it or not, as to a great extent a model employer of labour, for the views they enforce have a wide-reaching effect upon the action of private employers, and upon the conditions of workmen in every industry in the country. Therefore, the great mass of the electors of the country really feel a very great interest in this dockyard question. In the first place, I cannot accept as satisfactory the conclusion at which the Government have arrived as to what wages are sufficient for maintenance. I think it would be impossible for the House of Commons to lay down the rate of wages which employers should give so as not to be guilty of the offence of sweating, and I do not know whether the House is in a position to critically examine the figure of 19s. to which the Government have arrived as a minimum weekly wage. I should like to know whether the hon. Member for Battersea considers 19s. is in accordance with the Trade Union rate, and whether it is free from the imputation of a sweating wage? As a Member of the Labour Commission, I know what the wages of the men down the river are, and I should have thought that 19s. is rather a low figure; but I have no data upon which to dispute the figure. But having come to the conclusion that 19s. is the wage they ought to pay to redeem themselves from the accusation of being sweating employers, I cannot understand by what process of argument the Government have been induced to adopt the system of probation. The probationer must commence in the yard at 17s. a week, which is raised in another year to 18s. I noticed that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty was a little ashamed of that part of the scheme. I hope that indicates that there is a certain amount of dissatisfaction amongst the men with the action of the Admiralty. I am sure it would have been wiser if the Government, having come to the conclusion that 19s. ought to be the minimum wage, were able to tell the country that, except in a very brief period of probation, there was no man in their dockyards who had less than 19s. a week wages. I will not dwell upon the question of classification at any length, for I consider that, although it is a very important matter, it is outside the scope of the Resolution passed by the House in March last. I may say, however, that when I represented a dockyard constituency I expressed a very strong opinion against classification, and now that I am not returned by such a constituency and can hold a perfectly independent opinion on the subject I see no reason to withdraw from that opinion. It seems to me that in introducing classification into their service the Admiralty are going a little beyond making themselves model employers, and are making themselves experimental employers. The mere fact that the system is unknown in private yards is a sufficient reason for the Government to abstain from making the experiment. It is quite clear that the system will not work, and that it is unpopular with the workers. I come to a point on which I am very much disappointed with the action of the Government, in face of the pledge given when the Resolution of March last was passed, and that is the question of hours. I should have thought that with a Government in Office which is generally favourable to an eight hours day, and which has voted in block for it in the mining industry, there would have been a chance of seeing the experiment of an eight hours day introduced into the dockyards.

I hoped and believed that after my Resolution the Government would have reduced the hours of labour in their dockyards to 48 hours a week, especially as the hours worked in the dockyards very slightly exceed eight hours per day, being only 51 hours per week. I, therefore, feel the strongest disappointment that the Government have not seen their way to make this slight and salutary change; and I hope that next Session more pressure will be put on the Government to induce them to make the change. But I regret most that no change whatever has been made in the direction of providing for the old age of workmen in Government establishments.

MR. E. ROBERTSON : The subject is not relevant to this Vote.

SIR J. GORST : But it is relevant to this Vote. The great complaint which I made in March last, and the complaint which has been made in every Dockyard Debate in this Committee for the last 20 years, is the extraordinary difference which every successive Government keeps up between the Established and non-Established men in their service. No one has ever been able to give a satisfactory reason for that distinction. In the dockyards there are men working side by side, some of whom can look forward to a pension and others of whom will have nothing but a gratuity on retirement. I would not say that every man should at once become entitled to a pension. There might be one or two years' probation established, to see whether the men are really fit for the service, and whether they are the class of men you want. But at present more than half the men employed, though they may have worked for 20 years in the dockyards and arsenals, have no provision for their old age. I have discussed this matter with the men, and I can say that they do not ask for anything unreasonable. They admit that the wages they receive should be lower than the wages given outside for the same work in consideration of the superannuation allowance; they have often asked that a reduction should be made from their wages and carried to a separate fund, and that an actuarial calculation should be furnished to them, in order to see how exactly it was with them and what they got for the reduction. To those demands, which I consider modest and reasonable, no Government has yet acceded. During the Debates on the subject in March last, it was stated that the Government contributed half of the amount towards pensions. I showed that the Germans gave one-third, and that, therefore, we were less generous to our workmen than the Germans. But what I contend for is, that all the permanent servants of the Government should have a provision made for the time when they are no longer able to earn a living by work; that that provision should take the form of a deduction from the wages an outside worker would receive; that it should be clearly and specifically stated how much was deducted for that purpose; and to what extent it was supplemented by a contribution from the employer, which in this case is Parliament, and that there should be no mystery and confusion between the employer and the employed in the matter. The Government will probably adhere to the old clumsy method of Established and non-Established men. They will continue to give the superannuation in the most inconvenient form in which it can be given; and that in the case of the premature death of a man who had been subscribing to the fund for 40 years, not a single penny will be returned to his widow or children. I must say that in all these respects I have been much disappointed with the Government. I hope before the Debate closes we shall have some assurance from them that the matter is engaging their attention, and that if not now, at some no distant date, this most necessary reform in the employment of the workers will be made.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea) said, he wished to say a few words from a general labour point of view upon the Wages Vote of the Naval Department. He had to express in part his approval of the action of the Admiralty in giving £30,000 of an increase in wages spread over a few thousand men; but he regretted that they had not, whilst they were about it, gone the whole hog, by ignoring entirely the advice of the permanent officials, doing away with classification altogether, and establishing Trades Union rates of wages. In this matter they had to be frank to the labourers, who asked for an increase of wages, and, at the same time, to be fair to the ratepayers. That was the position he wished to take up. It had been said by hon. Members on the Opposition side that they were practically allowing the wages and the hours of men employed in the dockyards and the arsenals to be regulated by the Trades Unions, and that that was a condition of things which would be subsequently regretted. He did not share that view. He considered that when Trades Unions brought pressure to bear upon the Government or upon Members of Parliament they were strictly within their legal and constitutional rights, provided that they were not insisting on iniquitous conditions or privileges for dockyard workmen; and if they were to choose between the labour conditions of dockyards being determined by Trades Unions or by Party politicians, he would prefer to see the dockyards dominated by the Trades Unions rather than to have the Army and Navy put up at a Dutch auction for the two political Parties, and knocked down to the highest bidder for dockyard votes. After all, the Trades Unions had a restraining influence, for they were restricted in their demands by the fact that they could not go beyond the market wages and hours prevailing outside the dockyards, and fixed in healthy rivalry; whilst nothing in the world would prevent a Party politician, anxious for place, and privilege, and power, from going as near to Tammany Hall as it was possible for human ingenuity to proceed. He assumed that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, in fixing the rates of wages, had acted in deference to the strong views of a deputation of workmen who waited on the Admiralty nine months ago, and on the representations made by Members of the House in March and May last. The scandalously low rates of wages which arsenal and dockyard men received were exposed on those occasions. He had in his hand four specimen cases from Chatham. A labourer earned 17s. a week; he paid 4s. 6d. for rent; 1s. 3d. for fuel; clothing, 1s.; club, 6d., leaving 10s. for food for himself and his wife and four children. That, in his opinion, came within the scope of a sweating wage. It was true that the Government had increased the wages to 19s., but having taken the advice of the permanent officials, who went on the principle of starving subordinates for the purpose of keeping up their own extravagantly large salaries, the Government had set up a system of paying only the permanent men the 19s., and putting the others on probation, giving them only 17s. to begin with, with increases of 1s. a year till 19s. was reached. If 19s. were a fair minimum wage, why not pay it graciously at once, and not compel some men to wait for 18 months or two years before they received 19s.? He intended to call the labourers as well as the Government to account in this matter. He found that many of the labourers, both unskilled and skilled, who got these low wages got up at 4 o'clock in the morning and worked for two or three hours for private contractors before they commenced work in the dockyards, or, after breaking off at 5 o'clock in the evening, worked for local "jerry builders," in order to get their earnings up to the current Trades Union rates of wages. That was a system which the Government should not tolerate. The Government should pay a fair day's wage, and provide that the men were fully qualified for the work they had to perform by insisting that no work should be allowed before or after the day's work in the dockyards for outside firms. He, therefore, appealed to the Government to abolish the provisional policy, and give the Trades Union rates of wages right away. Now, as to the question of skilled workmen, he was under the impression that a man in a mechanical industry received in wages what he had proved his capacity to earn. In turning out war material they wanted the best and most efficient labour that could be secured; but they would be unable to secure that labour so long as they refused to pay Trades Union rates of wages. In his own trade, for instance, the 76,000 men of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers were the best men, and they were all Trade Unionists, and if the Government only paid 32s. a week in the dockyards whilst 36s. was the rate outside they would only get glorified handy men to work for them, instead of competent engineers who had served a genuine apprenticeship. Then, as to classification, he was entirely opposed to it, root and branch. He believed that classification had been adopted in the arsenals by permanent officials with a view to diminish that amount of supervision that in the absence of classification they would have to give in looking after the men and seeing that they did the proper work. It was contrary to the private yard system, which was, generally speaking, the best system of building vessels. The best plan was to give the men a maximum wage—let it be a Trades Union wage—to demand from them a minimum day's work, and to have no fancy classification which placed in the hands of a foreman who had a house to let the power of promoting his tenant to a higher scale in order to secure his rent when dockyard employment got scarce. He believed that if emoluments, pensions, and bonuses were abolished altogether, and the Trade Union rates of wages paid, the men would be better pleased. He was convinced that these emoluments, about which the men did not trouble themselves a bit, were kept up by the higher officials in order to justify the the big emoluments they obtained for themselves. He would suggest that the men employed in the construction of war material should be placed on the same footing as men employed at the same work outside. This would save the House from being worried every year by these details which a Departmental Committee ought to consider and settle. Generally speaking, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University and himself agreed on labour questions; but he would ask the Government not to follow one piece of advice which the right hon. Gentleman had given them. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he was in favour of the abolition of the distinction between non-established and permanent men. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the abolition of that distinction meant that emoluments, privileges, pensions, and bonuses must go by the board at once. But the right hon. Gentleman asked the Government to bring in a scheme of pensions. He sincerely hoped the Government would do nothing of the kind. Let the Government pay the men Trades Union wages, and then the men could go to their own Sick and Benefit Societies to make provision for their old age, or join with their fellow-workers throughout the country in demanding a national system of insurance based on some scheme of taxation, which they could claim as a right and not as a favour from the Government which incidentally employed them. He could not understand why the Government hesitated to establish an eight hours day, especially as they had the example of eight or ten large employers of labour on their own side of the House who had shown them how to do it with profit to their workmen and advantage to themselves. He, therefore, hoped that the Government would screw up their courage to the sticking point, and go in for an eight hours day. There was another matter to which he wished to direct attention. He found that in the Government dockyards there was an interchange of trades in all departments and in all classes of work. Shipwrights did engineers' work; boiler-makers did shipwrights' work; and carpenters did engineers' work. That was not the way things were done on the Clyde, Tyne, and in Belfast. In these private dockyards the engineers did engineering work and the shipwrights shipwright work. In some of the arsenals and dockyards they had got men who were jacks of all trades and masters of none. He would like to see the whole system of the supervision of the dockyards overhauled. The fact that a man was on the Front Bench did not imply that he was an embodiment of all the virtues, an Admirable Crichton, fit to run the universe. It was not always so. For his part, he thought that a Committee of 15 or 20 men should have power to visit these dockyards whilst the men were at work, not to interfere with discipline, not to interfere with the permanent officials in their successful administration of these large concerns, but in order to see if there was anything that would improve the condition of the workers and the character of the work they turned out. But such visits to these arsenals and dockyards were not allowed, with the result that some of the best engineers in the world—men who had established and maintained the English supremacy for engineering—were compelled to take statements from discontented workmen at second hand, and had no practical experience of the truth of the complaints. In fact, the House of Commons was behind every Corporation and other Public Bodies which recognised the principle of Trades Union wages, and possessed the right to see, and overhaul, and supervise, and criticise the work of every one of their Departments. He asked the Government to consider this proposal, whether the ratepayers, through their Members of Parliament, should not get some grip of the administration of the Departments, which spent annually £36,000,000 or £37,000,000? He asked the Government also to make no further bones about establishing an eight hours day in all Government workshops, and they would find that it would be one of the strongest points in their favour amongst the working classes when they appealed to the country.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I should like to notice some of the points which have arisen in the course of this discussion, and I will take as my starting point the very excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea, who has alluded to most of these points. He concluded by a reference to the 48 hours week. There is no difficulty in the way of our establishing a 48 hours week in the dockyards. We are now so close to the mark, there being only two hours or an hour and a half difference in point of time.

MR. W. ALLAN (Gateshead): Then why do not you do it?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: We have not lost sight of the question. It is now under consideration, and we hope, if we take the step, to be able to bring other Departments with us. I would point out that this question has not been urged on our attention by the working men themselves, because I presume they are so close on the 48 hours a week that the matter does not touch them closely. The hon. Member for Battersea also alluded to the technical matter of the interchange of trades in the dockyards. The most important case of the kind is a contest between the shipwrights and the fitters, and hon. Members will understand that it is a very delicate matter to interfere in a contest of the kind between two trades. We have, to some extent, acceded to the claim of the fitters so far as the ships are concerned; but we hope to inquire more fully into the matter. The one fact that has impressed itself most strongly on my mind as the result of these discussions is the unanimity with which the principle of approbation has been condemned. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University has suspected that I was not myself in favour of it.

He said, indeed, that I was ashamed of it. I cannot make such an admission as that; but I would remind the Committee that I specifically stated that my view was that it was not to be a compulsory but a permissive arrangement. I am much impressed by the arguments which have been urged against it, and I need not say that they shall have due consideration. There has been a general discussion about the rates of the various trades. I will not attempt an answer, but I am half-inclined to think that due justice has not been done to our proposals. We have got the best information that was available as to the rates of wages paid outside for the same class of work as is done in the dockyards, and, acting on that information, we believe we have established what my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea said was the thing we ought to establish—namely, rates of wages in the dockyards corresponding to the rates of wages fixed by competition in the open markets. As to classification, I can only say that we have taken up that position and must abide by it.

*MR. EGERTON ALLEN (Pembroke, &c.) said, that the dockyard men looked upon the House of Commons as their paymasters, and as the final arbitrators between them and the Admiralty; and as the point of view of the Admiralty, had been very plausibly put before the Committee by officials of the Admiralty it was only fair to the dockyard men that their point of view also should be stated by their Representatives. He did not care whether a Dockyard Representative sat on the Government side or on the Opposition side; he believed that every one of them would deem it his duty to call attention to the grievances of the men, and, so to speak, submit to the arbitration of the House of Commons the difference between them and the Admiralty. For himself, he felt he was in honour bound to place the grievances of the men before the House, and he meant to discharge that obligation. What he asked the Committee to do was to pass a judgment, if possible, on the general principles which ought to govern the relations between the Admiralty and the dockyard servants, and he only brought forward particular grievances in order to illustrate the question of this general principle. The Admiralty, impregnated as they were by a conception of implicit obedience in the Naval Service, wished to carry on their engagements and their relations with the men as if it was one of the services spelt with a big S in which discipline and order were all in all, and the responsibility of the superior to the subordinate was never for a moment thought of. The men, on the other hand, looked upon their relations with the Admiralty as one of an industrial contract between employers and employed. There should be no more secrecy, no more arbitrary conduct and discipline employed by the Admiralty in their relations with the men in the dockyards than was employed by any private employers of labour. He admitted that there must be discipline, regulation, and, of course, order. But what the men claimed was that there should not be more of it than was found necessary in the case of a private employer. The Secretary to the Admiralty had said the Committee that had been appointed had come to the best possible conclusion in the interests of both parties. He recognised the undoubted ability of the gentlemen who served upon that Committee; but it was a pity that there was not some direct consultation with the men as to any terms to be offered to them before those terms were finally stereotyped. He could not believe that in any great dispute between a private employer of labour and his men any decision could be come to unless the men had the opportunity of putting their views forward on equality with their employer. In the case of private employers, the men were able to kick against injustice; they were able to put the employer to great inconvenience, and to force on him that consideration which they thought was their due. But that power was utterly shut off from the men in Government employ. It was absurd to talk about a strike against the Government; they could not injure the Government by striking against them, as they could in the case of a private employer. Besides, the Government had force at their disposal, which it was utterly impossible to oppose or to grapple with. Again, many of the Government employés were under a system of deferred payment, which crippled them in standing out against the wishes of the Government. Therefore, the Government were all the more bound to take just measures to obtain a knowledge of the views of the men. He had received telegram after telegram expressing the dissatisfaction of the men with this new scheme. The last he had received from Pembroke Dock was put into his hands half-an-hour ago, and was as follows :—

“Great dissatisfaction with proposed scheme among shipwrights Maximum rates of present scheme alone will satisfy. Men determined to oppose proposed scheme, which establishes classification and prevents men from obtaining higher rate, which is a great injustice and most objectionable.”

What the shipwrights wanted was a wage of 34s. a week for hired men as the pay all round. The probationary period had been so much attacked that he need not trouble to attack it any further. The men wanted the scheme brought into force at once. They could not see why, if it was fair to raise their wages, it would not be fair to do so at once, and he could not see what the answer could be to that except the difficulty of finding money. But that was not the difficulty which the Government had themselves accepted as a sufficient answer. They had admitted that they ought in fairness to the men to spend at least £30,000 on a new scheme. The obligation being present ought to be discharged at once. The men complained of supercession. After passing examinations which were to secure advancement by an absolute engagement, they found men put over their heads who, in some cases, had not passed an examination at all, or had not passed so well, and in some cases had passed subsequently, and got a priority to which they were not entitled. This was a special grievance with foremen of yards and draughtsmen. There was another point with regard to the rates of pay and retiring allowances. The regulations as to retiring allowances had been prejudicially altered without any warning, and without any saving of the rights of men who had worked under them. Drillers and riveters had been specially affected by a sudden change in rates of pay. Then there was the ignorance of the rates which would be paid for task and job work, and he was glad to find that the Civil Lord had said that that grievance would no longer exist, for hitherto men had been treated as if they had no right to ask questions on the subject. There was another matter of very great importance, and that was the question of what might be called acting service. Men were working permanently on certain jobs, yet they were not rated as doing those jobs. If they left the Service they would not be given the credit of the work they had been doing, but would be discharged as having been employed on work inferior to the work they had actually done. Men worked as skilled labourers but were rated as ordinary labourers acting as skilled labourers. Then, again, skilled labourers acted as stokers, machine men &c., and part of their pay was cut off because they were not rated for the work they did. The equality of the trades was also a matter of great importance to the men. The shipwrights had an advantage over both joiners and fitters, and, of course, the latter did not like it. The leading men of the shipwrights were called Inspectors, but the leading men of the other sections were not allowed the title or the privileges. The Inspectors were allowed sick leave and casual leave without loss of pay, which the leading men of the joiners and fitters were not allowed. The joiners were worse off than either shipwrights or fitters, because they had no high priest at the Admiralty. If these grievances were shown to be valid they ought to be remedied. It would be a great improvement if the attempt to enforce the present discipline over the men in the dockyards was abandoned. He asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty to consider this point: that all regulations relating to the men's labour and pay and retiring allowances should be codified and published, and that they should not be altered without full warning to the men and consultation with their Representatives. The men should be allowed to have a real voice in criticising any proposed alteration or new scheme put forward, and he would ask that The Labour Gazette should be used by the Admiralty for the purpose of publishing proposed regulations, and that its columns should be open to the complaints of the dockyard men by allowing reasonable letters by them to appear therein.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) said, of the many speeches that had been made in this Debate the one that struck him most was that of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. J. Burns). He was a Representative of the working men. For himself, he (Mr. Wolff) was not a Representative of employers of labour, but he was a large employer, and it was, therefore, unlikely that he would take the same view as the hon. Member on all the subjects touched upon by him. He was bound, however, to say that, so far as his speech was concerned with the management of the dockyards, his observations were of a character with which he (Mr. Wolff) thoroughly and entirely agreed. The question of the management of the dockyards could not have been criticised in a fairer or more practical spirit. He had not yet been educated up to the views of the hon. Member for Battersea on the eight hours question; but he agreed with the hon. Member that, if an eight hours day was to become compulsory, and if it was to be introduced into the land, there was no place in which it ought to be introduced sooner than in the Government Service. If there was anything which ought to distinguish the management of Government Establishments it was that they ought to be ahead of private firms, not only as to the work they turned out, but also as to the relations in which they and their employés stood to each other. The more he thought of it the more he was persuaded that the Government Dockyards ought to be conducted on the same principle as private yards. He was convinced that before long the Trades Unions would force the Government into that system, and he thought it would be better that they should move in that direction. The system by which men were employed to do everything—and made, so to speak, jacks-of-all-trades and masters of none—was not satisfactory; the Government might by such a system get a quantity of work done, but they would not get the quality that they should get. Besides, the system of classification and differences in rates of wages produced very bad feeling. The labourers employed on the system adopted at the dockyards was against any man so employed becoming a proper skilled tradesman. The probation system had been so fully discussed that he would not delay to speak upon it. It had been fully condemned. There might be something theoretically good in the distinctions that were drawn, but they could not work it in practice. It would be much better, as he had said, for the Government to adopt the Trades Union principle at once than to wait, resisting it and having to yield in the end. Let them pay first-class men first-class wages, just as a private employer did, and sweep away all pensions and allowances, which, when they came to be put into money, amounted to very little. A certain number of men only enjoyed these extras. Would it not be better to commute or compound them, following the example set in the Irish Church case? Let them, then, keep each tradesman to what he had been taught and trained to. The system of extra pay for extra work was another source of grievance; there was sure to be an outcry while it lasted, just as from experience he could say there used to be in private yards. Another point made by the hon. Member for Battersea was that of having a Committee of Experts appointed by the House to visit the dockyards. He (Mr. Wolff) thought that was very desirable. The opinions of such a Committee would be of great value to the House, to the Navy, to the permanent officials, who, though as he knew were thoroughly efficient men, were apt, through lack of supervision and control by the House, to get into a groove from which nothing would move them. In all respects the yards should be as well managed as those of private firms. There might be some reason for the existence of defects in the system of management in private yards, owing to considerations of which they were all aware—the state of trade in the future and uncertainties that constantly arose; but in the case of the Government that did not apply, as they had their plans laid out for years ahead, and there was no ground for defence if the yards were not properly and efficiently managed.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he had seldom listened to a speech more full of common sense than that delivered by the hon. Member for Battersea. The point he raised was—Were they going upon the old false system by which practically the wages in the dockyards were put up to auction for contending parties to bid for them, or were they going to set up a fair and legitimate standard of wages for the men? Time after time it had happened that this system had been resorted to. He remembered that during the Government of his own Party in 1879 large numbers of men were put upon the Establishment immediately before a General Election. That was the sort of thing that must be put a stop to. He did not speak from Party motives in this matter, but from patriotic motives, and he said there was no Party bias in connection with it. If they were not going to put this question up to Party votes and influences, then the only thing was to have a fixed standard. The House had gone a long way towards the view of the hon. Member for Battersea by its acceptance of a Motion by the present Under Secretary for the Colonies (Sir E. Grey), to the effect that the workmen in these establishments should be paid the current rate of pay. They did not go much further in asking for the Trade Unions standard. That standard ought to be the Trades Union standard, and when they had got that they would put a stop to what had been the great curse of these establishments. There were certain difficulties in the way, he knew, as there were classes of work to which Trades Union rates did not apply—he met it in considering the Army and Navy Estimates—such work as that of accoutrements or military harness work. But they should, as far as possible, adopt private firm rates. But the dockyard men could not both eat their cake and have it; and if the Trades Union standard were adopted they must sweep away all the minor privileges. He did not know what value was placed upon their privileges; but if they were not swept away, they could not have a proper calculation. The course of the whole Civil establishment and dockyard system was that they were not able to dismiss inefficient men in the same way as private firms did. He knew the difficulties in that respect from having been on a Royal Commission which dealt with the question. If they had the Trade Union standard established, they would be able to let the men take the good with the bad, and they would be able to get rid, he hoped, of incompetent men. If political pressure was carried further, and if they did not get a definite standard like the Trades Union standard adopted, a strong feeling would arise that the only way to put a stop to such pressure would be to disfranchise both the Civil servants and the dockyard workers. That would be the inevitable result. At the present moment pressure was brought to bear by the Civil Service and the dockyards which the House ought not to tolerate. Another question was that of pensions. When a hired man went on to the Establishment 1s. 6d. per week was docked off his wage; but, unless the man lived to the age of 60 and got his pension, the 1s. 6d. never went back into his pocket at all. He did not care so much for the amount as for the principle; and he said that that deduction ought to be treated as deferred pay and go back to the benefit of the man or his family. There could be no doubt it was the man's own money, and he was entitled to it. He had mentioned the age of 60. What became of the man if, at the age of 50, he found he was unable to do any more work! Was the pension in his case the same as in that of the other man?

MR. KEARLEY was understood to say he got a certain proportion.

MR. HANBURY said, he only wanted to make sure upon the point. The hon. Member for Battersea told them they were arguing this question without adequate knowledge. Experience told them what occurred in the private yards; but one out of 50 of them had no practical knowledge of what occurred in the dockyards. They should have better information. They had had only one Committee that had gone into the question, and they would never have adequate knowledge if they did not have a Committee of some sort. His idea was that they should have a Select Committee of the House once every five years—or more frequently, if necessary. This Committee should go into questions affecting the Army and Navy, and he thought the result would be that Members of the House would be kept au courant with what was going on in their great spending Departments. Millions were voted in the House to these Departments, and, with the exception of a few gentlemen, they were all in ignorance of the importance of the subject. Members sometimes took no interest—for the most part, they took none. There was one other point in regard to the increase in wages which he would mention. It was said the men did not get the advantage—that the money went into the coffers of the landlords. He was quite sure that was so at Woolwich and Deptford; but he did not see how they could make any distinction between those and other places. There was only one other remark he had to make. He was convinced that the classification system, however pretty it might be in theory, in practice was thoroughly unworkable. They had now a new system which would lead to a new agitation. As the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Kearley) said, there would be no satisfaction until it was altered again. Why could they not put the matter on the same footing as private firms? Until they put into practice in the arsenals and dockyards the system recommended by the hon. Member for Battersea they would not only run the risk of perpetuating the present evils, but of having rival politicians bidding against one another, and then they would have the wages in those establishments higher than those paid under Trades Union rules by private firms. By adopting his suggestion they would have a better system—a suitable system. There were family cliques in these dockyards. There were too many uncles, cousins, and brothers all working side by side, and able to bring greater pressure to bear on the Admiralty even than Trades Unions. That system had to be broken up, and he should cast his vote for Trades Unionism in opposition to it. The sooner the Trades Unions were brought into the dockyards the better.

*MR. KEARLEY: I think it is necessary for me, in justice to the reply given by the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, to let him know the way we regard it. I understand the hon. Member to say that the probationary period, not only to labourers, skilled or unskilled, but as to the other trades, is to disappear. That clears the situation very considerably, and leaves open only the solution of the question as to the varying rates of pay of mechanics. The Government say that the wages should compare favourably with those prevailing in other parts of the country. I and my friends contend that that means Trades Union wages. The Government said that they had made an exhaustive inquiry, and ascertained what were the varying rates. They put forward the results of their inquiry, and we disagree with their figures. They say it is a fair solution, but we say that it does not compare with the Trades Union rates. I do not wish to delay the Committee by dividing it on this Vote, although it had been my intention to do so all through. If the Government will be reasonable, and will give us the opportunity of proving that their figures cannot be supported when compared with Trades Union rates of wages throughout the country, we shall be perfectly satisfied. The increase of labourers' wages comes into force at once. I take it that it is settled that the probationary period is to disappear, but as to the mechanics' rates, they are not to come into operation until April next. There is an intervening period during which amendments to the proposed scheme may be considered. I hope they will allow us to place before them evidence to show that their opinion is not in accordance with facts. As to classification, we make it perfectly clear that the men will not tolerate any differentiation of pay to exist, and will insist on there being a uniform rate of pay for all Established and hired men, subject to reductions in the former case for the benefit which the Establishment confers. If the Government wish to get rid of classification, I do not think that they will find us unreasonable in dealing with the question. We do not wish to make this House a cockpit for the contentions of conflicting interests. We are most anxious to get rid of these grievances. I, myself, have some 40 letters a day dealing with them, which is a proof of the hostility to the existing state of things.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that after the reply of the hon. Gentleman, he would make an appeal to the Committee. They had already spent a day and a-half on Section I. of the Vote, which dealt with labour. There were yet the two Sections for material and contract work to be discussed. It was desirable that some time should be devoted to those questions, and yet that money should be voted to the Public Service at the present Sitting. In consideration of the other work which had to be done he would appeal to the Committee to allow the present discussion to come to an end. On the section in Vote 8, bearing upon material, questions affecting shipbuilding could still be raised, but if an undue proportion of the time of the House was occupied on this subject sufficient could not be devoted to other subjects. He did not wish to press the Committee unnecessarily, but he really would put it to hon. Members whether the time had not come to proceed with the next portion of the Estimates?

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the only other Amendment, so far as he knew, in the first section referred to naval yards abroad, and, undoubtedly, there were some important questions to be raised on that Amendment. A great many of the naval yards abroad were not in the condition in which they ought to be, and he imagined that the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. Dilke) and the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had both a great deal to say about Gibraltar alone. That was a distinct question from the question now under discussion, and he did not suppose it could be raised on the item for material. If it could be raised on Section II. of the Vote then, as far as he was concerned, he should be willing to see it and other questions so raised.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: What other questions?

MR. HANBURY: I have something to say about St. Helena and Jamaica.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) said, he thought the Government might fairly expect to obtain Vote 8 to-night; but this section of the Vote was really an important section, and there was hardly a question of any kind that it did not invite discussion on. He did not think that anything would be gained by trying to prematurely conclude the discussion of the section. So far as he was concerned, he had practically nothing further to say, except to ask one or two questions which would not occupy more than a few minutes. If the Representatives of the Admiralty were to allow the discussion to run its natural course nothing would be lost.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH thought that what the noble Lord had said was said in the fairest possible spirit, and he accepted it in that spirit. The Government could fairly claim Vote 8 to-night.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said that, in acknowledgment of the fact that they had had a considerable discussion on Section I., he should withdraw his two Amendments on Sub-heads A and B. There were other matters upon which he should have liked to raise discussion, but he would refrain from doing so. The time had come for something to be said on Gibraltar, Malta, and Jamaica. He would only now add that it was clear the question of dockyard labour could not remain where it was. He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Members for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) and Battersea (Mr. J. Burns) on the matter. The position of the dockyard labourers must cease to be sport of the political partisan. If it did not, they would come to the American system under which assessments were made on wages to keep a Government in power, or to the Roman system, under which the position of Emperor was set up to auction by the Prætorian Guards. The system advocated by the hon. Member for Battersea was that there should be no pensions or incidental advantages given to the Government workmen, but that labour inside the dockyards should be treated in the same way as labour outside the dockyards, the men being called upon to give a fair day's work for a fair day's wage. He acknowledged the fair spirit in which the right hon. Baronet opposite had treated the Committee, and he was sure there would be no desire to push the Debate on the remaining items further than the public interest demanded.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) asked if it would be convenient now for him to say what he had desired to say on the general question when it was discussed last night?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman would be within his rights in doing so.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, he was anxious to say a word or two on the subject; for though not an expert in the matter of construction, he had for many years taken a great interest in the subject, and might be able to express the views held by his Colleagues on the subject. Some three or four weeks ago he had asked the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty a question as to the loss of the Victoria. His hon. Friend had said, in reply, that he could not give a definite answer to the question, because the Minutes of the Court Martial had not then been considered by the Admiralty, and they could come to no conclusion on the matter. The question he had asked was whether there would be an inquiry not into the loss of the Victoria, but into the reasons which caused the Victoria to capsize after the unfortunate accident had occurred. He was very glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty that their Lordships had come to the conclusion that some inquiry ought to be held into the causes of the capsizing of this ship. The right hon. Gentleman had not specified the nature of the inquiry. He admitted that the inquiry would be a very difficult one, which could only be properly investigated by experts, but for that reason he was certain it would not be satisfactory either to the House or to the country if it was conducted only by a Departmental Committee. Experienced persons from outside should be called in to make the inquiry in order to allay public anxiety with regard to other ships of a similar construction. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed) on the previous night had said something on this subject, and he was afraid the Secretary to the Admiralty had rather misunderstood the position of the hon. Member. It was to be regretted that the hon. Member had read out a list of ships which he held to be liable to a similar accident to that which had occurred to the Victoria. The names were familiar, of course, to himself as a naval man. They had been before the public some years, but the hon. Gentleman's reference to them might cause unnecessary uneasiness in the minds of many people serving in the ships. Still, he thought the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman's position. The hon. Gentleman had said that which he had contended for many years—namely, that certain ships, if wounded in a particular way, would be unstable and liable to capsize. The Secretary to the Admiralty, in reply to that, had produced the Minutes of the Committee of Inquiry into the Inflexible, and had pointed to some conclusions which had been arrived at by that Committee. He ought on the strength of that hold that the accident to the Victoria was no proof of the point for which the hon. Gentleman had been contending for so many years. The criticisms of the right hon. Baronet on the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff were not very fair. Sure was he (Commander Bethell) that a very complete inquiry by competent persons was absolutely necessary, and he would again impress on the right hon. Gentleman that it was of great importance, on every ground, that the persons who made the inquiry should not be confined to officials connected with the Admiralty. That was all he had to say with regard to the Victoria. As to ships of the new construction, he was very doubtful whether at present the opinion of any person as to the relative value of large and small ships was of any value. We had little or nothing to go upon, and it was extremely difficult—in fact, impossible—to form an opinion on the matter until there had been an opportunity of trying the ships for war purposes. Personally—and he gave his opinion for what it was worth—and he was bound to say he did not think it was worth much—he had always held the view that very large ships were a mistake; but he was bound to remember that the bulk of the profession to which he belonged were undoubtedly of opinion that large vessels were essential, for the reason that a high rate of speed was necessary at war. He was inclined to doubt that. It seemed to him that for purposes of battle they ought to sacrifice something, even speed, to get greater turning power for our ships than they now possessed. That was a technical question which he would not go into more fully at present. What was the reason of the construction of these large vessels? He was inclined to think that in this respect they were guided and influenced too much by what foreign countries were doing. We saw foreign countries building large ships, and it required a certain amount of obstinacy to persuade oneself that a large and formidable man-of-war could be successfully opposed by a vessel which seemed less formidable. Years ago the prestige of rams and torpedoes was greater than it was now. Then he thought we were too apt to give preference to large guns. In the first speech he had made in the House he had taken that view. The evolution of naval science would, he believed, be more in the direction of doing damage to vessels by torpedoes, and possibly by rams, than by means of guns, even of the more rapid-firing description. He would pass this criticism on the Admiralty—not only on the present, but on past Boards of Admiralty—namely, that he did not think they were solicitous and anxious enough about spending money for the purpose of experiment. He did not know how far it might be true, but he was informed, for example, that one or two foreign countries had recently been making large experiments in relation to submarine boats and weapons of war of that sort. We had done nothing in that direction at all. We must remember that if we did not advance in this direction someone else would. In the work of improving machinery and getting vessels to go at great speed, not only were our own Admiralty and other Admiralties engaged, but the whole Mercantile Marine had the same object in view. The result was, that we got the best ship that could be built in regard to speed and machinery. But that was not the case in many branches of naval science. The whole of the brains of the Mercantile Marine were not engaged in trying to elucidate these questions, and he was convinced that our Admiralty ought to set on foot greater investigations and inquiries into these weapons of war which were now so little known to us, and which he strongly suspected indicated the direction which the evolution of armaments would take in the immediate future. France and, he believed, Russia for some time made considerable investigations in regard to this matter of submarine boats. Great improvements were possible, and if they could be introduced and made effective a revolution would at once be brought about in naval warfare. The nation, therefore, which first succeeded in overcoming the difficulty in the way of constructing these boats would have a great advantage over all other countries which had not arrived at that point. He thought, therefore—as he had said in 1886—it was eminently desirable that money should be spent in making experiments in this direction. With regard to turning ships, we were using to-day the very same method that was in use centuries ago. The turning was a trifle quicker now than formerly, but beyond that there was no substantial difference. No naval officer would contest this position: that whoever was fortunate enough in battle to have a vessel that would turn rapidly would have many points in his favour. We should not put the question of rapid turning on one side as out of the range of practical possibility because other countries had not seriously taken it up yet. We ought to aim at being the first in all developments of this kind. The tendency in this country hitherto had been to follow rather than to lead. He did not think that naval officers were always better judges on naval matters than civilians. Civilians had sometimes given hints which had led to the winning of great battles and to the institution of systems which had never been adopted before. But in some matters, no doubt, the opinion of naval men was most valuable—for instance, as to the size of ships, and what ships could do. In these matters naval officers had actual experience to guide them. But the opinion of naval officers on some subjects—construction, for instance—was of no special value. The advice of naval men ought to be followed on the question of the size of a ship. He had never noticed, however, any keen desire on the part of the Admiralty for naval opinion on these matters. The Admiralty did not reflect fairly the opinion of the Navy. It was partly composed of civilians; but, more than that, the officers who formed the naval portion by no means reflected the opinion of the younger men of the Service. They would do well to listen to the views of the younger generation of officers—men who had not yet risen to the top of the profession, but who might be said, in a sense, to possess the more active minds. There was something to be said for this view. When a man had risen to a high place in his profession his position was secure. Without intending it, perhaps, he lost that extreme desire to follow modern developments, which characterised the younger man. Do not let it be thought that he wished to disparage the ability of the senior naval officers on the Admiralty Board. The Secretary to the Admiralty, he thought, had rather misunderstood the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast, which was not to be wondered at, having regard to the technicality of the hon. Member's speech. The hon. Member had pointed to the fact that at present ships were built with rams which, if used for ramming purposes, would bring destruction to themselves as well as to the vessels rammed. The hon. Member had explained that it was quite possible to construct a ship which would be effective for purposes of ramming without receiving serious damage itself in the process. He (Commander Bethell) did not know how that might be, but this question of ramming was one which should not be lost sight of by the Admiralty. It had of late years been too much pushed into the background, owing to the development of torpedoes. It was said that a ship would hesitate to come to close quarters with an enemy for fear of torpedoes. No doubt that, to some extent, was true, and no doubt the position had been made stronger by the introduction of quick-firing guns. But he was inclined to think we should do well to construct a smaller class of vessels for the purpose of ramming and also for carrying torpedoes—vessels which might carry light quick-firing guns—and from this it would be seen that he was in favour of the construction of small vessels. He was afraid Admiralty officials got into deep grooves from which it was difficult to escape, and that we were liable to be exposed to disaster from following too closely the example set by other countries. There had been some discussion on the previous evening on the question of torpedo catchers. He would not detain the Committee for any length of time on this question, for all he had desired to say had been said by others. He would only remark that the information he had received confirmed what had been said already—something was wrong with the torpedo catchers. They had shown themselves inefficient, and there ought to be careful inquiry before new ones were constructed. A little confusion had arisen in consequence of the nomenclature used in connection with these vessels. Some persons spoke of them as torpedo gunboats, and others as torpedo catchers or torpedo destroyers, and it would be well if the Admiralty adopted a uniform nomenclature. He would express a hope that the Secretary to the Admiralty would go further than he had hitherto gone in altering the nomenclature of the various classes of vessels. So much for the technical part of the discussion. He naturally felt inclined to join in the attack upon the Admiralty for their programme, or rather the absence of a programme, for the next two years. It was said they had one, or were going to have one, and their critics would like to be taken into the confidence of the Government, and to be told what it was going to be. It was clear from the speech of the Secretary to the Admiralty that the miserable little addition they proposed to make to the Navy in the course of the next year or two was not all they intended to propose. There were three battleships to be constructed, two cruisers, and some torpedo catchers. The total sum which the Secretary to the Admiralty spoke of as being set aside for the year had to be reduced by £560,000, which was really used last year. On the question of the increase of the Navy they had a right to press the Government. M. Thiers was credited with having said that a vessel lost to the English Navy only meant another vessel laid down, and the more valid that tradition was the more valuable it would be. It was an idea well worth cherishing and nursing. The idea attaching to it was valuable, and people were largely governed by ideas of that sort. He agreed with those who criticised the Admiralty, and said that they might very well set to work and lay down another vessel to take the place of the Victoria. It was no doubt very difficult to make an effective and true comparison between different Navies. There were so many different characteristics in the ships. They were made in so many different ways and their armaments were so different; but the English Navy had undoubtedly since 1885 been raised from a position of inferiority to a position of superiority over any other, and possibly to a position of equality with any two. But for the sake of a few hundred thousand pounds we ought not to go back from a position that had been acquired with so much difficulty. For some reason or another—he believed it could only have been because the Conservative Party proposed it—the Government had placed themselves in opposition to the principle of borrowing money for a short term of years in order to build vessels. But he was sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he turned the matter over in his mind quietly, would admit that, even if there was some objection, from his point of view, to the plan of spreading the cost of ships over a term of years, it was an immense advantage, if only as a motive for the Admiralty insisting on the building of a ship by a certain time.

Under the old system there were long delays, and money voted for one purpose was frequently devoted to another. He hoped, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be disposed to favour the view adopted by the late Government, and would, when the complete programme was placed before the House next year, tell them that he intended to follow that example. He would only add, in conclusion, that he thought there was a tendency shown this year by the Admiralty not quite to appreciate the advantage and the necessity of a steady flow of shipbuilding and new construction. It was so easy to fall behind, and so difficult to regain lost ground; and though the Secretary to the Admiralty had told the Committee that a programme would be produced in the course of next year, meanwhile a certain amount of valuable time would have been lost, a loss which to the present Government would entail, as he thought, great difficulties. He had occupied a considerable amount of the time of the Committee with these observations, but he did not often intervene on naval construction. The last time he had done so was in 1889. He was interested in seeing this country possessed of a large and efficient Navy, and he did not think that at the present moment civilians could fairly charge naval officers with demanding more than there was any necessity for. He did not think they were open to the charge that the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) brought against them—that of making Jingo speeches. He thought they were doing what their duty called on them to do—that was to say, to spur on the Admiralty to keep the Navy up to that standard to which it had been brought within the past few years, and by no means to allow it to fall back to the position in which it was in 1886-7.

*MR. ARNOLD - FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, he desired to say a few words on a point connected with the combatant branch of the Service. He wished to call attention to Sub-head E of the Vote, which related to Gibraltar. He was sanguine enough to believe that what was said to-night would go even further than the Committee, because the matter was a very important one—far more important than any that had been discussed during the two nights the Vote had been under discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am unwilling to interrupt the hon. Gentleman; but I must draw his attention to the fact that the sub-head to which he refers belongs to the second division of the Vote. The Question before the Committee relates to the expenditure for personnel, shipbuilding, and maintenance, including dockyards at home and abroad.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he was under the impression that, according to the arrangement which had been assented to by right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches, the discussion of the whole Vote might be proceeded with in order that it might be taken before 12 o'clock. If he were in Order, he would proceed on that understanding. In this matter he was not speaking on his own authority alone. What he was about to say he believed accurately represented the opinion of those who were best qualified to speak on the question throughout the Empire. He held in his hand the opinions of men which carried great weight in the matter. The argument he wanted to propound to the Committee was one based not only upon authority or technical knowledge, but upon common sense. They were asked to give two Votes in respect of Gibraltar, and he contended that the amount asked for was either too much or too little. They were not, he submitted, voting an effective sum of money for any public purpose. They got no value out of a half completed work; it was of no use expending nine-tenths of the necessary money and leaving one-tenth of the work undone. Gibraltar was primarily a naval base for the Empire. It had long ago ceased to be a factor in the military disposition of Europe. Gibraltar was not a dépôt for our troops. If we withdraw troops from it, they had to be replaced by other troops from home. It no longer controlled the Straits.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I rise to Order. I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but I must point out that the Vote relates entirely to salaries and materials for shipbuilding, and I submit that the hon. Member is raising the general question of works at Gibraltar, which would properly arise on Vote 10.

Commander Bethell

THE CHAIRMAN : I think the hon. Member is bound to confine himself to the subject-matter of the Vote now before the Committee.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER submitted that he was dealing with matters involved in the Vote—namely, the salaries of the officers in the dockyard of Gibraltar, and he maintained that the expenditure was altogether wrong unless the port and dockyard were adequate for the required purpose. He proposed to show that it was not capable of performing its proper duties. There was a small dockyard at Gibraltar which was supposed to transform it into a naval base, and he had been trying to explain why it was of no value as a naval station. It would be used by the English Fleet to prevent a junction between the Fleets of Toulon and Brest in the event of war with France. Instructions had already been given to the Mediterranean Fleet that in the event of war it was to withdraw to Gibraltar until it could be reinforced by the Channel Squadron. It was inevitable with such a disposition of our Fleet that a general action would be fought in the Straits, and if an English ship were injured she would be obliged to return to Gibraltar. But at present, as regarded repairs there, it would not be possible to drive a bolt into a jolly-boat below the water-line, and it was absolutely certain that a great part of the injury to our ships would be inflicted below the water-line. It would be absolute madness to send injured ships either to Malta or to Devonport in time of war ; they would have to remain at Gibraltar, and we might see our Mediterranean Fleet, which was worth £12,000,000 sterling, stuck there like barges on a mud bank. The injured vessels would have to be put under the guns of Gibraltar in reliance upon such protection as it might afford. Again, there was absolutely no protection from torpedo attack.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I rise to Order. The hon. Member is calling attention to the absence of a harbour of shelter at Gibraltar, and that question can be raised on the subsequent Vote, on the item for the New Mole.

THE CHAIRMAN : I think the hon. Member is not in Order. He must keep to the subject-matter of the Vote.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he was dealing with the condition of the dockyard at Gibraltar and the personnel of that yard. He really could not see how he was out of Order in pointing out that the yard was not capable of doing its primary work. It could not perform any useful work at all, and every farthing we spent on salaries and material in connection with it was absolutely wasted. Was it wise and right to pay a considerable sum of money for the salaries of officials to perform a duty which they could not perform with any advantage to the country ? He would prefer to see the money asked for in this particular Vote devoted to really effective purposes. By sanctioning this expenditure they were positively deluding the public. In all the wide world they could not find another naval dockyard worthy of the name in which, as in the case of Gibraltar, there was absolutely no dock. With an honest and earnest desire to keep within the ruling of the Chair, he could not understand why he was debarred from commenting on the fact that there was no dock.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I must point out for the third time that the question of adding a dock at Gibraltar can be distinctly raised on Vote 10—on the item in regard to the Mole.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER : I cannot find that item. There is no mention whatever of a dock in Vote 10. When we reach it I shall probably be told that I cannot discuss the question of a dock on an item referring solely to the Mole.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The question of constructing a dock can clearly be raised on Vote 10.

THE CHAIRMAN : That is so ; I have no doubt upon it. We are now on the Shipbuilding Vote, and the hon. Member must confine his remarks to that.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he, of course, bowed to the ruling of the Chair, and he would therefore conclude by again calling attention to the common sense aspect of the question, and ask the Committee was it right to expend a considerable sum of money for work which it was clear could only be very imperfectly performed ? He moved the reduction of the Vote by £2,000.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give an ample and sufficient opportunity for discussing the matters proper to be raised on Vote 10, which were of the highest importance to the country, and not meet the Opposition with the Closure. The question was, were they to be able to use the Mediterranean in time of war? and on that certainly the discussion ought not to be unduly limited. On the present Vote there was an item of £983 for the naval officer in charge of the dockyard. Now Gibraltar was a station where, as everybody knew, ships arrived after a long journey, and there had been put up on the summit of the rock a time-ball. When he was last at Gibraltar the time-ball was not at work, and vessels could not correct their chronometers by it, simply because no proper provision for working it had been made by the naval officer who was in charge of it. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman opposite could inform him that the time-ball was being worked now he would say no more about the matter.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That subject will be more conveniently discussed when Vote 10 is under the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES submitted that he was perfectly justified under this Vote in raising questions as to the non-performance of his duties by the naval officer in charge of the yard. He had also to complain that neither coils of rope, spars, nor any other naval stores which were continually being required by the crippled ships which came in from the Atlantic could be obtained at Gibraltar. Of course, he might be told that these things could all be obtained at Malta, but it was too much to ask such vessels to proceed 1,000 miles further up the Mediterranean to obtain such stores.

Mr. FORWOOD said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the amounts asked for for the repairs of old ships. The repairs of the Sultan had very properly been taken in hand, and the amount to be expended on her was estimated at £66,000; but no allusion was made in the Estimates for re-engining her, which would cost another £70,000. Surely some steps ought to be taken to have the engines ready for her by the time they were wanted. Large sums had been spent in repairing the Northumberland and the Agincourt, both of which were armed with old muzzle-loading guns, and could only attain a comparatively slow speed. He thought the money might have been better appropriated. Then the old Warrior had turned up again, and £10,000 was asked for repairing her this year, and £35,000 more was to be asked next year. She, also, was armed with old muzzle-loading guns. Another obsolete vessel, upon which it was proposed to spend £23,000, was the Comus, which was armed with 64-pounder guns. It was a mere waste of money to spend these large sums in repairing obsolete vessels.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I may say at once that we are not solely responsible in the matter of the Warrior and the Agincourt, because the repairs had been ordered to be executed by the Board of Admiralty of the late Government, and we are acting strictly in accordance with what has been decided on by my predecessors.

Mr. FORWOOD quite admitted that fact, but asked whether the present Board intended to replace the old armaments of these vessels with modern guns?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: In the case of the Hercules, it was decided by our predecessors to retain the muzzle-loading guns on account of the enormous expense which attended total changes in the character of such a ship's armament, and we have simply adopted a similar policy in the case of the vessels mentioned by my right hon. Friend. As to the Sultan, the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman have been anticipated, and tenders have been invited for engines. With regard to the repairs of vessels of the C class, like the Comus, the subject was very fully considered during the time the right hon. Gentleman held office in connection with the Champion and the Cleopatra, and a strong case was made for the necessity of repairing them on account of the great value of that kind of vessel on foreign stations, and of the fact that they were building no more vessels of that type. If my right hon. Friend did not succeed in dissuading the Board of which he was a Member, I fear he cannot expect to be more successful with the present Board.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked whether any experiments were being conducted in this country with submarine boats? The Navy ought certainly to be ahead of all the Navies of the world in regard to these new inventions. He feared that, as we were falling behind in the use of high explosives, so also in regard to submarine boats we were not attempting to utilise what would be sooner or later a very important method of naval warfare. He knew it was said that some of the French submarine boats were failures; but the French were navigating submarine boats for a much greater sea distance than was believed, and much secrecy was being observed with regard to them. It seemed to him the time had come when they should see that this country was not left behind in the race for new inventions.

MR. HANBURY called attention to the case of Port Royal, Jamaica. Time after time attempts had been made to get some information about the naval yards abroad, but without effect. On the Public Accounts Commission recently the question was raised, and it was found impossible to get anyone at the Admiralty to give the desired information about these foreign dockyards. It seemed that in the case of Port Royal, Jamaica, although there was very little work to be done there, the same establishment was maintained now as existed when, in the days of the Slave Trade, the station was one of great importance. A receiving ship with 90 men was stationed there, but he had been told that no work had been done by that ship for at least two years. Then there was a hospital with three doctors, though there were seldom more than two patients, a statement which he had on the authority of a letter to The Times by Lord Brassey, who had recently visited the place. He held there was no justification for keeping up these establishments. He was sure the Secretary to the Admiralty would not be able to give him any reply, simply because the right hon. Gentleman knew nothing of the matter. The right hon. Gentleman had no information to give. It was, indeed, ridiculous that those things should be put down on the Estimates year after year, although there was no official at the Admiralty who knew anything whatever about them. Unless some explanation were given he would move to reduce the Vote.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, that the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had carefully refrained from drawing attention to these various matters when the late Government was in power. The hon. Member's action was absurd and ridiculous, but quite worthy of him.

MR. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked why greater use was not made of Haulbowline Dockyard? The total expenditure on Haulbowline last year was only £3,550, while the total expenditure on other dockyards was £367,225. That was a matter that ought to be explained.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES pointed out that the cost of the dockyard at Jamaica, to which he had called attention by a question some months ago, was £12,149. Naval officers had informed him that no use was made of the yard, and in reply to his questions the Admiralty had avowed that last year only six ships entered it, and that only 84 men visited the hospital. The cost per man was, therefore, £144. That expenditure could not be justified, and it was high time attention was drawn to these worm-eaten, moss-grown abuses.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that Admiral Hopkins had recommended that Port Royal should not be continued as a dockyard, and a local Committee was to report on his proposal. The medical staff was retained at the hospital in case of yellow fever breaking out. Since 1888 the late Director of Dockyards had visited Vancouver, Halifax, and Bermuda, and the present Director had visited Gibraltar and Malta, so that the Admiralty were in possession of full information about the naval yards at those places, and he could assure the Committee that the important points which had been raised would not be lost sight of.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether any experiments were being conducted in the Navy as to the use of liquid fuel in lieu of coal? The matter was very important, both in regard to the question of storage and the amount of work to be got from fuel. Oil was now largely used by the Russian Government as fuel in place of coal.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he was not prepared to answer that question without notice; but the hon.

Gentleman might be sure that such an important matter would not be overlooked.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I wish to call attention to two questions under the heads of "hulls of ships building by contract" and "the reserve of merchant cruisers." The sum of £260,000 is asked for in order to enter into contracts with private firms for the building of hulls of new ships, and of that amount £57,000 is taken for two cruisers which the Admiralty proposed to lay down. But, in a Circular issued on Saturday last, we are informed that it is the intention of the Admiralty to abandon the idea of laying down the second cruiser.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: To postpone it till next year.

LORD G. HAMILTON: And to devote a portion of the money to the building of 14 torpedo catchers. I object on principle to any great Department such as the Admiralty changing their minds upon such an important question after their plans have been laid before Parliament, and after the Estimates have been six months under consideration. I think the decision would be unfortunate in regard to the relations of the Department with the Treasury, because the Treasury, very naturally from their point of view, dispute any expenditure forced upon them; and unless the Admiralty can show a good reason for the expenditure, probably they will not succeed in their demand. Yesterday the Financial Secretary said that one of the reasons which induced the Admiralty to alter their mind was the fact that a number of vessels of similar type, for which the late Board were responsible, had not fully complied with the expectations of their designers in the speed which it was hoped they would attain. Under the Naval Defence Act 18 vessels embodying an improvement of both these types were laid down, and so far as was known the form of those vessels was perfect. They were laid down in successive batches, and had fully attained the speed for which they were designed. But I also understand that during the recent manœuvres a certain number of them failed under certain conditions. Unless there is any special reason against presenting a full Report on the behaviour of these vessels, I think it is desirable the Committee should know all about them. If the form is right, and the horse-power sufficient to drive the vessels at the speed specified, it seems to me to be clear that if there is any defect it must be due to the construction of the boilers. Of all questions with which the Admiralty has to deal, none is more difficult than to obtain the highest boiler power out of the least possible weight. Last year, for the purpose of testing the various forms of boilers, six experimental torpedo catchers were ordered, and they were given to three of the best known private firms in the country. It was hoped that these vessels would be completed some time this summer, and that the result of the trial would place the Admiralty in possession of data, upon which they might be able to proceed in the construction of the other 14 vessels of the same character which Lord Spencer speaks of in his Memorandum. These torpedo boats have to attain a guaranteed speed of 27 knots an hour. To get 27 knots an hour out of a vessel of 200 or 300 tons is a remarkable development of speed, requiring a rare combination of excellence in the boilers and machinery. It was anticipated that in their armaments and speed-going capacity these vessels would be superior to any built, and it was proposed to complete and try these first examples in the summer, and subsequently to order 14 other vessels of the same class and type. I understand, however, that none of the experimental vessels have been delivered; and, therefore, it appears to me that the Government would be somewhat anticipating the result of the experiments in embarking upon the construction of 14 more before these six vessels have been completed and tried. I expressed, yesterday, some scepticism as to the possibility of spending all the money which was originally to have been devoted to the new cruiser on these torpedo catchers. The right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty in reply, so far as I can recollect, said that arrangements had been made with private firms for the purpose of placing these 14 vessels as soon as possible, and that the condition of the contract was such that if subsequent experience showed that any modifications were required in the specifications they could be introduced into the contract. I have had some experience in placing contracts with private firms. The late Financial Secretary and myself had to deal with contracts of probably greater dimensions than fell to the lot of any previous Board of Admiralty. If there is one thing more than another on which the Admiralty ought to insist it is that the specifications should be made so as not to be broken, and to attempt to enter into contracts with private firms on the understanding that the specifications are to be afterwards modified by experience or data subsequently given to the Admiralty is an entirely wrong business principle.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I never said anything about the specification.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The fact is admitted that there are six experimental vessels which are to have boilers of different types, so as to judge which are the best suited for the purpose. I advise the Admiralty not to embark on the other experimental vessels until they have data to go upon as to the form of boilers most suitable for such vessels. These vessels are to be built very rapidly—I suppose 15 months hence will be the extreme limit of time required for their construction; and, both on the merits of the question as well as on principle, I hope the Admiralty will reconsider their decision, and adhere to their original proposition to lay down these two cruisers instead of these torpedo vessels. I am sure they enter into a risk by ordering 14 more vessels of an experimental type, before they know what particular boiler will give them the exceptional speed they require. I trust, therefore, the Secretary to the Admiralty will reconsider the decision which he announced yesterday. I do not ask him to give me a definite reply to-night; but perhaps he will be able to do so on the Report. The second question I wish to call attention to is the diminution in the sum for the Royal Reserve of merchant cruisers. Last year this item stood at £60,000. This year it is only £22,000. It may be that the original contracts with the owners of merchant cruisers lapsed, and consequently there is a saving in the interval before fresh contracts were made. I believe there was no part of the policy of the late Board of Admiralty which the House of Commons was more interested in, and favoured more, than the attempt we made to acquire a reserve of merchant cruisers. The idea occurred to me to try and get the merchant cruisers when some six or seven years ago, by open competition, a foreign firm got a great postage contract to run to America, and that contract was nothing more nor less than a subsidy to a foreign firm which possessed a certain number of fast passenger steamers. It seemed to me, therefore, that if we could utilise the money spent by the Post Office in making contracts with the owners of vessels, whereby they would be liable to place such vessels at the disposal of the Admiralty in time of emergency, it would be a good thing for the Admiralty, whilst at the same time it would effectually prevent foreign vessels getting an annual grant out of English funds. The result of the arrangement has been that for the past five or six years there has been at the disposal of the Admiralty six of the finest merchant vessels in the world, capable of attaining a speed in a sea-way which no other vessels can attain; and if the country is ever landed in an emergency, the value of these vessels will be inestimable. The Majestic and Teutonic, for instance, will carry 3,000 or 4,000 men at such a rate of speed that it would be hopeless for any cruisers to attempt to pursue them, and if used as scouts by the Fleet they would be almost invaluable. I hope there is no intention on the part of the present Board of Admiralty to reverse the policy of the late Board in this respect. I think the Committee will be interested to know what is the reason of this reduction, because I may say that one good result of the policy of obtaining a certain number of these merchant cruisers has been not only to bring the Merchant Service into closer contact with the Navy, but also to establish a much closer association of the officers and men of the Mercantile Marine with those of the Royal Navy than has ever existed before. These are the two questions I would like the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty to answer—First, whether he would not undertake to revise the decision of the Admiralty to postpone the commencement of building the large cruiser; and, secondly, the reasons for the reduction of the sum taken by the merchant cruisers of the Naval Reserve?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I take notice of the fact that the noble Lord says he would prefer that I should not give an immediate answer as to the torpedo destroyers. I would, however, point out that while the arrangement made by the Admiralty is that the torpedo boat destroyers shall be commenced at once, we shall have experience of the working of the boilers in the boats now being completed in good time to utilise it for the others before the latter are far advanced. As I stated last night, the Admiralty are impressed with the imperative need of this class of vessels, in order to meet the swarms of torpedo boats which exist in foreign ports. Coming to the merchant cruisers, I think my noble Friend has forgotten for the moment the very wise arrangement entered into during the latter part of the period in which he held Office. In the earlier part of the noble Lord's tenure of Office it was customary to pay the subsidy on the merchant cruisers year by year; but owing to the transfer of two of these cruisers to a foreign flag it was felt that it would be wise to keep a year's subsidy in hand. This is the only reason for the reduction in this year's Estimate. A year's subsidy has been kept in hand, in accordance with the new form of contract. I will also mention this. On coming into Office we found that the late Government had, on the eve of leaving Office, entered into further agreement with two great companies with regard to merchant cruisers, and we are carrying out the arrangements then made by our predecessors, so that I think the noble Lord has no ground of complaint. What we shall do in the future depends very much upon some points which I cannot enter into at this hour. I may mention that there is a scheme in connection with troopships which is under the consideration of the Admiralty, which may afford a very efficient new class of cruisers to the Admiralty, and which may, to some extent, take the place in a more efficient form of some of these merchant cruisers. I do not enter at all into the question of the policy of merchant cruisers now, and I only point out that the cause of this reduction this year is as I have stated, and that we are carrying out the arrangements made by our predecessors.

Lord G. Hamilton

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. £1,656,000, Shipbuilding, Repairs, Maintenance, &c.—Material.—Agreed to.

3. £1,266,000, Shipbuilding, Repairs, Maintenance, &c.—Contract Work.—Agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,315,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Naval Armaments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894."

MR. HANBURY moved to report Progress, saying that it had been agreed to report Progress after Vote 8 had been obtained.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Hanbury,)—put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LORD G. HAMILTON asked what Estimates would be taken on Monday?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Civil Service Estimates?

MR. HANBURY: Will they be taken in order?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I cannot say.

FERTILISERS AND FEEDING STUFFS BILL.—(No. 345.)

Bill, as amended by the Standing Committee, considered.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. Gardner, Essex, Saffron Walden) moved the following Amendment:—

Clause 2, page 1, line 15, after "(1)" insert "Every person who sells for use as food for cattle any article which has been artificially prepared shall give to the purchaser an invoice stating the name of the article and whether it has been prepared from one substance or seed, or from more than one substance or seed, and this invoice shall have effect as a warranty by the seller of the statements contained therein."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) (on behalf of Mr. Heneage) moved the omission of Clause 4.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. GARDNER moved the following Amendment :—

Clause 6, page 4, line 4, after "analyst," insert "and the seller shall, on payment of a fee sanctioned by the Treasury, be entitled to have the sample analysed by the chief analyst, and to receive from him a certificate of the result of his analysis."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MORE moved an Amendment in Clause 7, page 4, line 23, leave out "Sub-section 1."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. GARDNER moved in Clause 7, page 4, line 27, leave out "or by the Board of Agriculture."

MR. MORE urged that the Board of Agriculture should be the prosecuting Body, and for these reasons. First, that the Report of the Departmental Committee had so recommended; secondly, that the Board of Trade, prosecuting under the Merchandise Marks Act, was a precedent; and, thirdly, that the Act would be inoperative without this power, as the farmers were too weak, and the County Councils could not be relied on to prosecute. If the Treasury objected to the retention of the Board of Agriculture as the prosecuting Body, and if from this cause the Act should prove to be inoperative, he hoped means would be taken to strengthen it.

MR. H. GARDNER remarked that in the first instance these words, which he now moved to omit, were inserted, but the Treasury decided that it would be very undesirable that the Board of Agriculture should be the prosecuting Body, and it was necessary, therefore, to exclude the words.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. MORE (for MR. H. HOBHOUSE) moved the following Amendment :—

Clause 7, page 4, line 23, at end, insert "but in the case of an offence under Section 3 shall not be instituted by the person aggrieved or by an association except on a certificate by the Board of Agriculture that there is reasonable ground for the prosecution."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. GARDNER said, this Bill was accepted by both sides of the House, it had passed the Grand Committee, and he hoped that permission would now be given for it to be read a third time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time," put, and agreed to.

Bill passed.

UNIVERSITY OF WALES (CHARTER).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her assent from the Charter of the University of Wales in its present form, and until it be amended so as to enable students connected with the University Colleges of Aberystwith, Cardiff, or Bangor, to present themselves for the examinations for degrees."

He said, he wished at the outset to point out that there was nothing of a Party character in the Motion. Members on both sides of the House supported the Charter as it at present stood, and also Members on both sides of the House desired the alteration and amendment he was now proposing. Not only was the Motion of a non-Party character, but the proposal was not directed against the Charter. None of them wished to see the Charter rejected, and the sole object of the Motion was to extend the basis of the Charter so as to include all Welshmen who desired to avail themselves of the advantages of the Universities, and to present themselves for examination. The Petition for the Charter was presented by the three Colleges of Aberystwith, Cardiff, and Bangor, and it was only necessary to read the Charter itself to see that it was proposed absolutely and exclusively for the benefit of these three Colleges. That was the ground of complaint against it. He and those who supported him were desirous that the benefits of the University of Wales should not be confined to these three Colleges, but that every man competent to pass an examination for a degree should be allowed to present himself for such examination. There were a large number of other Colleges besides these three. There were several denominational Colleges which had also Arts courses; there were also Intermediate Schools to be established under the intermediate system, as well as many private students, and all these ought to be entitled to present themselves at the University examinations; but if the Charter passed without the Amendment suggested, they would be completely excluded from the benefit of this University, the Charter for which, as it stood, was designed solely and exclusively as a measure of protection for these three Colleges, and to confine degrees solely to these Colleges. This was done under the semblance of having a teaching University; but the University, as such, did not profess to teach at all, and it had not got a single Professor or Lecturer, but it assumed the semblance of a teaching University by confining its degrees to the three Colleges. There were large numbers of men in Wales who were unable to afford the time and money to go to any of these three Colleges. Many who were anxious to obtain University degrees could not spare the time to go to College, because they would have to do so at that period when they were leaving some occupation or profession. Such a class of young men, he submitted, were deserving of every encouragement. Many elementary teachers in Wales had already gone through the University of London or Ireland, and had been able to obtain degrees, while, at the same time, carrying on their calling as elementary teachers. There were also many ministers of religion who had started their education in grammar schools and other institutions, who had been unable to afford the time to continue at a College, but who desired to continue their studies and go in for a University degree. By this Charter all such classes would be completely excluded, and no one would be entitled to go in for a degree in the Welsh University except students who attended one of the three Colleges. He was in no way against these Colleges, but he thought it would be an evil to unduly force the students to go there. Let the Colleges rely on their own merits. They were excellent institutions, with good teachers; and, that being so, they ought to have sufficient reliance upon their advantages without making the present Charter a measure of protection by enacting that no one should go in for these degrees except students of these Colleges. It was cruel kindness to some young men to require them to study at these Colleges before they had learned a profession, so that after they had attained the age of 21, 22, or 23, they found they had probably exhausted their means. If the Charter was passed in its present form, young men such as he had described would be told that they could not obtain degrees in their own native University, and they would be driven either to Ireland or to London. The only objections that were raised to this Amendment were these—it was said it was important to have a University training before a degree was granted. But if examinations were of any value, or were any test at all, he submitted they were a test of educational training. He admitted the advantage of young men going to the older Universities like Oxford and Cambridge, and mixing with representatives of every class of society; but it was different in the present case. It was, no doubt, of great value to young men to go to the older Universities, and come in contact with men of different classes of society, from different parts of the country, and of the highest intellectual attainments. But the Colleges in Wales were small, local Colleges, situated at a distance of 100 miles apart, and between which there was no common life or communion. They were non-residential—at any rate, two of them, Cardiff and Bangor, were. The students came from certain prescribed areas surrounding the Colleges, and were all of the same class. It was also said that, unless a training by the Colleges was made compulsory, there was a danger of the examination being vitiated by the system of “cramming.” He objected as much as anyone to the evils of “cramming,” but it was assumed by those who differed from him on this matter that those evils were confined to private students and private schools. But it was notorious that “cramming” existed to a very large extent in the great English Universities. The evils of cramming extended quite as much to the students of the Universities as they did to private students. In fact, these evils would be felt less by the class of private students that would present themselves in this University of Wales, because the latter belonged to a class of men who were engaged in other pursuits and devoted their leisure hours to the prosecution of their studies. The evils of cramming were chiefly found where there was an attempt to learn too quickly; but these Welsh students would not be subject to its influence, for the reason that they would be devoting their leisure time to their studies. The system that was now sought to be adopted by the University College of Wales had been tried and found wanting by other Universities. The University of London was founded on the same basis in relation to the two constituent Colleges connected with it; but the plan was proved to be unsatisfactory, and in 1858 a new Charter was granted to the University placing it on its present basis, so that any student, whether connected with an affiliated College or not, was entitled to present himself and obtain his degree if he was able to pass. The Royal University of Ireland simply absorbed the Queen's Colleges of Ireland, which up to 1880 were residential Colleges to some extent, and the University degrees were confined to students who were presented from those Colleges. But in 1880 an Act was passed throwing open the University degrees to every student. The condition of Wales was much the same as that of Ireland. A number of men were to be found there who had neither the time nor the money to enable them to go to these Colleges. All they asked was that the University of Wales should be established on the same principle as the University of Ireland. He simply wanted an analogous provision in this Charter to the one which existed in the Irish University Education Act, and which was as follows:—

"No residence in College nor attendance at lectures or any other course of instruction in the University shall be obligatory on any candidate for a degree, save for a degree in medicine and surgery."

He gladly avowed that the feeling in Wales was strongly in favour of a National Charter. They felt, and they had felt for years, that they had as much right to have a Charter for a University for Wales as Ireland, Scotland, or England had, and that they were quite within their rights in asking for such a Charter. On the question whether the Charter should include private private students, or be confined to the three Colleges of Bangor, Aberystwith, and Cardiff, the opinion of Wales was almost unanimous in favour of the views he had advanced. If they excluded the opinion of those interested in the three Colleges named, and appealed to the mass of the Welsh people, their opinion was overwhelmingly in favour of broadening the basis of the University, so as to include artisans, elementary school teachers, Dissenting ministers, and other private students. He merely wished to amend the Charter, not to defeat it. He hoped the Government would take no part on this Motion, but that they would let it be decided by the House. If the Motion were passed there was nothing in the world to prevent a Departmental Committee being appointed to see how the clause he had moved could be included, the Charter might then be passed, and its passage would meet with the approval of all sections of the community in Wales. He begged to move the Motion.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her assent from the Charter of the University of Wales in its present form, and until it be amended so as to enable students, unconnected with the University Colleges of Aberystwith, Cardiff, or Bangor, to present themselves for the examinations for degrees."—(Mr. Bryn Roberts.)

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry), in supporting the Motion, agreed that there was no Party feeling in this matter, and all that the friends of Wales desired was the good of Wales. They desired that this question should be settled and argued upon its merits. As had been said by the Mover of this Motion, they felt that this Charter was drawn upon too narrow and too illiberal a basis. As the hon. Gentleman had said, it was nothing but a Charter for the protection of the three constituent Colleges of Bangor, Aberystwith, and Cardiff. What were these Institutions? They were new Institutions of hardly 10 years old, some of them less. They were Institutions which were supported and backed up by £4,000 a year from the State, and were not self-supporting. Bangor was under such a cloud at the present moment that it was questionable whether it would ever be able to raise itself again in public estimation, and Aberystwith was at a standstill. In the year 1887 there were 99 Welsh students there. In 1891, which was the last Report he had been able to get hold of, there were only 85 Welsh students, and the numbers were just kept up by the English students, who in 1887 were 48, having risen to 64 in 1891. As for Cardiff, which was a great British seaport, and only geographically in Wales, almost the whole of the students who were there were there for a very short period; they seldom remained in residence very long—sometimes not even six months—and a very large proportion of them were English. Possibly these growing Institutions might eventually do some good educational work, but at present they were simply sowing very wild oats. Success with regard to Universities, as every one knew—and no one knew better than the Vice President—was very slow. They could not turn out a College ready made like they could a coat. The last Report on Welsh Higher Education was famous on account of the weakness of the Chairman and the strength of the other Members. Lord Aberdare was a changeable man; he changed with every gust of opinion. He did not hold the same opinion he held 10 years ago. He ventured to say that he did not hold the same opinion now as when the Report was published. The dominating spirit in the Report was that of Mr. Henry Richard, the great representative of Welsh Methodism—

An hon. MEMBER: He is not a Methodist.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: What is he, then?

An hon. MEMBER: A Congregationalist.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: A Methodist Congregationalist. At all events, he was a liberal-minded man. The Report proposed that the Charter conferred on St. David's College should be withdrawn, and a new Charter granted to a Syndicate or Board consisting of representatives in equal numbers of St. David's, Aberystwith, and any other College being a place of advanced secular education that may be affiliated for the purpose. Why had not the Charter followed that wise recommendation of that unanimous Report? Lampeter, as the oldest Welsh College—founded 60 years ago—had grown in importance; its standard was that of Oxford and Cambridge; it was affiliated to those Universities; it had no religious tests, and educational character should be the test of inclusion among the constituent Colleges. How was it that Lampeter had not been heard? Lampeter had been closed. They had been refused a hearing before the Privy Council. He appealed to the Vice President (Mr. Acland) to say if that were not so. This Charter was nothing but a scheme prepared by a caucus of these three Colleges, and nothing but a method of protecting them. There would be the greatest advantage in having among the constituent Colleges a College with a residential system. This was to be a Teaching University, and theology a subject to be taught—a subject for which a degree was to be given—but, would it be believed? not one of the three constituent Colleges had power to teach theology at all. It was prohibited in the curriculum, and Lampeter alone was enabled to give theological training to its students. Lord Aberdare's Report held the field until some other Report was presented. There was another Report, which gave facts, figures, and other information; but it was in the pocket of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Acland), who refused to show it. The Charter was intolerant and illiberal in character; it did not represent the aspirations of Wales; it was vigorously opposed by a large section of Nonconformists as well as Churchmen, and by every enlightened supporter of higher education, and he begged the Government to reconsider the question, and not force the Charter in its present form.

MR. D. B. JONES (Gloucester, Stroud) said, he would occupy just a few moments replying to the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved this Resolution. The hon. Gentleman did not object to a University for Wales, but to this particular University, and on the ground that it did not confer degrees as a result of examination under it. This objection was founded on the idea that there was a demand for such a University as the hon. Member wished for; but anyone who took the trouble to look at the history of the educational movement in Wales would see that there had never been any serious demand for the creation of a University independent of the three University Colleges. Those Colleges were created to meet the demand for better intermediate and University education in Wales, and the demand for a University was merely subsidiary. The people of Wales had contributed largely to the support of the Colleges; they were governed by Representative Bodies; and—notwithstanding what the hon. Member opposite had said—they had met with a remarkable amount of success, since they had turned out a large number of young men who had received a University training quite as good as that to be had in any other College in the Kingdom. It was said they should be allowed to confer on their students the same symbols of academic distinction as other such Bodies granted. That was a demand the Council and the Government had yielded to. But the demand to-night was for another kind of University—an Examining University. But it was to be remembered that these Colleges in Wales would object to an Examining University on the same ground that University College, London, and King's College were objected to by the University of London. The question arose—was there any need for an Examining University in Wales? The London University was at this moment in Wales performing the very functions which his hon. and learned Friend wished to see performed by the Charter as amended. What, then, became of the grievance to which his hon. and learned Friend referred? He (Mr. D. B. Jones) would not like to see an examining University established in Wales which would enable students to take degrees easier than at the London University. That being so, what plausible reason could be urged for the establishment of a new Examining Body in Wales? Nearly all the persons who went up from Wales for the London University examinations went up from one of the three Colleges. In fact, a short time ago one-eighth of the students who obtained the B.A. degree in the London University in that year were students from these University Colleges. And the hon. and learned Gentleman would see that the Board might, under the Charter, take measures to institute extra-University courses, and to hold examinations in connection therewith; and attendance at those courses would exempt from the full period of attendance at the College course. In this Charter there was a further provision to meet the case of the persons on whose behalf the hon. and learned Member had spoken. It was proposed to be enacted that the Court might grant diplomas or certificates in such subjects and under such provisions as might be determined by Statute. That seemed to him to meet the case which the hon. and learned Member had in view. A very important educational scheme was involved in this Motion—the question of an Examining University as opposed to a Teaching University. He believed the best educational authorities—the majority of cultured men—were opposed to the granting of degrees simply as a result of examination. The London University had encouraged the practice of cramming—a practice which cultivated the memory at the expense of the judgment. The object of a Training College or a University was not to make a man a walking encyclopædia, but to train his faculties for use in after life—that he might be able to pass judgment on the faculties of life. He felt it necessary, for the reasons he had stated and in the interests of Wales, to oppose the Motion.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh) said, he would confine his remarks to one or two of the points raised by the Mover of the Resolution. Lord Aberdare had been twitted with a change of opinion on this subject, but he would venture to point out that the circumstances had changed—that at the time Lord Aberdare's Commission sat there was only one College in Wales, whereas now there were three Colleges—Bangor, Aberystwith, and Cardiff—all doing good work. It was said the edifice was not to be crowned, because certain gentlemen had laid down a law that a certain constituent College was to be included in the University. What was that College? It was a Theological College. Why was not the claim of the particular College to be included in the University Charter made in proper time—namely, while the discussion of the Charter was proceeding? To-night, in another place, it was stated that the tribunal was incompetent. As a matter of fact, that tribunal was representative of all the best educational interests in Wales; if the claim was to be made, it should have been made at the time the Charter was being discussed, when it would have been entitled to, and would have had, fair consideration. That incompetent tribunal took into consideration the question of Lampeter College, but Lampeter College made no claim to be included. The hon. Member opposite said he resisted the Charter because he wished particular terms made with Lampeter College. Did he not know that particular terms had been made?

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS asked whether the remarks of the hon. Member were in Order? They were directed to the Resolution of the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division to include Lampeter College, and that was not his (Mr. Roberts') Resolution at all.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for the Oswestry Division gave as his reason for supporting the Motion for the rejection of the scheme the exclusion of Lampeter College; therefore I can hardly stop the hon. Member from referring to that point.

MR. KENYON said, that what he had been going to say was that a particular clause was inserted in the Charter for the express purpose of including in the future any constituent Colleges which might commend themselves to Her Majesty for inclusion. That disposed of the argument of the last speaker. He could only say that the hon. Member's policy was of a dog-in-the-manger kind. Wales wanted this Charter, and, what was more, she intended to have it. He would appeal to his English friends not to resist the Welshmen on this occasion. A deputation, of which he had been a member, had waited on the late Government, and their application was favourably received, but nothing came of it. Well, he was an educationalist first and a politician afterwards, and if he could get a Charter from a Liberal Government he would take it, while regretting that a Conservative Government had not seen fit to accord it.

*MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) said, he wished to give a few facts in answer to the Resolution of his hon. and learned Friend. He had no time to discuss whether it was better to have in Wales a Teaching University than one which consisted simply of an Examining Board; but his hon. Friend had contended that poor lads, students for the ministry, and elementary teachers would not be able to avail themselves of this University education. The facts concerning the three constituent Colleges entirely disproved that argument. Notwithstanding what had been said by the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division, there had been a large number of students educated at the three constituent Colleges—nearly 3,000—though two of the Colleges were of recent date, only one of them having been in existence any length of time—that was to say, about 20 years. With regard to Aberystwith College, 1,214 students in all had passed through, of whom 413 consisted of the sons of the commercial class—not of the wealthy commercial class, but of the class of shopkeepers and small tradesmen; of the farming class there were 188, and of the class of labourers 184. From these classes alone 785 out of the 1,214 had been educated there. At Cardiff College the total number of students had been 940. Of these, 299 had come from the tradesman class, 84 were the sons of farmers, and 285 were the sons of labourers, and this would give 668 from these classes out of the 940. In the case of Bangor College, the total number of students had been 564; 183 students had come from the tradesmen classes, 78 had come from the farming class, and 143 came from the labouring class. That was to say, there were 404 of these classes out of a total of 564. Lumping the three Colleges together, they found that out of a total of 2,718 students 1,857, or more than two-thirds of the whole, had come from the lowest walks of life. Then with reference to the case of elementary teachers. It was a fact that many of these had been educated in the three constituent Colleges. The number would be greater in the future than it had been in the past, for the Carnarvon (Church) School had removed to Bangor to avail itself of that College. Until lately schoolmasters and mistresses could only get training at Bangor (Normal) School, Carnarvon (Church), Carmarthen (Church), and Swansea (Girls), but arrangements had been made whereby Aberystwith would be paid by the Education Department to educate 120 elementary teachers, and Cardiff would be paid to educate 150. As to the objection that Nonconformist ministers would not be able to attend the University Colleges, it was the fact that nearly all the Nonconformist Colleges had already removed to the places at which the University Colleges were situate. The Pontypool Baptist College had removed to Cardiff, the Haverfordwest College to Aberystwith, the Llangollen College to Bangor, the Brecon Congregational College sent art and science students to Cardiff, the Bala College had removed to Bangor, the Bala Methodist College sent students for everything save Theology to Aberystwith and Bangor, the Trevecca Methodist College would soon adopt a similar course, and Lampeter Church College had its own degrees. Thus nearly all candidates for the ministry would reside and qualify in the University Colleges. With regard to the feeling in Wales on this question, there would be no better test than the attitude of the Welsh Members. So far as he was aware, the hon. Member who moved the Resolution had only one Member to support him on the Ministerial side of the House out of the total number sent to represent the Principality. The Charter had been considered by 12 out of 16 Welsh County Councils, and only two had objected to it, and in one of those cases the influence of the hon. Member who moved the Resolution was observable. Therefore, Wales was not far from unanimous on the question. If the Charter were not obtained now, it might be delayed for years, for the Departmental Committee suggested by his hon. and learned Friend would probably take a long time to inquire and Report. Even if a Departmental Committee were appointed forthwith they all knew that a large amount of time would be consumed by such an investigation.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS : About three months.

*MR. S. EVANS said, that was not our experience in connection with other Departmental Committees. Besides, there was no knowing what Government might be in Office when the Inquiry terminated, and whether it would be in favour of a University for Wales. He hoped, therefore, that all who desired to see higher education extended in the Principality would vote in support of the Charter.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (MR. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) said, that as so much of the subject had been so fully dealt with, he would confine himself to one or two points, which he thought he must allude to on behalf of the Government. This subject had now been before the Principality for a number of years. As the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs had said, a deputation of all Parties had waited upon the late Lord President of the Council to invite his attention to the matter. The noble Lord had received them in a friendly spirit, but had said that the right course to pursue was to go back and draw up a Charter for presentation. Well, the University Colleges and those persons interested in working out intermediate education in Wales had been engaged for many months in considering the matter, and they had now presented their Charter, which had been considered by the Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. Member for the Oswestry Division had complained that he (Mr. Acland) had not laid on the Table the Report which had been furnished by a gentleman who was an impartial man in this matter, and a very eminent Welshman. He would not go into the matter, but would merely point out that all the Petitions presented in this matter were laid before an impartial Committee of the Privy Council, composed of the Lord President, Sir H. James, Lord Knutsford, Lord Playfair, and himself. He thought that was a guarantee that the matter had not been treated in any partisan spirit. Those who had had the advantage of hearing the remarks of Lord Knutsford in another place would know that he was with them. The Principal of Lampeter asked to be heard before that Committee by counsel, but that could not be permitted, as it was contrary to the usual procedure. All Petitions were considered in the same way by the Committee, and the Committee formed their own judgment upon them. He could assure the hon. Member for Oswestry (Mr. S. Leighton) that the whole of the case of Lampeter College was before them. The object of the scheme was to draw the poorer students to the University Colleges by means of the Act of the late Government for intermediate education, and he was convinced that the Scotch system was the best for that purpose, and that the people of Wales would find that it would meet all their wants. There might still be a few poor students who would stay away from the University, yet by means of bursaries and exhibitions almost all private students who were able to take University degrees would be brought up. As to the arrangement proposed being a measure of protection, and all the work of the Conference being for the benefit of these Colleges, he thought that when they considered who had been gathered together at the Conference, and that the Governors of the Colleges were men of all Parties and creeds, and that all had tried to foster these Colleges, and had joined to obtain this Charter, the idea of protecting special interests might be dropped. With regard to Lampeter College, it was governed in a very limited manner, and was primarily a Theological College, the Principal being selected by the Bishop of St. David's from a selected list. No Government would admit that College to the position of a constituent College of the University while it was managed as at present. If it altered its constitution, then there were words in the Charter which would permit a supplemental Charter to be granted to meet the case. The Government had taken the wisest and the only possible course. If they had attempted to set up an Examining University, rivalling London, and exciting the jealousy of Victoria University, and other such Institutions, the scheme would have been doomed to failure. The Government had no doubt that they were meeting the wishes of Wales and of a large number of persons on both sides of the House. He only hoped that the House would sympathise with that zeal for education which distinguished every part of the Principality, and which the late Government had done so much to forward by their admirable Intermediate Education Act. All the present Government were doing was to develop that admirable Intermediate Education Act of the late Government, and he hoped the House would be unanimous in supporting them.

*MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) said, he fully recognised the conciliatory tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but he had hoped that the Government would have availed themselves of the opportunity of broadening the basis of the Welsh University. He could not agree that the line advocated by the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division (Mr. S. Leighton) was a dog-in-the-manger policy. It was not a policy to exclude anybody, but to include as many as possible. The object now in view was to enlarge and liberalise education in Wales, and he thought the Government should have availed themselves of this Charter for the purpose. He trusted that in future higher education would be put on such a footing that no Educational Institution giving efficient education and affording protection to freedom of conscience would be excluded from the University. If that were the case, those who had taken part in the Debate to-night, and had urged the widening of the basis of the Welsh University, would not have spoken in vain.

Question put, and negatived.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) [GRANT].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an additional annual sum, not exceeding £5,000, for the purposes of "The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889," and the Acts amending the same, and the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of any sums lent by the National Debt Commissioners, under the provisions of "The Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891," for the commutation of the said additional annual sum.—(Sir J. T. Hibbert.)

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 30th August 1893.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 448.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read, and discharged.

Bill re-committed in respect of an Amendment to Clauses 26 and 27 respectively.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; Bill, as amended, considered (Queen's Consent signified).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I am very mindful of the indulgence which I have already received from the House upon the principal stages of this Bill; and it would be unbecoming in me personally, with the memory that I cherish of that indulgence, to re-enter at large upon the general field of argument which, in our opinion, justifies and requires the passing of the Bill. I shall altogether confine myself to reference to points which have arisen since the last occasion, that of the Second Reading, when I had the honour of addressing the House on the general question, now four or five months ago. There are two occurrences which I think it right to notice, as they have arisen since that period, though they appertain to the general arguments of the Bill. One of these touches what we have always regarded as a very important argument, the argument derived from experience—from the experience of a very large number of European countries, from the experience of our own race in America, and from our own experience in reference to the Colonial Empire. But since that time, and I think that during that Debate, observations have been made tending to impeach that remarkable uniformity of result which is yielded by this wide field of observation in connection with a case now attracting some attention—but not more than it deserves—I mean the case of Sweden and Norway. It has, indeed, been contended by the opponents of the Bill that none of these cases are, strictly speaking, analogous to the case of Great Britain and Ireland. That admission must be freely made if analogy requires an exact correspondence of all particulars. There can be no such exact correspondence of particulars in a comparison between the transactions of one nation with the transactions of another. But there is one grand correspondence—fundamental and radical—determining in substance and in effect the whole character of the transactions and their applicability to our own case—that every one of those instances, whether I take Austria and Hungary, Sweden and Norway, the United States, or the United Kingdom and our Colonies, all are founded on the one fundamental and radical principle—that of division between local and general and Imperial affairs. It is that principle which, in our opinion, constitutes the essence of the present transaction, and it is the extraordinary success with which that principle has been applied in solving many problems, and in mitigating and reducing other problems, which makes it so grave and so important a lesson with respect to the present discussion. But some have observed that a great crisis has arisen in one of these cases—the important case of Sweden and Norway. Nor is it for a moment to be denied that the political affairs of those two interesting countries, so nearly allied in blood to ourselves, are at present in a state of acute tension, so much so that even the words “severance of the Union” have been in the mouths of men, not, perhaps, the wisest, but still in the mouths of men who are citizens of those countries. For my part, I venture to say that it would require a very great stock of folly on the one side in the controversy, and, perhaps, on both sides, to dissolve that Union. But for the purpose of adverse argument I will refer to the very worst supposition, and will assume that that Union is to be dissolved—which I do not believe. Supposing it were dissolved. How would the case stand? Would the argument for Unions of this kind, based on a division between local and Imperial affairs, thereby be destroyed? No; it would stand thus : That whereas at the close of a great war Sweden and Norway were actually in arms against one another, and were ready to fight out the battle in the field, by means of that Union there have been established 80 years of unbroken harmony between them. Those 80 years—come what may—represent a great good achieved for humanity, and for Europe, as well as for the two countries themselves. I might say more than that. Much progress has been made in many respects towards harmony, but I will assume nothing. I will only say that the realisation of those 80 years of peace, unbroken in any single case, except by political discussions, contrast favourably with the 93 years which have passed since the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland. But I must refer to another argument, which we, and perhaps I myself, have been especially in the habit of using. I will not say that it is as weighty as the argument from universal experience, but I confess that I think it an argument of some weight, and entitled to some consideration. That is the argument derived from the authority of the civilised world, as exhibited in its permanent literature. I do not speak of journalism, which represents the sentiment of the moment, and which in one country very often represents not the genuine judgment on the question discussed, but a judgment formed in reference to other questions and other interests. I have affirmed that it has been my object, so far as I could pursue it, to ascertain what is the sentiment of European and American literature on these subjects, and I have never found—though, of course, I do not assert it to be universal—a single case in which a European writer, speaking from some point of view that gave him a title to consideration, has approved of the conduct of England to Ireland, or has recognised it otherwise than as a great stain upon the honour of this country. There are one or two gentlemen who are bold enough to contest that proposition, and to produce five names in asserted contradiction. Not one of those citations touch the point. I have never said that all Continental and American writers approved of the Home Rule Bill. If they did, I should attach but a very secondary weight to their judgment ; but I think that on particular measures the judgment of foreigners, when we get into particulars, cannot be of any great weight or value. But there was not one of those five persons who contradicted my assertion, or who had any apology to offer for the grievous, the shameful history which we have to deplore during almost the whole of our connection with Ireland. [Cries of "Oh!"] The right hon. Member for Sleaford touched upon the subject, and was severe upon me for the superficiality of my examination compared with the careful range with which he had examined the question and the results he had obtained. Out of those five names there is not one which contradicts my assertion with regard to the effect of the Irish connection on English honour and character. But there is one among them which is so eminent that I must go into it a little further than the right hon. Gentleman did, and that is the name of Cavour, who travelled and spent some time in this country. His judgment was of the highest order ; his insight into politics, as we know from subsequent results, was a peculiar and extraordinary gift, one of the very few who, among statesmen, attained the very highest of their qualities—the quality and the character of the nation-maker. Cavour, said the right hon. Gentleman, had approved the union of England with Ireland ; but Cavour wrote before the true history of that Union was known. It is true that Cavour did give an approval, but a very limited and qualified approval, of the Union of England with Ireland.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : No, no.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The right hon. Gentleman challenges my statement. In that case I must refer to what Cavour said. He said—

“In civil respects and in economic respects, the Union was good ; but as regarded the religion of the people of Ireland, it left it in a worse position than before.”

The religion of the people of Ireland is the heart and soul and centre of their whole life. That I call a qualified and limited approval. But that is not the point. First of all, did Cavour think that the relations between England and Ireland had been honourable to England ? I will read a few lines from a translation of his book on the subject. He says this of Ireland in 1792—

"Ireland was destined to become, after a long career of misery, an inexhaustible source of troubles and anxieties to its oppressors in order, perhaps, to give to the world a great lesson, and to teach to the most powerful nations that their crimes and their errors recoil sooner or later on those who commit them."

That is the judgment of Cavour upon the conduct of England to Ireland. Of that we hear nothing from the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHAPLIN: There are half-a-dozen passages quite the opposite.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Then Cavour contradicts himself. That is an assertion of the right hon. Gentleman which I will leave to stand for itself. But what was material was this: We were told that Cavour approved of the Union; and I have shown that it was a qualified approval. But did he approve of the Union as if it were a finished work, to be the basis of the relations between England and Ireland? No doubt Cavour looked at the Union as solving a great problem with respect to the supremacy and the union of the two countries; but was he of opinion that it left nothing to be done in the way of Constitutional and organic change? No, Sir. Here is a passage which the right hon. Gentleman will find on pages 109-10 of the work which I have quoted. This he wrote at a period when Sir Robert Peel's Government was in Office. He wrote at the period when the work of local self-government upon the principle of division of powers had just been completed for Canada, and he wrote in these words—he did not wish the repeal of the Union, he disapproved of it; but referring to the Peel Government, of which he had favourable opinions, he said—

"It will then pursue the work of regeneration. In support of what I have said, I will only cite the moderate, liberal, generous conduct of the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel towards Canada. What it did for that distant Colony it will do for Ireland."

It will be perceived that that great statesman took in principle, as nearly as may be, the very ground we take at this moment, of preserving the supremacy of Parliament and the unity of the Empire, but of granting that self-government—undoubtedly under limitations—in principle, which had been granted to Canada at the time when he wrote. I think that, as regards Count Cavour, I have pretty well made good more than the propositions which, on various occasions, I have said before the House. As I have already stated, my duty on this occasion, I think, will be to deal with what, according to a phrase now generally used and accepted, may be described as "the situation"—the actual state of this Bill and the circumstances which have taken place since we were discussing the principle on the Second Reading. Undoubtedly, during that interval between the Second Reading and the present stage we have accumulated a mountainous mass of Debate. I wish I could entertain the opinion that that mass of Debate will greatly add—taken as a whole—to the fame of the House of Commons as a deliberative Assembly. I am afraid the result will be somewhat the reverse, and that the best that can be said of it is that it has been distinguished by a very great and singular development of small points. That the future will decide. But we have to consider results; and the results, I apprehend, are these: As the reward of the 79 days which have preceded this Debate, we have secured these two things: the passing of the Bill through the House of Commons, and the leaving available, if we have the courage to use it, a residue of the Session which may be devoted to the much-needed and important purposes of British legislation. How have these results been attained? They have been attained by two instruments; one of them the use of the time-closure—a system of dealing with legislative measures in respect of which I will only say that I regard it as an evil. [Opposition cheers.] I am glad that some of its authors agree with me, and recognise it as an evil, and an evil which ought only to be tolerated for the avoidance of some much greater evil. The other instruments by which these results have been attained are the unbounded sacrifices which Members of this House—the special duty, of course, of Members of the majority—have made; they have given up their time—I hope not their health and strength—their ease, their convenience, their usual habits, for the purpose of a bold and inexhaustible perseverance in the discharge of their public duties; and while, naturally, I admire this self-sacrifice upon this side of the House, especially, where it has been united, in my humble conviction, with the purposes of political wisdom and sound policy, I am glad to have the opportunity of paying at least this compliment to gentlemen opposite: that they, too, have exhibited a very large portion of old English pluck and fortitude, worthy—if they will permit me to say—of being devoted to a better cause. These are the means by which these ends have apparently—and I hope I may now with confidence anticipate—been attained. I will ask gentlemen opposite—and I think I may trust to their kindness—to hear me with patience, and I think that before I close they will find I have tried to do them justice. We have not attained these important results—namely, the passing of the Irish Bill, now immediately imminent, and of reserving at least some portion of the year free for British legislation—without paying a price for them. We have paid a very heavy price. This has been a lengthened Debate, extending beyond all previous precedent, beyond all possible expectation, and with regard to which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition and his coadjutor, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, have attempted, with infinite ingenuity and with a great deal, I must say, of grace and undeserved kindness, to trace it to my individual responsibility. I think, however, in all those declarations there was a strong strain of irony; at any rate, I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman into that discussion, though I think I could do it with some effect. I think he will agree with me that it would be rather too small for the present occasion. But I will take the mass of the discussion, and it is certainly an extraordinary fact that if we divide on Friday night, as appears to be the arrangement made by consent in the House, we shall have expended 82 days on the discussion of this Bill. Those 82 days are entirely in excess of anything that has ever before happened. It may, perhaps, entertain, or even instruct the House, if I mention in what way it was that in former times great Irish crises were wont to be disposed of by the British Parliament. In 1782 there was effected a political, but a peaceful, revolution in Ireland. Ireland became, as to legislation, a free country. As to the Executive Government, it is true that it did not become equally free, for the responsibility of Executive Governments to Legislatures had not then been esta-lished. That is a great political discovery, and a result of the 19th century. But there cannot be the smallest doubt that, had that Parliament of Ireland been continued, and had not the disturbances that followed the recall of Lord Fitzwilliam intervened—I say, had that Parliament continued to the present day, in a peaceful course of things, the responsibility of Irish Ministers to that Parliament would have crowned the work of Grattan. However, when that legislative revolution took place in 1782, the Debates upon it were confined to April 9 and May 17—not to the period intervening between those two dates, but to those two days themselves. In 1783, when the work was completed by a formal declaration of the sole authority of the Irish Parliament to make laws for Ireland, one day sufficed for the great consummation. In 1799 and in 1800, when the work of the Union was accomplished, when this Legislature of Ireland was swallowed up and annihilated, and the whole institutions of that country placed upon a footing essentially different—a revolution greater by far than any that is now contemplated or proposed—that revolution, where the business was not to construct, but to pull to pieces, was accomplished in seven days in 1799 and six days in 1800. That was the way in which Irish questions were disposed of in former times. But how have other questions been disposed of by us? As far as I know, the three longest periods given by this House to any Bill were, in 1887, 42 days, to what we justly term the Coercion Bill; in 1881, 46 days to the Irish Land Bill; and in 1831, 47 days—only one day beyond the Land Bill—to the great Reform Bill of Lord Grey, which went to the very root and foundation of this country, and for the first time, at any rate, in modern history established the great principle that no man should sit in this House without having a real constituency. That was a measure so great that it not only effected at the moment a vast change, and roused from their sleeping places all the dark prophecies and sinister inventions of those who opposed it, just like the present Bill, but also supplied the basis of subsequent Reform Bills in such a way that they had no new principle to introduce, and are but mere sequels and developments of the great measure introduced in the past, without a revolution out of doors, but only just without a revolution by the Government of that day. I know there are those who say that that was not such a great Constitutional measure as the one now proposed. I can only say that I am unable to enter into a discussion of that question with those gentlemen, for I am unable to appreciate their mode of reading history, their form of political philosophy, and their estimate of Constitutional changes. That is the mass of the time that has been taken. But this question of time taken is one of extreme importance. Little has, as yet, been said upon it. That little has been general. But it will have to be pursued into details and particulars; for I hold it to be certain that the time of the House of Commons is the treasure of the people. See what it is that this Bill has cost them. Having stated roughly, and generally, the amount of time, I am obliged to go forward and ask the question—By whom was that time taken? I shall come afterwards to the justification for taking it, but I am now speaking only of the past. The case stands thus. I will look first at the stage in the Committee and on the Report—the stage which relates to Clauses 3 and 4. On these two clauses in Committee, and on Report, the Amendments given notice of were 326. But the reaper, in the shape of the authority in the Chair, put in his sickle, and mowed down prematurely a certain number of the Amendments, so that the actual number moved on two clauses came to 141. The time taken on those two clauses, almost entirely in dealing with these Amendments, amounted to 110 hours. That tolerably answers my question—By whom was the time taken? because it certainly was not from the friends of the Bill that the Amendments proceeded. What was the quality of those Amendments, and what was their purpose? The purpose of a number of them undoubtedly was to restrict the powers of the Irish Parliament, to undo piecemeal the work of devolution which had been performed in the gross on the main stages of the Bill; and those Amendments upon two clauses only, entirely apart from other Amendments upon other clauses, in restraint of the boon to be conferred on Ireland, were no less than 88. That is an unexampled quantity. There may have been a reason for it. I will come to that by and-by, but it was an unexampled proceeding, which I think justifies the statement we have made, that, whether rightly or wrongly, in their reasons and aims, the opposition to this Bill was different from all former oppositions. I, at least, from all previous experience, am aware of no case in which there has been, on a great measure, a deliberate and persistent attempt of this nature in Committee on the Bill partly to destroy the work by the mass and volume of Amendments, partly to undo and take back in morsels the boon that had already, in principle, been conferred. I must resort to another method of answering this question—By whom has the time been spent? I am not going to endeavour to lay any peculiar responsibility upon any individual in respect to it, but I will take the total number of speeches in Committee. I cannot say that the account I am going to give will be found literally and in every point unassailable. It is not quite like an ordinary arithmetical process, but in the main the figures are correct. It has been taken with every possible care from The Times, which we have supposed to be the best repository for such a purpose. With the exception of a certain number of speeches, which could hardly be put down either as for or against the Bill—not amounting to 5 per cent. of the whole, and therefore hardly affecting the general result—the speeches made for the Bill in Committee were 459—an awful roll. There were many, no doubt, made by the Government, but most of them made by the Government were owing to the compulsion—the gentle compulsion, the Parliamentary compulsion—of the Opposition. What were the speeches against the Bill? The number was 938. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer that statement. They are quite consistent. I will give them a little further material of the same kind. Besides the number of speeches, we have to look at the length of the speeches, because the object is to ascertain where lies the consumption of time—who were responsible for it, in fact—and how far the pleas which, I admit, were urged on its behalf are sufficient. The hours taken by the 459 speeches for the Bill were 57½, but the hours taken by the 938 speeches—twice the number against the Bill—were 152 $\frac{3}{4}$ , so that while the number of the Opposition speeches were two to one compared with those for the Bill, the length of the Opposition speeches was not far from three to one. [Opposition cheers.] I am glad we are agreed as to the fact. This peculiar mode of proceeding, I think, justifies us in the belief that the intention was, if possible, to prevent our passing this Bill through the House of Commons. But my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) said that no such intention had ever been entertained. Fully believing the assertion, as far as concerns himself and those for whom he in this case speaks, I modify my statement to this extent: that I think it was intended, in the first place, to drive and compel us to the use of the Closure—to leave us no weapon except that most invidious weapon, no weapon by which we could attain the main object, or fulfil the commission which we had received from the country at the time of the General Election. I think also what he said was perfectly consistent with the supposition which I also entertained—and, indeed, I think it amounted to positive assertion on his part—that what he looked to was to leave us, if we liked, the power of passing the Irish Bill through the House of Commons by an unbroken devotion of our time and energies from now to Christmas; but the great object was to prevent our possessing any free residue of the year for British legislation. I hope it will be felt in the House—and I am sure it will be perceived in the country—that a great part of the battle in which we have been engaged—an important and a vital part of it—has been to defeat the great purpose of the Opposition, apparently specially entertained in what is called the Liberal Unionist quarter, and to vindicate, on behalf of the people of this country, and of their many legislative wants, the claim to some free time at least for the purpose of British measures. I know it is said on the other side that this is a most complex Bill, a Bill containing 16 Bills, according to one gentleman; a Bill containing a Bill in every clause, according to another gentleman; a Bill containing 100 Bills, according to a third speaker; and, according to a fourth speaker, possessing a more powerful and strong-winged imagination, a Bill containing 1,000 Bills. This complexity, to a certain extent, we admit, but only to a certain extent. Undoubtedly, the nearness of Ireland to England, the close intertexture of Institutions and Organisations which had been produced during the 19th century, did render necessary a great number of secondary and subsidiary—but important—provisions which it was essential for us to introduce into the Bill. Had this Bill only consumed the time which was consumed say even by the great Reform Bill of 1831, I think we should have no cause for wonder or for special remark. But the complexity of the Bill does not account for the time consumed. What does account for it is the complexity of the Amendments. It is not that the complexity of the Bill was unbounded, but it is this: that the largely greater part, the far largely greater part, of the time we have spent upon the Bill was spent not upon what is in the Bill at all, but upon what it was endeavoured to put into it. We are perfectly aware of the quarter from which these endeavours came. It was a natural and, from their point of view, a legitimate endeavour. It is alleged by the Opposition, and I think it has been confidently stated by Lord Salisbury in some letter or emission of some kind, that the main points of the Bill have not been discussed. Suppose, for a moment, that that allegation was true, on whom falls the responsibility? The Government were not responsible for it. I have shown that 930 speeches were made in 157 $\frac{1}{4}$  hours by the Opposition, or by the two Oppositions. Was it possible, in 930 speeches occupying nearly 158 hours, to get at the main provisions of the Bill?

An hon. MEMBER here made an observation which was inaudible in the Reporters' Gallery.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very sorry that I did not catch what the hon. Member said, because I am unwilling to lose any valuable suggestions that may be made from the other side. But is it true that the main provisions of this Bill have not been discussed? What are the provisions of the Bill that have been discussed, and that at an enormous length? I will shortly recite them. They are all contained, I admit, in 11 clauses, and I also admit that 26 clauses, besides the Schedules, have not been discussed. I think, however, that that is rather a better proportion than that which was discussed in the case of the Coercion Bill of 1886. You alleged on that occasion that the clauses that were discussed contained the main body of the Bill. That is what I contend with regard to this Bill, and what I think I can prove. What were the points that were all of them largely discussed—not one of them except in a considerable number of hours? First, the supremacy; secondly, the great devolution of legislative powers and responsibilities from the Imperial upon the Irish Parliament; thirdly, the constitution of that Parliament in two Houses; fourthly, the disabilities and limitations which we thought it wise to impose upon the Irish Parliament; fifthly, the position, responsibilities, and duties of the Executive; sixthly, the retention of the Irish Members in Parliament; seventhly, the Financial Clauses, with respect to which, although the very important particulars are only temporary, yet every principle for the regulation of them is strictly defined and laid down in the Bill; and, eighthly, what is important, but less important in principle than the other seven, the great principle of adjustment with the Constabulary and Civil Service in Ireland. I affirm that these eight heads contain a Home Rule Bill. You may tell me that there was much else that was important in the principle adopted by gentlemen, not perhaps exclusively in this Bill, which might be elevated to supreme rank. But, whatever individual fancy may tend to exaggerate, my affirmation is—and I submit that affirmation to the country—that the great cardinal principles and provisions of the Home Rule Bill are contained, and are contained throughout, in the heads which I have now enumerated. The justification then, in my opinion, is not to be found in the observation that the Bill has not been discussed. Neither can it be found in the allegation that the Bill is so complex. But I must say one word more of that complexity, and it is this: Why is the Bill complex? Because of its moderation. You have before you a vast and insoluble, or as yet unsolved, Irish problem. There are more ways than one of solving that problem. I think I have found in the works of Lord Macaulay—who, in a most eloquent and powerful speech, opposed the repeal of the Union in 1834—a distinct admission that, rather than continue in permanent and vital discord with the mass of the Irish nation, the separation of the two countries would be a less intolerable evil. One of the arguments quoted against me by the hon. Member for Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), disapproving of the Home Rule Bill, was that of an extremely clever French writer. He did not disapprove of the Home Rule Bill. And why? Because he said the only rational plan was separation. But there is another measure very different from separation, and much more within legal and Constitutional purview, and that is the repeal of the Union; and it has to be borne in mind that the advocates of Irish nationalism have never to this hour, as far as my knowledge goes, admitted the moral authority of the Act of Union. If that which I do not expect were to come about—namely, a prolonged, bitter, obstinate resistance to the granting of this restricted claim, the question of repeal might arise in most gigantic form, and might become the ground of the National question—not certainly in my hands—not in the hands of men of my age, nor could even men 30 or 40 years younger face that question. But my capabilities are one thing, and the possibilities of the political world are another. And I state confidently to gentlemen who treat this complexity as if it were some capital offence of ours, the complexity of our Bill, as I admit it in certain limits, is due to the fact of Irish nationalism adopting the counsels of moderation, adopting them in principle, and, I must say in justice to the Irish Members, sustaining them in detail throughout the whole course of this interminable discussion. Nay, Sir, these principles, in taking resort to this limited form of legislation, have introduced a complexity which I think it is rather hard to turn against them and to turn against their country for the purpose of opposition. Is there to be found, either in the complexity of the measure or in the incapacity of the House of Commons to discuss all these clauses, a ground broad enough to form a justification for the very novel and remarkable description of opposition that has been pursued? I have deliberately refrained, on the score of time, from analysing the character of that opposition—from going into detail. I have given you nothing but summaries and the totals; but the statement would be more remarkable, and would be strengthened and corroborated in all its parts, if I were to pursue the subject in all its details, which I hope on the part of other speakers will be brought fully to the notice of the country. But now I come to what I think is the main justification of the Opposition in the course of this Debate. I come to the nature of the pleas which they have urged against our measure. I will state them very shortly, and I think that gentlemen will recognise that I reproduce them faithfully. I do not mean that every speaker, or even every prominent speaker, has used every one of them. I mean they have been used by these prominent speakers, and that they might all of them be collected from the speeches of the most prominent Members. At any rate, they are, in my judgment, the only pleas of those made by the Opposition which afford prima facie, and, from their point of view, a justification for the peculiar and unprecedented mode which they have adopted, and which now, for the first time, has been introduced into the proceedings of Parliament. Although I admit there has been obstruction before, there has never before been obstruction by any Party prevailing from the First Reading down to the Second and Third of a character which is admitted to be entirely without example. Now, what have been the pleas and allegations against our Bill? If gentlemen can command their nervous systems, let them exercise that command for a moment over their alarm and horror at what I am about to read. I am going to give an extremely brief recital of what, according to our opponents, will be the certain and probably immediate results of passing the Home Rule Bill. It will separate the islands; it will destroy the Constitution; it will break up the Empire; it will, within the House of Commons, annihilate financial control—and I apprehend that financial control in the House of Commons over the Expenditure and taxation of the country is of itself a large part of the life of the Constitution; it will make Irish delegation supreme in British affairs within these walls. Then there is the loyal minority. What is to be the result to them? Virtual slavery in person, property, and religion; and, lastly—this is the seventh of this goodly list of pleas—whereas we have been wickedly inveigling Parliament into this dreadful scheme, by representing to them that if they would only pass it a huge load would thereby be lifted off the shoulders of every man by the reduction of Parliamentary work, and making it easier for Parliament to discharge its duties to the country—we are met with the allegation that besides breaking up the Empire and ruining the Constitution, and all the rest, Parliamentary controversy within these walls will become worse and fiercer than before, and will become quite intolerable. It is my duty to admit that, if those seven pleas be sound and true, it must go hard with Home Rule. Let gentlemen make of these allegations what they like. If they can make them good, the result will not be altogether of a satisfactory character for themselves. Suppose for a moment that they are true. I believe them to be enormous, monstrous, hideous falsehoods; but let it be understood when I say falsehoods, I do not say a word against the sincerity of any gentleman. I am bound absolutely to believe, and I do absolutely believe, that each believed what he said. If these seven pleas be true, if they be just, would they not have a terrible recoil upon ourselves? Are we, then, bound to admit that, after 700 years of the British connection with Ireland—after England, during the whole of that time, has occupied a dominant and Ireland such a subordinate position, after all the responsibilities of superiority resting upon us, the result of our treatment of Ireland is this—that we have brought her to a state in which she cannot undertake, without danger and ruin, the very responsibilities which in every other country have been found to be within the capacity of the people and to be fraught with the richest benefits to them. I do not envy those who feel that they have to sustain the force of the recoil. With regard to the pleas themselves, it is not necessary for me to discuss them. It would be contrary to my pledge. It would be quite unnecessary and quite intolerable. But I will venture to treat them within the compass of a single sentence. These pleas rest, like other pleas generally, on either assertion or denial—on the affirmative or on the negative. In that well-known work of Lady Mary Stuart Wortley Montagu she describes the growing prevalence of the spirit of scepticism in this country, and she says—

“The fashion now is to take the word ‘not’ out of the Commandments, and to put it into the Creed.”

This indictment will suit exactly the case of the seven pleas. Where the seven pleas deny, take the word “not” out; where the seven pleas affirm, put the word “not” in, and you will arrive at the sound and satisfactory conclusion. I close with a very few words. In my opinion, and I think it will be the general opinion of those who in different countries have examined the question, the history of Ireland has implanted an inveterate stain, by no means as yet fully washed out, upon the honour and the escutcheon of England. At any rate, I will put the case as between England and Ireland on this footing, which I think can hardly be disputed. The state of these relations, the estrangement of the vast majority from the present Constitution, the exaggerated, and, as I believe, injudicious, but still, as I am bound to admit, sincere, apprehensions for what are called the loyal minority—the whole facts of the case show that the state of these relations between England and Ireland, even taking it at the present day, when I joyfully admit that by good legislation from time to time much has been done by way of correction, reform, and real conciliation—yet still the condition of these relations is far from being to the honour either of the splendid political genius of England or of her warm and generous heart. There is a great necessity, and I know not in what quarter, except the quarter which we have endeavoured to probe, the materials for meeting it are to be found. We, Sir, repel those charges. We deny that the brand of incapacity has been laid by the Almighty on a particular and noted branch of our race, when every other branch of that race has displayed in the same subject-matter a capacity and has attained a success which is an example to the world. We deny that that brand has been placed on the Irish race. We have faith in rational liberty, and we have faith in its efficacy as an instrument of national education. We believe that experience, widespread over a vast field which has been traversed at every point, encourages us in our work; and, finally, we feel that the passing of this great measure through the House of Commons, after 80 and more days’ Debate, does, will, and must constitute the greatest among all the steps that have hitherto been achieved towards its certain attainment and its early triumph.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Government, in the course of a speech which well deserved the plaudits of the House, has revived some of the old controversies, and I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman into the details of those matters. I must deny the exactness of the inferences which the right hon. Gentleman drew from the case of foreign countries, the Colonies, and the United States, and the relevance of them to the question under discussion. There is not a single Member in the House who is not ready to allow that, in certain circumstances and in certain relations, the establishment of a federation of States might be the most convenient system of government. Nor will any one question the propriety of the Federal system in the United States; no one will question the propriety of the Federal Institutions of Switzerland; none are disposed to question the policy of setting up free Representative Institutions in our several Colonies; but each of those cases has to be judged on its merits with respect to the circumstances of the case, and the experience of all together furnish but little light on the problem what one should do with respect to Ireland. The situation as regards Sweden and Norway has no bearing whatever on the question, and the fact that the relations between the two Scandinavian Kingdoms has become one of extreme tension is no argument against Home Rule any more than it is an argument in favour of it. My right hon. Friend has revived again the question as to the opinion of the “civilised world” upon the problem before us. What I understood the right hon. Gentleman to have said and written on former occasions is very different from the proposition which he now puts forth. I understood the right hon. Gentleman in former times to have declared that the opinion of the civilised world was in favour of his policy of Home Rule. All that he now asserts is that the opinion of the civilised world views with disfavour the past conduct of England towards Ireland. Why, Sir, he need not go as far outside as the civilised world to discover that. I do not suppose there is a single Unionist who would not echo that declaration, and say—"I join in the opinion of the civilised world in that regard." It is impossible for any of us to view with approval the past conduct of England towards Ireland; but if that is all we can get from the opinion of the civilised world, what bearing has it upon the question whether the Home Rule Bill should become law? That is the practical question we have now to deal with, and if the opinion of the civilised world is worth anything it must be brought to bear on the problem. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford will, no doubt, take an early opportunity of vindicating the position he has taken up. I must say a word or two on the statement of the Prime Minister as to the attitude of Count Cavour. What was the conduct of Count Cavour with respect to the special question which agitated England and Ireland at the time he visited this country and visited Ireland—namely, the repeal of the Union? His article, which is a classic on the subject, is a long-sustained argument against the policy of the legislative separation of the two countries. It is no answer to say that Cavour was arguing against O'Connell and repeal, for his arguments were as applicable to a subordinate Parliament free from the intervention of this great Assembly as they were to the proposal formerly under discussion—the separation of the two Parliaments. Cavour was altogether opposed to the policy of the present Government, although the form of his opposition was directed against the repeal which was then advocated. My right hon. Friend cites the declaration of Cavour with respect to the conduct of Great Britain towards Canada as being conclusive. I am not aware of the context, but even as I heard it read it did not in the slightest degree appear to justify the conclusion drawn. Cavour only suggested that in dealing with Ireland the same tolerant, free spirit should be shown.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The words were these : "What they did for that distant colony they will do for Ireland."

MR. COURTNEY : Does my right hon. Friend mean to say that Cavour had in his mind the setting up of an autonomous Legislature in Ireland?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Clearly.

MR. COURTNEY : I contend that that is wholly against Cavour's argument. We need not, however, dwell upon what Cavour said in his article, though it is extremely pertinent. I invite my right hon. Friend to consider another fact. What did Count Cavour do in Italy? Cavour was invited to set up a Federal Monarchy. Strong pressure was put upon him to preserve the system of component States in Italy. An ardent Home Ruler who has now passed away from us, the late Professor Freeman, thought Cavour made a mistake in not giving Home Rule to Sicily. That was not the opinion of Cavour. Cavour's practical action was directed, in spite of the pressure of the French Emperor and of the apparent difficulty of the work which he undertook to the unification of Italy, the suppression of autonomous Legislatures, and the forbidding altogether of any suggestion of Provincial Assemblies. The unification of Italy was Cavour's work, and it stands out as an eminent illustration of what he really thought was the policy of dealing with States situated with respect to one another as the States of Italy were and as Ireland is in respect of Great Britain. He carried out in Italy precisely the policy he advocated in his celebrated article on the question of Ireland and Great Britain. The Prime Minister directed the greater part of his argument to the way in which the Bill was discussed in the House. That argument was an appeal to the country on the question of the way in which the Bill was debated and considered. I am quite ready to face that argument. In saying that no Bill had ever been so debated and dealt with before, my right hon. Friend was using the same fallacy as he used in respect of Home Rule. He was disregarding the particular circumstances of the Bill. I venture to say that if examined it will be found that no Bill has ever been submitted to this Assembly under circumstances similar to the present. I do not dwell merely on the complexity of the Bill. That is admitted by my right hon. Friend, and undoubtedly a Bill on this subject must be complex. But inasmuch as it is complex it necessarily provokes a great deal of criticism and a great deal of discussion; and where should discussion be initiated—whence should criticism come—but from the Opposition? To complain of the Opposition because they criticise is to complain of them for discharging what is their proper function. But in reference to this argument there is a more important matter than the complexity of the Bill. What is obstruction? The question has been often asked. I attempted to answer it a dozen years ago, and quite apart, therefore, from any relation to the circumstances of the hour. I take leave to repeat what I said then—that obstruction does not lie necessarily in the making of many speeches, in the moving of many Amendments, or in the occupying of much time. The essence of obstruction is the using of the Forms of the House in order to gratify your own self-will, or in opposition to things you dislike, without any larger aim and without any public motive. But I added that if the questions raised were those upon which it was necessary or justifiable to educate the electorate, then the Opposition was not only justified, but bound to use the opportunities of Debate in order to elucidate the issues so raised. I apply these principles to the Bill. The Bill is not only complex, full of new principles which require examination, and pregnant with issues which demand investigation; but it has been presented to the House with at least the doubtful sanction of national approval. You cannot claim that there is behind it the strong, clear power of the nation. A score of Members shifting from one side of the House to the other would ruin your majority. Not only is the majority small, and secured without reference to the details of the Bill, but it was obtained upon the presentment of several other issues which were ingeniously, perhaps necessarily, tied up and bound up with Home Rule; and it, therefore, cannot be trusted upon that issue alone. Under these circumstances, and with the certainty from the first that the Bill will not pass into law, it became the duty of the House to engage in discussion for the very purpose of elucidating the issues involved in the Bill, and of securing that if the question were again put before the constituencies they should know exactly what is the issue, and should, as far as possible, be enabled to vote upon the precise question submitted for their decision. We acknowledge the binding and conclusive authority of the nation when the national will is once ascertained and once declared. We might regret the decision, but when it has the form and substance of a deliberate judgment we bow before it. The Government have not that support behind them now; and the labours of the Opposition are directed in order to secure that at some time—we hope no very distant time—we will obtain the determination of the national will upon the question to be submitted to it. So far from thinking that we have spent too much time, or raised too many questions, on the Bill, I think we have not occupied enough time, or raised a sufficient number of questions. There are many questions which we could not raise—some because of the Forms of the House, others because of the process to which the Government allege they were driven—but which must be debated before any Home Rule Bill can become law. Reference has been made to the situation in 1831, when Lord Grey was passing his Reform Bill through the House. That Bill, no doubt, met with a strong Parliamentary opposition. But what was the temper of the nation in respect to it? It was impossible to hold a meeting against the Bill in any part of Great Britain. Wherever they went the opponents of the Bill were in a small minority, and were exposed to violence if they made any declaration of their opinions. There had been a national demand for the passing of that Bill which was felt within Parliament, and which necessarily operated on the length and course of its Debates. But now go to any part of Great Britain you please; go to the most populous centres, industrial or commercial, and you can hold a great meeting on behalf of the Bill. Next week you can hold an equally great meeting against it. Go to Liverpool; go to Manchester; go to Glasgow; go to Edinburgh—let a Leader of one Party go down, and he will be received by thousands; let a Leader of the opposite Party go down, and equal thousands will greet him. You have not, in the present instance, got anything like that national determination which would enable you to carry this Bill through under circumstances similar to those of 1831. I do not dwell on the fact that Great Britain by a majority has decided against Home Rule. But it is a fact, and Lord Brassey, a trusted friend of the Government, has declared that it is hopeless to try to settle this question unless you have a majority in Great Britain as well as in Ireland in your favour. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to cite an illustration of any Bill of the same far-reaching character, involving issues of the same degree, which has passed, or could pass, except under such conditions as those under which the present Bill has been making its way through the House. The Chief Secretary, addressing his constituents the other day, told them that the Constitution of the United States was drawn up and agreed to after five months had been spent upon it. I suppose that my right hon. Friend, like others, has a platform manner as well as a Parliamentary manner, and he says things on the platform which at all events will not instruct—will not edify—those who hear them. Does the right hon. Gentleman really think that the framing of the great Constitution of the United States is a parallel case? One thing at the back of the framers of the American Constitution was a sense of the imperative necessity of its being done. There is no such sense in the present case. The framers of the American Constitution sat in secret. The parallel to their conduct is not the action of the House of Commons, but the action of the Cabinet of Her Majesty. The action of the Cabinet Ministers in the framing of this Bill may be cited as a parallel to the action of the framers of the Constitution of the United States. There is no parallel whatever between the conditions of their action and the conditions of this branch of the Legislature receiving and discussing a scheme of Home Rule from the Advisers of the Crown. My right hon. Friend the head of the Government is very much disturbed at the length to which the Debates have run. Let me recommend to his attention something which is happening in a country with which he has a strong and lively sympathy. He once reproved one of the minor Members of his Government for casting a slur upon the position of the Kingdom of Belgium. It is not a very old Kingdom; it has lived for 60 years with great honour and respect; Parliamentary Institutions have taken up their abode in it; they are well developed and appear to be strong. What has happened there? Three years and more ago, after many years of debate outside, the Chambers agreed by a unanimous vote that a particular article dealing with the Parliamentary franchise and the constitution of the Chambers should be considered, revised, and amended. This happened in 1890; it was re-affirmed in 1891; and the work of that revision is still going on. It has been all these three years before the Belgian Chambers; and The Times of yesterday shows that the Senate is still discussing a particularly contentious point. There has been considerable excitement in Belgium, but at the same time the people have patiently awaited the progress of the discussion, in which the issue is really no more than the issue involved in that part of this Bill which is concerned with the constitution of the two Houses of the Irish Legislature. If they can spend three years in discussing these questions in Belgium, it would not be very much for Members to spend a whole Session in considering these three clauses alone.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): At that rate the Bill would take 20 years.

MR. COURTNEY: We have not spent one hour on the question of the constitution of the two Chambers, or the two branches of the Irish Legislature. We have spent a great deal of time, no doubt, and I am not here to declare that on every point that time has been wisely or judiciously appropriated. I do not think it is possible in any Parliament to exercise a rigid economy in the disposition of time; and it may be that the lesson to be derived from this attempt at legislation is that we may have considerable changes made in our procedure—not such as were adopted at second hand by the Government, but something which will secure the discussion of all the principles contained in a Bill, and possibly a more rapid review of the details branching out of them. But we have not spent an hour over the composition of the Irish Legislature. We discussed and voted that there should be an Irish Legislature, and that it should consist of two Chambers. The vote in favour of two Chambers was notoriously given by many Members with much hesitation, and it is conceivable that their action would be entirely changed by a discussion as to the composition of the two Chambers. But we never came to that discussion. Now conceive of such a course of procedure as this. You have brought in a Bill to establish a Legislature in Ireland; you determine that there shall be two Chambers; you leave the details to be filled in without discussion; and you call that Parliamentary government—you call it legislation by a deliberative Assembly. The Belgian people spend three years; we have not spent three minutes; and yet we are to pass this Bill as worthy to become law. I understood my right hon. Friend to say this was one of the subjects that had been debated in the country, entirely forgetful of the way this House had dealt with it.

Mr. Courtney

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said that what had been determined was the constitution of a Legislature with two Chambers. I never said that the constitution of each Chamber had been debated.

MR. COURTNEY: But on this, which is treated as a small question, many people believe the whole aspect of Home Rule depends. To-day I met a Home Ruler in the Lobby who said—"The whole thing depends upon the way you compose the Lower House in Ireland. If you make that a fitting House, you may then trust the Legislature to act justly and wisely, and you may hand over the fortunes of Ireland to it." The whole matter depends on the decision of the House on what my right hon. Friend considers a small matter. I think anyone who reads the Prime Minister's speech will infer that the actual constitution of the two Chambers has been examined and determined, whereas there has been no examination of their composition. One of the followers of Her Majesty's Government, who has so far supported them unflinchingly, declared in Debate that his vote on the Third Reading would depend upon the nature of the Lower House. I am not speaking of the hon. Member for Newington (Mr. Saunders), who said he would not vote for a Bill with a Second Chamber in it; I am speaking of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Little), who said his action upon the Third Reading would depend entirely upon the question whether there was any provision for the representation of minorities in the Lower Chamber. And this is a matter which my right hon. Friend considers a matter of minor importance. I might name half-a-dozen other subjects which were not examined, and could not be examined, under the scheme of Closure adopted by Her Majesty's Government. We really have had no examination of the question in what respect, if at all, Irish Members should sit in this House. It was disposed of very rapidly after a complete change of front on the part of the Government, and the main discussion of the question occurred in two speeches of my right hon. Friend, one made in bringing in the Bill and the other in abandoning the original clause. But a question which vitally affects Great Britain, supposing Home Rule to be set up, was not seriously examined in this House. A good deal has been said about it at different times; there has been a good deal of assertion on the part of my right hon. Friend which I should like to examine briefly. He seems to have declared that the Liberal Party was strongly, and the Liberal Unionists were still more strongly, in favour of the inclusion of the Irish Members. The Chancellor of the Exchequer devoted a great deal of time to the examination of the question how far one eminent Liberal Unionist was committed to the retention of the Irish Members. As a body, the Liberal Unionists never committed themselves to any declaration on the point. The late Mr. Bright, who was an eminent Member of our Party, said of the Bill of 1886 that the one thing in it of which he approved was the exclusion of the Irish Members. Lord Hartington never committed himself any further than this—that their exclusion was a demonstration of the degree of separation which was involved in the Bill then before Parliament; but he never committed himself to any declaration as to whether he would have included them supposing it was necessary to pass a Home Rule Bill. I can speak on behalf of many of my friends and myself. Speaking of the subject in the country, I have declared that, if ever Home Rule became law, the exclusion of the Irish Members would be a necessary consequence. On the part of Liberal Members I crave some recognition, some little consideration of these facts. Let us consider the situation when the Home Rule Bill of 1886 was introduced. It excluded the Irish Members. The Bill itself was a staggerer, we know, to the Liberal Party, and in their dislike to it they naturally seized upon the thing open to the strongest criticism. But let us look fondly at the matter, and ask ourselves this. Suppose that the Bill of 1886 had been brought in with the inclusion of the Irish Members, would there not be very much the same severe criticism to the inclusion as there was to the exclusion; and was it not, in fact, simply an expression on the part of Liberal Members who objected to exclusion that they were not ready for the Bill at all? The inclusion or exclusion was seized upon—the point which was most open to objection, most damaging, and which would most completely get rid of the Bill. If we are to consider the matter in a practical way as to what will follow when Home Rule becomes law, we must approach the question with an open mind; and I venture to say it would demand a much larger consideration and minuter examination to be given to it, and that it will be found that the majority of this House are decidedly in favour of exclusion. Even if it be true that the majority of the Liberal Members are deliberately in favour of the retention of the Irish Members, the majority of the Liberal Members are not necessarily the majority of the House, and do not necessarily reflect the opinion of the majority of the country, and they must give way to what is demanded by the majority of the House. This is another point which cannot be said to have been exhaustively examined; in fact, the view I have presented to the House was never presented before at all, and it seems to me to require some consideration and examination before the matter can be considered exhaustively. I might go to the matter of finance, of which, no doubt, we have had several versions, but of which certainly we had no final or complete examination. In finance, as in respect of the retention of the Irish Members, we have had illustrations rather of the uncertainty of the handling of the matter on the part of the Government, and I think we have come, at the end, to the solution in this case as in that, worst of all. I can conceive of an arrangement of finance as between a supreme and a subordinate Parliament under which the subordinate Assembly would have authority over particular taxes local in their nature, and which would not interfere with trade relations between the two countries, which would furnish the subordinate authority with a Revenue which it might economise, dispose of, reduce, or extend, and over which it would have a free hand. That is a reasonable form of solution, suppose it were necessary. I can conceive, again, of a situation in which a fixed amount of money should be paid by the subordinate to the supreme authority, which could be revised from time to time by the united Parliament or by delegates representing the two authorities, but which for each period would be unchanged. Again, you leave the financial conduct in the subordinate Parliament. But in the settlement you have adopted you have not given freedom to Ireland or the United Kingdom. You have tied the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; you have given no motive of economy to Ireland whatever. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes any alteration, he is bound to take into consideration what effect this will have upon the third which is allotted to him in respect of Irish charges. Both will be hampered, neither will be free. You have settled on a scheme without adequate debate, and you have presented hurriedly this third plan of dealing with the question, which contains within it the maximum of inconvenience with the minimum of convenience. I might refer to one other matter on which there was no discussion at all, although it is of the highest importance in respect to the settlement of this question. You are retaining to the Imperial Parliament certain authority and certain jurisdiction within Ireland itself. You propose to secure the maintenance of that authority and that jurisdiction by setting up certain Exchequer Judges, who shall be your agents to enforce the supremacy of Parliament within Ireland; but by what machinery? How are they to exercise their power? We never had a word of discussion about this; and yet upon the framing of the machinery which the Exchequer Judges will use, upon the giving to them of power to exercise their authority, the whole of their authority must depend. It is in vain to talk of supremacy to be exercised through these Judges, unless these Judges are somehow endowed with the power and machinery to enforce their decrees. You never considered the mode in which these gentlemen should be appointed; you never considered the security they were to have for their authority; you never considered in any way in what fashion they would be able to enforce obedience to their decrees. I pass on to that which is surely the most vital question of all—the question of the land. Did we have any debate whatever in respect of the land in Ireland? We had, for above an hour, some discussion on the question whether the subordinate Commissioners of the Land Commission should or should not be appointed from Westminster instead of Dublin; but as to discussion on the Land Question of Ireland as a whole we had none. And yet the Bill contains the extraordinary clause that for three years the Irish Parliament shall be debarred from dealing with the Land Question. I will recall in this connection the words used by an eminent Member of the present Government. Some two years ago the Home Secretary, speaking at Manchester, uttered some words of wisdom on this point; and here I may observe that it is not by design, but a happy circumstance apparently, that the most formidable critics of the Bill, those who showed by their declarations beforehand how much they understood the character of the problem, have almost all been absorbed in the ranks of the Government, so that they have been debarred from uttering that criticism which would have been so valuable, and from which the House would have derived so much assistance. What did the Home Secretary say two years ago at Manchester? Why, he implored the Leaders of the Liberal Party to do then what would have saved an infinite amount of trouble in the next

Parliament, to give at least the outlines of their scheme—

“Because,” he said, “if you do not do so you will be told that the country has not voted upon your scheme, and that the scheme must be sent back to the country.”

He went on to say—

“It would be absurd for any Home Ruler to think of setting up a Parliament in Ireland, and to deny the amplest power over the Land Question.”

The Home Secretary is now a party to what he then denounced as absurd—at all events for a period of three years. For three years the Irish Parliament are not to interfere with this Land Question. Again, that is a reason for refusing to accept a Bill which for three years exposes it to the condemnation which the Home Secretary pronounced beforehand, and which also leads us to conclusions which have never been considered and discussed by the country at large. I will not go through the many other points which might be examined, as many other persons will have to take part in this discussion. But there are half-a-dozen matters of importance in respect of the Bill which have never been discussed at all. It is sufficient for me now to say that this Bill is, in my judgment, ill-conceived; and it has been worse developed. It is wholly wanting in certain organs which are necessary to carry out the scope of its action, if it ever becomes a vital law. Other parts in it are rudimentary and cannot be trusted, and the Bill, as a whole, is in that position that it is impossible it could pass. It is lop-sided; it is amorphous; it is undeserving of, and does not receive from anyone, respect. There is no Legislature with any self-respect which could pass this Bill. I will go further and say this. If this House suddenly found itself vested with full powers to make the Bill as it stood the law, this House would reconsider its position and withhold this Bill from its last stages. You go through the form of passing it; you give it sanction in order that it may meet its fate elsewhere; but if you had the power in your own hands, if you, by your fiat, could make this Bill law you would not do it. You would be suddenly sobered by the sight of it. You would see that there are things to be supplied which must be supplied. This must, of course, be known to Her Majesty's Ministers even more than to their followers. They are perfectly conscious of this. This Bill is described as a workable Bill. It is an extraordinary phrase. The Bill could not be worked. The Bill requires improvements, amplification, reconsideration, and much alteration, before it could ever hope to be launched into law. It is going already from here, and it will meet, no doubt, its fate elsewhere—a fate which few will regret, and which will, on the whole, be considered well-deserved. Already Ministers are groping about to see if they can discover some method of dealing with this question hereafter. I think it is well worthy of consideration how it can be dealt with hereafter, because it certainly will not be disposed of now. I think I may be permitted in passing to say, with reference to the suggestion which the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. W. Dilke) has recently made, that, whatever may be said in its favour under apt circumstances, that suggestion could not be entertained here. The suggestion is that if a Bill has been deliberately considered and finally settled, and once passed by either branch of the Legislature, it should then become law, or that the branch of the Legislature from which it has passed might provide by a Resolution that the Bill should be again taken up in exactly the same stage as it was when it last left them. A good deal may be said for that proposition under apt circumstances. It is, in fact, nothing more than a suggestion for suspension and resumption which has been made by many persons charged with the responsibility of Government. The suggestion for suspending a Bill and resuming it at the stage at which it was left off has been made by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear! ]—and met with strong opposition from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But in respect of this Bill the suggestion is inapplicable, because the first condition is wanting. It is only applicable when the House which seeks to revive the Bill has deliberately considered it, has gone through all its details, and has given a considered and final judgment upon it. But a Bill which has been passed through the House by preventing two-thirds of its details from being considered at all—a Bill of that character does not come in any degree within the scope of the suggestion, and that, at all events, must be set aside in respect of this Bill. But, Sir, we need not consider at present how this matter is to be dealt with hereafter. It is enough now to know that the Bill is moving to its doom. The Bill is moving at present to its doom, and I observe already that some thoughtless, some reckless persons are disposed to raise a cry against the other House on the supposition that the other House will refuse to pass the Bill. I believe no person with any sense of responsibility, no person who believes at all in popular sovereignty, who understands or recognises what is meant by the expression “the will of the nation,” will for one moment seek to quarrel with the House of Lords if they refuse to approve the Bill. If, indeed, the Lords reject this Bill simply from wilfulness or wantonness, because it is personally repugnant to them, no one would condemn their action more loudly than I should. Further, if they refused to accept the Bill on a deliberate examination of the whole subject, for the reason and conviction that it would work mischief to Ireland and to England, much as I should respect such a decision, I should not be able to accept it as a final dealing with the matter. But at the present time, in relation to present circumstances, I look beyond the Peers to the people. [Cheers.] I am glad to think there are others who agree with me in that respect. We want to go to the people. We demand the national judgment. We are ready to go to the people. They are the judges—they must decide. Let them at least know the arguments; let them at least know what the issues are on which they are to pronounce. Yes; we will go to the people; let it be an understanding people and we do not shrink. But the people at the last Election had not before them this Bill. They did not know what was involved in the plan. The people at the last Election were not furnished with the means of judgment such as they now possessed; and, furnished as they were, they gave that halting and uncertain verdict, which I ventured to describe immediately after it was delivered as being nothing more than a determination to give my right hon. Friend “another chance.” He has had his chance; he has presented his Bill. That Bill has been exposed, not fully, because the opportunity of full examination has not been given. [Ironical laughter.] I have cited parts of the Bill which have never been examined at all. You cannot get rid of a hard fact like that by laughter. We are ready to go to the people on the issue now debated and now understood. Let them decide between the two alternative policies. There is the policy of interfusing the people of the two countries; of bringing us nearer to one another; the policy of effacing, except for historical, and retrospective, and sentimental purposes, all distinction between Irishmen and Englishmen. That is the policy which great men adopted in past years. It was the policy which the genius of Cromwell—not a friendly name in Ireland—first conceived. It was the policy which the great men of the 18th century longed for, which Pitt consummated, and which for 60 years at least, from 1832 down to the present, has been steadily developing in better government for Ireland, and in drawing nearer to each other the people of the two countries. That is one policy. On the other hand, if you realise what is meant by this Home Rule; if you realise that what you call “liberty” is the domination of a class, that what you call “peace” is warfare, that what you call “order” is the breaking out of discord, that instead of the unity of the nation being established you are tearing asunder social and international bonds; if they realise the contrast between the two policies which all statesmen of any authority down to 1885, including my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government himself—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no! Read my speech on the Address in February, 1882, where I said I was favourable to the principle of Home Rule provided that means were adopted for maintaining the supremacy of Parliament.

MR. COURTNEY: I will qualify my statement with respect to my right hon. Friend by saying that all except him had approved, and which he himself had been understood to approve. [MR. GLADSTONE: No, no!] I remember well the speech of my right hon. Friend at Aberdeen. [MR. GLADSTONE: In 1871?] No; later than that—a much later one than that—it might have been in Edinburgh. I remember, however, the speech very well, in which the whole audience rose when my right hon. Friend made a declaration which they believed to be adverse to Home Rule. The language used, when carefully examined, did not bear out the interpretation which the whole audience put upon it. Let, then, the two policies be set aside in their entirety and fulness, in all their meaning. Let them be set before the people. Let their judgment be ascertained, not as a passing fancy, but as a deliberate and well-understood and well-conceived resolution. Whatever the consequence may be, I at least—and I believe I speak for my friends—would not shrink from it, although it might not be what we desired. We have confidence that if the issue is honestly presented, the issue between the unity and this partial separation of the two Islands, the principle of unity will prevail, because the nation will see in it a finer ideal, a grander future, to wash away all traces of the dismal past, and so make us, indeed, a united nation, breathing one spirit and working through one Legislature to a common end. I beg to move that the Bill be read a third time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange) said, he felt that he owed an apology to the House for continuing a Debate upon a subject which undoubtedly now must inevitably be one of weariness to the majority of Members. Indeed, one felt that one ought to be gifted with the wit of the hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. R. Wallace)—and then it was necessary to speak against one's own Party in order to get it fully appreciated—or to leave the discussion to those wise and eminent persons whose speeches were interesting on all subjects ex officio. But he had two pleas in extenuation. One was that until the present time he had not spoken in any of the Debates on the Bill, and the other was that he was a Home Ruler of somewhat longer standing than some of his friends, and, consequently, felt a very profound interest in the fate of the measure. He would like to make one reference to the discussion as to the opinion and policy of Count Cavour. The right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) told the House that although the passage cited by the Prime Minister undoubtedly was an expression of the opinion that the self-government which was given to Canada would prove effective for the peace of Ireland, still he was to be judged by his actions and not by his words, and that his own policy, when confronted with a similar difficulty, was in favour of unification, and not in favour of the autonomy of the several States with which he had to deal. The right hon. Gentleman said that considerable pressure was put upon Cavour to induce him to preserve the autonomy of the States; but he did not tell them—and it was the most important part of the question—what was the opinion of the people of those States upon the question? Did the right hon. Gentleman wish them to believe that Count Cavour insisted on the unification of Italy against the wishes of the Italian people, and of the citizens of the autonomous States? There could, he thought, be no difference of opinion on that point, and that what Cavour was doing in that instance was exactly what the Prime Minister was doing now—namely, giving effect to the wishes of the people themselves as to the form of the Government under which they should live. With regard to the Bill itself, it had been subjected to severe criticism. He was prepared to admit that it had been, to some extent, subjected to damaging criticism. But the first consideration that occurred to one on the point was—Was any paper Constitution conceivable which could not be subjected to damaging criticism in the House? He thought not. Suppose, to take an example, the British Constitution were put in the form of a Bill and introduced by the Prime Minister. Imagine the torrents of invective and ridicule which would be poured upon it by the right hon. Members for East Manchester and West Birmingham. The British Constitution could not stand such criticism unscathed; and yet the British Constitution marched—he was going to say worked, but the right hon. Member for Bodmin disapproved of the application of the word “workable.” Or take the boasted Constitution of America; was not the measure of success which undoubtedly attended it due a great deal more to the genius of the people and the social conditions resulting from the undeveloped resources of the country than to any extraordinary or superhuman ability on the part of its framers? The truth was that any reasonable scheme would effect its purpose if those to whom it was entrusted were honestly desirous that it should; while, on the other hand, he was convinced that if the Angel Gabriel himself were to design and draft a Bill for the self-government of Ireland, it would be a most unsuccessful measure unless the citizens both of England and Ireland were determined to make the best of it, and turn it to the purpose for which it was intended. At to the attitude that should be taken on the Third Reading by supporters of the Government, they could not possibly have a Bill which would suit the precise taste of every supporter of the Government, to say nothing of the Opposition; and it seemed to him a very extraordinary position for a man to take up who was convinced of the soundness of the principle of Home Rule for Ireland to go off on this point or on that of minor importance, and refuse to support the Government, because in every particular the Bill did not carry out his wishes in the way in which he would most like to see them carried out. It seemed to him that the main question was whether this was a workable measure of Home Rule or not? If it was a workable measure of Home Rule, then he thought every sincere Home Ruler was bound to vote for it; if it was not, it would be of no good either to England or Ireland, and they ought to vote against it. He was willing to confess that in one regard he should very gladly have seen the Bill other than it was. He alluded to the 9th clause. He did not conceal the opinion he had always held that, however strong the theoretical arguments against it might be—and he admitted that they were of very great strength—the compact that was entered into in 1886 for the exclusion of the Irish Members was one which in practice would have been found to be beneficial both to the English and to the Irish people. But there was this to be said—that undoubtedly before the General Election of 1892 the present Prime Minister distinctly declared that any measure of Home Rule that he introduced would contain a provision for the inclusion of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament; and, therefore, whatever his private opinions might be, he could not possibly, after seeking the suffrages of his constituents upon the footing of the Prime Minister's policy, vote against the Third Reading, or any part of the Bill, because it contained a clause for the inclusion of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament. From his point of view, the actual details of the Bill, though, no doubt, not unimportant, were not of paramount importance. The real question was whether they had or had not got a scheme of self-government which would enable the Representatives of Ireland in their own country to deal satisfactorily with their own affairs. His contention was that, with the present Bill, they had such a scheme. The right hon. Member for Bodmin, in his argument, resorted to one of those assertions which had been so very widely spread and frequently used in the Debate on the Bill—namely, that the supporters of the Government relied in their support of the Bill upon the knowledge that the House of Lords would reject it, and that if they were put in the position of being able to make the Bill law to-morrow they would shrink from doing it, and would go back from their word. That kind of assertion could only be met by an assertion to the contrary. From what he knew of his own opinion, and of the opinion of his friends, he could say that, so far from the right hon. Gentleman's statement being correct, no political gift that could be offered to them at the present moment would be so highly prized as the right to make this Bill law, and proceed at once to the transaction of English business. He fully admitted the responsibility which they owed to the minority in Ireland, to see that they were not subjected to tyranny and misgovernment, which they must suppose that minority seriously feared. What he said was that their true and only possible protection depended upon the power of Great Britain and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and that by no possibility could they make the position of the minority secure, although they inserted hundreds or even thousands of limitations upon the action of the Irish Parliament. Whatever powers they gave to the Irish Parliament must be powers which, if that Parliament was maliciously inclined, it would be able to turn to the detriment of the minority in Ireland. The only protection worth talking about which the minority in Ireland could have was the protection afforded by the perfectly well-known fact—well-known in Ireland as well as in England—that if the Irish Parliament were to attempt to abuse their powers to a degree, however small, in proportion to the degree which it had been suggested they would abuse them, these powers would be taken away from them, and their last chance of Home Rule would be absolutely gone. That was the real protection which the minority in Ireland had got, and it was the only protection they could have, and he believed it to be an ample and sufficient protection. It had been said by the Leader of the Opposition and others that the followers of the Government would find it difficult to justify their support of the 9th clause before their constituents. He took quite another view. The first matter to consider, when they were dealing with the question of whether the Bill was or was not worth having, was what was the condition of affairs which the Bill was intended to replace. There he at once joined issue with the right hon. Member for Bodmin, when he declared that, in his opinion, there was no imperative necessity for the Bill. That seemed to him the fallacy which underlay all the arguments of the Opposition. They had always spoken of the matter as though some kind of ideal relation existed between the countries of England and Ireland, and as if the Liberal Party were constantly interfering with a state of things which was acting admirably. His view of the matter was exactly the opposite. The condition to which that House had been reduced before the introduction of the Home Rule Bill in 1886 was one which, in the interests of this country, was utterly intolerable, and which held out every threat of getting worse. There was then among them a substantial minority who came from Ireland with a fixed determination to prevent the transaction of Public Business as long as their claims were disregarded. Hitherto he would have referred to their conduct as obstruction; but accepting the definition of the right hon. Member for Bodmin it was not obstruction at all, for according to that definition no course could rightly be termed obstruction that was resorted to for public purposes. According to the right hon. Gentleman, for a public purpose one might abuse every form of the House with a view to prevent the transaction of business.

MR. COURTNEY: I did not say that.

MR. NEVILLE said, he had carefully noted what the right hon. Gentleman had said, and he had certainly understood him to exclude from the category of obstruction tactics which were resorted to in furtherance of a public object. But by whatever name the state of things that prevailed before 1886 might be called, it was a formidable state of things that had to be dealt with. They had resorted to a number of expedients in order to meet that state of things. Everyone should admit that these measures had been ineffectual in securing the satisfactory transaction of the Business of the House. It was only natural that that should be so. Representative Institutions were never intended and could not be directed to the government of the discontented. Where there was a substantial minority who were dissatisfied with the method of Government the representative system must inevitably break down, and there must be a paralysis of the legislative power. The question, therefore, which the House had to consider was whether this Bill would afford any amelioration of the difficulties which had undoubtedly existed? He held that it would. In the first place, the representation of Ireland in that House would be substantially reduced, and from this a direct advantage would accrue to British electors, for it was only right that they should have what they had not had up to the present time—namely, their fair proportion of representation in the House of Commons. But indirect advantages would be gained which would prove to be so great as to be a solution of the difficulty he had referred to, and which would restore to the House of Commons the power of transacting its business in an efficient way. Under the new system the Irish Members would have something to lose, and they would act in such a way as to make sure that they would not lose it. Irish Members and Irish electors were spoken of in such a way that one almost doubted whether hon. Members thought they were capable of seeing their own interests. His opinion of Irish Members had been largely increased by the manner in which they had acted during the discussions on this Bill. They had shown the greatest self-control in the manner in which they had listened to the Debates. He confessed that if he had heard the English nation and British Members spoken of in the House as Irish Members and the Irish nation had referred to, he would have found it hard to display the same self-control which had been displayed by the Irish Members. It was contended, of course, on the opposite side that Irish Members were shrewd enough to see that it was their self-interest to act in the way they had done while the Bill was under discussion. That was what he relied on for the future success of this Bill. Their own interests would dictate to them such a course of action as would secure the continuance of the benefits which they would derive under this Bill, and lead to the removal of those restrictions with which it had been thought necessary to hamper their new powers for the present. A course of intrigue on their part, impeding the progress of English Business, would be the greatest error they could commit. The Irish Members knew that the patience of the English people, though large, was not inexhaustible; and no country had ever yet tried that patience beyond endurance without being very sorry for it afterwards. It had been said that if this Bill were passed the Irish Members would become Delegates, and cease to be Representatives; but in what sense in which they were not Delegates now would they be Delegates then? With regard to their co-operation in English legislation, they would be in precisely the same position as they now occupied. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham had said that under the new system the British portion of the House of Commons would have no power of retaliation. The policy of retaliation might be very dear to the heart of the right hon. Gentleman. But he would ask him in what way this alleged power of retaliation had been effective to deal with the difficulties which the House had encountered in the past. Could one instance be pointed out in which the power of retaliation had been effective in mitigating the opposition of the Irish Representatives in the House of Commons? This weapon, if serviceable at all, had been kept in its scabbard until now, and was only hunted out from the armoury to show the injury that would be done to British interests under the Bill. The right hon. Member for Bodmin spoke of an alternative, and, in his peroration, referred to some ideal Union with Ireland. But no alternative to the present scheme had ever been offered to the country. Therefore, they had to choose between this scheme and leaving things as they were, or, rather, in a worse position than they were, inasmuch as the agitation of the past 12 months would absolutely increase the demand for Home Rule in Ireland. In 1886, and even later, the proposed alternative to Home Rule was 20 years of resolute government—in a word, coercion. But that was no alternative, though he was quite prepared to admit that superficial order was, to a large extent, maintained under that system. A Government by police was, however, a very hateful, though, he admitted, a possible form of Government, as was proved in Russia. But coercion in Ireland could not possibly be supposed to improve the condition of affairs in that House. Was it likely to cure disaffection? Would the Representatives of Ireland be less vigorous under it? So far from affording any possibility for improving the Parliamentary position of things, it would inevitably result in an increased strain when dealing with our own business. He submitted to the House that he had shown that great advantages were likely to result from the passing of this measure, and that, if the House were to refuse to pass it, nobody had anything to offer them in its place. He believed that the House would pass it with an undiminished majority, for he could not conceive any true Liberal who believed in the efficacy of Home Rule, but who, because he disagreed with this or that particular clause or provision in the Bill, should think it right to vote against the measure as a whole. What would be the effect of such a course if it were followed by each individual Member, or by any substantial number of hon. Members? They would be throwing away the labours of the last seven years; they would be committing the country to a long period of Tory Government, and, if he might use the expression, Pinchbeck reform. Therefore, no true Liberal should withhold from giving his vote in favour of the Third Reading of the Bill. They had been told that neither the country nor the House had had time for the discussion of the measure, and they were referred to the example of Belgium. If the Belgians liked to spend three years in discussing a portion of their Constitution, let them do so; but he was quite sure that such a course would not suit the people of this country. After seven years' discussion, which the principle of Home Rule had received in the country, and after the discussions upon the present Bill in this House, he was sure that if the Liberal Party failed at all in obtaining the suffrages of the people of this country, it would not be on the ground that this matter had not received sufficient consideration both in the country and in the House.

*MR. CONINGSBY DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) said, that as the last speaker had stated that he was converted to Home Rule by the former obstruction of the Irish Members, he certainly ought to be brought to give his vote against the present Bill through the obstruction of a far more numerous minority, which had been so frequently charged against the Members of the Opposition.

MR. NEVILLE: I did not know that the Opposition admitted obstruction.

*MR. CONINGSBY DISRAELI replied that they did not, and that was all to the point. The Government motto had seemed to be for the last seven months, not carpe diem, but carpe dies. He desired to look at the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to his constituents, because it was a very good keynote of what the speeches would be in the different constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman had a very admirable platform manner. He spoke from experience, because he had the opportunity of hearing a speech from the right hon. Gentleman in his own Division at the last Election; and, therefore, he could say that his speech on Saturday must have been very pleasing to the people of Newcastle. The right hon. Gentleman told them the number of lines passed in the Bill, the number of hours that were taken, and the number of Amendments that were put down; but he did not tell them the number of times that the Government could not answer questions put to them. He did not tell them how thoroughly changed the Bill was since its introduction, nor how time after time the House adjourned with a great part of the Bill left unintelligible to Members like himself. He would compare this precious measure to Galatea. It was brought into the House a living—a “workable”—model; but when they desired to inquire into the character and past history of it the curtain was drawn. He was certain that this Galatea would now be judged by the Peers, not as something workable, but as “a woman of no importance.” The Chief Secretary spoke at Newcastle of the necessity for this Bill, and drew a parallel between the present position and Washington and his elders drawing up the Constitution of America. The parallel was not a good one. Washington and his elders were confronted with an imperative necessity which they were compelled to meet with promptitude, and which was wished for by a great nation. But what was the necessity in the present case? What necessity was there for Home Rule to be passed into law this year or next year, or the year after that, or even for 20 years to come. If the Prime Minister had been true to his former life, he would have thought it necessary to have a true discussion of the provisions of the Bill, and then to let it be judged on its merits. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had spoken about the “aspirations of a nation.” What change, however, had there been in the condition of affairs since 1885? The case for Home Rule was the same, and the Irish Leaders, with one notable exception, were the same; nothing had altered, and nothing had been dropped by the Irish National Party. Their demand was for a full and satisfactory measure of Home Rule, but it was admitted even by the Nationalists themselves that this was not a full and satisfactory measure, and would only be accepted as the stepping-stone to the complete achievement of their objects.

Mr. Coningsby Disraeli

And they were to pass this Bill in order, to quote Mr. Butt, “to construct fantastic baby houses, or to frame political toys. It was in vain to expect that the English people would consent to pull the fabric of Government to pieces for the sake of giving us Home Rule.” That was the opinion of the father of Home Rule, but was that the opinion of the Irish Nationalist Party at the present moment? It was said that the Bill was perfectly safe, and that the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would not vote for it unless it were safe. Yet, as soon as Members began to investigate the safeguards with which it was said to bristle, the supporters of the Government remained silent, and the discussion usually ended in the Closure. This treatment of those who were anxious to grasp the supposed safeguards, and to find out what they really meant, reminded him of the dinner party in Alice in Wonderland. What had been the policy of the Government respecting the retention of the Irish Members? It had been a policy of change and vacillation all through. First the Irish Members were in; then they were out, then they were in again, and then they were out again, and now they were in once more. It was a policy of drifting, with Age at the prow, and 80 Irish Members at the helm. They were to have in the Imperial Parliament 80 Irish Members, who must always be a very strong force for any Government to contend against, and who would vote on questions in which they had absolutely no interest. Those Irish Members were to vote on English questions. They were to vote for the schooling of English children, whilst English Members were to have nothing to say respecting the schooling of their children, and they were to vote on taxes which they were not to pay. The Government talked of “finality.” What finality could there be when 80 Irish Members were left in the House with their Nationalist aspirations unsatisfied? Did the Government think these 80 Members were going to rest quietly in their seats when they had their duty as Representatives of a great “Nation” to perform? No; the result would be that Ireland would always have a strong and a determining voice in the Constitution of this country, and in the constitution of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, speaking at Manchester in 1886, said—

“I will not be a party to a Legislative Body to manage Irish concerns, and at the same time to having Irish Members in London acting and voting on English and Scotch questions.”

How must that statement have been cheered by the Liberals of Manchester, who liked strong things! Now he wondered, however, what they would think of the position. “Never,” said the right hon. Gentleman, throwing his cloak around him; and the Opposition said, “Hardly ever.” Then there was the question of finance. Not only were the Irish Members to remain in the House of Commons, but Great Britain was to pay very dearly for the not very great benefit of having them there. Under the Government scheme Ireland would pay over £500,000 less than at present, and over £1,500,000 less than she ought to pay, according to her taxable capacity. On the admission of the Government itself, the British taxpayers stood to lose at the outset over £500,000 as the price of setting up Home Rule. Not only was Great Britain to have the benefit of Irish Members interfering in the Councils and deliberations of Parliament, but she was to pay out of her pocket money to enable the Irish people to set up their own establishment, and yet be allowed to remain at Westminster. If the Irish people had anything to lose, were they going to lose anything at all for their loyalty to the principle of Home Rule? No; it was the British nation who had been betrayed on these questions, and it was the vital interests of Great Britain that were to be destroyed by this measure. The more they had been allowed to discuss the Bill the more the difficulties and the dangers of it had been brought to light, and to avoid further exposures the Government had resorted to an extraordinary expedient for the purpose of passing the Bill. The Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), and the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce)—that extraordinary triumvirate of Prime Minister, philosopher, and professor; that trinity of disunity—were responsible for the imposition of the Closure. Fortunately, the reign of the gag was brief. It did not go beyond those walls. The Government could not gag the “man in the street”; they could not close public opinion; they could not guillotine hon. Members when they addressed their constituents, and the constituents of the Government and their supporters. The Government had drunk deep of this cup of unconstitutional practice. Hon. Members would remember Balzac’s story of the Peau de Chagrin, the hero of which became possessed of a magical wild ass’s skin, which yielded him the means of gratifying every wish; but on every occasion on which he indulged in undue licence the skin shrank, and his life became less and less. On the same principle, Her Majesty’s Government had indulged in weekly bouts of unconstitutional debauchery, and their skin of life was shrinking more and more. Hon. Members opposite were never tired in defending the action of the Government with regard to the gag, and referring to the precedent of 1887, but they might as well compare Magna Charta with the present Home Secretary’s Pistols Bill, as the present occasion to that of 1887. It was no precedent at all, but the Government had by their action set an example by which any future Government, no matter how constructed, no matter what their majority, no matter how small, or how big, or how obtained, would be able to pass any measure, however feeble, through the House of Commons. That was the legacy, and the only legacy, which this Government would leave behind it. It was said that Home Rule was not separation. If not, what was it? As a matter of fact, it was worse than separation. Great Britain was cut off, and Ireland was not. The Irish Members would be able to take part in all British discussions and to enter into all British affairs, whilst British Members were to have nothing to do with the two Chambers in Dublin. This Bill had been thoroughly exposed. It had been born in deceit, nurtured in evasion, swaddled with the gag, and thrust upon the people’s Parliament unsanctioned by the people. He would read an extract, part of which, no doubt, was very stale, from a speech made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt). The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Liberals must not be in a hurry to turn the Tories out. He would let them for a few months stew in their own Parnellite juice, and when they stank in the nostrils of the country, as they would stink, then the country would fling them discredited and disgraced to the constituencies, and the nation would pronounce its final judgment upon them."

He would say to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he were in the House—"Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," but Cæsar was not there. He would, therefore, "preaching another man's sermon," only say that when the present Government stank, as they would stink, in the nostrils of the country the country would fling them discredited and disgraced to the constituencies and the nation would pronounce its final judgment upon them. That would be the end of this miserable travesty of legislation.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): In offering to the hon. Member who has just sat down my congratulations on the interesting occasion of his maiden speech in the House, I may say I am sure he will acquit me of any discourtesy to him if I do not follow all the arguments he has used. I desire to occupy the time of the House for the briefest possible space, and therefore I will come to what I wish to say at once. I am glad that the frequent opportunities which have been accorded to me by the indulgence of hon. Members, of expressing my opinion both on the principle and the details of this measure, render it unnecessary for me on this occasion to occupy more than a very few moments indeed. I do not intend on this occasion to discuss the principle of the Bill or to criticise its details. In my opinion, the long time which has been spent in Committee has been well spent. The discussion, though it has been no doubt often marred by trivialities, by rancour on the part of a few and by a want of bona fides on the part of a great many, has still, on the whole, been a worthy discussion, and has thrown much light on a most difficult and complicated problem. We have, however, now arrived at the end of that discussion, and for the first time are entitled to look on this measure as a whole. So looking at it, I have no hesitation whatever in repeating the few words I used in this House on the very night, I believe, in which the measure was introduced and which to-day, as they did then, exactly express my opinion on the merits of the Bill. I said then—

"In my opinion, this Bill is defective in some very grave and important matters. In some other matters it is gravely disappointing, and in the financial aspect it is not only ungenerous, but absolutely unjust."

I went on to say that, in my opinion, it would be the duty of Irish Nationalists to endeavour so to mould the Bill in Committee that it might become the settlement of the Irish Nationalist Question. Since I spoke those words the Bill has gone through the ordeal of Committee. We have endeavoured, using such opportunities as were afforded to us, so to mould the Bill that it would satisfy what we considered to be the necessary conditions of a reasonable settlement of the question. I regret now, at the end of all this discussion, to think that every single effort of ours in that direction failed. Those portions of the Bill which we regarded as objectionable and dangerous we voted against, but our votes were overborne; those portions which we considered faulty and defective we endeavoured to amend, and again our Amendments were rejected by the Government and by the overwhelming majority of the House. The changes which have been made in the Bill are, in my opinion, changes which, on the whole, are for the worse, and not for the better. It is a significant fact that almost every change which has been made in the Bill has emanated from men who are openly opposed to the principle of Home Rule, and who have openly boasted that their object in moving Amendments was not to improve, but rather to maim and destroy the measure. One result, and one result only, of the discussions in Committee, to my mind, is thoroughly satisfactory. As this Bill now stands, I maintain that no man in his senses can any longer regard it either as a full, a final, or a satisfactory settlement of the Irish Nationalist Question. The word "provisional" has, so to speak, been stamped in red ink across every page of this Bill. From one point of view, of course, I have been bound to regret this. I have always believed that one of the strongest arguments in favour of Home Rule among Englishmen is the hope that the passage of a Home Rule Bill into law would mean for them getting rid of the Irish Question, and from an Irish point of view I cannot help feeling that we can do nothing really effective to the amelioration of the condition of our people until full and unfettered powers over all purely Irish affairs are placed in the hands of Irishmen. But, Mr. Speaker, as far as this particular Bill is concerned, no doubt it is most fortunate that the result of the discussion in Committee has been to stamp its leading features with a temporary and provisional character, because I will say at once, without any concealment whatever, that were this Bill put before us—perhaps I had better say put before me, as I had better, perhaps, not profess to speak for anyone in this matter but myself—if this Bill were put before me as the be all and end all of the national aspirations of Ireland, if it were put before me as a full, final, and satisfactory settlement of the national demands, and if I were asked to accept it as such, I would feel myself bound to refuse to vote in favour of the Third Reading on those conditions. On the contrary, I would say that this Bill as it now stands cannot under any conceivable circumstances, if it passes into law, afford either a full, a final, or a satisfactory settlement of this question. It would not be a full settlement, for it leaves over for further consideration by the Parliament of Great Britain some of the most vital of all Irish interests, and withholds control over them from Ireland. It would not be a final settlement, because, in my opinion, of necessity no partial grant of autonomy can be final. Whether the experiment be successful and the Constitutional liberties of the people widen and increase, or whether it be a failure and those Constitutional liberties are narrowed or destroyed—in any case, no man can claim that such partial and restricted powers as are conferred by this Bill can by any human ingenuity be invested with any element of finality. I say also it would not be a satisfactory settlement. It would not, in my opinion, be satisfactory to England, because no settlement would be satisfactory to England which does not end, as it ought to end, this Irish Question, while no settlement can be satisfactory to Ireland which does not make Irishmen masters in their own country. So far as the restrictions on the powers of the Irish Legislature are concerned, for my part I have no objection on principle, up to a certain point, to such restrictions.

Every reasonable man must recognise the fact that very large masses of people in this country are profoundly distrustful as to the wisdom, the stability, and I would say the ability, which are necessary for Irishmen to rule themselves. But those who, like myself, have profound faith in the common sense, the moderation, and the abilities of our countrymen say—and we take a reasonable and a logical position I think—we do not object to restrictions such as many restrictions in this Bill on the powers of the Irish Legislature, because we know if once the experiment of Home Rule be fairly tried, the result of that experiment will be to justify and to necessitate the disappearance of those restrictions altogether. More especially do I say this with regard to those restrictions which are inserted in the Bill with the object of offering security to those of our fellow-countrymen who imagine that their civil and religious liberty would be menaced by an Irish Parliament. I can conceive of scarcely any restrictions having that object in view to which I would object, because I am so certain in my conviction that the almost immediate result of the working of Home Rule for a few years would be to show the absolute want of necessity for any of those restrictions, and the natural effect would be that those restrictions would eventually disappear. As long, therefore, as we are not asked to say, as we were in 1886, that this Bill is a full, final, and satisfactory settlement of the national demands of Ireland, for my part, I see no objection to going the longest way possible along the road to conciliation. The attitude I desire to take with regard to this Bill at this stage is well expressed in a resolution recently adopted at a gathering of Nationalists held in the City of Dublin.

“The manifest injustice of the financial provisions, the constitution of the proposed Legislature and the degrading and petty restrictions with which its action is hampered, the reservation to the Imperial Parliament of the power to impose and control Irish taxes, and of power over so many Irish interests of paramount importance in the development of the nation, coupled with the reduction of the Irish representation in the Imperial Parliament during the period of such reservation, leaves little beyond the mere assertion of the principle of Home Rule to commend the present Bill to Irish Nationalists, and renders it impossible of acceptance as a full, final, and satisfactory settlement of the National question.”

Every one of the objections mentioned in the resolution were dealt with by my hon. Friends and myself in Committee as far as opportunity permitted. Unfortunately our views and votes were overborne. With regard to the financial part of the Bill, if in every other detail the Bill were satisfactory, that part of the Bill is so grave and faulty that it would be impossible for me to allow the Third Reading to go without uttering a protest and making it clear that my vote cannot be held as approving that part of the scheme. It is not merely that Nationalists regard the Financial Clauses as ungenerous, in view of the past history of the two countries and in view of their great disparity in wealth; it is not merely that they think the Financial Clauses to be unjust, and that under them Ireland will be practically robbed of millions of money; it is the practical ground that they believe it to be impossible to govern Ireland successfully under these Financial Clauses. The effort to govern Ireland under the proposed scheme will not merely make it absolutely impossible for the Irish Government to enter upon those works for developing the resources of the country and for improving its material condition which would stop the tide of emigration and make the people comfortable and happy in their own houses; not only would it negate that possibility, it would bring about national bankruptcy. Under these circumstances, it may be asked what Ireland will gain by the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, in view of the fact that it is to be rejected by the House of Lords in a few days. The value I attach to the passage of the Bill by the House is that it will mean that, after nearly a century of struggle, after the wasting of innumerable lives, the spilling of much precious blood, and the enduring of much misery, Ireland will at last have obtained from the Representative House of the masses of the British democracy a reversal of the policy of the Act of Union, and the solemn affirmation of the principle of Irish self-government. That principle may be rejected to-morrow by the House of Lords; but its affirmation by the House of Commons will stand on record, and, as far as I know, the affirmation of no great principle such as that which is undoubtedly contained in the Bill has been given by the House without its sooner or later finding its way into the Statute Book. The passage of the Bill by the House means the certain and speedy enactment of Home Rule for Ireland; and if indeed it should happen, as probably it will, that the Irish people have yet to endure another period of hope deferred and of oppression, they will be sustained by the consciousness that the inevitable end of their sufferings is at hand, and that the measure of their liberties will in all human probability be all the greater, wider, and more generous because of the futile delay which is now interposed by the Representatives of the very classes in whose interests Ireland have been so long and cruelly misgoverned. Whatever vicissitudes may be ahead—and the prospect has shadows and darkness enough—for my own part I feel perfectly confident of the future of Ireland. I regard it as absolutely secure and beyond the reach either of the selfishness of class or of the prejudice of ignorance. It will be a future of freedom, prosperity, and honour. John Henry Newman, one of the greatest Englishmen, in speaking of Ireland, used these beautiful words—

“I look towards a land both old and young—old in its Christianity, young in the promise of its future. A nation which received grace before the Saxon came to Britain, and which has never quenched it. I contemplate a people which has had a long night, and will have an inevitable day. I turn my eyes to the future, and I see the island I am gazing on become the road of passage and union between two hemispheres and the centre of the world. I see its inhabitants rival Belgium in populousness, France in vigour, and Spain in enthusiasm; and I see England taught by advancing years to exercise in its behalf that good sense which is her characteristic towards everyone else.”

It is because I believe that the latter part of this picture will be fulfilled that I shall, with a light heart, and in spite of all the Bill's defects, vote in favour of the Third Reading.

*MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken to the fact that besides the point of view which he advocated there was also the point of view of the rest of the United Kingdom to be taken into consideration. There was not only the English, but there was particularly the Scottish point of view. In Scotland they had no ill-will at all towards Irishmen; on the contrary, they entertained the best wishes possible towards the Irish people, and were their demands for some scheme of self-government similar to that which was enjoyed in Scotland and in England—fully as wide, and possibly wider—they would find an immense deal of support amongst Scottish Unionists. There was a practical point of view from which they looked on this question. They saw that this measure of Home Rule, on which 82 days had been expended, had absolutely obstructed all those social and industrial measures upon which they in Scotland were particularly set, and that in the arrangements which were proposed under this Bill, instead of seeing an end to the Irish Question, they discovered in it a long vista and a long future in which those questions in which they were deeply interested would be placed in the background. The Prime Minister told them in 1886 that in any scheme which he should propose, the political equality of the three countries must be maintained, and it was in this respect that Scotland suffered a peculiar and extra hardship. The Members returned for English constituencies would number 495, and from Scottish constituencies only 72; whereas there would be from Ireland, which would have a Parliament of its own, 80 Irish Members in this House, who would have an overwhelming voice so far as Scottish affairs were concerned, and in regard to them would be entirely irresponsible to any constituency. That, he thought, was an important consideration, and he believed when the notice of the Scottish constituencies was brought to the fact that their nation would be absolutely swamped, they would regard it as a matter which was absolutely monstrous and intolerable. The Irish Members would have the opportunity of doing what no Scotsman would permit—that was, of putting their hands in the pockets of the Scottish people; of dealing with their Budgets, and assisting in making Scottish laws. In Scotland they did not relish such an idea. They would have Donegal, with its mass of illiterates, dictating to the citizens of Aberdeen, where there was scarcely a percentage of illiteracy, upon educational questions, and they would have the followers of Archbishop Walsh dictating to the descendants of John Knox as to the establishment or disestablishment of the Church. This opened a vista on which they could not but look with horror and disgust. When they took into consideration the fact that the Irish Members were to be retained in the Imperial Parliament, and also what were the financial proposals under this Bill, it would be found from the Scottish view that there was a very serious question for consideration. They were assured that by passing the Bill they would secure the gratitude of hon. Members opposite; but was that gratitude likely to be anything more than a lively sense of favours to come? In dealing with the Financial Clauses, the President of the Local Government Board laid down the principle upon which the finance of the Home Rule Bill was to be conducted. He said that the principle of the scheme was to bring out, as nearly as possible, Ireland's normal contribution under the new system of Home Rule government, and the amount she contributed under existing financial arrangements. If Scotland were to pay in future under Home Rule what she paid at present, Scottish Members would look at the matter from a different aspect than they did at present. The First Lord of the Treasury laid down in 1886 what he considered was the right method of assessing the proportion of wealth in the three countries, and his rule was that the measure was the amount of property assessed for the Death Duties. If they took that as the measure, they found that the proportion of wealth in Scotland to the proportion of wealth in Ireland was about 7 to 4. Scotland paid in contribution to the Imperial Exchequer nearly £7,000,000. Therefore, in the proportion of 7 to 4, Ireland should contribute about £4,000,000 per annum, instead of the net result, which worked out at about £1,500,000. That would show the inequality that would exist under this Bill. Not only would the Scottish contribution be stereotyped, and they would go on paying too much, but they would in addition be burdened with the amount which was to be paid to Ireland as the contribution for the police and collection of taxes. Under this arrangement the proposed contribution from Ireland would be about 6s. 6d. per head, and the contribution from Scotland would be about 34s. 6d. per head. He hoped that when Scottish Members went to their constituents, and talked about a Scottish Home Rule scheme, they would bring out the fact that they had laid down as the principle upon which Home Rule should be granted, that the contribution to the Imperial expenditure should be based, not upon what was fair, and just, and right, and what the wealth and the population were entitled to pay, but that it should be simply what each country was paying at present. The hon. Member for North Aberdeen, who took a forward part in the Scottish Home Rule movement, introduced a Bill to give Home Rule to Scotland, and wrote an interesting pamphlet to explain the Bill. He said the Bill was backed by 12 Scottish Members, the largest number permitted by the Rules of the House—which he (Mr. Cochrane) supposed was meant to express the opinion that there were more than 12 apostles of Scottish Home Rule—and that

“The principle that people should be taxed according to their means was so obviously just that it had become a common-place with writers on political science. There might be some difficulties in applying the principle, but the principle itself was incontestable, and would not be contested.”

The hon. Member laid down the principle which, in a Home Rule measure, could not be contested, that the measure of the wealth of the country and the population should be taken into consideration, and yet, when it came to an Irish Home Rule Bill, he and the hon. Members who supported him in the Scottish Bill voted for the principle laid down by the President of the Local Government Board, which was totally opposed to the principle which they themselves supported in their Scottish Home Rule Bill. That was one of those instances of inconsistency of which the House had seen a great many. He thought that when those hon. Members went back to their constituents, and explained what they had done, their constituents would understand how it was their requests for a financial inquiry into the position of Scotland were put in such a milk-and-water fashion, and received no recognition from the Prime Minister, until he was compelled to pay attention to the representations that came from the Unionists. If the people of Scotland obtained a proper explanation of these financial arrangements they would express their feelings very strongly to their Home Rule

Mr. Cochrane

Representatives. As to the safeguards for the minority, that was a question which interested them in the West of Scotland very deeply. They knew the minority had taken, and would take, every possible constitutional means to call attention to their feelings, and their Representatives had told them that the safeguards were illusory, and did not exist. They in the West of Scotland deeply sympathised with them, and regretted exceedingly that this Bill had not carried out the promise of the First Lord of the Treasury, that he would introduce adequate safeguards for the minority. The hon. Member for Waterford had just told them that the Bill could not be accepted as a final settlement, and the Opposition were consequently justified in asserting that it did not contain those provisions which were laid down as essential by the Prime Minister in 1886.

*DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) said, he hoped he would be in Order to-day in making a few remarks more or less having a bearing on this Bill. Last week, when he was very properly called to Order, he in the hurry of the moment attributed a quotation to Sydney Smith which he now found was not the work of any Smith, but a Pope's bull. When he sat down, he was on the point of agreeing once again with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He said “once again,” because at one time he used to agree very much indeed with all his utterances. At that time he regarded him as his beau ideal of a Democratic Leader—the coming man, in fact—but the Member for West Birmingham had gone over, not to the majority, but to the minority. He had gone over to a class that toiled not, neither did they spin. He ventured to say that the reputation of the right hon. Gentleman would have been better regarded if he had paid more attention to the cultivation of the orchid than to the lily. However, he was inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman once again, and it was in this respect. Not long since the right hon. Gentleman expressed the opinion that as the legal magnates of the House had spoken, the lay Members of the House should now give their judgment. In this respect he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. His verdict was that Home Rule was now inevitable, not only for Ireland, but on Federal lines. It would be just as easy to sweep back the Atlantic with the proverbial broom as it would be to stop the tide that was now steadily flowing on to government by the people for the people. That being the case, he could not understand why so much opposition was exhibited in a certain part of the House. It would be more prudent on the part of the Opposition if they were wise in time, and made such concessions as would conciliate the democracy, and perhaps prevent a revolution of much greater magnitude than they were threatened with. He always understood that the functions of the Opposition was honest criticism, but he now found it not only to mean obstruction, but destruction of the measures of the Government; and he thought it was unworthy of the Mother of Parliaments to waste the time of the country in this fashion. He only wished to say in conclusion, on this the Third Reading of the Bill, that his profound conviction was that Home Rule for Ireland was not only just, but reasonable and necessary.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have been so pointedly challenged by the Prime Minister in the course of his speech that I may, perhaps, be allowed to intervene for a few minutes. I was, unfortunately, not in the House when the right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech; but I will reply to what I did hear, and to what I gather from my friends was the material portion of the observations made. The House will remember that the question of the testimony of foreign authors in regard to the government of Ireland by England was raised, in the first place, on the First Reading of the Bill by the Prime Minister, and there was likewise discussion upon it in the Second Reading Debate. I may remind the House of the original statement by the Prime Minister to which I took exception. It was to this effect. On April 6 the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I ask whether in the whole history of the world, amongst the thousands of authors who have touched upon the relations between England and Ireland, there is so much as one who had ever denied the impolicy, and injustice, and scandal of the management of the Irish Question by the predominating power of this country”?

The House will observe there was nothing in the statement limiting the authorship to foreign authors. I came down to the House on the Second Reading armed with a number of English authorities in order to confute him, but when I proceeded to quote them the right hon. Gentleman said he referred to foreign authors alone. I frankly own I was not so well prepared as I otherwise might have been had I understood the view of the right hon. Gentleman. On this particular point the right hon. Gentleman has been rather prejudiced and partial, and the wish, no doubt, has been with him father to the thought. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, adhered to the statement which he made on a former occasion. I will supplement what I said before regarding the views of two men of eminence, whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect. The first which I will quote is M. Guizot, from a work written by himself, and entitled, History of England from the Earliest Time to the Accession of Queen Victoria, translated and published in 1882. M. Guizot, who died, I think, in 1874, was a man of great distinction. He was Foreign Minister in France from 1840 to 1848, and must have been well known to the right hon. Gentleman. He speaks of the Union as follows:—

“Henceforth the Union of Ireland and England was definitive, advantageous, and efficacious for both countries alike, in spite of the difficulties it had still to meet with.”

That was M. Guizot. Now I am going to quote another eminent authority, who, I think, has expressed opinions which justify me in using him in contradiction to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I refer to M. de Laveleye, a great writer on economics, and who, being the leader of the Bimetallic Party on the Continent, I am disposed to regard with greater favour. M. de Laveleye, in Le Gouvernement dans la Démocratie, published in 1891, dealing with the question of nationalities, quite incidentally remarks—

“Even England is not escaping from national claims. The Irish, under the name of Home Rule, are demanding a complete autonomy. . . . If Home Rule is to be synonymous with a separate Government and a complete autonomy, it will hand Ireland over to the Catholic clergy, and will bring back persecution and civil war, with all its horrors.”

But M. de Laveleye was well known long before 1891, and was held in great esteem by a high authority in this country. In 1875 he published a pamphlet, entitled Protestantism and Catholicism. This book contains some passages, I am bound to say, very derogatory to the influence of the Roman Catholic religion as compared with Protestantism in Ireland. I may quote one sentence—

“Since the Scotch have embraced the Reformed religion, they have outrun even the English. The climate and nature of the soil prevent Scotland being as rich as England; but Macaulay proves that, since the 17th century, the Scotch have in every way surpassed the English. Ireland, on the other hand, devoted to Ultramontaniam, is poor, miserable, agitated by the spirit of rebellion, and seems incapable of raising herself by her own strength. What a contrast, even in Ireland, between the exclusively Catholic Connaught, and Ulster, when Protestantism prevails. Ulster is enriched by industry; Connaught presents a picture of desolation.”

Now, that may or may not be a fair description of the state of things which prevailed in Ireland at that time; but, at all events, M. de Laveleye was asked by a very distinguished man to translate the work into English, and this distinguished man also wrote a preface to it, in which he speaks of the writer as “a Belgian of known liberality and tolerance.” Who was this very distinguished man I have referred to? It will interest the House to know. I turn to the beginning of the book, and find that the preface ends in these words—“I remain, dear M. de Laveleye, most faithfully yours, W. E. Gladstone, 23 Carlton House Terrace, May 26, 1875.” So here we have a foreign authority of “known liberality and tolerance,” according to the right hon. Gentleman, who, so far from admitting the impolicy, the scandal, and injustice of the management of Ireland, and the preponderating power of England, is apparently of opinion that if the present state of things is to be reversed, and the policy of the right hon. Gentleman adopted, it “will bring back persecution and civil war, with all its horrors.” That is an opinion which, I think the House will agree, justifies pretty fully what I said on a former occasion. I now come to the opinions of Count Cavour, and I am bound to say that if anybody has a right to complain of the way in which Cavour has been represented in this House it is I, and not the right hon. Gentleman. I desire to vindicate myself in the matter, and, in doing so, I am afraid I shall have to make four or five quotations, and detain the House for a few minutes. The first is on page 19 of his work—

“But, putting aside the appreciation, and the merits of those who took part in the Act of Union, let us examine this measure in itself, and let us see if, in fact, it has been unjust and iniquitous towards Ireland, and if it deserves all the hatred which it excites, even at this day, all the vituperation which O’Connell and the orators of the popular Party lavish upon it without ceasing.”

Then he goes on to refer to the economic relations of the two countries, which he describes as irreproachable. The right hon. Gentleman said that, as regards religion, Cavour stated that the Union made the condition worse. But he omitted the next sentence, in which Cavour says—

“The points I have now examined are only subsidiary. The essential provisions of the Act of Union are those which regulate the proportion of the political power reserved to each of the two countries, and the manner in which the public burdens are divided between them.”

And, in the second place, he says all religious grievances have disappeared. At page 28 he says—

“After 1800 Ireland was governed, like the rest of the British Empire, by the three Estates sitting at Westminster. Did the great majority of that country, the Catholics especially, lose much by this political change, and have they had serious reasons to regret their National Parliament? This cannot be maintained.”

And then he goes on to argue the question at some length, and he concludes in these words, which are entirely conclusive of the case against the right hon. Gentleman—

“Therefore it is that, all things considered, I must regard the Act of Union, in spite of all its defects, as an event at which humanity must rejoice.”

So that we are confronted with this extraordinary position—that while an illustrious man describes the Union “as an event at which humanity must rejoice,” we have another illustrious man—a man, perhaps, more illustrious—in the year 1893, denouncing the Union as one of the greatest acts of blackguardism perpetrated in the history of Europe.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no! That word “blackguardism” was used in a private letter, and that letter was published as to that word without my knowledge. But the word is a strict and accurate description of much that took place as a means for procuring the Act of Union. It did not refer to the Union itself.

MR. CHAPLIN : I will not press that point. I should be sorry to pin the right hon. Gentleman to an expression in a private letter which was never meant to be made public. I turn to Cavour again, because he has shown in another part of the work the enormous difficulties with which any statesman must be confronted who tried to carry out the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, and to establish a Parliament in Dublin. Difficulty after difficulty are mentioned—many of which were, indeed, mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman himself when he made his first statement on Home Rule in 1886, and more particularly in connection with the question of the retention of the Irish Members. In fact, when I became acquainted with Cavour's work, I thought that many of the arguments used so successfully by the right hon. Gentleman against the retention of the Irish Members must have been taken from this great authority. What was wanted, Cavour said, was "The creation of a National Parliament . . . in which the Catholic and popular element should have an incontestable preponderance."

And here he points out that "We see numberless difficulties arise, which neither O'Connell or any other Irish orator has yet attempted to resolve. If in the British Constitution the functions of the Parliament were purely administrative; if, even, it did not extend beyond the sphere of legislation, we might manage to understand the co-existence of two independent Legislatures, sitting one in London the other in Dublin. But everyone knows that in England the Parliament has the preponderating influence on the Executive power; that foreign and colonial policy is subject to its control; that nothing of serious importance is done without its approval and sanction. That being so, how can these high functions be divided between the legislators of the two countries? How can their independent action be harmonised? I do not think that it is possible to devise for this end any means that can resist a few minutes' examination.

This was precisely the expression of the right hon. Gentleman in his famous statement in 1886, when he declared that it passed the wit of any man to devise any satisfactory scheme for this purpose. And now I wish to say a word upon the quotations from illustrious men made use of by the right hon. Gentleman himself. He quoted, if I understood him aright, one passage from Cavour as actually in support of the policy which is now before the House. The passage I understood him to quote was that in which Cavour says that,

"In support of what I have said, I will only cite the moderate, liberal, and generous conduct of the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel towards Canada."

And this quotation was loudly cheered by the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman. But does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that Cavour referred to a National Parliament when he used these words? Nothing of the kind. I turn to the context; and the context shows conclusively how entirely his meaning has been misrepresented. Cavour says—

"In fine, I shall be asked what conclusion is to be drawn from all the reasoning by which I have endeavoured to ascertain the present state of the questions relating to the condition of Ireland. In the first place, I have a firm conviction that Repeal would not be effected. But I shall next, perhaps, be asked—What, then, will happen?"

And what will happen he describes in these words—

"It is probable the present Ministry and those which shall follow it will apply to Ireland the system of amelioration of reform which Lord Melbourne was the first to adopt on a broad basis."

And then he asks—

"What will be the final result of these progressive and moderate reforms? . . . These are grave questions, which only the future can resolve. I hope, and I ardently desire, that the solution will be favourable to that Ireland which is so worthy of interest, and which inspires so deep an attachment. May the real progress which the efforts of honest men of all Parties, aided by time, must accomplish, compensate her for the loss of those brilliant dreams of National independence that she can never realise."

These are the words of Cavour in his work. Now, Sir, I will not dwell further upon that subject. I am perfectly content to leave to the House, and to the public outside the House, to determine whether I have misrepresented Cavour in the Debate on the Second Reading of the Bill, and whether it is not the right hon. Gentleman who has placed a wholly erroneous interpretation upon Cavour's opinions this afternoon. Perhaps I may be allowed to add a few words in regard to some other aspects of the question. I do not wish to say much on the subject of the Bill itself, about which the House and the country have, I think, heard quite enough by this time. But I do want to say a few words upon some of the incidents which have marked the passing of the Bill through the House, and upon some of the methods by which the Government have endeavoured to force it through. The passage of this Bill has certainly been signalised by various incidents and episodes which are not by any means uninteresting. I cannot say that the Liberal Party has gained any strength or any popular support in the country during the time which has been occupied in passing this Bill. As a general rule, we have frequent opportunities for forming some opinion, more or less accurate, of the estimation in which the Government is held in the country through the results of the bye-elections. Bye-elections of late have been singularly few; but, notwithstanding that, I find that since this Bill was laid on the Table of the House of Commons, and since the discussions have been carried on, the Government have lost no less than three seats. But if the losses of the Liberal Party have been few, owing to the cause I have mentioned, the desertion from the ranks of their supporters have been much more numerous. They have lost during the passage of this Bill, in addition to their losses at the bye-elections, seven of their supporters, who have declared their hostility to the measure in the form in which it stands at the present time. In addition to these, there has been one resignation on the part of a Member of the Government—though, I admit, a Member of the Government not occupying a very important position.

MR. ASQUITH: Who?

MR. CHAPLIN: Lord Wolverton. He was a Member of the Government, and he resigned because he disapproved of this Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer snorted something between contempt and defiance at that. But in spite of that, and of the scoffs of the Home Secretary, the defections from Her Majesty's Government would have been much more numerous were it not for one powerful and prevailing reason. Hon. Members opposite know very well that the defeat of the Government would have led to a Dissolution, which would, in all probability, have meant the exclusion of many of them from this House. We have also witnessed the use of the weapon called the gag by the Government to a degree which is absolutely without precedent, and which was never contemplated by its authors, or by the House of Commons at the time it was accepted by Parliament. It has been, in my humble opinion, destructive of free speech, and this evil precedent having been once set, it will become more and more dangerous and destructive to the freedom of Parliament in the future. One of the most deplorable and unfortunate results of the reckless use of that weapon by the present Government was the disgraceful scene which we witnessed in the House not so long ago, when certain Members of this great and famous Assembly came to blows. That episode resulted more or less directly from the use of this weapon by the Government. In my opinion, that scene has made the existing House of Commons unworthy of the continued confidence of the country, and unfitted to transact in future such serious business as that in which we are engaged, and the only mode of purging the House of such an offence would be the immediate Dissolution of the House which has been guilty of such an abominable act. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and he is probably the only person animated by such feelings—thinks that deplorable incident a proper subject of amusement.

MR. CHAPLIN: You can explain yourself afterwards at whatever length you please before this discussion closes. I do not wonder much at the dissensions in the ranks of the supporters of the Government when we recollect the methods by which the Bill has been conducted. I venture to say that no Bill ever submitted to the House has been the subject of so much concealment—I had almost said so much sharp practice—towards Parliament and the country as this Home Rule Bill. We have only to remember what has happened in connection with the question of the retention of the Irish Members. Everyone knows what has occurred in respect to that matter. We recollect the emphatic and unqualified declaration made by the Prime Minister very shortly after his defeat in 1886 that he would not be a party, if there was to be Home Rule in Ireland, to the Irish Members coming here to Westminster to interfere with Scotch and English business. Then there was that unfortunate episode which occurred when Mr. Parnell had an interview with the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Parnell declared that it was agreed upon that any difference of opinion in the Liberal Party as to the retention of the Irish Members should be carefully concealed pending the General Election.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Till the General Election.

MR. CHAPLIN: That is what I complain of; that it did not end at the time of the General Election. This concealment has been carried on absolutely to the very last day, and until it was not possible to conceal it any longer.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no!

MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman must forgive me for differing from him on this point. I do not make this statement without being able to give chapter and verse. Here is his statement on the 30th May, 1893, and I presume the right hon. Gentleman is referring to the 9th clause, which he said—

“It is our intention to propose, and to do our best to induce the House to accept.”

[MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Yes; but he never did it. Did you ever propose the 9th clause to the House of Commons? Nothing of the sort; the right hon. Gentleman is entirely in error, and in complete forgetfulness of what passed with regard to his own Bill. Questions were over and over again put to him, and he was asked as to what his intentions were; but he never would tell us anything about it until the day before the question of the 9th clause was settled. Then when the Resolution for the gag had been successfully passed, with the full knowledge that the question could only be debated for one day, then he did tell the House of Commons, and this was the first occasion upon which we were really allowed to know their true intention on this question. This was the first occasion upon which the policy of concealment was departed from, and only on the night before the whole question was to be settled by the gag did the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the 9th clause was not to be proposed as he had declared it would be; that the House of Commons was not to be asked, and the Government were not going to do their best to induce the House of Commons to accept it, as he declared they would do, but that, on the contrary, he was going himself to propose the propositions which are now contained in the Bill, and which are absolutely different to the 9th clause as it was introduced. I do not think it requires much of a magician to know why the policy of concealment was carried on so long, because if the country had known for a single moment that the right hon. Gentleman had always had this in his mind — that although you were going to have a Parliament in Ireland which all the Irish Members might attend, but which the English Members might not attend, yet, at the same time, the Irish Members were to come to Westminster, interfere with, manage, dominate, and practically control all our affairs in this country, do you mean to tell me, if the English people had known that at the time, you would ever have had the slightest chance of a majority at the last Election? You know perfectly well your chance would have been hopeless, and I think I can tell you something more if you do not know it already. It is this very proposition which is now contained in the Bill, which will be absolutely certain, if nothing else does, to insure your defeat by a triumphant majority at the next Election. I would like to ask this question—How far does this Bill fulfil the pledges of its authors, and the conditions which they laid down as absolutely essential to the vital parts of any measure to which they would agree to be party? There is the question of supremacy, of unity, of the division of burdens and of finance, which have been so frequently discussed already that I will not say anything further upon them on this occasion. There are two questions only to which I do wish to refer for a moment. One is as to the safeguards for minorities, the other that this shall be a final settlement of the question. As to its being anything whatever in the nature of a final settlement, as to its being anything whatever in the nature of a settlement at all, I contend that in the present shape of the Bill that if absolutely impossible, and the Government must be perfectly well aware on it themselves, and for two reasons. In the first place, you reserve some of the most important subjects in connection with this Bill altogether for future consideration. There is the question of the land, the question of finance, and the question of the Constabulary which you have reserved. And, in the second place, you are going to maintain 80 Irish Members still in the House of Commons at Westminster. Now, one of the main reasons by which you have always supported the Bill has been this—Ireland, you have said, blocks the way, and until that difficulty is got rid of it will be absolutely impossible to transact British business in a satisfactory manner in the House of Commons. Why is it to be better in the future? The great difficulty which has always stood in your way—the presence of the Irish Members—is to be maintained. As far as I can form any opinion—as far as any unprejudiced person, I think, can form an opinion—this difficulty appears likely to be in future worse than ever; and it is no answer for the right hon. Gentleman when dealing—or professing to deal—with this among many other objections raised this afternoon, to turn round to the House of Commons and meet it by a joke about Lady Mary Montague and the word “not.” That is the only contribution of the right hon. Gentleman which can be supposed, by any stretch of the imagination, to dispose of the arguments used by the Opposition. I suppose it is perfectly useless to remind right hon. Gentlemen opposite of what they have said in former days upon these subjects. They are perfectly deaf, it appears to me, to all remonstrance from this side of the House when they are directed to the solemn declarations which they have made themselves. But whether they are deaf to it or no, I am going to remind the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and the Prime Minister of two things they have said on this subject. I remember a speech delivered at Chelmsford upon the 7th January, 1885, when the Chief Secretary made this statement—

“I want order in Ireland, and I want power in the House of Commons at Westminster. Do what you will with your Rules of Procedure, you will not have restored the old British Parliament. You will not have made the British people master in its own House until you have devised some scheme or other which will remove the Irish Members from the British House of Commons.”

Was it not one of your main claims for the support of this Bill that by what you were going to propose you would make the British people master in its own House, and you would have restored the old British Parliament? What escape have you from that position? These were the sort of statements you made to the country, and upon the faith of which the country have accepted you and your policy with regard to Ireland, and now you throw all your old statements to the wind without the slightest feeling of compunction, much less of remorse. I think the charge against the Prime Minister is even more serious, because there is, in my judgment, no more binding or solemn statement which can be made by a man in his position than is contained in the electioneering address he put before the country at the time of a General Election. The country has a right to believe when the Prime Minister—or, indeed, any Member of Parliament—puts before his constituents and the country the various points of his policy in an electioneering manifesto, that he has every intention of abiding by them and carrying them out. What did the Prime Minister say on this very point of the freedom of Parliament in 1892? He said—

“I now say it is a proposition which set both Parliament and Ireland free, Ireland for the management of her own domestic affairs by a local Legislature in close sympathy with Irish life, and Parliament for the work of overtaking the vast arrears of business and supplying with reasonable despatch the varied legislative wants of England, Scotland, and Wales.”

How was this to be done? By getting rid of and by settling the question. It was then to be a final settlement. It was held out to the country that it was to be a final settlement of the Irish Question which it is now acknowledged is not to be final, or anything of the kind—
[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is not acknowledged.] You may be stupid as much as you like, but you will be obliged to acknowledge that what the right hon. Gentleman indicated in the quotation I have read could only be attained by a final settlement, and also, and above all, by the exclusion of the Irish Members from this House. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: No.] That was part of the policy you put before the country at the time. [Mr.

W. E. GLADSTONE: No.] Then what was the meaning of the words? How were you going to obtain freedom for Ireland and freedom for Parliament as well? There is no meaning to the words unless it be the meaning that I have submitted to the House. There is one other subject upon which I had desired to say a few words, but I am sorry to say I have left the papers I had behind me. With regard to the safeguards for minorities, I desire to call attention to what seems to me one special cause of complaint by one class in Ireland, at all events, against the proposals of the Government. After all the various Members of the Government have said upon this subject, there is no class in the country that has been so abominably treated or so grossly deceived as the Irish landlords. The Irish landlords are in future with their fortunes—I might say almost their lives—to be placed at the mercy of an Irish Executive in that country. The right hon. Gentleman was so conscious in former days of the extreme hardship of this position and of the wrongs it would inflict upon them that he did not scruple to declare it to be an obligation of honour and duty upon his part to make provision to safeguard the rights of the Irish landlords if the policy of Home Rule was carried. Since then I am aware he has stated that the observations he made then applied strictly only to the circumstances of 1886. I am at a loss to know in what respect the position has varied since 1886. The dangers to the landlords are not less; the obligations of honour and duty appear to be as great as at that time. Similar statements were made by the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman—by Lord Spencer and by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. What has become of all their declarations upon this point? On that, Sir, no doubt, Lord Spencer will be challenged, and will have to answer for himself in another place; but the Chancellor of the Duchy ought to have answered the challenges made to him over and over again in this House, and which he has never attempted to meet. I am afraid I have not got the quotation of what the Chancellor of the Duchy wrote upon the subject, but I recollect the tenour and effect perfectly well. He declared we should be ashamed to look any other country in the face, unless either prior to, or concurrently with, the passing of the Home Rule Bill we had taken measures to insure the rights of the landlords. Then I know we are met in this way. We are asked from that side of the House—"What are you afraid of? Why do you mistrust the Irish Members? What is the great danger that you apprehend at their hands?" The answer is perfectly simple. We do not trust the Irish Members, first, because we believe what these gentlemen themselves have said on the subject; and, secondly, because we believe what you have said about them. Everybody knows the old statement of the right hon. Gentleman that a small body of men had arisen in Ireland who preached and practised the doctrine of public plunder. We have always contended that it is from Representatives of that small body of men, who, as far as we can judge, will be Members of the new Irish Executive, that the dangers to the Irish landlords are to be apprehended. The right hon. Gentleman, when challenged on one occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), denied that he had made any allusion whatever to anybody except to Mr. Parnell, and he stated that he had never identified—[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Never marked any individual]—or identified anyone except Mr. Parnell. He had, he said, identified none of them with Mr. Parnell's policy at that time. I am very sorry I have not got the quotations with me, otherwise I would have been able to bring home to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman that he is in error. I recollect a great speech the right hon. Gentleman made at Leeds, in which he rated Mr. Parnell most soundly, and in which he announced to the people of England that the resources of civilisation were not exhausted. A week afterwards, at the Mansion House in London, the right hon. Gentleman said that that very day he had heard that the man who was responsible for this anarchical oppression in Ireland—I think those were the terms—had been arrested and placed in gaol. This was the first step towards carrying out the resources of civilisation and giving back freedom to the Irish people. That happened on a certain 13th October, and that was the first step taken by the right hon. Gentleman. What was the second? On October 14 he imprisoned the Member for North Kerry

(Mr. Sexton) and the Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and on the 15th he imprisoned the Member for Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien). If they were not identified with the policy of Mr. Parnell, for what were they imprisoned? I venture to say, with all possible respect to the right hon. Gentleman, if he will make a review for himself of all the circumstances which occurred at that time, to say that he did not identify any individuals of the Irish Party with Mr. Parnell and his policy because he did not identify them by name, is the greatest quibble that ever was uttered in the House of Commons. And it is, Sir, to these men, without the slightest safeguard whatever, that in face of all your pledges, and all your promises on this subject, you are going to abandon the Irish landlords without the slightest regard whatever. I do not wish to use strong language either on this or any other point; but I must say it does seem to me to be the most cruel, the most uncalled for, and the basest betrayal of the interests of a class that I can ever call to mind in the annals of the House of Commons, taken in connection with the statements made over and over again by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman when he sat down this evening ventured to hazard a prophecy with regard to the future of this question. He stated, if I heard him aright, that in his humble judgment the passing of this measure through the House of Commons would constitute a great factor, which must tend and inevitably lead to the certain and not distant triumph of this question. I venture to hold a totally different opinion. What I think, and what I am convinced of, is this: That when it comes to be known how you have forced this measure through the House of Commons, when the methods of mystery and concealment, and of the arbitrary use of your power in the House of Commons, are realised by the constituencies in the country, your policy will meet, at their hands, with such just and such emphatic condemnation, that both Parties in the State—whichever Party may be tempted to deal with this question in future—will think not once, not twice, nor thrice only before they endeavour to settle, in a manner like this, the great questions which have agitated so long England and Ireland.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. WASON (Ayrshire, S.) said, they had been told that the Government majority would be smaller if hon. Members sitting on those (the Liberal) Benches were to vote according to their convictions. He ventured to tell the right hon. Gentleman who had made that statement that those who supported the Government, and who sat on those Benches, were going to vote according to their convictions. The hon. Member for North Ayrshire (Mr. Cochrane), in the speech he made, told the House that he spoke from the Scottish point of view. He (Mr. Wason) ventured to speak also as representing one of the largest constituencies in Scotland. The point the Member for North Ayrshire made was that the Scotch people would not tolerate that they should only send 72 Members to the Imperial Parliament, while Ireland, which would have a Parliament of its own, would send 80 Members to Westminster. Speaking as a Scotch Member, he was rejoiced to think that the Government had determined to retain the Irish Members here for all purposes. He quite agreed that this was not a complete and final measure of Home Rule, but it was the foundation-stone, and having laid it they hoped to be able to rear up a measure of Home Rule, not only for Ireland, but also for Scotland, Wales, and England as well. So far from the people of Scotland being dissatisfied with Ireland sending 80 Members to the Imperial Parliament whilst Scotland only sent 72, he would point out that they would be in a better position than they were at the present time, because now Ireland sent 103 whilst Scotland only sent 72. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) maintained that had it not been for the other items of the Newcastle Programme the present Ministry would not have been in power. He ventured to say that had it not been for the question of Disestablishment in Scotland the Government would have had eight or 10 more supporters of their policy from that country. If a man was a strong Home Ruler and in favour of doing justice to Ireland, if he happened to be a member of the Established Church, the way in which the matter was put to him at the last Election in Scotland was this: "What does it matter to you about Home Rule for Ireland? It is the Established Church you want to support, therefore you ought to vote against the Liberal candidate." Other arguments were used, and the Scottish Liberal candidates were opposed tooth and nail by the Established Clergy in a way, he ventured to say, which the priests in Ireland had scarcely equalled. They were denounced from the pulpits, and one clergyman went so far as to say that any Liberal Churchman who voted in support of the Liberal candidate was unfit to be a partaker of the Lord's sacrament. That was stated in one of the pulpits in South Ayrshire, and he should like to know if any priest had said anything worse than that?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Why did you not Petition.

MR. WASON: Because I won the seat. If the Scottish clergy were going to interfere in the future as they had hitherto done, and use their pulpits against the Liberal candidates in the same way as they did at the last Election, he ventured to say there would be Petitions which would tend to throw light on the subject and result in certain of the elections being declared void. He was very glad to have the opportunity of saying these few words. He should vote strongly in favour of the Bill, not because he thought it was or could be a final settlement, for that was absolutely impossible, as the questions of the land, the police, and finance were reserved to the Imperial Parliament, but because, as a Scotch Home Ruler, he believed that every one of the component parts of Great Britain was better able to manage its own affairs than the Imperial Parliament. It was only by this devolution that they would ever be able to relieve the Imperial Parliament of the intolerable burden to which it was now subjected and to restore to it its ancient freedom.

MR. TRITTON (Lambeth, Norwood), as one who had not spoken at all upon this question, ventured to hope that even the Prime Minister would allow that he, at any rate, was not one of those hon. Members who had taken up any of the 1,500 hours which the right hon. Gentleman said had been occupied in the Debates upon this Bill, nor could the Chief Secretary place him amongst those Members against whom he levelled the bitter charges of obstruction in which he indulged at Newcastle a few days ago.

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

The Prime Minister had made a great many claims on the devotion of his followers, but he ventured to think that the claim he now made for the Third Reading of this Bill was, after all, the heaviest claim the right hon. Gentleman had yet made upon them. They recognised the devotion which had led his adherents to follow the right hon. Gentleman thus far. They also, on his (the Opposition) side of the House, believed in devotion to their Leader. They believed they had a Leader who inspired devotion because he was one of the best Leaders who ever led a Party in the House, and they followed him because they knew he was leading him right; but he was afraid that some hon. Members opposite followed their Leader while they could not help thinking that he was leading them wrong. The Prime Minister had told them that this Bill had occupied so much time that it was by no means likely to add to the fame of the British House of Commons as a deliberative Assembly. He ventured to think that reading this Home Rule Bill a third time in its undigested, undiscussed, and undebated condition was the most humiliating task the House of Commons could be asked to undertake.

It being half past Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Leave given to make a Special Report. Special Report brought up and read, as followeth:—

The Select Committee on Public Petitions having examined certain Petitions against the Established Church (Wales) Bill, and having observed that in the case of the Petition from Pwllheli, presented on the 16th May last, many of the signatures are in the handwriting of the same persons, and complaints having been made in regard to this and a considerable number of other Petitions from Wales that signatures have been obtained by means of misrepresentation, have decided to recommend to the House that the Order made upon the 16th day of May last, That the said Petition from Pwllheli do lie upon the Table, be read and discharged, and that the Petition be rejected.

3 T

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked if there was no means of bringing up this contempt of Parliament by forging Petitions?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a matter for the opinion of the House. If the hon. Member brings it before the House it will be for the House to take notice of the matter.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): Might it be brought forward early in the day?

MR. SPEAKER: I think it might be brought forward at the commencement of Business. It appertains to the Privileges of the House.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): May it be brought forward by any Member, or can it only be brought forward by the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions?

*MR. SPEAKER: On the action of the Chairman of the Committee, or any Member of the Committee may bring it forward.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: Or any Member of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: It is left to the Committee in the first instance, but it is open to any other gentleman on a Report being presented to the House to take any action he may think proper. In the first instance, it is for the Committee of Selection to deal with it, and it is entirely within their discretion whether they take any action.

SIR C. W. DILKE: I do not know whether the objection that privilege must be taken notice of at once would apply to any other Member who might bring this forward?

*MR. SPEAKER: As it affects the privileges of and the right of petitioning this House, I think the matter might be brought up at any time.

MR. A. C. MORTON: If within a reasonable time either the Chairman of the Committee or some member of the Committee does not bring the matter forward, any private Member can then do so.

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; that is the right interpretation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I see the hon. Baronet the Member for Ipswich (Sir C. Dalrymple) in his place, perhaps he will be good enough to tell the House whether the Committee intend to take any step in regard to this Breach of Privilege?

*SIR C. DALRYMPLE: The Select Committee on Public Petitions have gone very fully into the question to-day. They had before them allegations as to certain Petitions; they thought upon due consideration that the allegations were not of a kind they could attempt to substantiate to any great advantage; but, at the same time, they were of some gravity, and they desired to make an example in the case of the Petition which they thought had most offended. They, therefore, decided to recommend to the House that the Petition should not lie on the Table, but should be rejected. They do not propose to take any further step, and their decision was come to unanimously, their reasons being given in the Report which has been read to the House.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [29th August] reported.

NAVY ESTIMATES, 1893-4.

1. Sec. 1 "That a sum, not exceeding £1,797,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Personnel for Shipbuilding, Repairs, and Maintenance, including the cost of Establishments of Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

2. Sec. 2. "That a sum, not exceeding £1,656,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the Materiel for Shipbuilding, Repairs, and Maintenance, including the cost of Establishments of Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

3. Sec. 3. "That a sum, not exceeding £1,266,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Contract Work for Shipbuilding, Repairs, and Maintenance, including the cost of Establishments of Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

Resolutions agreed to.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Twenty-third Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 31st August 1893.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.].

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): My Lords, I present a Bill on the subject of Education (School Attendance (Scotland)). This Bill is precisely the same, mutatis mutandis, for raising the age of exemption to 11 as the English Bill to which your Lordships have already assented; and as I cannot conceive that there will be any objection to it, as none was raised to that measure, I propose to put it down for Second Reading to-morrow.

Bill to amend the Education (Scotland) Acts with respect to the age for attendance at school—Was presented by The Lord President [E. Kimberley]; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 262.)

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

Commons Reasons for disagreeing to one of the Lords Amendments considered (according to Order).

*LORD HOBHOUSE moved that this House do not insist upon its own Amendment with which the Commons have disagreed, but agree with the Amendments made by the Commons. With regard to the latter, he thought it would turn out they were little more than verbal. He would, therefore, split the Motion into two, the first being the important half—namely, that the Lords do not insist upon their Resolution which had the effect of throwing the Betterment Clause out of the Bill. The history of the Bill was very simple. It was a Private Bill promoted by the London County Council for the purpose of effecting improvements in London streets; and one of these improvements was calculated to enhance the value of adjoining property. The Bill contained a plan for carrying out the desirable object of getting back from the owners of these improved properties a portion of the enhanced value which the expenditure of the ratepayers had conferred upon those properties. That was known as the principle of betterment, and the Bill was passed by the House of Commons in that condition. When it came before this House the noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) moved a Resolution to the effect that such a provision ought not to be embodied in a Private Bill, and that Resolution was carried, so that when the Bill came before the Committee they found no option left to them but to accept the Resolution and strike out all the provisions of the Bill affected by it. It that state it passed this House and went down to the Commons; and the Commons, as far as they could, had restored the provisions of the Bill. From that statement their Lordships would see that the only principle which this House had affirmed, and to which it stood committed, was that those provisions ought not to be the subject of legislation by Private Bill. He would not repeat the arguments he had already used on the former occasion as to provisions of this character having been inserted in Private Bills for a number of years and in innumerable instances; and that thereby great Codes of Law had been formed quietly, gradually, without disturbance, with safety derived from experience, and to the great benefit of the nation. Those arguments stood wholly unanswered. Further, the House of Commons had, after discussion, debate, and division, decided that this was a provision proper to be embodied in a Private Bill. The highest authority in this House—the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Morley)—had also stated that, in his opinion, the machinery of a Private Bill was the proper method to adopt for that purpose. He would not disguise from himself that in all probability the majority of those who voted for the noble Earl's (the Earl of Onslow's) Resolution were influenced less by any question of machinery or form than by hostility to the measure itself, or even more by hostility to the London County Council, and a tendency to view with suspicion and dislike any proposal which proceeded from it. On no other ground could he understand why so large a portion of the speeches which were delivered in support of the Resolution consisted of attacks upon the London County Council, and, indeed, upon Municipal Bodies elsewhere. As to the hostility shown to the measure itself, the justice of the principle underlying the plan was undisputed. It was the plan that was attacked, and he gathered that the objections to it were twofold. In a letter published by its staunchest opponent the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), he had objected that the question whether a property was enhanced in value or not was a speculative one; but if the noble Duke had had experience on a London Assessment Committee he would not have raised that objection. Every five years the 39 Rating Bodies of London had to speculate in regard to thousands of houses as to how far their value had been increased by the expenditure upon them. The Assessment Committees had to guess; but being men of business, with some experience in the matter, they guessed very well, and their decisions were seldom disputed. If they were, the dispute went to the Quarter Sessions, but the Quarter Sessions had no greater resources than the Assessment Committees, having to guess also, though their guess was final and without appeal. The chief difference between that operation, which had been at work in London for a number of years under the Metropolitan Valuation Act, and the present proposal was that for the Quarter Sessions an arbitrator was substituted. That, in his opinion, was a distinct improvement, seeing that an arbitrator was a much more skilful tribunal than a Justice of the Peace, while his proceedings were simpler and swifter. The other difference was that instead of speculating upon the probability of increased rental value the arbitrator would speculate upon the probability of increased gross value; but what was there in either of those operations which made them one whit more speculative than the other? The second objection of the noble Duke was to the appointment of an arbitrator by the Government; but no valid reason was given why an arbitrator should not be so appointed. What probability was there that a Government official would show favour to one side rather than to the other? But experience was better than à priori argument. The plan of resorting to Government Offices for the appointment of arbitrators in various Departments was not new. It had been followed for many years, and on a large scale, and he had never heard a whisper of complaint of improper appointments of arbitrators. It was true that in this case the arbitrator would go beyond the mere money value of the improvement, and would adjust the incidence of the charges upon the various classes of owners. That had to be done in some cases when the freeholder was not in possession; but in those cases would anybody seek to throw the whole burden upon the persons who chanced to be in possession? Where there was a diversity of interest among owners somebody must settle the question between them; and it was not uncommon to refer such questions to arbitration. How could such matters be better settled than by a single proceeding before a man whose duty it was to inform himself of the whole facts of the case? He did not wish to be disrespectful to the noble Duke; but he asserted that it was not the County Council's plan, but the noble Duke's objections, which were open to the charge of being speculative and contrary to the daily experience of mankind. This principle had been discussed now for four or five years, and its justice, which had at first been keenly disputed, had been established to the satisfaction of the great majority of reasonable minds; but, as everyone admitted, there was difficulty in the application of it, and the County Council had endeavoured to devise a good method of application. Three years ago they proposed a plan which, like most first attempts, was found to be faulty. Another, which was under discussion for some time, did not meet with sufficient acceptance. They had now produced a third—the present plan—which had been accepted by the County Council without any expressed dissentient voice, and, as far as he knew, with unanimous mental agreement, and it had been accepted by the great majority of Members for London constituencies. Surely, then, the time had come when the County Council were entitled to know from their opponents what it was they wanted. Their opponents said themselves that the principle was just, and that there probably was some good method of applying it. Well, what was it? Were they to go on contriving methods until one appeared to which there was no objection to be made? If they were to do that they would be waiting until the river flowed away, and would never get this reform at all. As to the general attacks on the County Council, they were utterly irrelevant to the present discussion, founded upon complete ignorance of the subject, and were really attacks on the electors of London. The noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) had thrown out dark hints that the next municipal election would send a good many of the present occupants of seats upon the Council about their business; but he could state with confidence that at the present moment there was not the smallest symptom that the electors of London would fail to support their Representatives in insisting on improving the finances of London. They were certain to insist that their Representatives should persevere in their efforts in that direction. This question had not been decided by Party Divisions in the House of Commons. A large proportion of those who voted "Aye" to this clause were among the habitual supporters of the noble Marquess, and upon the second Division only 10 London Members voted "No," while 27 voted "Aye" to the clause, and the Representatives of the nation voted in favour of it in the proportion of 5 to 2. He believed that in London there were very few constituencies indeed in which a candidate or a Member would stand up and tell the electors fairly and squarely that he thought the expenditure of London was rightly distributed, or that he did not think the present plan of alleviating the finances of London was a just and proper one to be carried into effect. The gist of the case was that the aim of the County Council was a just one. Londoners were eager—he might say impatient—for some action to be taken in the matter. The present plan was the outcome of years of incubation, and of attempts made by persons who understood the subject. It had been unanimously approved by the Municipal Representatives of the Londoners in the County Council, by the majority of their National Representatives in Parliament, and by the majority of the Representatives of the nation at large; and now, if the House of Lords stood in the path suggesting no alternative of its own, but simply saying "No" to whatever was proposed by the County Council, he was afraid there would be left a very painful feeling behind—a feeling that Londoners were not receiving due consideration in a matter of peculiar importance to themselves, and which had been brought to maturity by the most careful consideration and toil on the part of their Representatives. He begged to move the Motion which stood in his name.

Moved, "That this House doth not insist on the Amendment (viz., to leave out Clause 41) to which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Lord Hobhouse.)

THE EARL OF ONSLOW asked their Lordships to support the decision of their Select Committee, and to insist on the Amendment introduced during the passage of the Bill through this House. He was quite aware that the result of such a proceeding, if carried, might be the loss of the Bill, and he was equally well aware that the improvements which the Bill proposed to carry out were very desirable and necessary improvements; but the principle involved was so important that he had no hesitation in asking their Lordships to pursue the course he advocated. If the Bill was lost, the loss would not rest upon their Lordships' House, but upon those who declined to accept their Amendment, because the 41st clause did not in any way affect the possibility of carrying out those improvements. All that the 41st clause did was to give to the rate-payers of the whole of this Metropolis a maximum possible sum of £150 a year. The London County Council's predecessors, the Metropolitan Board of Works, might not have been possessed of all the virtues; but they possessed at least one, that of humility. They were content to accept the wisdom of Parliament, and they had constructed such noble thoroughfares as Northumberland Avenue, Charing Cross Avenue, and Shaftesbury Avenue. During the four years the County Council had been in existence, what could they point to having done in any way approaching the magnitude of those works? People who had to catch a train at Waterloo had still to allow an extra 10 minutes for the block in the Strand, and the traffic from the great arteries of Holborn, Fleet Street, and the Strand, still had to go through tortuous streets and ill-paved slums. And what was the reason? It was because the County Council declared that it would not proceed with those improvements until Parliament armed it with further powers. A remarkable case occurred in June last. The Improvement Committee of the London County Council recommended that Bozier's Court, at the end of Tottenham Court Road, should be swept away; but the County Council decided not to undertake that improvement, although they acknowledged it to be urgently required, until an alteration was made in the incidence of taxation. In a less degenerate age such dictation to Parliament as had been exhibited by the London County Council would have been treated with contempt; but since one of the great Parties in the State had preached the doctrine that the Imperial Parliament was not competent to manage the affairs of the whole of the Kingdom, they must not be surprised if Municipality after Municipality went out on strike and declared it would not do its work until Parliament altered the general law of the land. The noble Earl the Leader of the House had said that noble Lords on that side of the House were very fond of finding fault with the County Council which they themselves had created. Yes; but the reason they found fault with it was not account of its administrative or executive work, but because it wished to force legislation upon Parliament and to appear in the character of a Legislative Body. He had no antagonism to the London County Council, but, on the contrary, admired many of its executive acts. Many Members of their Lordships' House were also members of that Council, and lent adornment to its debates and eminence to its doings; pre-eminently he would refer to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who had not hesitated to give his great ability and services to matters of merely local or Metropolitan concern. But the point on which he quarrelled with the County Council was that they said to Parliament—"Though you have created us to administer the government of the greatest Metropolis in the world, and have laid down the conditions under which we are to raise and spend money, yet we decline to carry out the government of London and improvements in London until you alter those conditions in the manner which we dictate to you." As he had said on the former occasion, he was not opposed to the betterment principle himself, and he had conversed with some of the larger landowners in London, and had found that there was a very general and widespread feeling that property should pay something in return for the benefit conferred upon it by the expenditure of the ratepayers' money. That principle had been accepted by a great many people, and if a Select Committee were appointed to consider how that could be done with justice they would have no objection. But this plan had been pressed upon them in a form almost savage in its ferocity to the unfortunate owners affected by it. They were not rich people. It was convenient for those who supported this measure to pretend that noble Lords who voted against the embodiment of this principle in a Private Bill were personally affected by it, and were personally interested in this question; but he believed he was correct in saying that not a single one of their Lordships were interested to the extent of one penny piece in the properties affected by this Bill. The landlords whose properties were affected were all poor people, and they were to have this charge or tax imposed upon them, not for five years, but for ever. That was to be done whether the property increased in value or not, whether the population migrated or not, whether or not trade had left the district, or whatever might happen. On the other hand, no proposal was made that compensation should be given where the property was deteriorated in value. It was conceivable that there might be cases in which what was known by the disagreeable word "worsement" might be the consequence of the improvement. It was said that this was not taxation on the capital value of the land. If it was not upon capital value he was at a loss to know upon what value it was thrown. It was to be a fixed annual sum placed upon the property, and if the property happened to be unoccupied and yielding no profit the charge remained just the same. That was an absolute proof that the charge would be upon capital and not upon annual value. It was said that this was not taxation in the proper sense of the word. He would not ask the House to enter into a close investigation of what was and what was not taxation, but would merely say that this was to be imposed by a public body for public purposes, and could be collected by all the machinery of Government. The principle of betterment had been in operation in America for many years, and American writers had long regarded this kind of assessment as taxation. It was urged that any injustice which might be inflicted by this clause would be set right by the independent authority of the arbitrator. He would be disposed to accept that principle if they were living in the days of Balaam and the prophets, or even in the more modern times of the Hesperides of the classics; but unfortunately they were living in the 19th century, and the surveyors who must be chosen for this kind of work were very matter-of-fact people, and some of the most eminent surveyors had declared that it was utterly for them to prophesy unless they knew, and they would not undertake to say what might be the increased value of property under this Bill. Mr. Vigors, the well-known surveyor, told the House of Commons Committee that he would decline to attempt it. Mr. Driver, the President of the Surveyors' Institute, in his evidence last year, said it was perfectly impossible for any man, honestly disposed, to undertake such an office, and that he would have to draw upon his imagination for his facts. Similar opinions had been expressed by Sir Whittaker Ellis, Mr. Shoppee, and other well-known surveyors, that—

“It would be impossible to apply the principle equitably and without the risk of doing a grave injustice, and that all experienced surveyors were agreed that none of the plans put forward for the purpose were even approximately just or practicable.”

This matter had been considered by several Committees presided over by men of high position in Parliament, and who had held high office. First of all, Sir Joseph Bailey had said the subject ought to be decided by a strong tribunal, by a Joint Committee of the two Houses, or by a Select Committee, and that it was wrong to allow the principle to be introduced in a Private Bill. Sir James Fergusson supported the Amendment made by their Lordships for the same reason. If the political opinions of both these gentlemen would not commend themselves to noble Lords opposite, he would ask them to admit the authority of Mr. Fowler, President of the Local Government Board. When the Strand Improvement Bill was under consideration by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, the Chairman, Mr. Fowler, drafted a Report which was not adopted by the Committee, because the betterment part of the scheme had been withdrawn by the promoters. But Mr. Fowler said—

“That the House should authorise the adoption of this principle before it is inserted in any Private Bill.”

In conclusion, he asked their Lordships to adhere to the Amendment which they had made—first, because if they did not a very grievous injustice would be inflicted upon a body of poor people, who were ill-able to afford such expense; secondly, because all the surveyors and practical men who would be called upon to act as arbitrators had declared that they would not be able to carry out the duty thrown upon them—that the plan was utterly impracticable; and, thirdly, because all the Chairmen of the Committees who had considered the question since it was started in Parliament had declared with one voice that the principle ought to be settled on broad and general lines before it should be introduced in any Private Bill. For those reasons, he asked their Lordships to adhere to their Amendment.

*LORD MONKS WELL said, he was glad that the noble Earl opposite had not made so violent an attack upon the London County Council as he had made in his former speech; and in that respect, certainly, he had effected that which he would prevent them from carrying out—a great improvement. The noble Earl said that the County Council should accept the decision of Parliament, and he fell foul of them for suggesting to that House that their Lordships should accept the decision of the great majority of the ratepayers of London and of the House of Commons. Surely it was as reasonable for them to ask the House to accept a decision of five to two, not a Party majority, and a majority which was growing. The noble Earl talked about dictation to Parliament on the part of the County Council; but how would this matter appear to the ratepayers out-of-doors? Where would the ratepayers consider the dictation lay? Would they not rather think it existed on the part of noble Lords who, as had been shown by the noble Earl's own speech, did not know a great deal about the subject. The noble Earl could hardly have mastered the proposal, or he would not have described it as "almost savage in its ferocity to the landowners."

Was not the present system rather to be described as savage in its ferocity? Under it the London County Council were allowed to schedule lands, which might be compulsorily purchased beyond the limits necessary for improvements; and this was the scheme of recoupment to landlords; they could take the property simply at a valuation, irrespective of the improvement itself, and the owner might get no benefit whatever from the improvement. That law had been in operation for 20 years, and it might be worked most unjustly to the landlord. Under the betterment system, however, the landlord must be benefited by the improvement towards which he was called on to pay. Under the principle of recoupment cases of this kind were possible—there might be two houses standing together, one of them being a shop and the other a private residence, required for the purposes of an improvement. The shop, however, might be left alone because of the larger amount of compensation payable to the owner of the property; but the private residence might be taken at a valuation which would, in all probability, give the owner little more than the bare value of the property, while, on the other hand, the owner of the shop would be enormously benefited by reason of the improved position of his property in the new thoroughfare. Their Lordships would see how thoroughly unjust and inequitable that system was as compared with betterment. Another, and very serious, objection to the recoupment system was that it was not only unjust, but thoroughly wasteful and extravagant. Where a man's trade interest was bought up and extinguished, a valuable property was destroyed, just as if by a bombardment. And they could not buy up a tradesman's house and shop without buying up his trade interest as well. He knew something of public feeling in London on this question, and he maintained that the ratepayers throughout the Metropolis were almost unanimous in favour of the principle of betterment. This was made abundantly manifest at the last election for the County Council, and it resulted in the return of a large majority of Members who pledged themselves to adopt the principle, and, if possible, to secure its application to London. It was a point of importance in this matter that those who directly benefited by the improvements should, as far as possible, be made to pay for them; otherwise there would be a danger of the County Council succumbing to the principle of what was called "fair play" in the work of improvements. If the whole of London was called upon to pay for an improvement which benefited only a part of it, there was danger of feelings of jealousy and dissatisfaction being aroused between the different parts of the Metropolis, as, indeed, had already been the case in more than one instance. In the case of the Western Thames Embankment the people in the East of London said that, as so many millions had been spent to benefit the West End, so many more millions must be expended for the benefit of the East End. If London improvements were paid for all over the Metropolis there would be danger of competition between one part of London and another, so that one particular locality should not get an unfair share of improvements. For that reason, also, it was highly desirable that as far as possible improvements should be paid for by those who specially benefited by them. One word in conclusion. The noble Earl opposite had gone in some detail into this clause. It was, no doubt, long and somewhat complicated, and he was sorry their Lordships had, by their previous vote, shut themselves out from considering its details; but he would respectfully submit to them that that was not a sufficient reason for throwing over a Bill which had been carried by a majority of 5 to 2 in the House of Commons, and was supported by the almost unanimous vote of the ratepayers of London through their representatives on the London County Council.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the noble Lord opposite has expressed himself with such extraordinary energy in favour of the principle of betterment that I should like to say a few words to record what is the point of view from which I regard this question. I have no metaphysical or à priori objection to the principle of betterment. On the contrary, it seems to me, as stated by Mr. H. H. Fowler, a very sensible principle, that if you can ascertain clearly and without doubt that a public improvement is going to increase the fortune of a man, you may make that man a contributor to the carrying out of that public improvement. I have nothing to say against that principle. After all, it is a well-known principle, and it is analogous to that which is applied in the case of building sea walls on the coast of this country. Those walls protect the property, and therefore preserve the fortunes, of a certain number of proprietors. There is no doubt who are the proprietors benefited by the sea walls, and, therefore, in the rates raised for erecting them a further burden is placed upon those proprietors. That is a principle which is perfectly reasonable and just, and no one would object if a mode of equitably applying it to the case of London improvements could be discovered. On the contrary, it would be a matter of congratulation if this could be done, for undoubtedly there is considerable difficulty in finding where the money for the improvements which this city requires is to come from. But because you have an impression that one man pays too much and somebody else ought to pay something, it does not follow that you are thereby absolved from taking any trouble to get at the right person to pay. That is the fallacy which seems to me to pervade the speeches of those who support this clause. They seem to think that when it is once established to be important that persons who do not pay now should be brought in to pay, that all objections to the form or machinery of the measure are to be thrust aside as unimportant and vague. This Bill is entirely a question of machinery and detail. Find us the person whose fortune is manifestly bettered—find it without uncertainty and without injustice—and we will make no objection whatever to his contributing to the improvement which betters his fortune. But you must find it without uncertainty and without injustice to himself. This clause in the County Council Bill appears to me, I confess, to be the least equitable of all the proposals that have been made. The idea which the County Council appear to have conceived, that participation in the value of improvements is purely a question of proximity to it, is, in my opinion, an entirely groundless assumption. That a new street affects the houses immediately adjoining, that is upon each side of it, everybody knows; but it does not follow that the value to proprietors or occupiers of adjacent properties depends on their proximity to the new street. This plan of taking lines of deviation—which we have never been allowed to see, and therefore I do not know exactly what they are—that shows the manner in which this question, like others, has been dealt with—this mode of taking two parallel lines, I suppose on each side of the street, and presuming that every person included therein will benefit by the improvement, has not the vaguest shadow of foundation. The County Council appear to think that the action of an improvement is a radiating action, like the action of heat, light, or gravitation, and that people benefit in inverse proportion to the square of the distance. I cannot imagine where they get that idea from. The truth is, so far as my observation has led me to a conclusion, that the population or owners in the immediate neighbourhood of an improvement may not only not benefit, but may, and constantly do, suffer loss, because the good shops and good customers desert the old and smaller streets and go to the new street; and therefore your neighbours, these people within the area of deviation whom the County Council propose to tax, are likely to suffer loss rather than to derive benefit from improvements you have been making. Then you fall back upon your arbitrator, and you tell me the arbitrator will discover all this. I have not a word to say against the action of the arbitros of the Local Government Board. Perhaps it would be desirable, if they are to be entrusted with great powers of this kind, that they should be made a more permanent body, and that they should not be appointed simply ad hoc for deciding cases in which at some future time political passions might arise. At all events, I have nothing to object to in the decision of the Government arbitrator ; but official arbitrators have hitherto been employed to decide questions of fact, such as the value of this property, or that property, or of the growth of value in a neighbourhood ; but now they are to be asked to decide what will be the effect of an improvement that has not yet been carried out upon various properties which it has not yet, therefore, affected. An arbitrator decides every day, and decides with very fair accuracy and contentment to the parties concerned, upon values or rates of increase that are actually in existence ; but here you are asking him to decide in cases where there exists no code of rules, no accumulated body of experience, no basis for decision, which would enable a surveyor to give evidence or an arbitrator to decide upon the probable effect in the future of an improvement, the action of which must be absolutely uncertain. The serious consequence of asking an arbitrator to decide something which he cannot possibly know, and with respect to which he must draw entirely upon his own imagination, is the enormous cost which you inflict upon the suitor. You know that these land disputes are not cheap questions at any time. You know that these miserable people who are caught between the lines of deviation are not rich ; and when the London County Council assesses some huge sum upon them, if they have to fight—and no doubt the County Council will assess the largest sum it can in order to make precedents for future work—they will have to appeal to arbitrators against the County Council assessors. The County Council will have a serried array of expert witnesses, and the unfortunate appellants will be compelled to produce experts on their side. There is no other legal amusement in the world that is as expensive as that of fighting expert evidence ; and the more uncertain a matter is, and the more it is a question for the arbitrator's imagination, the more will it be necessary to rely upon the evidence of this body of experts on each side, who will have to collect, painfully, such facts as can be obtained from the few parts of London where improvements have taken place, and where, of course, they would be able to show that one house had been improved, and that other houses had not been improved at all. These uncertainties will mean nothing but expense to the litigants. But see what the position is in which you put these unfortunate people, who are caught between the lines of deviation. They are to be for seven years kept in uncertainty about their property. When you impose a tax there is an end of it, and the various interests concerned. But now, for seven years, there may be upon those wretched people the uncertainty whether or not their property is to be selected for being mulcted in this manner, and they will have no means of accelerating the decision or escaping from the uncertainty. The very first effect of this Bill, I venture to say, will be to lower the value by 50 per cent. of every inch of property. The values might increase afterwards, but at the first moment the feeling of panic at being exposed for so long a period to an uncertain tax would diminish the value of, and be a heavy burden upon, property within the lines of deviation. No one wishing to sell a lease would have the slightest chance of getting the fair value which it bears at this moment. Those, my Lords, are the grounds on which I object to this ill-constructed and slovenly measure. And I wish your Lordships would look at it by the light of precedent, and consider the irregularity of form of which we have been guilty. We have Public Bills in both Houses of Parliament. If this had been a Public Bill it would have been exposed to ample discussion in the House of Commons as each line of it was taken through Committee ; public opinion would have been turned to it, and information would have flowed in ; and this new principle of taxation, if agreed to, would have been established in the light of day. Even if it had been treated as an ordinary Private Bill it would have been considered fully, and counsel would have been heard upon each side before men who would have dealt with it according to the best of their ability. But you did not even do that. A thing called a Hybrid Committee was appointed to consider the measure, where the men were not selected on account of their impartiality, but on account of their opinions, five of its Members being on one side and four on the other, and the fifth man on the side of the majority was actually the member of the County Council who was most interested in the proposed legislation and in pushing this Bill. My Lords, this Bill has been, not for the sake of the money to be obtained by it, but for the sake of clandestinely and insidiously setting up a precedent, driven through the crooked backways of a Hybrid Committee, instead of being submitted to a Public or a Private Bill Committee in the public light of day, where all Bills which come before them are fully discussed. In such circumstances, objections of form become objections of substance and reality. Such forms are meant to prevent haste, and to protect the weak from injustice. In this case those forms have been deliberately set aside; and it is to protect the weak from injustice that I ask your Lordships to insist upon your Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must say I have heard with astonishment the last portion of the argument of the noble Marquess. I can hardly see upon what ground he can possibly base it. He has just told your Lordships that the Bill was not submitted to an impartial tribunal, but to a Hybrid Committee in the House of Commons, and he has criticised the mode in which the Bill passed through that Hybrid Committee. Well, in your Lordships' House there are no Hybrid Committees, and the clause now under consideration might have been considered by an impartial Committee of this House, but for the action of the noble Marquess and his friends, who carried a Resolution excluding the clause from consideration by the Committee. I can only suppose that the noble Marquess has forgotten the nature of that Resolution. I submit to your Lordships that that is the very point of which we complain. Why was not this clause allowed to be examined? It seems to me very proper that it should have been examined. I do not assent for a moment that the clause in this particular form as sent up from the House of Commons is perfect. I think, indeed, it is one of those clauses which it is exceedingly desirable should have been examined by a Select Committee, and if there was any wish afterwards to review it it could have been discussed. In any case, light would have been thrown upon the noble Marquess's metaphysical opinion. I believe he said it was not a metaphysical opinion, but a sort of pious opinion, that betterment is in itself a good thing. In point of fact it is impossible to argue against the principle. Nothing is more easy—and it is a very common thing in private discussions—than to admit that a principle is a good one, and at the same time to take extraordinary care that that principle shall have no practical application. That I imagine to be entirely the position of the noble Marquess and his friends. They admit the principle to be sound and rational, but he and his friends have prevented that principle from being carried out in a Bill which has been placed on the Table of this House. But, my Lords, see what a position that places this House in. The noble Marquess, who from his ability and position has great weight, tells the House that in his opinion the principle of betterment is a sound and a good one, and at the same time he has supported the proposal made on the other side of the House which has prevented the possibility of the application of that principle under the Bill before your Lordships. I rather thought the noble Marquess would have taken up another ground, which was the ground taken up on the previous occasion, that this provision ought not to be put forward in a Private Bill. Of course, I understand that ground perfectly well, though that was not quite the ground taken by the noble Marquess the other night—that it was a matter to be dealt with by a Public Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Yes, and I entirely retain that opinion; but what I pointed out was the extreme injustice of not letting it go before, not only a Public, but even a Private Bill Committee.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: But it had to be considered in this House, as all Private Bills have to be considered, that is under the Forms of this House. I think the noble Marquess relied upon the argument brought forward on the Resolution—an argument I can perfectly understand, and which is quite legitimate—that you ought first to have a general law upon the subject laying down the general principle by which the whole matter would have been settled. With regard to the objection the noble Marquess took to the arbitrator, I am sure the noble Marquess must know that arbitrators have constantly to decide questions upon which they have no general principles to guide them. I should like to know, in a case where a number of houses inhabited by the working classes have been destroyed, upon what principle the arbitrator determines exactly the number of tenements requiring to be built on account of that destruction? But it is a decision to which they must come to the best of their ability. I am assured by my noble Friend (Lord Farrer), with his great experience at the Metropolitan Board of Works, that there are numberless instances of matters being decided by arbitrators in which there is just as little guidance from general principles as there would be in this case. The noble Marquess said that in all probability property affected by the improvements would decrease in value. If that happens, then it is quite clear that the principle of betterment would not have any application, and I do not see how an arbitrator could say in that case that the value of the property had increased. I still think that the best mode of proceeding is by a Private Bill. There are, no doubt, great difficulties in the way of formulating a satisfactory scheme; but the proposition here is to carry out the principle with a real and genuine desire to do justice to everyone. Considering the very strong opinion on the part of the population of this great city in favour of some such scheme as this, and considering the largeness of the majority in the House of Commons against your Lordships' Amendment and its non-Party character, I think it would be a lamentable thing for the House to commit the grave mistake of refusing to consent to the Amendment.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) wished to say a few words, not in reference to the principle of betterment, but rather with regard to the position in which the House found itself in consequence of the Resolution passed by their Lordships, and of the action taken by the House of Commons upon it. The Resolution did not condemn nor impugn the fairness or equity of the principle of betterment, but stated that the House required further information as to its application, and that the principle should be practically carried into effect in a more public manner. The result was that when the Bill came before the Private Bill Committee to which it was referred, that Committee considered that they were debarred from dealing with Clause 41 at all. He did not think the Committee could have taken any other course; but the result was that the opponents of the clause were debarred from being heard by the Committee, whether their objections were generally to the principle of betterment, or local objections which might go to the point that the particular area involved was not one suited to the application of that principle. In the Debate which took place on the Resolution he ventured to express an opinion that where property was improved by the expenditure of public money it was just and fair that that property should contribute to the expense of the improvement. He also expressed the opinion that a principle of this kind, when confined to a limited and local area, might very properly be dealt with in a local Act; but the Resolution of the House maintained—and he thought that there was great force in it—that some general principles ought to be laid down by an authority that would not be disputed to guide the conduct of Committees in dealing with individual cases. He would suggest that that excellent end might be attained by the appointment of a Joint Committee, such as that which sat to consider the question of electric current disturbances during the present Session. The Betterment Clause had been reinstated by the House of Commons by a very large majority, and that fact, of course, could not be disregarded, especially considering how that majority was formed. But there was the great difficulty which had not been alluded to by any previous speaker, that if the clause was allowed to stand no opponent of the Bill could possibly be heard against it. They would be absolutely debarred from their Constitutional right to be heard. It was impossible, in the present stage of the Bill, to refer it again to the Committee, while by the action of the House the other day the opponents of the Bill were debarred from being heard against the principle of betterment as carried out in the clause which had been struck out of the Bill. Therefore, if their Lordships did not maintain their Resolution, they would pass a Private Bill without giving its opponents an opportunity of being heard. The only possible solution to his mind was to postpone the operation of the clause until a future Session, when the possibility of applying the principle might be considered by a Select or Joint Committee. He did not say that that was altogether a satisfactory solution, but he threw it out as a suggestion. The result of that would be that the County Council would obtain the clause as it stood; that the opponents of the measure would hereafter have the opportunity of being heard against it; and that owners or purchasers of property would be warned that their property might be burdened by a charge. He was afraid that would hardly be accepted as a compromise by either Party; but, failing that, he regretted that it would be impossible for him, in the position he had the honour to hold, to support a Motion which would prevent all the opponents of the measure from being heard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): I merely wish to say one word on the point to which my noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) has alluded. I cannot myself entertain any doubt that the opponents of the Bill are those persons at whose instance the proceedings were taken which prevented them from being heard, and, therefore, I have not the slightest fear that injustice will be done to them.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, it could not be contended, as had been said, that the last election of the County Council turned upon the question of betterment. No doubt the Metropolitan Radical Federation referred to the question in their programme; but it was mixed up with revision of taxation, the revision of the distribution of rates between owners and occupiers, the special taxation of land values, the rating of empty houses, vacant special rating, and other questions. It was rather strange that the Earl of Rosebery, when he was asked to sit for St. George's, Wapping, and declined, though he issued an address which occupied three-quarters of a column in The Times, did not mention betterment as one of the subjects which the London County Council ought to deal with.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 27; Not-Contents 50.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW moved that the House do insist on the Amendment it had made in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

A Committee appointed to prepare a Reason for the Lords insisting on their Amendment:—The Committee to meet forthwith.

Report from the Committee of the Reason to be offered to the Commons for the Lords insisting on their Amendment, read, and agreed to: And a Message sent to the Commons to return the Bill with the Amendment and Reason.

BLACKROCK AND KINGSTOWN DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order).

Moved, "That the Commons Amendments be agreed to."

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) said, he had no objection to the Motion, but would point out that nothing could be more irregular than the manner in which they had been introduced. The main objection to them was that they were absolutely outside the notices deposited with the Bill, thereby bringing into it at the last stage new matters altogether. Such a course would cause great confusion in private legislation if adopted. He was informed that the loss of this Bill would involve great hardship on the towns of Blackrock and Kingstown, and therefore he would, on that ground, offer no objection to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

THE CASE OF F. W. SMITH, OF HUNSLET.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inquire into the case of F. W. Smith, of Clarence Road, Hunslet, under sentence of 14 days' imprisonment for neglecting to vaccinate his child; whether two police officers about midnight of 17th August came and knocked loudly, and broke in the outer door to arrest Smith; and whether he will take steps to prevent such a course being pursued in the future?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The following is the answer of my right

hon. Friend:—I have made inquiries into this case, and have received a Report from the Chief Constable, from which it appears that Smith was evading payment, having stated that he did not intend to pay. A warrant was issued for his arrest, and as the officer charged with the execution of the warrant could not get to see him he proceeded to execute it at night. He did not, in the first instance, break open the door, but knocked, and Smith, answering from the bedroom window, said he would surrender when ready, but instead of that escaped by a side door. The officer, after waiting some time, then burst the door and found Smith gone. The Chief Constable further informs me that if he had been consulted beforehand he would not have authorised the attempt to arrest at night; but the proceedings do not appear to have been illegal.

THE LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT, 1891.

MR. KENNEDY (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, with a view to enable agricultural labourers to avail themselves of Section 3 of "The Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1891," the Local Government of Ireland will direct clerks of Unions and relieving officers to fill representation forms when requested to do so by any agricultural labourer or labourers who wish to sign the representation under this section, and who signify their inability to prepare the legal form?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The view hitherto taken by the Local Government Board is that these representations should be prepared without the intervention of Union officials or Guardians, before whom the representations would afterwards come for consideration. I am inclined to think that a labourer ought to experience very little difficulty in finding some person other than an official able to fill up the form for him. The clergyman, National school teacher, the constable of police, or local shopkeeper would probably not refuse to fill the form if asked.

ASHPERTON NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will defer the order given for the enlargement of the class-room at Ashperton (Herefordshire) National School until after the next inspection, with the view of ascertaining whether such enlargement is really necessary?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Inspector, after his annual visit to this school last May, reported that the existing class-room, which is only 10 feet wide, was quite unsuitable for its purpose. It has been suggested to the Managers that the available space might be enlarged by replacing a wall in the school by a glass partition. If the Managers accept this suggestion, which will be regarded as sufficient by the Department, I see no reason why the alteration should not be carried out at once. The Department have just received a fresh letter from the Managers on the subject, which will, of course, be carefully considered.

SIAM.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any truth in the statement, telegraphed to The Times of Tuesday, to the effect that French troops are throwing up earthworks round Chantaboon?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We have no Agent at Chantaboon, and I cannot say how far the report as to throwing up earthworks is accurate.

SLAVERY AT ZANZIBAR.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government, or by the Government of any of the other Powers, signatories to the Brussels Act (ratified 2nd January, 1892), to establish (1) the International Slave Trade Office at Zanzibar, contemplated in the 74th and following Articles of the Act; or (2) the Special Office at Brussels, contemplated in the 31st and following Articles of the Act?

*SIR E. GREY: Both these Institutions have been established and are in full working order. The first issue of documents has been made by the Brussels Office, and at page 367 of their publication the Report of the constitution of the Zanzibar Office is given. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House of Commons for reference.

MARTINI-HENRY RIFLE CONTRACTS.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is true that Martini-Henry rifles are being made for the Government by Messrs. Purvis and Co., of Eagle Wharf Road; if so, whether he is aware that the sights are sub-contracted to a man on the premises, who receives 2s. 2d. for each sight, for which he pays the men under him 1s. 4½d.; whether he is aware that portions of the rifle are being made by sub-contract in Birmingham; and whether such action is sanctioned by the War Office?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): Martini-Henry rifles and carbines are being made under contract with the War Office by the Henry Rifled Barrel Company, of Eagle Wharf Road, the manager of the firm being Mr. Purvis. It is true that the back-sights are undertaken by a foreman of the works, but he receives 1s. 11d. per sight, not 2s. 2d. This price covers 1s. 5d. for piecework, in addition to 30s. per week for daywork operations and the foreman's own wages for finishing. The pieceworkers earn on an average 35s. per week, or over 7½d. per hour, which is considered satisfactory. Three small items among the component parts of the carbine are being obtained in an unfinished state from Birmingham. The contract provides that sub-letting, other than that which may be considered customary in the trade, is prohibited. It is not considered that the company have done anything which is not customary in the trade.

MR. LOUGH: May I ask whether the workpeople employed under the foremen are paid by them or direct from the general office of the company?

MR. WOODALL: Hitherto 193 day and pieceworkers have received their money from the window of the office, while 54 hands under seven contractors take their earnings direct from these contractors, who also regulate the rates to be paid to the 54 hands for the different operations. It has now been arranged that all the piecework rates shall be fixed by the company, and all workers receive payment direct from the office.

CROWN FORESHORES.

MR. LOUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, inasmuch as the foreshore of the United Kingdom belongs prima facie to the Crown, he will take steps to prevent all further sales of Crown foreshores, in order to secure it for the health, enjoyment, and welfare of the people; whether he is aware that private landlords are in many parts of the country setting up claims to foreshore, and preventing access to the sea; would he state what Government Department has the duty of protecting the rights of Crown and public to the foreshore; whether such Department is willing to receive information from the public of landlords' encroachments; and whether he will instruct the police to give information to the responsible Department of Government of any notice boards erected by landlords claiming rights over foreshore?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The rights and interests of the Crown in the foreshore of the United Kingdom, with a few exceptions, have been by "The Crown Lands Act, 1866," placed under the management of the Board of Trade, whose policy is to preserve such shores for the use and enjoyment of the public, and not to alienate the rights of the Crown therein, except for the purpose of some useful works in immediate contemplation, such as reclamations, sites for harbour works, piers, &c. The Board of Trade are aware that in some places landowners claim to be entitled to the foreshores adjacent to their properties; but such claims are not recognised without careful investigation by the legal advisers of the Department. The Board are prepared to receive authentic information of encroachments upon foreshores, or of unauthorised interference therewith, from any persons. Coastguard officers and officers of Customs have been under instructions to report any such attempted encroachments to the Board of Trade since 1867.

BETHLEHEM AND ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can say who comprise the Governing Bodies of Bethlehem and St. Luke's Hospitals for the Insane, how they are elected, the annual amount of income, and from what source or sources the funds are derived; and whether he will consider the expediency of making these Asylums part of the general system of Lunatic Asylums for the Insane of the Metropolis?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I am informed that Bethlehem Hospital is the property of the Corporation of the City of London, by grant from King Henry VIII. in the year 1547. The Governing Body of the Hospital are a Committee elected by and from the Governors; and the Governors are the Aldermen of the City of London, 12 Common Councilmen elected by the Court of Common Council of the City, and certain Donation Governors who have each given £50. The income of the Hospital in 1892 was £33,369, of which £24,606 was derived from rents, dividends, and interest; £7,767 from patients and boarders; £179 from donations, and £817 from other sources. St. Luke's Hospital originated in the benevolent designs of a few private persons in 1751. The Governing Body are a Committee elected by the subscribers to that Hospital of 30 guineas and upwards. The income of the hospital in 1892 was £14,697, of which £4,582 was derived from rents, dividends, and interest; £8,746 from patients; £73 from donations; £1,079 from legacies; £157 from annual subscriptions, and £60 from other receipts. These Hospitals form part of the general provision for the insane of the United Kingdom as Public Institutions, and for patients not of the pauper class. The Commissioners in Lunacy state that they think that both Hospitals deserve praise for their work, and are, under their present management, very useful Institutions.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of schools in Ireland supported by public funds which have either school farms or school gardens attached to them; the number of scholars in these schools who have been examined during the past year in practical agriculture; and the number of scholars who have successfully passed such examination?

MR. J. MORLEY: The number of national schools in Ireland that have school farms connected with them is 45, and the number of such schools that have school gardens is 28. The number of pupils examined in practical agriculture during the past year was 666, of whom 605 successfully passed in the agricultural programme; and the number of pupils examined in practical work of garden management was 546, of whom 415 passed. It may be mentioned that there are also two agricultural institutions under the Commissioners of National Education not included in the figures just quoted—namely, the Albert Institution, Dublin, and the Munster Agricultural and Dairy School, Cork. The numbers that attended the Albert Institution in 1892 were:—Agricultural boarders, 35; dairy pupils, 46; national teachers, nine; and Queen's scholars, 130. The numbers attending the Munster Institution in 1892 were:—Agricultural boarders 14 and dairy pupils 65. There has not been sufficient time to ascertain the number of workhouses to which school farms are attached, but I am informed that in nearly every case where the boys are old enough they are taught practical agriculture in the grounds attached to the workhouse. In addition there are farms and gardens attached to some reformatory and industrial schools, but no examinations in practical agriculture are held in connection with these. I may add that instruction in the theory of agriculture is compulsory in all rural national schools for boys in the fourth, fifth, and sixth classes, and is optional in the case of girls of the same classes. There were 79,260 pupils examined in the agricultural class books at the results examinations, of whom 48,083 passed.

CRADOCK WILLS CHARITY, CARDIFF.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether the whole of the Scholarships and Exhibitions established under the Scheme of 1889 for the management of the Cradock Wills Charity, Cardiff, have been awarded; and, if so, whether he will ascertain and state the trade or occupation of the parents of the children who have obtained such Exhibitions and Scholarships?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): Clause 26 of the Scheme of 28th May, 1889, directs that a yearly sum of not more than £200 shall be applied in maintaining Scholarships. The following sums have been so applied:—In 1890, £185; in 1891, £191 10s.; in 1892, £197 10s. The following is the analysis of the occupations of the parents of the holders:—Artisans, 22; engineers, 5; employed on ships or about shipping, 5; employed on railways, 12; shopkeepers, 12; clerks, 7; travellers, 3; miscellaneous, 5; father dead, 3; unascertained, 10. The Commissioners have not yet received information as to the award of Exhibitions by the Council of the University College of South Wales and Monmouthshire.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Are any of the Scholarships held by children whose parents are below the artizan class, who are labourers, and belong to the poorer class?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I shall be happy to give the right hon. Gentleman a list of every one of the holders of the Scholarships.

DEFECTIVE SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to the Circular just issued to Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools regarding schools not under Government inspection, whether it is intended immediately on receipt of the Reports of the Inspectors to disqualify those schools which are found to be defective in accommodation or instruction, or whether, following the precedent hitherto observed in the case of voluntary schools, a period of grace will be allowed them in which to meet the requirements of the Department?

MR. ACLAND: In districts where a deficiency of school accommodation is caused by the disqualification of uninspected schools, notices will be issued in the ordinary way under Section 9 of the Act of 1870, and the usual opportunity will, therefore, be given for the voluntary supply of the deficiency by existing schools being brought into conformity with the requirements of the Department.

SITTINGBOURNE POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the branch post office at the east end of Sittingbourne, Kent, has been recently removed from the corner of Bayford Road, where it has been for the last seven or eight years, to a site 165 yards further westward, and that no less than 520 householders are affected by this change; and if he can state the reasons why it has been made?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): As usual in such cases, the Treasury nominated for the vacancy at the sub-office referred to in the question of the hon. Member. The site of the new office is, I understand, 165 yards from the old office; and I am informed that, while some of the inhabitants of the district have that distance further to go, others are benefited to the same extent. The circumstances are not, in my opinion, such as to justify my cancelling the nomination.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Did not the right hon. Gentleman receive a representation from the inhabitants of Sittingbourne, pointing out the extreme inconvenience of the course pursued?

MR. A. MORLEY: I think one letter was received. I do not hold that there is anything in the circumstances to justify my interference.

THE WEIGHT OF ARMY RIFLES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the weight of the Lee-Metford, the Männlicher, the Lebel, the Mauser, the Berdan, and the Martini-Henry rifles respectively; and what rifles are the British Army now supplied with?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The weight of the Lee-

Metford rifle is 9lb. 8oz.; that of the Martini-Henry 8lb. 12oz. The Männlicher rifle in use in the Austrian Army weighs 9lb. 10oz.; the pattern adopted by the German Army 8lb. 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ oz.; and that adopted by Roumania 8lb. 8oz. The Lebel rifle weighs 9lb. 4oz.; the Mauser (Argentine pattern) 8lb. 14oz.; Belgian pattern, 8lb. 2oz.; and Servian pattern, 9lb. 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. The Berdan rifle weighs 9lb. 12oz. The troops on the British establishment are armed with the Lee-Metford rifle, with the exception of eight battalions in Ireland and eight in the Colonies, which have the Martini-Henry. The Lee-Metford rifle has been sent out to India in sufficient numbers to supply all British troops there; but it is not known whether the issue has been completed yet.

THE NEW HEBRIDES.

MR. T. CURRAN (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any official information has been received of the reported intention of the French to annex the New Hebrides; whether he can specify the date on which the present joint agreement between Great Britain and France, for the government of the Hebrides, expires; whether he is aware that the permanent occupation of the New Hebrides by France would be regarded with serious concern and dissatisfaction by the people of the Australasian Colonies; and whether Her Majesty's Government has come to any conclusion with respect to the future of the New Hebrides on the expiration of the present Treaty with France?

*SIR E. GREY: No information as to any such intention has been received, and no date is fixed for the termination of the Convention. This Convention, together with a record of the assurances given by the French Government that they entertained no projects of annexation, will be found in Parliamentary Paper, France, No. 1 (1888). Her Majesty's Government are aware of the views of the Australasian Colonies. As the termination of the present Convention is not contemplated, there has been no occasion for coming to any conclusion such as that indicated in the last paragraph of the question.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Did not the French Government give similar assurances with regard to Siam before annexing part of that country?

*SIR E. GREY: They gave certain assurances as regards Siam; but they would contend that the operations there do not conflict with the assurances previously given.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): Having regard to the alarm and anxiety which, according to the latest telegrams in The Times, prevail in Australia with respect to the intentions of France in this connection, will the Secretary of State communicate with the British Ambassador with the object of obtaining authoritative assurances that the annexation of the New Hebrides is not contemplated?

*SIR E. GREY: The annexation could not take place until the present Convention is terminated; and, as we have had no intimation leading us to suppose that the French Government are proposing to terminate that Convention, it would be superfluous to ask for further assurances.

*MR. HOGAN: Is the hon. Baronet aware that a few years ago, when it was generally believed that France was about to seize those islands, the Australian natives seriously contemplated despatching a vessel to annex the New Hebrides without waiting for the sanction or authority of the Imperial Government?

*SIR E. GREY: The question relates to an incident of some time ago, and it would be necessary for me to refer to the Colonial Office before answering it.

MR. FORRESTER, J.P.

MR. J. WILSON (Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that Mr. Robert Forrester, holding Her Majesty's Commission of the Peace for the County of Lanark, was convicted, on Friday the 25th instant, at the Glasgow Central Police Court, for assault and being under the influence of drink, and sentenced to pay a fine of two guineas or 14 days' imprisonment; and whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to remove Mr. Forrester from the Commission of the Peace?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I regret to say that the Report I have received from the presiding Magistrate in regard to the case referred to is of a very unsatisfactory nature, and it will be necessary for me to lay it before the Lord Chancellor for his consideration.

FISHERY HARBOUR ACCOMMODATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will endeavour to carry out at as early a date as possible the recommendations of the Sea Fisheries Committee on the subject of fishery harbour accommodation in Scotland, whereby power should be given to the Fishery Board to apply the funds entrusted to them for harbour improvement as security for loans to be made for that purpose by the Public Works Loan Commission?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The recommendation referred to in the question of the hon. Member will be duly considered along with other points in connection with the Sea Fisheries Regulation Bill now before Parliament, as it cannot be given effect to without legislation.

ARMY MEDICAL REPORTS.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the officer at the War Office who supervises the Quarterly Medical Reports and to whom the whole sanitary responsibility of the Army is left is only a junior officer, holding the rank of Surgeon Major; whether he will arrange to have the principal medical officer's inspections made twice a year in India as in this country; and whether he will make a more stringent Order requiring the Commanding Officers to go round with the principal medical officer on his half-yearly inspections?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The medical officer who performs the sanitary duties at the War Office is not a junior officer, but has nearly 20 years' service, and will next month be promoted to the rank of Surgeon Lieutenant Colonel. The sanitary responsibility of the Army does not rest wholly with him, nor even with the Director General, the interests of the Army in this respect being, moreover, secured by the Army Sanitary Committee, of which the officer in question is a member. The second question is one entirely for the Indian Government. It is not proposed to alter the Regulations at present existing as to the officer who is to accompany the medical officer on his half-yearly inspections. This duty at present is imposed on such officer not below the rank of Captain as the officer commanding may appoint to represent him. And he is also accompanied by an officer of the Royal Engineers.

MR. A. C. MORTON : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in many cases the medical officer is accompanied not by the Commanding Officer, or Colonel, or Captain, but by an officer of still lower rank ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : That is strictly against the Regulations.

HINDU-MUSSULMAN RIOTS.

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central) : in the absence of the hon. Member for Banffshire, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the Hindu-Mussulman riots which have occurred during the last five years, showing how each riot originated, how it was dealt with, and how many persons were killed and wounded ; and whether the Secretary of State will call for a Special Report from the Government of India regarding the disturbances this year at Azamgarh, Balia, Bareilly, and Bombay, showing how these disturbances originated, why they are becoming more frequent than in past years, and how they can be put a stop to ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.) : The Secretary of State is not in possession of the full information which would enable a Report for the last five years to be prepared. But he will ask the Government of India to send home with the local Reports on the recent riots a general Report covering the points enumerated by my hon. Friend in the second paragraph of his question.

THE CULLIPOOL LABOUR DISPUTE.

MR. BEITH (Inverness, &c.) : In the absence of the hon. Member for Argyll, I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland upon what ground a force of police has been sent from Oban to Cullipool ; whether there has been any disturbance requiring the presence of extra police ; whether the extra police are boarded in the house of the lessees of the quarries, who are one of the parties to a dispute which has arisen about the payment of wages ; and whether the lessees of the quarries keep a store, and in the dealings with the quarriers infringe the provisions of the Truck Act ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : In reply to the hon. Member, I may state that the Chief Constable instructed his Superintendent and two constables to go to Cullipool, in consequence of a report received from the Superintendent at Oban intimating that a strike had taken place amongst the quarriers there, and that a disturbance was anticipated. The disturbance was of such a nature as to demand the presence of some extra police, with a view to the preservation of the public peace. I understand that one of these constables was lodged in one of the lessees' houses, as no other accommodation was available. The lessees have no store at Cullipool, but they have one at their Toberonochy quarries. A complaint has been made to the Crown Authorities of a contravention of the Truck Act ; but after a full inquiry, and upon the statements of the quarriers themselves, it does not appear to be well founded. I am glad to add, from a telegram received from the Chief Constable, that the strike is now at an end.

MR. BEITH : I beg, on behalf of the hon. Member for Argyll, to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to the complaint of the men working in the quarries owned by Maclean and Co., at Cullipool Easdale, that their wages are paid only once in three months, and that a deputation of the men who waited upon Maclean and Co., asking for payment once in six weeks, was informed that they would pay the men "when they saw proper," and that anyone refusing those terms would "be compelled to clear out of the houses immediately," and that the spokesman "would be at once dismissed" ; and whether he is aware that the houses referred to were built by the men and their forefathers ?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.) : It is the fact that a deputation of the slate quarriers waited upon Messrs. Maclean and Co., lessees of the Cullipool quarries, asking payment of their wages every six weeks, and that the quarriers refused to resume work unless their request was granted. They came to terms on all points except in regard to the occupation of their houses some time ago; and from a telegram received yesterday I conclude that this matter has also now been arranged. The houses are held by the Messrs. Maclean along with the quarries under lease from Lord Breadalbane. I have no information as to the persons by whom the houses were originally built.

PIGEON HOUSE FORT.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can now state, for the information of the Corporation of Dublin, the terms on which the Corporation may acquire the Pigeon House Fort, so that the drainage works which are urgently needed may be commenced as soon as possible?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The matter is now under consideration. No time shall be lost in coming to a decision.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Sir Charles Elliott, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, has asked for a prolongation of his present leave; and whether Her Majesty's Government has decided to appoint him to some Colonial Governorship?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The answer to both of the questions is in the negative.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if an examination for Army candidates, which includes Military Law, will be held in September; and if no new Queen's Regulations, embodying the recent changes in the Army Discipline Act, has been published; and if, unless a new Queen's Regulation is published a reasonable time before such examination, he will direct that the examiners do not set questions affected by such recent changes of the Army Discipline Act?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: An examination for Army candidates in Military Law will be held in September. The new edition of the Queen's Regulations will not be published before October; but no questions affected by the recent changes in the Army Act will be set.

THE RIVER SUCK DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland have declared their inability to advance this year the balance of the grant sanctioned by Parliament for the completion of the River Suck drainage works; and whether, in view of the facts that the time for the completion of these works will expire at the end of this year, and that the Drainage Board have been urged by the Commissioners of Public Works to employ as many men as possible so as to complete the works within the prescribed period, the Treasury will make some arrangements by which the balance of the grants may be made available this year?

COLONEL NOLAN: At the same time may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the time for the completion of the River Suck drainage works will expire at the end of this year; and whether, considering that the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland have urged the Drainage Board to employ as many men as possible so as to complete the works within the prescribed time, the Treasury will advance, during this year, the balance of the grant sanctioned by Parliament for the completion of the works?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Government are unable to submit a Supplementary Estimate for this service during the present year, but the Treasury and the Board of Works are concerting financial arrangements with a view to preventing any stoppage of the works for want of funds. I understand that the time for completion can, if necessary, be extended by the Board of Works with Treasury assent.

MR. HAYDEN: Will the financial arrangements involve the payment of interest to the Board?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: That will rest with the Treasury and the Board of Works.

COLONEL NOLAN: Did not the late Government make the grant for these works?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes; the difficulty is, however, that provision has not yet been made in the Estimates for the whole of the amount granted.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : When may we expect the works to be completed ?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I hope very shortly, if the weather keeps fine.

THE INSPECTION OF LAUNDRIES.

MR. BEITH : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a resolution from the Trades Council of Inverness in favour of placing laundries, in which women are employed, under the Factories Act ; and if he has yet seen his way to include laundries within the provisions of this Act ?

MR. H. GLADSTONE : I have received this resolution and many others of a similar character. The Inspectors of Factories have received instructions to make special inquiries all over the Kingdom into this question. It is, of course, impossible to legislate on the subject this year.

THE SUPERANNUATION OF ELEMENTARY TEACHERS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the recently - appointed Committee on the Superannuation of Elementary Teachers has begun its work, and whether progress is being made with its inquiries.

*MR. ACLAND : The Committee have held one meeting, at which the course of procedure to be adopted for the preparation of alternative schemes was settled. Owing to the fact that the members of the Committee will mostly be absent on vacation during the next two months, it will be impossible for them to meet during that period ; but subsequently it is proposed to hold meetings weekly (or oftener if found desirable) in order that as speedily a solution as possible of the question may be arrived at.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF SIAM.

SIR R. TEMPLE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is truth in the reports that the King of Siam is being required to undertake that concessions for material improvement in the Eastern Siamese Provinces shall be reserved for the French exclusively ; and whether the French Government continues to give assurances of its desire to respect the independence of Siam ?

*SIR E. GREY : The Reports we have received of the French proposals do not include a demand for such an undertaking on the part of the Siamese Government. There has been no withdrawal of the assurances given by France.

THE PAYMENT OF MEMBERS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, inasmuch as an unrepealed Act still remains upon the Statute Book which empowers the Government to maintain any Member who applies to have payment made him, and pending the Resolution for Payment of Members becoming law, the Government intend to put this Act into force for such Members as may make application ; whether the Government will introduce a Bill to bring this Parliament into similar practice with its own Colonies, as shown in the Return furnished by the Governors of Newfoundland, Natal, Cape of Good Hope, South Australia, New Zealand, Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, Canada, and Tasmania regarding the Payment of Members, which is customary in most Constitutionally-governed countries ; and whether the Government will consider the arrangement of free passes on railways, a system generally prevailing outside the United Kingdom ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : I stated my views on this subject in the Debate on the 24th March, and I have nothing to add to that statement.

THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he has observed the telegraphic despatch published in The Times of Saturday last which declares that the 23rd Pioneers are marching into Chilas in accordance with the pre-arranged programme ; can he inform the House if there is a pre-arranged programme and what are its objects, also why British-Indian troops are marching into Chilas, which is far beyond the boundaries of Her Majesty's dominions ; and whether a considerable escort has been sent on the Khagan route to Gilgit ; and, if so, what the escort is to convoy, and what is the object of this military operation in these remote regions ?

MR. G. RUSSELL : The 23rd Pioneers are engaged in making a new road from Abbotabad viâ Knagan and the Babosar Pass to Chilas. This road will afford a shorter and easier communication with Gilgit than the present one. The first 140 miles are in British territory. The last 20 between the Babosar Pass and Chilas are in territory which is tributary to the protected State of Kashmir. The Secretary of State has no information of any "escort" being sent on the Khagan route such as is referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. SNAPE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he is aware that it has been publicly stated that we have overstepped the Indus by hundreds of miles ; that we have a railway station within 60 miles of Kandahar, and military posts in the Zhob and Gomal Valleys ; that we have pledged to the Ameer the integrity of Herat, Maimena, and Andkui ; that we are contemplating a railway up the valley of the Kabul river, and have established garrisons at Gilgit and Chittal ; whether he will present Papers to Parliament showing under what authority the Indian Government has overstepped the Indus by hundreds of miles, accompanied by a map describing the extent of territory so included ; when and under whose orders military posts were established in the Zhob and Gomal Valleys ; and also what garrisons were established at Gilgit and Chittal ; and whether the official documents can be laid upon the Table of the House by which we have pledged to the Ameer the integrity of Herat, Maimena, and Andkui ?

MR. G. RUSSELL : The Secretary is aware that various statements have from time to time appeared on these subjects, for which he is in no way responsible. The portion of our frontier to which the hon. Member presumably refers as overstepping the Indus by hundreds of miles is Quetta and the territory in its vicinity. The Papers in regard to the occupation of Quetta will be found in Parliamentary Paper (Baluchistan) (No. 2), 1877, and a map showing the extent of territory brought under the control of the Indian Government in that district was placed in the Library of the House at Mr. Slagg's request in 1888. The military posts in the Zhob and Gomal Valleys consist of local tribal Militia, and were established under the orders of the Government of India, approved by the Secretary of State in 1889 and 1890. In regard to Gilgit, which is part of Kashmir, a garrison consisting of three Kashmir regiments, one company of Kashmir sappers, and a mountain battery (Kashmir) is stationed in that territory. The Political Agent who is posted there has an escort of 200 Sikh Infantry. There is no British garrison at Chittal. A Mission was recently deputed there at the request of the new Ruler, Mehtar Nizam-ul-Mulk, and the Gilgit Agent's escort of 200 men accompanied the Mission. On the Mission being withdrawn, an officer was left there temporarily ; also, at the Mehtar's request, he retains one-half of that escort. The official Document, in which our pledge regarding the integrity of the Ameer's territory is recorded, will be found at page 40 of Parliamentary Paper (Afghanistan) (No. 1), 1881. The Secretary of State will consider whether Papers can be presented with regard to the Zhob and Gomal Valleys ; but it would not, in his opinion, be for the interests of the Public Service at the present time that Papers should be presented on the other subjects referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. SNAPE : Does the Secretary of State for India deny the allegations contained in the question, and is he aware that they were made public by his predecessors in Office ?

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport) : Inasmuch as the statement in the question on the Paper emanated from myself, I beg to ask the Under Secretary whether it is not the case that the frontier policy there alluded to was explained at length to this House in the Indian Budget Debate of 1885, and was received without criticism or opposition by the Liberal Party, and was further discussed at length on March 13, 1888, when Mr. Childers, speaking on behalf of the Party opposite, accepted that policy, and declined to vote against it, and when, upon a Division, it was approved by a majority of 50 ?

MR. G. RUSSELL : I believe the facts are as stated by the hon. Gentleman opposite. With regard to the supplementary question of the hon. Member for Lancashire, I have only to inform him that the words of the answer have been carefully studied, and I am not disposed to subtract from or add to them without consultation with the Secretary of State.

MR. A. C. MORTON : May I ask whether the speech of Mr. Childers, delivered in 1888, pledges the Liberal Party of to-day ?

[No reply was given.]

THE IMPORTATION OF RAGS.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Senate of Hamburg has issued an Order to prevent the importation into Hamburg, and prohibited transit over territory under its control, of rags and bedding imported from Russia, actuated by the experience of what the people of Hamburg suffered in 1892 ; and whether he will consider the advisability of adopting a similar course in this country ?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER : The only information I have as to the Order referred to is contained in a telegram from Berlin to the effect that the Senate of Hamburg has issued Orders “ Prohibiting the importation into or transport through Hamburg of old clothes and dirty body and bed linen from Russia. Passengers' luggage is excepted.”

The Order of the Local Government Board of August 5 deals with articles of a similar character. The Order prohibits the landing in England of “ dirty bedding or disused or filthy clothing, whether belonging to emigrants or otherwise,” except under certain specified conditions as to disinfection.

MR. MACDONA : Is not the importation of rags prohibited in New York unless they are first disinfected ?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : I have no information upon that point. There are rags called rags of merchandise in bales which have been collected during a long series of years, and the importation of such rags is not prohibited in any country.

MURDER IN CORK PARK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether anyone has been made amenable in respect of the recent murder of a woman in the Cork Park ; whether there have been any complaints as regards the absence of a police patrol at night in the vicinity mentioned ; whether there was any patrol there on the night of the murder ; and, if not, what was the reason ; could he state what is the number of policemen now serving in the city, and how many are on day duty and night duty respectively ; and whether the Police Authorities will arrange to have a police patrol sent into the suburbs at 7 p.m., instead of at 8.30 p.m. as at present, especially on Sunday evenings ?

Mr. G. Russell

MR. J. MORLEY : No person has yet been made amenable for the murder of this woman, but the police are still hopeful of tracing the perpetrators of the crime. It is a fact, I understand, that complaints were made as to the absence of police patrols in the vicinity mentioned, though it appears that at the late Cork Assizes the Judge expressed himself satisfied that there had been no neglect of duty in the matter on the part of the Constabulary. There was, I am told, a patrol in the vicinity on the night of the occurrence. The total strength of the Cork City Force is two District Inspectors and 193 men of all ranks, of whom 65 are employed on day and 92 on night duty, and there are 11 mounted men and eight detectives who perform day and night duty indiscriminately. There are also six rural stations with a total strength of 30 men, who are constantly patrolling towards the city. As to the last paragraph, it is reported that patrols do not start for the suburbs at 8.30 p.m., as alleged, but at 7 p.m., as a rule, and sometimes as early as 6.30 p.m. The Sunday patrols invariably start earlier.

THE DUBLIN SEWAGE DIFFICULTY.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that all the sewage works from Kingston-on-Thames to Barking are in the midst of thickly-populated districts ; whether the Pigeon House Fort was full of troops about the time when the Rathmines and Pembroke townships arranged to run their sewage through the Fort and deposit it in a crude state into the Liffey lower down ; whether the War Office offered any opposition to that proposal ; whether at present the Fort is mainly occupied with old stores and a few sentinels; whether the War Office has received the Report of the Government chemists and leading engineers of the Kingdom declaring that the site selected for the treatment of the sewage at Dublin is the best in the Three Kingdoms; and whether, in view of this statement, and in view of the fact that the Dublin Corporation some time since gave Richmond Bridewell to the War Office to be used as a military barracks, the Government will now reciprocate by handing over the Pigeon House Fort to the Corporation, so that the main drainage scheme may be immediately commenced in the interests of public utility?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that I am aware that in London the sewers must necessarily pass through thickly-populated districts; but the question here is not as to sewers, but as to the outfall of sewage. The average number of troops at Pigeon House Fort in 1876, when the Rathmines drainage scheme was introduced, was about 150. The proposal as actually carried out was at first opposed by the War Office; but as it was only a question of the drainage of two rich residential townships with a small population and a relatively large consumption of water, and as no question of open settling tanks was involved, opposition was ultimately withdrawn. When it was reported that the whole of the sewage of South Dublin was to be embraced in the scheme, the Military Authorities offered the strongest objection, and insisted that the sewage, in that event, should be carried out to Pool Beg lighthouse. The War Office only finally withdrew its opposition on the assurance of the Commissioners that they had no powers to include South Dublin. The question now is not as to the south of Dublin only, but relates to the sewage of the whole city. Pigeon House Fort contains some of the most important ordnance stores for the supply of Ireland, and its garrison varies from 100 to 300 troops. The War Department received the Report of the experts employed by the promoters of the scheme, and referred it for the consideration and report of the Army Sanitary Committee—a competent tribunal, which includes three unofficial members of great authority on these subjects, and whose opinion I was bound to take in the interests of the soldier. That Committee reported to me that the scheme was in certain respects unsatisfactory as affecting Pigeon House Fort. Richmond Bridewell was not given by the Dublin Corporation to the War Department. It was the property of the Prisons Board, which, when it had no further use for it, surrendered it to the War Department, under Clause 31 of 40 & 41 Vict., c. 49, Prisons (Ireland), thus saving the cost of its maintenance. Pigeon House Fort was purchased from the Corporation of Dublin for a sum of over £100,000, and more than £60,000 has been expended upon it, and it could not be surrendered without the provision of equivalent accommodation.

MR. HAYDEN: Was Richmond Bridewell originally built at the expense of the Government, or of the ratepayers of Dublin?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It was originally built at the expense of the ratepayers, and then passed into the hands of the Prisons Board.

MR. FIELD: And is no compensation to be allowed to the inhabitants for the appropriation of the Bridewell by the War Office. Considering the enormous issues at stake, will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to get this matter settled?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am doing all in my power to secure that.

MR. CARSON: What was the price paid for Pigeon House Fort?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have answered that.

MR. CARSON: Is it not a fact that the letter of the Dublin Corporation has not been answered?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have said that the matter is still under consideration. I cannot answer until we have the materials on which to frame an answer.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): May I ask whether, according to the Papers presented by the late Government, Richmond Prison is not worth at least £100,000? Is it not fair to the Corporation to remember that the Government have now got a splendid new barracks with three acres of land attached?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I am not acquainted with the circumstances attending the transfer of the prison.

THE EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, as "The Employers' Liability Act, 1880," is to be continued under the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill now before the House, it is intended to proceed with the Bill to amend that Act in the Autumn Session?

MR. H. GLADSTONE : I must defer giving an answer to this question until the First Lord of the Treasury makes a general statement on the arrangements for Business.

THE LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACTS.

MR. BARTLEY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many houses for labourers in Ireland have been put in proper sanitary condition under "The Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1883," being one of the Acts to be continued under the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill now before the House?

MR. J. MORLEY : The provision enabling Rural Sanitary Authorities to put in repair existing cottages is contained in Section 16 of the amending Act of 1885, and the total number of cottages thus repaired to March 31 last was 62.

MR. BARTLEY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what amount was lent and how many dwellings of the labouring classes in Ireland were improved in each of the last five years under 23 & 24 Vict., c. 19, being one of the Acts to be continued under the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill now before the House?

MR. J. MORLEY : The last Annual Report of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland contains, at page 18, a Table showing the number and amount of loans sanctioned in each of the past 10 years for dwellings for agricultural labourers under the Act mentioned in the question of the hon. Gentleman. I have called for information as to the number of dwellings improved, but regret I am not in a position to give it to-day.

MR. M. HEALY : Is it not the fact that the Act referred to in the question relates only to landlords' property?

MR. J. MORLEY : I believe that is so.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH GUARANTEES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state on what principle the amount of guarantee is calculated that is required by the Post Office from persons who desire the postal telegraph to be extended to their neighbourhood, in cases where it is anticipated that the revenue from such an extension will be insufficient to meet the expenditure thereon; how the amount of the total sum to be guaranteed is arrived at; whether this sum includes the cost of wires, poles, and other materials, as well as of the labour for setting up the length of telegraph required, or whether this cost is borne wholly or in part by the Post Office; and whether there has been any recent change in the method of dealing with these matters; if so, what the change is, and when it was made?

*MR. A. MORLEY : The amount is made up of (1) interest at 3 per cent on the outlay of the Department for poles, wires, and other materials and labour, and (2) an annual provision for the maintenance and the working of the telegraph. The guarantors are not required to pay the amount of the guarantee; but if the Revenue in any year falls short of that amount, they are called upon to pay the difference. A change was sanctioned by the Treasury in August, 1891, when guarantors were relieved of the burden of providing for the repayment of the capital outlay. By the Post Office Act of the same year, Rural Sanitary Authorities were empowered to give guarantees.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : And in case the guarantee has to be paid and the Post Office cease the telegraph connection, are the wires handed over to the guarantors?

MR. A. MORLEY : The guarantee is only for seven years, and at the end of that time the question arises shall the telegraph service be continued?

In reply to a further question by Mr. GIBSON BOWLES,

*MR. A. MORLEY said, the new Regulation was not retrospective.

MACHINERY IN ROYAL MINES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Woods and Forests Office is allowing to be removed from Royal mines—namely, the Moel Ispri and Champion Mines, near Dolgelly—machinery and fixtures erected upon such Royal mines; whether there is a clause in the lease entitling the Crown to purchase from the lessees, upon the termination of the lease, all gold machinery at a valuation; and, if so, why such powers of purchase are not exercised with a view to renting or selling it to one of the numerous applicants for a fresh lease; and whether the Crown has power, at Common Law or otherwise, to prevent the removal of fixed machinery (erected solely for the purpose of extracting gold) from these Royal mines; and, if so, whether, in the interests of the State and the industry, they will exercise such power?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The machinery and fixtures at the Moel Ispri and Champion Mines have, it is understood, been sold, and will, it is presumed, be removed unless purchased by those to whom a fresh lease of the mines has been offered. There is a clause in the lease giving the Crown the option of purchasing the machinery, but it is not the usual practice of the Commissioners of Woods to exercise this option, and it was not considered expedient to depart from the usual practice in the present instance. The lessees are, therefore, entitled to sell or remove the machinery.

+ BRITISH INTERESTS IN SIAM.

MR. CURZON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that the French are fortifying Chantaboon, in Siam; that they have demanded exclusive concessions for public works in Battambang and Angkor, or in any of the Siamese provinces, as well as the expulsion of all or certain European officers from the service of the King of Siam; whether these fresh demands are consistent with the pledges given by the French Government to respect the independence of Siam; and whether Her Majesty's Government still adhere to Lord Rosebery's statement on 17th July, that the independence and integrity of Siam is a subject of grave importance to the British, and more especially to the British Indian Empire, and that Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to their responsibilities in the matter; and, if so, what steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government in discharge of those responsibilities?

*SIR E. GREY: We have no official confirmation as to the expulsion of any European officers. Her Majesty's Government do adhere to the statement made on the 17th of July, and Lord Dufferin returns to Paris this week to resume the negotiations on the lines previously agreed upon with the French Government and stated in this House as necessary to safeguard British interests.

MR. CURZON: The hon. Baronet having replied to a previous question that he has no information as to Chantaboon, because we have no Agent there, I now desire to ask him, since Chantaboon is connected by wire with Bangkok, whether he will telegraph for information to the British Minister at Bangkok; also, whether the House is to understand from his reply that the French Plenipotentiary is believed by the Government not to have exceeded the terms of the last ultimatum accepted by Siam, and that no such excess is to be anticipated; and, lastly, am I to gather that Her Majesty's Government will not regard with equanimity any further encroachments upon the independence of Siam, which has been declared by them to be a matter of grave importance to the British Empire?

*SIR E. GREY: I think the best mode of answering this question is to recall to the hon. Member and to the House the statement previously made with regard to British interests. It is to the effect that Great Britain is interested in having a neutral zone between the two countries; that British trade has to be protected; and that the Government keep in view the fact that Great Britain has interests in the maintenance of the independence of Siam. When Lord Dufferin returns to Paris these matters will be present in his mind. So far it has only been necessary to negotiate as to a neutral zone in a certain part. The assurances given by the French Government with regard to the independence of Siam still holds good. It is not, therefore, necessary that any negotiations should take place with regard to that point. As to the desires for further information in connection with the demands made by the French Government, it would, I think, be convenient to await the return of Lord Dufferin to Paris, in order to obtain that information from the most authoritative source.

MR. CURZON: Will the hon. Baronet inquire as to what is going on at Chantaboon?

*SIR E. GREY: I do not attach the same importance to this rumour as the hon. Member, as the information in possession of the Government goes to show that there are in Chantaboon 450 French and over 4,000 Siamese troops. Under these circumstances, it is quite possible that some earthworks may have been constructed by the French as a temporary precaution. I think it undesirable to attribute undue importance to the matter by making special inquiry by telegraph.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Will the hon. Baronet inquire whether British enterprise is to have an equality with French enterprise in all parts of the independent Provinces of Siam?

SIR E. GREY: That would be a subject for negotiation with Siam as an independent State.

THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, before entering into any agreement with the National Telephone Company, he will, in the interest of telephone users and the Municipal Authorities of this country, lay a draft of the proposed Agreement upon the Table of this House?

*MR. A. MORLEY: Similar questions were put to me on the 31st ultimo and on the 18th instant, and I must refer the hon. Member to the replies which I gave on those occasions.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: This is a matter of very great importance. May I inquire whether the Agreement will be signed very shortly; and whether it will be placed upon the Table in order to be subject to the approval of Parliament?

MR. A. MORLEY: I hope it will be signed very shortly. As I have already stated, it will be submitted to Parliament.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Considering the importance of this question to the country, and especially to traders, may I ask why Parliament cannot see the Agreement before it is signed? Why should there be any secrecy in the matter; and might not the Municipal Authorities have an opportunity of laying their case before the right hon. Gentleman?

Sir E. Grey

*MR. A. MORLEY: There is no necessity for that, as the position of the Municipal Authority will not be affected by the Agreement. A Committee of the House of Commons has considered the whole subject, and reported that the details ought to be carried out upon the responsibility of the Government of the day, and that the Agreement should be laid before Parliament.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Will the Agreement be signed almost immediately?

MR. A. MORLEY: I hope very shortly.

CHOLERA AT MECCA.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether information has been received by Her Majesty's Government that, in spite of the outbreak of cholera at Mecca, many pilgrims who are British subjects have been compulsorily detained at that city by the illegal action of the Governor, when desirous of proceeding at once to the coast to embark; if so, what steps the Government have taken to put an end to such proceedings?

*SIR E. GREY: Information to this effect has been received, and urgent representations were immediately made at Constantinople by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires. Instructions were then sent by the Sultan to the Governor of Mecca not to interfere with the departure of the pilgrims. It appears, however, that such interference did take place to an extent which is said to have caused great injury to the pilgrims, and considerable loss to certain British ship-owners. Her Majesty's Government are now investigating the circumstances in view of the possibility of being able to advance claims for damage inflicted, and in order to prevent the repetition of any such injustice on a future occasion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

AN AUTUMN SESSION DECIDED UPON.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he intends to take up the Saturdays 9th and 16th September for Supply, or whether Members may reckon on having those days free?

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what course the Government propose to take in regard to Friday nights?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): As to the arrangements of the Business of the House during the close of the Session, I think it would be convenient that I should state consecutively, at the proper time, the entire arrangements that we should advise the House to adopt. Therefore, either to-night or to-morrow, I hope to give notice of the terms of a Resolution to be moved on Monday next, and in which the whole of the particulars will be set forth. In the meantime, I may state that the Government have so far considered the position of the House that they have determined, at the close of Supply, that they will advise the House to adjourn till Thursday, November 2, for the propose of then proceeding with Business.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has told us the fact and date of the Autumn Session. Will he supplement that by a statement as to the nature of the Business to be then proceeded with?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said I would give notice of the Resolution for Monday, thinking that would be a good opportunity for giving particulars.

GIBRALTAR DOCKYARD.

SIR R. TEMPLE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will cause the Navy Vote relating to Gibraltar to be taken at a time which may allow discussion on the future dockyard there?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The proper time for this discussion will be on Vote 10 of the Navy Votes. Due notice will be given when the Vote will be taken.

ILLITERATE VOTERS.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (Ballot Act) expires on the 31st December next, and is on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill now before the House to be renewed; whether he is aware that Clauses 26 and 27 of the First Schedule, and part of the Second Schedule, grant special provisions for illiterates voting in the presence of the agents of the candidates, and that those provisions apply to Great Britain and Ireland; and whether he will consent, in renewing the Ballot Act in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill of this year, to withdraw these and other clauses that may be necessary, and so repeal these clauses, and do away with illiterate voting for Parliamentary and other elections in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland at one and the same time?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have no doubt that the question is one for discussion, but it would not be usual to include in this discussion on the annual Act such questions as that.

MR. BARTLEY gave notice that on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, in Committee, he would move to leave out certain clauses in the Bill giving special advantages to illiterate voters in this country.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Would that be in Order? Must not each Bill, as a whole, be either included or excluded?

*MR. SPEAKER: The question will arise in Committee, but I entertain grave doubts as to the regularity of the course suggested by the hon. Member for North Islington.

THE TREASON-FELONY CONVICTS.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that there exists a strong feeling throughout Ireland that the time has arrived for a reconsideration of the cases of the Irish prisoners now undergoing sentences under the Treason Felony Act; and whether, in consideration of this strong feeling in Ireland, he will consult with the Home Secretary with a view to the release of John Daly and the other prisoners?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Secretary of State answered a similar question the other day. The Government do not see any cause which would justify them in interfering with that decision.

THE QUEENSTOWN MAIL ROUTE.

MR. HAYDEN: On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for the College

Green Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Postmaster General what, in the event of his recent offer to the several Shipping and Railway Companies for the special conveyance of the American mails from Queenstown to London being accepted, will be the mileage rate receivable by the London and North-Western Railway?

MR. A. MORLEY: Negotiations with the various companies are pending, and I do not think any good purpose will be served by discussing the details of the different arrangements.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 448.)

THIRD READING. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [30th August] proposed to Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. TRITTON (Lambeth, Norwood) said, that in resuming his speech against the Third Reading of this Bill he wished, in the first place, to express his regret that on the preceding afternoon he inadvertently misquoted some words used by the Prime Minister; and he proposed, in the next place, to call attention to the statement of the Chief Secretary in his eloquent speech at Newcastle on Saturday last, that the Government had made the Home Rule Bill a "workable scheme." He wondered how many Members of the House thought that statement correct. The right hon. Gentleman devoted a considerable portion of his somewhat lengthy oration to severely criticising the conduct of the Opposition, and then went on to say—

"We gave a pledge to bring before Parliament a scheme which should satisfy Irish desires, which should meet the necessities of Irish social life, and should endanger no great British interest. We have fulfilled that pledge."

But had the Government satisfied Irish desires? Why, the very first time an

Mr. Hayden

Irish Member had risen in his place in the House since the delivery of the Chief Secretary's speech he said—

"One result of the discussion in Committee was thoroughly satisfactory. As the Bill now stood, no man in his senses could any longer regard it either as a full, a final, or a satisfactory settlement of the Irish national demand. The word 'provisional' had been, so to speak, stamped in red ink across every page of the Bill."

The hon. Member for Waterford, to whom he referred, further said the Bill would not be a satisfactory settlement to either country, because no settlement would be satisfactory to England which did not end the Irish Question, and no settlement would be satisfactory to Ireland which did not make Irishmen masters in their own country. So much for "the workable scheme" which would satisfy the Irish Members. As a man of business he was strongly opposed to the Bill. As a member of the London Chamber of Commerce he had great respect for the views of kindred organisations, and he could not get over the protests of the Belfast Chamber of Commerce, the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, the Linen Manufacturers' Association, and the Dublin Stock Exchange. He did not know if business men opposite believed the airy assertion of the Prime Minister that the Bill would produce a wonderful plethora of money in Ireland; but evidently business men in Ireland did not look forward to prosperity under Home Rule, for they had pronounced strongly against the Bill; that it would be detrimental to trade and commerce; that if it became law security, credit, and capital would vanish, and starvation of labour set in. He therefore, as a business man, protested against this unbusinesslike Bill being allowed to be read a third time. He further objected to the Bill from the teetotal point of view, and he was surprised that none of the so-called "temperance" party had risen to object to a Bill which made the solvency of Ireland depend on the consumption of whisky, and which made temperance legislation impossible in Ireland—because it would involve national bankruptcy. A widespread increase of habits of temperance among the people would mean financial ruin to the Irish Exchequer. Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby—would not venture to use his splendid rhetorical powers in a crusade in poor drink-trodden Ireland, because the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer would protest against his action as likely to lead to the bankruptcy of Ireland. He also objected to the Bill because of the danger it involved to the loyal Protestant minority. The Prime Minister said the pleas put forward by the Opposition against the Bill were "enormous, monstrous, and hideous falsehoods," though he was kind enough to add that he believed in the sincerity of those who advanced them. The voice of the Protestant minority had been pretty largely heard, and appeals had been made, especially by Nonconformists, begging their brethren in this country to do something to oppose the Bill, and thereby save them from having their religious liberties imperilled and placed under the domination of the Irish priesthood. He wished to know whether the Prime Minister desired it to go forth to the country that these appeals were nothing but enormous, monstrous, and hideous falsehoods? He could hardly fancy that one who, like the right hon. Gentleman, owed his present position so largely to the votes of the Nonconformists of England, would wish such a statement to go forth respecting the pleas put forward against this pernicious Bill by the Nonconformists of Ireland. He (Mr. Tritton) only wished that some of the gentlemen opposite would have the courage of their convictions on this subject. He believed that when the days of Gladstonian glamour and Sextonian supremacy had passed away there were many Members opposite who would wish to God they had never helped in carrying this Bill through its Third Reading. The other night he dreamt—he knew it was wrong for a middle-aged Conservative to dream; the young men of the Eighty Club were the only men who ought to have dreams; but he was thankful that the Prime Minister could not gag Members in the hours of darkness as well as in the hours of light—he dreamt that just before a most critical Division in the House of Commons the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) rose in his place and asserted, in that patronising manner which some of his friends regretted that he had so much acquired since he took Office, that he had been especially authorised by the Government to say that on that occasion hon. Members would be allowed to vote according to their convictions. He (Mr. Tritton) was afraid that this dream would not come true; but he still ventured to hope that some gentlemen opposite, recognising the unworkability of that scheme, the want of real safeguard, either material or moral, for the loyal minority in Ireland, and the solemnity of the occasion on which they were to give their votes might, before it was too late, go over and help the Unionist Party to defeat the most miserable and the most mischievous measure which had ever been proposed by a responsible Government to that Imperial House of Parliament.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has made a vigorous and in parts an amusing speech. I do not think that he proposed to himself to say much, and he certainly has not succeeded in saying much, to assist the judgment of the House upon the great question before it. He began by expressing his disappointment with the character of the speech delivered by my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Morley) last Saturday. I can only say that we on this side of the House have not been disappointed with that speech. The hon. Member referred to my right hon. Friend's statement that we have proposed to put before this House for acceptance a workable scheme of Home Rule, and he asked who believed that statement. Well, my answer is that the majority of this House believe it. About some other points of the hon. Member's speech I shall have to say something in the order in which they arise, but I must decline to follow him on this occasion into a consideration of the temperance question or the Local Veto Bill. There has been one feature of the speech of the hon. Member which has been characteristic of all the speeches delivered against this Bill up to the present time, including those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin). They have all said very little about the principle of this Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, indeed, said that by-and-bye some such Bill might properly be accepted by this House and passed by Parliament, but that this was not the time for it, that the question was not ripe, and that we had not behind us such a mandate from the country as would justify the House in passing such a measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford took the same line of argument, but devoted the greater part of his speech to a defence of his reputation for literary accuracy. I am not going to enter into the controversy between the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject of foreign authority in relation to the Irish Question. I will make but two observations in reference to that matter. The first is that the right hon. Gentleman mistook the purpose for which the Prime Minister referred to that authority. The Prime Minister never referred to that authority as being one the volume of which had declared in favour of Home Rule. But he referred to it for the purpose of establishing the fact that there was a consensus of opinion that, owing to the long years of misgovernment of Ireland by the superior power of Great Britain, there was a debt due by Great Britain to Ireland, and not yet recognised in its legislation. When the right hon. Gentleman referred to the case of Cavour I think he entirely misunderstood the application of what he said. Count Cavour was arguing against the Repeal of the Union. That meant the restoration of Grattan's Parliament; it meant the restoration of an independent Legislature, although not accompanied by an independent Executive, and it meant the right of that independent Legislature to entertain questions touching succession, touching the Regency, foreign relations, external trade, Treaties, and the like. When in connection with his opposition to the Repeal of the Act of Union Count Cavour went on to refer to the case of Canada, he meant to express his approval of the principle of delegation by the supreme authority of Parliament to a subordinate legislative authority to deal with local affairs. But, Mr. Speaker, there has run through all the speeches delivered up to the present moment one consistent line of argument, at one moment more obviously and clearly expressed than at another, but never wanting in the whole thread of the argument. It is this—that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has needlessly and gratuitously brought forward this Irish Question, and made his attempt to solve it, without there being any pressing necessity for him to undertake that task. One would suppose from many of the observations made that my right hon. Friend had invented the Irish Question. Under these circumstances it is necessary to consider briefly what was the condition of things that had existed long anterior to 1886, and what it was that made it a matter of urgent necessity for the Prime Minister to attempt to deal with the question of Home Rule. We have it upon the confession of right hon. Gentlemen opposite that before 1885 the Government of the Queen, backed up by all the resources of the Empire, was not wholly powerful in Ireland, that there existed in Ireland an embittered feeling in respect of the Government which proceeded from the Imperial Cabinet and from this Imperial Parliament, and that the Irish Representatives, although they had no Constitutional resources and power at their back, were the real authority in the land—an authority, grievous to relate, often more powerful—that was the accusation of the Opposition—than the law of the land itself. For years there had been pursued an alternate system of bullying and bribing, of coercing and conciliating. At the end of that series of experiments, when in 1885 the Irish people were enabled for the first time to speak as a fully enfranchised people in the sense in which England and Scotland were able to speak, they returned out of 100 popularly-elected Members 85 Members demanding, in Constitutional language and within the lines of the Constitution, the concession to Ireland of the natural right of self-government in its own affairs. I ask, was it possible for any Constitutional Minister, much less for a Constitutional Minister heading and leading the great Liberal Party, to turn his back upon such a demand? Mr. Speaker, I have said that many plans have been tried, and that they have failed. There is one plan that has not been tried—a plan that has this in its favour—that wherever it has been tried it has never been known to fail—and that is the plan of putting responsibility upon the people for their own government. We, in 1886, looked with hope, and in 1893 we look with hope, for the speedy accomplishment of such a measure as being the means of at once removing, or at least of mitigating, the chronic difficulties of Irish government, and of setting free the energies of this Parliament to deal with pressing questions affecting Scotland, England, and Wales. In 1886 the Government of that day proposed a measure which may be described in a single sentence, for in that single sentence the pith and kernel of the principle of the measure is contained. It was the creation of a subordinate Legislative Authority in Ireland, and of an Executive responsible to that Legislative Authority, which should have power to legislate in respect of purely Irish affairs subject to and leaving untouched, as it is untouchable, the supreme authority of this Imperial Parliament. Well, the Bill of 1886 failed. Why? It failed mainly for three reasons. I will give these reasons, not merely for the sake of retrospect, but because they have a distinct bearing on some of the questions that are in contention to-day. The first reason was that the public of England and Scotland and Wales were, to a large extent, in a state of unpreparedness for the policy of 1886. The second reason was that by the Bill of 1886 it was proposed to exclude the Irish Members. That proposition was considered quite enough in the eyes of its opponents to condemn the Bill altogether, because it was said that the continued presence of Irish Members in this House was the sign and symbol of the continued supremacy of this Parliament, and that if the Irish Members were to go it meant separation, and nothing but separation. The third reason was that there was connected with that Bill, and forming part of the policy of that Bill, a Land Purchase Scheme. I can speak with some authority, if I may be permitted to say so, upon this matter, and I have the strongest belief that it was not the Self-Government Bill of 1886 that defeated the policy of the Government of that day half as much as the coupling with it of the Land Purchase Scheme. I will only say that in my own constituency and in other constituencies I saw placards on which was written in large letters the question—"Are you, the overtaxed British taxpayer—you, the overburdened Englishman and artizan—going to submit to be taxed to the tune of £200,000,000 in order to buy out the Irish landlords?"

I believe that although the policy came upon unprepared minds to a large extent in this country that policy, so far as self-government for Ireland was concerned, would have succeeded even in 1886 had it not been for the Land Purchase Scheme. As regards the exclusion of the Irish Members, I was then, and am now, opposed to that exclusion. I beg leave to say, if I may be allowed this brief personal reference, that in my speech upon the introduction of that measure in 1886 I expressed the earnest hope that the Government would see their way to yield on the point, not that I feared that the exclusion of the Irish Members would lead to separation, but that I was unwilling on the part of my country and on the part of my countrymen to give up a fair share in the direction of those Imperial interests which they have, according to the measure of their opportunity, their means, and their powers, done their part to build up. They have in every Department of the State done, at least, their share of the work of State service. Although the times have been, I admit, when in Imperial matters the Irish people, or a portion of them, have not mourned when the English people mourned, nor rejoiced when the English people rejoiced, yet I have lived in the hope, and still live in the hope, that the day is not far distant when existing differences will have been removed, and when Irishmen will take as much interest as any Englishman in upholding the interests of that Empire, the greatness of which they have done much to create. The plan of exclusion was universally condemned. It was condemned on all sides of this House; it was condemned in the Press and at public meetings. I must express my surprise at one statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) — namely, that the Liberal Unionist Party had not expressed any views upon that question. My right hon. Friend in effect told us that if it had been inclusion instead of exclusion, the Liberal Unionist Members would have seized upon it just as they seized upon the proposal of the Bill of 1886.

MR. COURTNEY: I said the Liberals would.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: To use the right hon. Gentleman's expression, the opponents of the Bill seized upon the provision which came readiest to their hands. I suppose that Birmingham is some authority upon the question of Liberal Unionism, and I suppose the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings) have some place of importance in the Liberal Unionist Party. I would remind the House that when the Bill was under discussion in 1886, and when this question of the exclusion of the Irish Members was the point of attack, a great meeting was held in Birmingham at which the resolution I am about to read was passed. Supporting this resolution were the right hon. Gentleman the Members for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings), and the resolution was moved by Dr. Dale, a man of authority. It began by expressing confidence in the then head of the Government, my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), and it proceeded as follows:—

“Cordially sympathises with him as the Leader of the Liberal Party in his efforts to make a permanent settlement of the Irish Question, and heartily approves his proposal to entrust to the people of Ireland a large control over their domestic affairs by means of a Representative Assembly, provided that adequate safeguards are devised for maintaining the integrity and unity of the Three Kingdoms; that this meeting recognises in the Irish Government Bill the foundation of such a settlement, and regards with satisfaction the indications of a disposition on the part of the Government to amend the Bill by retaining Irish Representatives in the Imperial Parliament, thus insuring Imperial supremacy and upholding the Liberal principle that taxation and representation must go together; that this meeting trusts that the Amendment suggested, and others that may be shown to be desirable, will be accepted by the Government, and believes that by a measure so amended the just desires of the people of Ireland would be complied with, and that relations of cordiality and mutual confidence between Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom will be established and permanently maintained.”

Well, after that, it is a notorious fact that my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), subsequently to the defeat of the Government, announced that, yielding, as he believed, to the opinion of the House, and to the strong volume of opinion out of the House, as far as he was concerned the exclusion of the Irish Members from this House had dropped out of, and would form no future part of, the scheme for the Government of Ireland. Since 1886 a good deal has happened.

Sir C. Russell

Since that date we have had announced to us by the Party opposite the policy of permanent exceptional repressive legislation. For the first time we have had on the Statute Book in a permanent form an exceptional repressive measure, which is, if the will of right hon. Gentlemen opposite prevail, to endure for ever. That policy, I contend, failed. [Opposition cries of “Oh!”] Will anybody say it succeeded?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Certainly.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I will make two observations in reference to that assertion. The first is, that if anyone will take the trouble to compare the administration of that repressive measure by the right hon. Gentleman in the early stages of his career, when he was young and earnest, with its administration in the later stages of his career as Irish Secretary he will find a very marked change.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There was a marked change in Ireland.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I admit it. But the right hon. Gentleman was in Office under favouring circumstances. What were those favouring circumstances? The first was as to land legislation, which your Party had done all they could to defeat, and to mar when they could not defeat it, and it was beginning to tell with some effect in Ireland. But a much more potent influence was at work in Ireland, and that was the announcement of the policy of 1886, and the fact that a great historical Party had made the question of Irish Government its own. If the right hon. Gentleman's policy succeeded, what an ungrateful country Ireland is, and what an ungrateful country Great Britain is! Because, I suppose, it will be admitted that the electors of Great Britain and Ireland conjointly turned the right hon. Gentleman out of Office. I say his policy failed, and that it did so is shown by the fact that at the end of his administration, so far from anything having been done to satisfy or meet the wishes of the Irish people, the unbending resolve of the Irish people to obtain self-government remained. To-day, even in spite of national differences, four-fifths of the Representatives of Ireland demand Home Rule. I want to know what is the question affecting England or Scotland as to which you can point to such a preponderating force? I would say that since 1886 circumstances favourable to Home Rule have occurred. I have pointed out some of them. There has been the manifestation of a wish on the part of the Irish people to let bygones be bygones—to rase from the national memory events which have burnt deep into it, and to prefer this claim for self-government in a friendly tone—not to demand it as a weapon of offence against England, but as the concession of a just right to be used for the benefit of Ireland. What has been the change in Great Britain? I say the change in Great Britain has been great. There has been wider interest and fuller information on the question. There has been an appreciation more wide and more thorough than existed in 1886 that, after all, this scheme of Home Rule is but a scheme of delegation from the supreme authority for local legislative purposes on conditions which the supreme authority fixes, and which leave that supreme authority untouched. Above all, there is the manifestation of a charitable and kindly feeling in the generous mind of England and Scotland and Wales to make allowances for the indiscretions, for the wrong things done and said by the friends and advocates of Ireland when they were actuated almost by the spirit of despair. We approach the question now finally with these considerations, and, further, the consideration which the people of these countries, believe me, are beginning to take to heart and realise: that, after all, there is no divided interest between Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom; that it cannot be a gain for England or Scotland that Ireland should remain discontented; and that the great volume of opposition to this concession of Home Rule comes in the main from the Party which in times past has, as long as it dared, opposed all popular reform, and that Home Rule is supported by the Party which in the past has been the great instrument for securing popular rights and defending them. I should now like to be allowed to consider briefly one or two of the main objections urged against this Bill by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin. He said there was no mandate for the Bill. What does that mean? It is, of course, quite true to say that this Bill, verbatim et literatim, was not before the country; but except the alteration as to the two orders which appeared in the Bill of 1886 and the question of the exclusion of the Irish Members, does anybody suppose that any intelligent politician or voter or any unintelligent politician or voter who took any interest whatever in this matter did not well know that the principle of the Bill of 1886—namely, the creation of a Legislative Body to deal with Irish affairs—was the principle by which the Liberal Party stood, and to which they would give effect at the next General Election? I do not think that many people will agree with the suggestion that this question was not before the country, and was not fully considered upon every platform where politics were discussed—[“Oh!” and Opposition laughter]—aye, upon every platform where politics were discussed in the seven years that intervened. I will cite the authority of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He says—

“We are face to face with the great fact . . . that the great majority of the Liberal Party are pledged to the principle of Home Rule, and have been strenuously endeavouring during the last seven years to make it a cardinal feature of Liberal policy.”

That is literally and absolutely true. Then it is said—“Oh, but the scant majority you have got was not got upon this question at all,” and some Members have pointed out how far that majority depends upon the Irish vote. I will do my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin the justice to say that he did not make that point. Why is the Irish vote to be excluded? Why are you, the advocates of unity, to use this language of separation? Why, upon a question which directly affects Ireland, in the calculation of votes are you to exclude the Irish votes? But it is said that the question of Home Rule was mixed up with other questions, and the opponents of this so-called revolutionary measure of Home Rule for Ireland suggest a revolution which is still greater, so far as our Constitution is concerned—namely, the referendum upon this question. I do not wish to dwell long upon the question of the referendum. I content myself with saying—and I fancy I shall have the assent of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin—that where by the Constitution the Representative House creates and controls the Executive Government where, as in this country, it is a Government by Party, the referendum can, in its proper sense, have no proper application and place. Why? Because the question for the electorate must always be, taking the policies of the two Parties before the country, which of these policies best recommends itself to support. It is said that some voters voted for Home Rule candidates because they were interested in the temperance question, and because they were interested in the Disestablishment question for Wales and Scotland. Quite possible; but were there no voters who voted in support of Conservative candidates because they were sound on the liquor question, or because they were opposed to Disestablishment? The same thing would occur if the question were referred to-morrow. So much for the question of mandate and the statement that the Bill was not before the country. It is said next that the question has not been discussed in this House. On that point I have very little to add to what the Prime Minister stated yesterday, but I should like to be permitted to say just a word or two. Four days were occupied on the First Reading of the Bill, 12 on the Second Reading, 47 in the Committee stage, 14 on the Report stage, and, if the Division takes place as arranged to-morrow night, at least three days upon the Third Reading stage. That represents the time taken in passing through Parliament four great measures of primary importance, and some of them of great Constitutional importance. It represents the total time occupied in the passage of the Act of Union, the Reform Bill of 1831, the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill, and the British North America Act. These four Bills took no more time than the time taken for the consideration of this one measure. I notice that my right hon. Friend, who always means to be perfectly candid, says—

Perhaps not; but whose fault is that? That is what we say, that if you had wanted to discuss this Bill fairly and to invoke the opinion of the House upon what you believed to be essential questions, it was your own fault if you did not do it. My right hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division tells us that he is going into the villages. He seems to regard the villages as a kind of special playground of his own; and he is going to tell the villages that we have gagged—“second-hand,” by the way—the discussion on this matter. I will tell you what I think the villages will say to my right hon. Friend. They will say that if there was anything worth saying and worth listening to 80 days were ample for the purpose. But what will the country, to which hon. Gentlemen are so fond of appealing, ask themselves in their consideration of this question? They will ask themselves in what spirit the discussion of this Bill was approached by its opponents, and we shall be able to remind them that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington said—“We do not desire to amend the Bill”; that the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh said—“We will not touch an Amendment of the Bill”; that the right hon. Gentleman the Senior Member for the University of Dublin said—“We will discuss the Bill to make it more detestable,” and that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition more cautiously said—

“We may move Amendments to the Bill, but we will try to destroy the Bill.”

[Opposition cheers.] Yes; I quite expected those cheers. That is a perfectly legitimate object on your part. You disapprove of this Bill; you regard it as a bad Bill, and you are entitled to endeavour to destroy it. Nobody can complain of that; but what I wish to enforce on the House is that from these expressions it will be apparent that the real question is not as to this or that Amendment, not as to the exact constitution of the Council, not as to the exact distribution of seats, not as to crossing the t's and dotting the i's in the drafting of Amendments, but that the question which divides that side of the House from this is whether you oppose or are in favour of the principle of autonomy in Ireland? What the country will, I think, ask itself is this: What Amendment could have been conceded by the Government, short of the destruction of the principle of the Bill, which would have done anything to conciliate, or even to mitigate, opposition? But, in fact, the Bill was much more amply discussed than the mere enumeration of the clauses and the Amendments would at all suggest, because both on the earlier stages, and even in Committee, the fullest licence was given both by the Chairman of Committees and Mr. Speaker to refer to other matters in connection with the Bill so far as they had any connection, even although indirect, with the particular clause or Amendment under discussion. In these circumstances, I submit to the judgment of this House and of the country that it became a question ultimately whether the minority was to overbear the majority, or whether the work on which we have spent long, tedious, and tiresome months was or was not to be thrown away. An hon. Friend of mine, the hon. Member for Argyllshire, humorously, in a thin House, described literally the position of the Opposition in relation to this Bill. He said—"You display most anxious consideration about the most minute constituent parts of this prescription, which this House of Parliament is engaged in making up. You do this, although you well know that you have arranged with a friend in another place to chuck the bottle containing it out of the window." That, literally, was a true description of the position of the Opposition in relation to this Bill. Well, the Closure has been used, "second-hand." That is a phrase of the right hon. Member for Bodmin, for which I thank him. Who has any love for the Closure? Certainly not we on this side of the House. It is an evil at the best, I admit, only to be defended where its use avoids a scandal and an evil greater still. But we had in this matter a curious suggestion from the Leader of the Liberal Unionist Party, as he desires to call himself. I refer to the extraordinary statement coming from the noble Duke delivered in Yorkshire the other day, when he told us that he should take a part, and a prominent part, in the rejection of this measure in another place, because it had not been sufficiently discussed in this House. What right has the House to which the noble Duke belongs to dictate to us in this matter what shall be the limits or mode of discussion which we judge to be best? Are they to be entitled to say—"We agree with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham that 100 days ought to have been given to the discussion, and, as only 80 days have been given, we reject the measure"? Mr. Speaker, I repudiate this right to introduce this entirely novel doctrine, which means interference on matters under the absolute judgment and control of this House. Another point I come to is the question of the power of the Lord Lieutenant as to giving or withholding his assent to legislative measures. I am anxious to say a word about this, as I was anxious to say a word on last Friday in the discussion—rather heated—in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham took part. I was anxious to join in that discussion; but it was judged by others, to whose opinion I deferred, that as the time for the Report had been fixed, and as it was then short, we ought not to curtail the use of that time by others. I wish, upon this question of the veto—as it is frequently miscalled; more correctly called the power of the Lord Lieutenant to give or withhold assent—to say a few words. The three classes of cases which have to be considered in this connection are—First, Bills which are clearly within the competence of the Irish Legislative Body, and which contain no suggestion of oppression or injustice, and as to which no difficulty arises; secondly, Bills which are outside the powers of the Irish Legislative Body, or which do contain provisions oppressive or unjust, and as to which also no difficulty can reasonably arise; thirdly, questions which may be said to be doubtful, and with respect to which the question is asked whether the Lord Lieutenant is to judge whether they are within or without the competence of the Irish Legislative Body, and, if not, who ought to judge? As to this, I wish to speak perfectly plainly as to the position I conceive the Lord Lieutenant to be in. If you will not allow to the Irish Legislative Body the possession of some modicum of common sense, I hope it is not too large a demand to make to ask that you will admit that the Lord Lieutenant may possess some portion of that important quality. If he does, the Lord Lieutenant will have only one course to follow—to be open and aboveboard with his Ministers, and to consult them from time to time in the progress of their legislative work. If he thinks that their legislative enterprises point to offences or possible offences against the 3rd and 4th clauses of this Bill, the restrictive and exemption clauses, he must warn them, and do all that he can to avoid coming into collision with the Irish Legislative Body. And if necessary he must seek advice from the Imperial Cabinet, putting before that Body the views of his own Ministers in support of their contention and policy and being guided by the advice which he so seeks; and if, in spite of remonstrance and advice, the Irish Ministers discard his opinion, then he has his Constitutional right to dissolve Parliament, and the further Constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers. It is said that that does not meet the difficulty at all, and that the real difficulty will arise when Irish Ministers at the end of the Session, when the Appropriation Bill is a matter of urgency and the Supplies for the Public Service are needed, tack on to the Appropriation Bill some provisions which are objectionable, and then go to the Lord Lieutenant and say—"At the peril of stopping Supply refuse your assent to this Bill." In such a case—I believe it to be practically impossible—the Lord Lieutenant would be perfectly entitled to say—"You have acted in bad faith towards me; you have not informed me of this. I will not prorogue Parliament; reconsider your Bill. I will take advice, and, if necessary, delay the prorogation of Parliament." That would be the obvious and perfectly Constitutional course to take. Then it is said that the Chancellor of the Duchy showed that the veto was utterly useless, because he said that if the Irish Parliament were so minded it could easily embarrass the Lord Lieutenant. So it could. What is there to compel it? How could you compel it to vote Supplies? It might refuse to vote Supply, but whose would be the responsibility? The responsibility would be the responsibility of the Irish Government, and you are asked to believe that the Irish Ministers—I care not from what section of Irish opinion they are drawn—would pursue a course which would not only invite, but would justify, interference by the Imperial Parliament; that they would do something which would imperil that precious gift, as they regard it, of self-government for which they have laboured so long; and that they would by such insane conduct paralyse and destroy the efficiency of their own National Government. I have felt indignant frequently in the course of these Debates at the tone—the contemptuous tone—in which the Irish nation has been referred to. I decline to consider any question in relation to it as if they were inferior to the rest of their fellow-subjects, and ought to be treated as a nation of inborn fools. The last point to which I wish to refer is the 9th clause, or, as it now stands in the Bill, the 10th clause. I would respectfully ask attention to what I have to say upon this, because, unless, indeed, I be mistaken, there has been a great deal of misrepresentation and certainly a great deal of exaggeration about the character and effect of that clause. How is that question to be approached? I admit the difficulties, however the matter is to be approached. No course which can be proposed is free from difficulties; but I wish the House to remember that, in considering it from the Government point of view, they must accept one datum—and that is that public opinion in 1886 and since has determined that the Irish Members are not to be excluded from the Imperial Parliament. Now, that being so, and that being settled as we conceived by the voice of the country in 1886, there are only two possible plans—inclusion for all purposes and inclusion for limited purposes. I ask myself if inclusion for limited purposes had been chosen—what you call, in order to ridicule it, the in-and-out clause—what would have been said? How hon. Members in all parts of the House would have been sharpening their wits in exposing that provision, or any provision on those lines. I admit, and I again concur with what the right hon. Member for Bodmin said, that inclusion for limited purposes would have gone no nearer to conciliate opposition than the clause as it stands. [Mr. COURTNEY: Both are bad.] I wish to point out that that means that you are unwilling to recognise Home Rule at all. [Cheers.] I am perfectly well aware of that, but you are making a special attack on the 9th clause; and the hon. Member for South Tyrone the other night, when flushed with victory, told us that it was not Home Rule, but the 9th clause which had won that victory at Hereford. That being so, and the choice being as between limited purposes and for all purposes, I content myself by saying that for limited purposes it has been shown how difficult of operation such a scheme would be, and that it would involve a novelty in our system and also an organic change which is not the consequence of retention for all purposes. It is said that retention for all purposes—and this is the pith and point of objection to which I desire to direct my remarks—gives, beyond the position which they now have, a power and right to Irishmen to interfere in Scotch, English, and Welsh affairs. I want, in the first place, to ask, have they not that power now? Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that, going back for a long series of years, Irish questions have decided the fate, and, therefore, the policies, of successive Governments, and that thus they have affected English, Scotch, and Welsh affairs? As long as Irish Members continue to sit in this House, whether under an “in-and-out” clause or otherwise, they will always have the right to vote upon the question of the policy of the Government, because that is an Imperial question, and they will have the right to vote upon all Imperial questions. But that is their position now. But it is said that in the future Irish Members will have the right to vote upon questions that are exclusively English, Scotch, or Welsh, and that, inasmuch as Ireland will have the exclusive control over her own affairs, that would be unjust to England, Ireland, and Wales. Well, I will give those hon. Members who hold those views a crumb of comfort. It is this: That in the whole history of this Parliament there is, as far as I am aware—and I have asked others who are better informed upon the point than I am—no one measure that has been forced upon England or Scotland against the wish of the majority of the Representatives of those countries.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): The Local Veto Bill.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Has the Local Veto Bill passed? Has it even been read a second time?

An hon. MEMBER: The First Reading was passed by Irish votes.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: No; it has not so passed. I say the tendency of opinion is growing stronger day by day to give weight to local opinion, and that is the principle of the Bill referred to; and I do not hesitate to say, speaking for myself, that if the majority of the English, Scotch, and Welsh Representatives were seriously opposed to any particular measure affecting either of those countries separately, it would be absolutely impossible—morally impossible—for Parliament to force it upon them. I will only add this: that Ireland is the only country in which the predominant voices of England and Scotland have forced measures that were repugnant to her. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was the hero of that performance, because up to 1885 the voice of Ireland was not properly represented by popular votes, and since 1885 the right hon. Gentleman has been—in 1887—the author of a measure which was obnoxious to the Irish people, and which was forced upon her against the protests of the great majority of her Representatives. The tendency of opinion is, I again say, such that it is morally impossible to force a measure upon England, Scotland, or Wales against the wish of a majority of their Representatives. It is one of the principles of the Liberal Party that the voice of the country affected is to be respected, and it is the principle Lord Hartington in 1885-6 (when he had a right to speak for the Liberal Party) avowed ought to be observed in relation to Scotch Disestablishment and in regard also to Welsh Disestablishment. The question, therefore, is a practical one. It is: Will the position of England, Scotland, and Wales be worse or better than it is to-day under the Home Rule Bill with the 10th clause in it? That is the practical question. I say that their position will be better under that Bill than it is now—not only because the Irish Members will be here in reduced numbers, but because, by granting Home Rule, we shall have removed to a large extent the motive for the interference on the part of Irish Members with English, Scotch, and Welsh affairs, and because, further, the Irish Nationalists will realise that any such interference on their part with English, Scotch, and Welsh affairs would provoke retaliation on the part of this Parliament with Irish affairs, which is the last thing that the Irish Legislature would desire. I should have desired to say a few words on the question of the land, but I have already occupied the House at great length; and I should like to say a word as to the Exchequer Judges, in reference to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). He, in effect, said—

“They are appointed to safeguard Imperial interests, but where is the authority by which they can enforce their decrees?”

The answer to that is to be found in the 19th clause, Section 5, which says that the Exchequer Judges are entitled, in the first instance, to invoke the aid of the Local Authorities, and to create, if those Authorities are wanting, such agencies as are necessary to give effect to their decisions. The difficulty apprehended is not a real difficulty. Authority exists where there is power, as there is here, to demand, if necessary, the exercise of Imperial authority. Wherever there is power there is authority to do such acts as the circumstances of the case may require. Hon. Members may remember the case of the Georgia prisoners, incarcerated under an unconstitutional law. Their release was ordered by the Supreme Court, and a mere piece of paper, signed, “John Marshall”—the name of the Chief Judge of that Court—was ultimately sufficient to procure that release. The Executive authority of the Federal Government in the United States to-day does not rest upon local manifestations of local force; the Federal authority can be brought into play with all the power that may be required. One word with regard to Ulster: I am glad to say that in these Debates we have not heard much about it.

AN hon. MEMBER: You will hear a great deal about it.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: The loyal minority were referred to by the hon. Member who preceded me. We have heard very little in the course of this Debate about the question of religious intolerance, and, in my opinion, that is a matter of happy augury for the future. I am glad to find that it is not seriously contemplated by any hon. Members in this House that the powers to be conferred by this Bill upon the Irish Legislature will be used for the purpose of religious persecution. I was glad to hear from the speech of the hon. Member for the South Division of Dublin County (Mr. H. Plunkett), who has lived all his life in Ireland, and who knows the character of the Catholic people of Ireland and the circumstances of the country, that he had no dread of the misuse of the powers to be conferred upon the Irish Legislature for the purposes of religious oppression. I believe that that opinion widely prevails among the Protestants of Ireland. There are, if needed, adequate safeguards in the Bill, but there is no fear, and I believe that there are no grounds whatever for the apprehensions that have been in some quarters expressed in this House upon the point. In that connection I will make but two observations. Whatever may have been the faults connected with the National movement in Ireland, that movement has been a National movement, and it has been in no sense a sectarian movement. I would like any gentleman who thinks the Catholics of Ireland are intolerant and illiberal to their Protestant fellow-countrymen to read the speech of an hon. Member of this House, the hon. and learned Member for Accrington (Mr. Leese), recently delivered upon this subject, in which comparison was made between the counties in Ireland in which the Protestants are predominant and those in which the Catholics are predominant; and in which it was shown that in the counties where the Catholics are in a majority they have recognised fairly and fully the claims of their Protestant fellow-countrymen to share equally in all the advantages that they themselves enjoy in the government of those localities. The only intolerance that has been exhibited in Ireland has been shown by that part of Ulster that claims to itself the possession of all the virtues, intelligence, spirit, and enterprise of the country. Well, Ulster has not made any claim for separate treatment under this Bill. I honour Ulster for that. I am glad that Ulster has been content to throw in its lot with the rest of the country. Whatever may be the feelings that actuate some hon. Members to-day, I am constrained to think that the lofty and purifying influences which spring from the power of self-government will not fail to act upon the minds of Irishmen any more than upon the minds of other communities. I am confident that when Ulstermen have their fate and their destinies in their own hands, they will forget the causes which have kept them apart from the rest of Ireland, and will apply themselves with patriotic minds to do their duty

by their country. There are still some things upon which I should like to have dwelt, but I will only say a word or two upon the question of what is the alternative policy to that of Home Rule. You condemn our policy. What is yours? You have told us what it was in your measure of 1887, which one of your ablest men has endeavoured to carry out in thorough fashion. I said before, and I repeat now, you have failed in that policy. You have done nothing to reconcile the four-fifths of the people of Ireland—they are as much opposed to your policy to-day as they were when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) opposite took Office. When he left Office, his Lord Lieutenant (Lord Zetland), speaking in the North of England, declared that it was impossible to govern Ireland by ordinary law and without perpetual measures of an exceptional character. And now I have to ask those who, I suppose, still believe that the Government of Ireland is the most bureaucratic in the world; that the people of Ireland are more divorced from their own Government than any people in the world; that the system of government known as the Castle Government could not be tolerated in any country where the healthy breath of native opinion was not stifled, what is the remedy? We have propounded a remedy. What is the policy which you propound to cure that state of things? Is it that miserable policy proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in the County Government Bill—a Bill heaped with ridicule from its birth, but as to which the most sanguine admirer of the right hon. Gentleman will not dare to say that it touched, in the very least degree, the evils signified by the name of the Government of Dublin Castle. This system is admitted to be a crying evil. What is the plan by which you suggest it is to be overcome, short of having a Representative Body in Ireland with an Executive responsible to that Representative Body? This is a question which requires an answer. I know of no other plan that has been, or can be, suggested. We have propounded our policy. It may fail to-day, but there is not one of you who does not in his heart of hearts believe that it must ultimately pass. You indulge in doleful jeremiads as to what is to happen when it does pass. You are only doing what your Party has always done in regard to every great measure that went to broaden the popular bases on which the Institutions of the country rest. Probably this Bill, when it does become law, will not do all the good, or cause any of the evil, predicted for it. I do not believe that it will bring the millennium to Ireland. It depends on the people of Ireland themselves—upon their firmness, upon their fulfilment of the great and noble duty cast upon them in the new era opening to their country, upon their securing and cherishing this priceless gift of self-government, not for a section or for a sect, but for all classes of their fellow-countrymen—for the whole people of Ireland. Mr. Speaker, the claim of Ireland to self-government has survived many and great calamities. It has survived famine. It has survived emigration, which drained the life-blood of the country. It has survived coercion in all its hateful moods and tenses. It has survived the errors of its friends. And vain is the hope that now when it has been espoused by a great historic Party, the greatest agency of wise progressive legislation in the past as it will be the greatest in the future—vain, indeed, is the hope that it will die now. Mr. Speaker, great is the responsibility of the men or of the Party that would let and hinder this settlement, and by delay would rob it of all its grace, and relegate it to that long category of measures dealing with Ireland which have been yielded from necessity, and not from a willing sense of justice.

MR. D. PLUNKET (Dublin University): My hon. and learned Friend began his speech by finding some fault with the hon. Member for the Norwood Division for the admirable speech with which he delighted the House, on the ground that it did not throw much light on the subject of this Bill. Well, Sir, I am bound to say, much as I admire the eloquence of my hon. and learned Friend, I cannot help feeling that in a great part of his speech he has thrown no light on those portions of the Bill to which, when he rose, it was hoped he would address himself. My hon. and learned Friend was so much concerned with the general principles of what he laid down at the commencement that he found he had not time to deal with many matters to which we attach great importance. I am sure the House would have listened with pleasure if he had gone on and dealt with these subjects. What was the light thrown by my hon. and learned Friend on the Bill? He dealt with the Lord Lieutenant and the exercise of the power of the veto—one of the few matters fully discussed and closed in the end. At the time it was discussed the Government were unable to give any answer to our argument, and I do not think my hon. and learned Friend has put his defence of the Bill in this respect much further. Then he went on to deal with the Exchequer Judges, and I am glad he did so, for that is one of the questions upon which we wanted the counsel of my hon. and learned Friend. His answer on that subject amounted to this: that if the Exchequer Judges want to enforce their authority, they must call in the Army and Navy; and that it was, in fact, by the Imperial Forces alone that their authority was to be enforced. My hon. and learned Friend made a statement which seems to me a most extraordinary error on his part, for he claims the well-known case of Chief Justice Marshall as a proof of what a threat of the Executive authority would do. The facts are not, however, as my hon. and learned Friend has stated them. My recollection is that that authority was never carried out.

SIR C. RUSSELL: The prisoners were released by the State of Georgia.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): No, no!

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): It is a mistake; they were not.

MR. PLUNKET: Yes; I am right, so that my hon. and learned Friend's argument on that point has entirely broken down—the instance upon which he rested the strength of his argument against the case we have made on the provisions of this Bill. Well, Sir, I will not renew the Debate on that subject. I might go on dealing with points that have been dealt with over and over again. I shall not do so. I shall, however, say one word in passing of the general observations which my hon. and learned Friend introduced at the beginning of his speech. He first of all pronounced a funeral oration upon the abortive Bill of 1886, and he explained the reasons why that measure was rejected by an overwhelming majority of the constituencies of the United Kingdom. The oration was made for the purpose of showing why the present Bill should not be rejected—why it should fare better, since it did not contain the defects of the Bill of 1886. The fact that there is a difference does not prove that this Bill is likely to succeed. He said that the country was not prepared in 1886 for that particular measure. But, I should like to know, has the country been prepared for this Bill? If he says so, I answer—Let him try it, and the sooner the better. My hon. and learned Friend said something about the Land Purchase Bill of 1886; but he said nothing of the Land Question in connection with the present Bill, although in 1886 the Prime Minister relied mainly on the agrarian relations in Ireland. He had nothing to say now on that subject. Another reason he gave for the rejection of the Bill of 1886 was the exclusion of the Irish Members. That proposal may have been bad or it may have been good; but after all the vacillation and concealment of the Government—however it may have carried them through their difficulty in this House—this point, I venture to predict, will be the rock upon which, beyond all others, their ship will go to pieces. What else did my hon. and learned Friend say in the earlier part of his speech? He said the Home Rule Bill was introduced in 1886 because it had been proved that it was impossible to carry on the Government of the Queen, and that the government of the Land League was omnipotent there. Then he went on to denounce the Tory policy of repressive measures—"coercion for ever and ever," as it used to be called. I observed that, although my hon. and learned Friend went into that question, the Prime Minister, in introducing his Bill this year, did not rely upon it at all. The Land Question, and the situation arising out of that question, formed the chief topics of his speech in 1886; he never alluded to them in introducing the present Bill. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman rest his policy this year on the same ground as in 1886? Because all his prophecies had been defeated, all his statements as to the impossibility of carrying on the Government of Ireland except by such coercion as had never been known before had been falsified and all his forecasts on this subject had failed. The hon. and learned

Mr. D. Plunket

Gentleman (Sir C. Russell) began to argue that the policy of the late Government had failed, and when he was told it had not failed, and he saw that he had started on the wrong lines, he went on to say why it had not failed. The reasons he assigned were that the Land Act was beginning to produce beneficent effects, and the hope of the coming Home Rule was influencing the lives of the people. Well, Sir, we have heard that argument before, and what does it come to? The working of the Land Act did not prevent the Leaders of the National League from doing all they could to make the law in Ireland a failure, nor did it prevent hon. Gentlemen, and even right hon. Gentlemen opposite, from aiding and abetting them in this House. But the attempt to defeat the law failed. Baffled and beaten, the conspiracy fell back; and when my right hon. Friend (Mr. A. J. Balfour) left the Government of Ireland the law of this land had been established, the law of the Land League had been broken down, terrorism had been defeated, honest men could go about and do their work in freedom and in safety, and, in spite of the so-called "coercion for ever and ever," there was hardly a person in gaol under the Crimes Act; indeed, the gaols were empty and the banks were full; peace prevailed in Ireland, contracts were observed, and all the anticipations and prophecies on which the Prime Minister founded his demand for Home Rule in 1886 had been utterly disappointed. Well, Sir, I do not desire to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman further into that part of his speech, nor do I desire to attempt to argue again any of the points on which I have had the honour, by the favour of the House, of addressing it on former occasions. I should have been glad if we had had from the hon. and learned Gentleman or from some other Member of the Government further light upon some of those portions of the Bill which have not been debated at all, or have been inadequately debated. The utter inadequacy of the provision was demonstrated; so much so that on the 11th August the Prime Minister went so far as to say that—

"If it could be proved upon a discussion of the Schedule that it was unjust as between Nationalists and Unionists, not only a very grave charge of indiscretion and neglect would have been made good against the Government, but likewise a very strong case would have been made out for compulsory rectification, at whatever cost of time, of that error."

Well, Sir, has there been compulsory rectification? Is this Bill to leave the House without any further explanation as to what the Government are prepared or what they are not prepared to do? We had no opportunity of discussing that matter on the early Sittings on the Bill, and I think I can fairly claim to hear something on this final stage of the measure from someone who can speak with the authority of a Member of the Government. But though we have not had an opinion from the Government as to whether or not the Schedule is unjust, we have been favoured with the opinion of an hon. Member sitting on the other side of the House. My hon. and learned Friend opposite boasted to-day that the workableness of this Bill was proved by the Divisions—by the support which the majority have given to it. But, certainly, the workableness of the Bill is not clear to the mind of at least one of the supporters of the Government, who should be supposed to know something about it—I refer to the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Little). Speaking on August 7 that hon. Member said—

"The Schedule would shut out the Protestant minority in Leinster, who numbered about 300,000 or 400,000, from any representation either in the Irish House or in this House. . . . On behalf of Leinster he demanded from the Government and from the House some scheme which would give adequate representation in the Irish Parliament to the Protestant and Catholic minority. . . . He asked the Government to put before the House a plan which would provide a fair representation in the Upper House, in the Lower House, and in the Imperial Parliament, for the minority in Ireland."

That was the demand made to the Government by one of their supporters, specially well qualified to speak on the subject, yet we have not a word of explanation from them. And this is the condition in which this "workable" Bill is to be sent away from this House. Well, there is one matter which I desire—with the permission of the House—to dwell on at a little greater length. I will deal with it as shortly as I can, but at the same time I hope the House will bear with me, for the matter is one which greatly affects many of those I have the honour to represent in this House. I desire to put some questions to the House and to ask for some explanations as to their dealings in this Bill with the Land Question of Ireland. We have not been well treated by the Government in this matter. I think the House must have observed with me that when the Prime Minister sat down at the end of the great speech with which he introduced the Bill not a word had been uttered on the Land Question in Ireland, as if there had not been a Land Question there at all. But when we saw the Bill itself, what did we find was the provision dealing with this subject? The provision was that that question should be reserved from the Irish Legislature for three years. A most extraordinary provision, and I protest that up to that moment I had not the smallest idea on what principle the clause had been introduced into the Bill. We have not heard a word of explanation on that subject, and the transitory provision was huddled away into the furthest corner of the furthest "compartment," where it was impossible to get at it. The House has not been treated fairly and frankly. I hope that when someone rises on the Front Bench opposite we shall, on this subject, have an explanation of the most amazing change of front which had ever been made by any Government. I say I am entitled to speak on this subject, not only because I represent tens of thousands of men who will be speedily and absolutely ruined if this Bill should pass in its present form, but because, after all, the Land Question is the Irish Question. When the Prime Minister introduced his Home Rule Bill in 1886 it was on the Land Question and the Agrarian Question arising out of it that he mainly relied, and when, a week later, he was introducing his Land Purchase Bill that formed the whole foundation of the speech and the policy which he propounded. I will read a few of the words which were then spoken by the Prime Minister, because I desire to obtain some explanation, if it can be given, of the great change of front of the Government, not only in procedure, but, as I contend, in principle, and as to the obligations of duty and honour which were then spoken of and which now appear to be forgotten. The Prime Minister, after a most exhaustive and interesting review of the Land Question, summed up the case thus—

"It would be an ill-intended and an ill-happen kindness to any class in Ireland to hand over to an Irish Legislature as its first introduction to the work that it may have to perform this business of dealing with the question of the land. It would be like giving over to Ireland the worst part of her feuds and confronting her with the necessity for efforts which would possibly be hopeless, but which at any rate would be attended with the most fearful risks."

Are we not entitled to know, if the Land Question is to be handed over to the Irish Legislature after three years, how we are to avoid or get rid of these fearful risks? But in that same speech he argued, in support of what he called "an obligation of policy and a dictate of honour," that the deeds of the Irish landlords were, to a great extent, the deeds of the Imperial Parliament, because

"With power in their hand it had looked on—it had not only looked on, it had encouraged and sustained," and so he came to the conclusion

"That Great Britain should make herself a Party to the matter—to the extent at least, as he said, of 'a just offer and a fair opportunity' given to the landlords of extricating themselves, if they would, from the position of peril in which they had been placed by the facts of history he had reviewed."

In the same speech he added the well-known words—

"It is impossible to deny that the landlords have been our garrison and our representatives; that we have relied upon them as they have relied upon us, and that we cannot wash our hands of the responsibility for their doings and for the consequence of those doings."

The right hon. Gentleman the other day by interjection—and all the light which has been thrown on this subject has been by way of interjection—stated that these words were spoken with respect to facts and circumstances which were then existing. But is that any argument? But these reasonings were not founded on the facts and circumstances which then existed. They were hewn out of the rock of Irish history—they were found embedded in the chronic condition of the social system of Ireland; they were the fruit, I suppose, of his own observation of the difficulties and dangers of the question for half-a-century of public life. I do not wish to go into the antecedents of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, but I say, generally, the Prime Minister is quite indignant now if anyone suspects the leaders of the agrarian revolution in Ireland of hostility or injustice towards the Irish landlords. He seems to think that the leaders of the League, who were formerly "marching through rapine," the leaders of the League whose steps were dogged by crime, are all now "the mildest-mannered men that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat." And the other night he told us there was "no reason why they should accept the proposition that the Irish people were to be held untrustworthy with regard to the administration of the Land Laws."

I venture, with all respect, to refer him back to his arguments, and I confront him with his conclusions which I have quoted; and I claim that someone on the part of the Government should explain to us this fundamental change in their policy. We want to know what is the change in the circumstances that have since happened? On what grounds do they justify the policy of this Bill? by which they do hand over (after three years) the Irish Land Question to the Irish Parliament—by which they do leave the landlords without any just offer—without any fair opportunity of escaping from their certain doom. What are the principles of this Bill? In the first place, with regard to the Executive, if the Bill were to pass to-morrow, the power of appointing the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners who are to fix the rents in the future would be absolutely in the hands of the Irish Executive. The duty of enforcing the law and of giving such protection and assistance to the landlords as might be required would be absolutely in the hands of the Irish Executive. We have stated the manner in which the Irish Executive would be sure to exercise these powers; and not only has it not been gainsaid, but no attempt has been made to gainsay it. But what are the proposals as regards legislation that are introduced into the Bill? As I have said, it is proposed to hand over the power of legislating as to the land to the Irish Executive for three years. I ventured to put down on the Paper, when we were in the Committee stage, Amendments which would have had the effect of reserving the Land Question to the Imperial Parliament not for three years but altogether—or, at any rate, until some permanent settlement of the main difficulties of the matter was arrived at. I thought, and still think, that that would have been the natural corollary following from the reasons and policy propounded by the Prime Minister in 1886. But we never reached that clause, and we have never had any opportunity of debating it, and no explanation as yet has been given. As I understand, the Prime Minister expressed the pious opinion that it would be possible for the Imperial Parliament to grapple with the question of Irish land during the next three years, and hints were thrown out by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General to the same effect. If the Home Rule Bill is passed, and we get rid of what is called the incubus of the Irish Question, is it not absurd to suppose that, with the Irish Members present in this House, a Bill could be passed disposing of the Land Question which at the end of three years—supposing no such measure were adopted—would come under the unrestricted control of the Irish Legislature? It is playing with the House to tell us that before the expiration of the three years the Imperial Parliament may settle the Irish Land Question. In proof of my statement that the landlords will be in deadly peril if the Bill passes in its present form, I will not refer to the speeches of the Irish Members, but I will cite the authority of Members of the present Cabinet. I will not cite the Prime Minister, for he has been more guarded in his statements than some of his Colleagues, and there is no inference to be drawn from his arguments except that there was grave apprehension on the part of the landlords, and that it was necessary to afford them some opportunity of escape. I do not wish to weary the House with many quotations, but here is what was said by one who, before the Land Purchase Bill was debated in 1886, was a Cabinet Minister, and who is the Secretary for Scotland in the present Government—

"Mr. Gladstone and his Colleagues were just men. They were determined that the Irish landlords should not be ruined by being exposed to the action of the Irish Executive. They knew that, under the proposals they were bringing before the country, the Irish landlords would be ruined, and so they brought in a Land Purchase Bill."

I would ask the House to listen to a quotation from another gentleman, who was not at that time a Member of the Cabinet, but who is now—and I am sorry that he is not in his place at this moment. I refer to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Bryce). The Chancellor of the Duchy has played a rather unhappy part in regard to the Bill. With a very considerable knowledge of the American Constitution, he was allowed by his Colleagues to introduce some safeguards and precautions which turned out to be worth nothing at all—though when it was sought to introduce other provisions taken from the same source which might be of some avail in protecting the minority, the answer was that gentlemen below the Gangway would not consent. But the right hon. Gentleman, though, perhaps, not very successful in his experiments as a Constitution maker, is a brilliant writer, and I will, therefore, ask leave to make an extract from an article written by him in February, 1886, in one of the magazines, which states clearly the case for the Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“One of the weightiest arguments against the creation of any Legislative Body in Ireland, whether central or local, whether a Parliament, or a Provincial Council, or a County Board, is the danger it involves to landowners. The power of dealing with the land is the very power the Irish most desire; what object is there in a grant from which the power is reserved? But everybody knows how such a power would be used. Most Nationalists own that they would give a merely nominal compensation to the landlords, whom they regard as robbers. Some talk of five years' purchase, some of prairie value. It is proposed, even by some English statesmen, to give Elective County Authorities the control of the police. But with the police under the orders of an Elective Board the landlord might whistle for his rent. He would be lucky if he kept a whole skin. His property would be gone without any need for confiscatory legislation. Now, can the Imperial Parliament leave the landlords to the mercy of an Irish Authority? There is a feeling against them in England, a feeling justified by the sins of the class in time past, but which ought not to make us forget the innocence of many members of the class, still less the hardships which some of the innocent—ladies, for instance, with no livelihood save their rents—have suffered since 1879. All of them, however, be they good or bad, and their mortgagees, have legal rights grounded on Imperial Statutes. The honour of England is pledged to these rights. At no cost can we abandon them. We could not look other nations in the face were we to throw over men whose property we confirmed as lately as by the Act of 1881; not to speak of the shock which so pernicious a precedent would give to the security of property in England and Scotland. It has been suggested that guarantees might be taken from any Irish Authority against interference with contracts, or vested rights of property. But such guarantees would not touch the police difficulty; and in any case they would be uncertain in their effect, likely to give rise to infinite litigation, certain to produce conflicts between any Irish Authority and Imperial Statutes. They would keep up that very irritation which the grant of powers of local legislation would be designed to remove. The conclusion follows that before any police control or any considerable legislative functions can be conferred on an Irish Authority, whether central or local, the Land Question must be grappled with. Reasonable compensation must be offered to the landowners, and either prior to or concurrently with any settlement of the other questions this compensation must be secured, and a scheme enacted for the discharge by the purchasing tenants of the liability devolved upon them.”

These were the words of the right hon. Gentleman, who is a careful student and an accurate writer, and who is not specially friendly to the landlords as a class. It is not necessary to make quotations from Irish Members; but I ask the right hon. Gentleman, or any Member of the Government, to tell us what has happened since 1886 that should change the opinions that were then expressed. Have Irish Members repudiated any of the doctrines upon which these conclusions were formed by the right hon. Gentleman? I will not occupy much more time in answering statements which I can hardly imagine are relied upon as arguments against affording landlords and those dependent upon them an opportunity of escape. I do not think that any such arguments would be founded on the misdeeds of the Irish landlords as a class. The Prime Minister dealt with this in 1886. He referred to the Bessborough Commission, and said that the landlords had stood their trial and had been acquitted.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: You should quote what I said as to the greater light thrown on the case by the deeper experience under the operations of the Land Act of 1881.

MR. D. PLUNKET: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to that kind of argument before, and a more baseless and unfair argument than that now suggested against a body of men whose fate was in the balance was never made. What is the case? Why, Sir, the opinion of the Prime Minister is quite changed by his experience since 1886.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Under the Commission of 1881.

MR. D. PLUNKET: I can hardly believe that position. That was not the position of the Prime Minister when he brought in his Land Bill in 1886. The experience of the Act of 1881 was in the possession of the Prime Minister when, in 1886, he declared that, although he framed a great indictment against the landlord system in the past, he hoped and believed there were few landlords against whom accusations could be made in recent times. Why, then, are we not to fulfil the obligations of honour and duty towards them? Are they now to be told they are robbers and have taken rents from their tenants unfairly? I challenge the Prime Minister as to the argument based on the operation of the Land Act of 1881. That Act has now been 13 years in operation. Every tenant in Ireland has an opportunity of going into the Court and getting his rent reduced. Fewer than one-half, or 280,000, have availed themselves of this opportunity, and in 113,000 cases rents have been reduced by voluntary arrangements. It is unjust to found on such facts an excuse for a change of policy. It cannot be deemed that, on the whole, the reductions made by landlords in England have been greater than those that Irish landlords have been required by the Land Courts to make; and the conclusion to be drawn is not changed by the fact that the reductions were voluntarily made in England. When you establish Land Courts you set landlords, as it were, at arm's length. The ground of the usual claims upon landlords was cut away by the legislation of 1881; and, besides that, what chance had landlords in any part of the country to come to terms with their tenants when the object of the Land League was, not to reduce rents, but to get rid of landlordism and to make voluntary agreements impossible? To this day tenants in Ireland are sitting under agreements with which they find no fault, and they can and do pay their rents; and it is perfectly monstrous to exempt from provisions of security which were offered in 1886 the landlords of to-day, because a small number are accused of not having been sufficiently lenient in the matter of rents. I do not suppose it will be contended that because landlords are hostile to Home Rule no means of escape for them is to be provided. It was equally admitted in 1886 that landlords were hostile, and still they were protected by the proposals of that year. Landlords are opposed to Home Rule, not only because it means speedy and complete ruin to themselves, but because they believe it will be the ruin of their country. And you are going to force this Bill upon them, and because, you say, the offer of 1886 was not acted upon, all further obligation is at an end. An offer was never effectually made, and it was not, therefore, refused. What is the meaning of saying that because the landlords refused assistance in carrying a Bill which they believed to be ruinous to their country it is now to be held that their hostility to the Government shuts them off from consideration? It is a monstrous proposition. It is an argument that cannot be seriously advanced.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We have never used it.

MR. D. PLUNKET: When the right hon. Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin) was speaking the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) said, "The offer was made." Although landlords, as a class, are unpopular with some supporters of the Government, still I believe hon. Members on the other side of the House would not—whatever may be their opinions on Irish landlordism—would not willingly do injustice to them any more than to any other class. One word more about another matter. What is the position in which we stand now? The Government have had years to mature their plan, and to consider the least obnoxious way in which they could present it to the country. They have had a great advantage in the swing of the political pendulum, which, however, no Government, after a long term of Office, ever survived. Yet they have presented their scheme in the vaguest and most unsubstantial way, so as to obtain the support of men of diverse and opposite views. What is the result? Scarcely have they scraped together an insignificant majority, insignificant for the purpose of grappling with such a social revolution as is now proposed. In fact, they would not have a majority at all, if it were not for the support of those at whose dictation this great surrender has been made. They have had not only six years to consider the question, but they have had a whole Session in which to exhibit and defend as best they could their proposals before the House and the country. Beaten in argument, they have fallen back on the Closure—the “guillotine”—and, after all, they have been obliged to abandon, after many vacillations, some of the most important provisions of their Bill. The Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) has denounced me personally for saying I was willing to destroy a Bill which has had no sanction from the country. I have been quoted several times by Cabinet Ministers for saying I was willing to make the Bill more detestable to the country. Let us have done with this pharisaic cant. What Parliamentary Opposition would not do their best, in dealing with a measure which they believed to be ruinous to their country, to make it detestable in the eyes of the country? We have succeeded, by perfectly fair Parliamentary methods, in showing that the Bill is detestable. It is absurd to fasten on me the word “detestable,” because it has two senses. You may make a Bill detestable by exposing its deformities, which was the sense in which I used the word; it is another thing to proceed to say you will make the Bill a worse Bill and therefore make it unworkable, which, by the way, is the word assigned to me by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) in the course of a pompous homily in which he boasted of his 40 years of Parliamentary experience. I challenge the hon. Member to put his finger upon the occasion on which the threat was uttered. The words that the hon. Member assigns to me I never said, and it is only by putting a gloss upon them that they could be made to bear such a construction. But I do contend that the attitude which we have assumed is perfectly legitimate and Parliamentary; and I claim that every Opposition has not only the right, but the duty imposed upon it, when they believe a Bill to mean ruin to the country, to exhibit it as being detestable. We are chided with un-Parliamentary conduct because there is no better argument to advance. But, Sir, the people of these three Kingdoms have been watching these proceedings. We challenge the Government to appeal to the people. We defy them to say that we have not succeeded in making their Bill more detestable. They must have some time to introduce other measures. Other thoughts, other hopes, must be placed in the minds of the electors. They must be made to forget the exposure they had seen in this House of this Bill. That sort of manœuvring may succeed for a time, but a day of reckoning must come; and I confidently believe that when that day does come, the sense of duty and justice and honour of this great people, which saved the country seven years ago, will come to the rescue again, and the courage and the commonsense of the English people will shake off once for all the sickly sentimentalisms, the absurd fallacies, with which it has been endeavoured to cozen them; they will resume their old healthy and honest belief in this Imperial Parliament, where all parts of the country may be freely and equally represented; they will declare that this Parliament has the right to govern, as it has hitherto governed, every part and section of the Three Kingdoms; that it has the power, as they know it has the will, to do justice fairly by all. When that day comes, and when the question is proposed—“Has not your own country in former times suffered at the hands of this country, and is not some atonement required?” I would answer—“Yes, in former times it is true; but I say that of the last 70 years it is false.” Those who most stoutly and strongly opposed the Union at the time admitted that after Catholic Emancipation was carried in this House this country did her best, and no other country has ever, and I do not believe ever will struggle more honestly to redress and redeem whatever errors were committed in the past—but I believe the verdict of the country will be that if atonement is now to be made for the errors of these bygone times it is not by flinging, after past misgovernment, the reins on the necks of the maddened horses. It is not by casting the peace and the prosperity of Ireland into the arena of fiery religious and civil conflict, to be torn to pieces and left to sink in weakness and in hopeless poverty. No; if the great heart of England, to which the right hon. Gentleman eloquently referred yesterday, beat, as I believe it does, it will teach that people to cast their arm lovingly round their weaker sister, steadfastly to guide her destinies and to lead her into the ways of peace. Speaking as an Irishman, born and bred, all whose traditions and recollections of happier times are associated and intertwined with Ireland—I say, speaking from the deepest feelings of heart and conscience and knowledge, I believe it is here in this Imperial Parliament that best can be promoted and preserved the material prosperity, the abiding peace, and the real liberty of every class and creed of the people of my beloved country.

*MR. E. J. C. MORTON (Devonport) said, he must venture to apologise to the House for following the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, and following him after such a speech as that which he had just delivered. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as an Irishman, and no one who differed from him, whether Irishman or Englishman, would dispute his claim to the title of a patriotic Irishman. But he must question the soundness of the right hon. Gentleman's argument that the Unionist efforts to make the Home Rule Bill detestable had been justified by success. How did the right hon. Gentleman know that he had succeeded? His statement was of the nature of prophecy. The House had listened to many prophecies about that Bill. When this Parliament first met they were informed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that it would be impossible to form a Cabinet, yet a Cabinet was formed, and it had proved one of the strongest of modern times. Then it was said that the Cabinet when formed would not be able to agree as to their programme. This was also falsified. Then they were told that it would be impossible for the Government to frame a Home Rule Bill which would satisfy every section of their followers. That was a prophecy which would be finally falsified to-morrow night. Then there were prophecies that the Government would be defeated on the Address; that they would be defeated on the Second Reading; that they would be defeated on some vital point in Committee. Since all these prophecies had been falsified by the event, the right hon. Gentleman must forgive him if he ventured to doubt the accuracy of the prophecy which the right hon. Gentleman had just been uttering. Coming now to the general question, he had listened to every word on the Third Reading to learn as far as he could the reasons which were advanced by the Opposition for desiring the rejection of the Bill at this the eleventh or the twelfth hour. He thought that nearly the whole of the case of the Opposition was contained in one speech—one remarkable speech—that of the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). The right hon. Gentleman referred to many points which had been referred to again and again in that House already. The first point that he took was that this Bill had been advocated, and thus far carried forward, in the mists of secrecy, and in principle he alleged that the First Lord of the Treasury had never given an indication of his designs with regard to Home Rule for Ireland until he suddenly sprang those designs on the House on April 8, 1886. He (Mr. Morton) had some recollection of a speech delivered in the spring of 1886 by Lord Hartington, in which his Lordship alleged that none of the Colleagues of the First Lord of the Treasury could possibly object to the action which the right hon. Gentleman had taken, because it had been well known for years that the mind of the right hon. Gentleman was moving in that direction. But more than that. It was a matter not only known to the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman, but of notoriety, that for years the mind of the right hon. Gentleman had been moving in that direction. [Dissent from the Opposition Benches.] Well, he could quote the most absolute proof. In the month of January, 1883, Sir Alexander Galt, then Agent General for Canada, delivered an address in Glasgow on the subject of Imperial Federation. This was published in February, 1883. In the course of that address Sir Alexander Galt said that the practical question for those interested in Imperial Federation to ask was what was the first step to be taken in that direction, and then Sir Alexander added—

“After all, I think the Irish demand for self-government, or as it is called, though the term is one I scarcely like to use, Home Rule, is really what this country will have to consider—whether it is not possible to give to Ireland such a measure of self-government as will remove this growing grievance.”

Then Sir Alexander went on to say—

“Now I believe that that very remarkable man who is now the Premier of this country—I believe in the invitation, for it amounted to that, which he gave to the Irish Members at the beginning of last Session (that was referring to the speech on the Address in February, 1882), to propound what they thought would be acceptable in the way of self-government for their country, indicated that there was in Mr. Gladstone's mind the opinion that some measure would have to be taken in that direction."

Not only was that the opinion of Sir Alexander Galt, but it was well known that the Dominion Parliament of Canada in 1882 passed an Address praying Her Majesty to grant Home Rule to Ireland. This was either moved or seconded by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Blake), then in the Dominion Parliament, and the grounds on which the Dominion Parliament avowedly chose that particular occasion for passing that Address was the very speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on the Address of 1882. It could not, therefore, be said that any secrecy had been preserved by the Prime Minister in his conduct of this case. But it was said that the electorate of this country was entirely ignorant of the details of this Bill at the time of the last General Election, and that, therefore, the electorate should be consulted again, and the details placed before it. He maintained that, with the single exception of the Reform Bill of 1832, there never had been a single instance in the Parliamentary history of this country in which the details of any of the great measures that had revolutionised our political life had been before the electorate at the General Election previous to the Session in which they were introduced. Was the Repeal of the Corn Laws before the electors? Why, even the subject itself was not before the electors. Was the Reform Bill of 1867 before the electors? Why, the very Ministers who proposed it were pledged against Reform at the previous Election. Or the Land Act of 1881? Or the Coercion Act of the right hon. Member for East Manchester in the time of his Chief Secretaryship? Were the details of the right hon. Gentleman's Local Government Act of 1888 before the country during the General Election of 1886? There was not a single instance, excepting that of the great Reform Bill, to back up the Constitutional argument of the right hon. Member for Bodmin on this point. But he went further. The right hon. Member for Bodmin, like the Leaders of the Opposition, admitted that the decision of the electorate on that Bill should be final if the Bill was laid before them. It could not be denied that something of the nature of this Bill was before the electorate at the General Election. It was known that the Liberal Party were going for a Parliament, and for a responsible Executive. That amount of detail was, at any rate, known. The question really was, how much of the details of the Bill were before the country—were sufficient details before the country? If the Leaders of the Conservative Party acknowledged that the electors of this country had a right to the final decision on this Bill when the details of the Bill were laid before them, how would they be able to deny that the electors had a right to decide whether or not sufficient details were before them? If the country held the view that they were being kept in the dark, that sufficient details on any measure were not before the country, would they not take note of that, and would it not tell against the framers of the measure at the Election? Inasmuch as the country returned a majority to support the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, he held that the country's decision as to the adequacy of the details was taken as much as could be its final decision on the Bill itself. But what reasonableness was there in this complaint about the absence of details? What real inducement had the Unionists given to the Prime Minister to give details earlier than he had done when they had always said that whatever the details were they would vote against the measure. But as to this question of details, he maintained that, with the single exception of the Reform Bill of 1832, there never had been a measure before Parliament of the details of which the electorate knew so much at the previous General Election as they knew of the details of the Home Rule Bill at the last Election. The country had the Bill of 1886 before them. The First Lord of the Treasury had invited discussion on the details of that measure. He had said that if any elector felt strongly upon any detail of the measure, and would vote for Home Rule if his views were met, but would vote against Home Rule if they were not met, let him say what this detail was, and the First Lord of the Treasury would see if his views could be met. There was only one instance in which this invitation had been accepted. Some electors did say they would vote for Home Rule if the Irish Members were retained in the Imperial Parliament, but would vote against Home Rule if they were excluded. The First Lord of the Treasury met their views, and agreed to retain the Irish Members. It was, therefore, open to any elector who was in doubt about Home Rule to know any detail about which he was anxious. And when, between 1886 and 1892, the Prime Minister was appealed to, his answer was that there was no justification for assuming that the details of the Bill of 1886 would be altered, excepting so far as he had given public intimations on the subject. He himself had drawn up a Home Rule Bill—a Bill in which he simply introduced into the measure, as it stood in 1886, such changes as the public declarations of the Prime Minister before the General Election led him to expect. When the Bill now before the House and the Bill he had drawn up were compared, he found that they did not substantially differ—a fact which he thought proved that the nature of the proposed Home Rule Bill had been very well known to the country. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham declared that this was beyond comparison the most important Bill ever introduced in the House of Commons. Did the right hon. Gentleman really think, or, if he had persuaded himself, did he think he could persuade the country, that the Home Rule Bill was really more important than the Act of Union, the Reform Bill of 1832, the Bill for the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and the Disestablishment Act of 1869 all put together? The total time taken up by all these Bills was 80 days, which was exactly the time devoted to this Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Eighty-two days.

\*MR. E. J. C. MORTON said, then he would throw in the British North America Act of 1867 for the two days more. The contention was that every clause in this Bill was a Bill in itself. That was true of every great Constitutional Act passed by that House. The most important Constitutional Act ever passed by the House of Commons was the British North America Act of 1867, which contained 147 clauses, each of great importance, and which set up a Constitution not merely of the one Parliament and the one Executive of the Dominion of Canada, but a Parliament for every one of the Provinces, and yet the whole time taken up in the discussion of that measure was only two days. Not one of the Acts establishing Constitutions in the Colonies occupied more than seven days in debate. But, further, he maintained that, as a matter of fact, the present Bill, in spite of the guillotine, had been discussed in all its important clauses. It had been said that, in dealing with a great Constitutional question like this, they were dealing with what was known in some Continental Constitutions as a fundamental law, and that the Imperial Parliament was not morally entitled to interfere in a matter of fundamental law in the same way as in ordinary legislation. Again, what Lord Salisbury once described as “that magnificent institution of the American Constitution, the Supreme Court,” had been referred to over and over again. It had been contended that such an institution, with its restrictions upon the Legislature, would be an advantage to the United Kingdom. But the motives for providing those restrictions in relation to the American Constitution were precisely the reverse of the motives which influenced those hon. Gentlemen who now desired a similar institution for England. The motive in the former case was to guard against reaction and to stereotype freedom; in the latter case it was to guard against progress and to stereotype tyranny. He alleged fearlessly that the Home Rule Bill, from the point of view of Great Britain, was a matter of extremely trivial importance; but, of course, from the point of view of Ireland, it was of vast importance. It could only be of importance to Great Britain in so far as it affected the Constitution of this country, in so far as it affected the unity of the Empire and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and in so far as it affected the moral obligation of the Imperial Parliament to protect the minority in Ireland. Each of these three questions had been most freely and fully debated. The guillotine had not been applied to one of them. As to the first of these questions, the Constitution of Parliament, it was absolutely unaffected by the Bill, except in the simple detail that there was a very small redistribution of seats arrangement, by which the representation of Ireland was reduced from 103 to 80 Members; surely, in so far as the Constitution was touched by that arrangement, it was touched in a sense that hon. Gentlemen opposite would approve of. Then, as to the second point, the unity of the British Empire, it could not be said that the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament had been withheld from the full discussion of the House, because it was debated on Amendments to Clauses 2 and 3, the latter of which took seven and a half days. Not one of these Amendments had been closed. The guillotine did not fall on the first four clauses, and it was only on the first four clauses that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament could be raised. Then, again, the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament might be said to arise on the 3rd clause, which dealt with the exceptions from the powers of the Irish Parliament. On that clause every Amendment put down by the Opposition, 58 in number, was discussed, which occupied  $11\frac{1}{2}$  days. The question of the Imperial veto arose on Clause 5. It was perfectly true that the guillotine did fall on Clause 5; but it was also true that there had been five days of full discussion on the clause, and that 24 Amendments to it were considered. With regard to the 17 Amendments guillotined, it was a matter of absolute certainty that six of them would have been ruled out of Order, as having been covered by previously discussed Amendments. The question of the veto was not only discussed on Clause 5, but it was discussed in detail on the First Reading and on the Second Reading of the Bill, so much so that on February 17 the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington said, in a speech, that he would not refer to the veto, because it had been already fully discussed. Then there was the question of the protection of the minority. That question was, first of all, included in the restrictions on the powers of the Irish Parliament in Clause 4—a clause that had been debated  $7\frac{1}{2}$  days, on which every Amendment put down, and in Order, was discussed, and on which the guillotine did not fall. The question also arose on Clauses 27, 28, and 29, which dealt with the pecuniary interests and pensions of the Civil servants. Every one of these clauses was discussed to the full; not a single Amendment was closed, and the guillotine did not fall upon any one of them. The right hon. Member for Bodmin had also complained that the Land Question had not been sufficiently debated. But, if so, whose fault was that? The Opposition had had full power of raising it, and he maintained that they could only deal with it by Amendments to the first four clauses, and every Amendment they put down to those clauses was discussed, or else by a new clause on Report, and none of the new clauses were guillotined.

MR. D. PLUNKET: The Amendments to that clause, raising the Land Question, were ruled out of Order.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON said, that that did not prove that no Amendment which was in Order could be devised. And, as a matter of fact, it was raised on Clause 4 by an Amendment of the hon. Member for York. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin had also stated that Clause 9 had not been properly discussed. Well, it was debated for five days. On the 10th July the Opposition voted for retaining 103 Members for Imperial and foreign affairs only, and on the same day they voted for total exclusion. On the next day the Opposition voted for an Amendment moved by the right hon. Member for the University of London for reducing the number of Irish Members to between 30 and 40, but retaining them for all purposes, and on the same day they voted for retaining 48 of the Irish Members. On the 13th of July they voted for the in-and-out clause and against retaining 80 Members for all purposes; and, lastly, by voting against the clause, they voted for leaving the Imperial Parliament absolutely untouched and for retaining the 103 Members to vote on British as well as Irish affairs. If, after that, they wanted still more discussion, he could only say that they exhibited a positively Gargantuan appetite for devouring their own principles. He was certain that if the Liberal Party was unable to rouse the country by the cry of obstruction the Opposition would not be able to rouse the country by the cry of the "gag." The country desired, above all, that the efficiency of the Imperial Parliament should be maintained, and he believed that one of the very strongest arguments in favour of Home Rule was the argument that by removing this everlasting Irish difficulty largely from out the daily consideration of this Parliament, they would really restore and revivify the efficiency and honour of the House of Commons. The country regarded the "gag," to use the word of hon. Members opposite, with no great disfavour, for paramount to its desire for full and free debate was its desire that the efficiency of the House of Commons, as a legislative machine, should be maintained. He must ask the House to allow him to thank the House for the patience and kindness with which they had listened to him. But though he might owe an apology to the House for venturing to address it at all, he made bold to say he owed no apology on the particular ground of the subject which he had last referred to; for although he was only a new Member, in his first Session, yet the honour, the efficiency, and the dignity of the House, the Mother of Parliaments, with its traditions extending back for many generations, with its centuries of service to the cause of Democracy, of freedom, and of good government, was the concern, and ought to be the concern, of every one of its Members, however young and however inexperienced—nay, it was the heritage of every one of the citizens of the Empire, however mean his status and however humble he might be.

MR. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxeth) said, he would not have intruded upon the notice of the House if it were not the fact that he, unlike many Members, came to Parliament perfectly free and untrammelled by pledges and promises, except that he would do his best to oppose any scheme having for its object the creation of a separate Parliament for Ireland. Representing a division composed entirely of working men, mostly mechanics and artizans, he claimed to speak the views of what was an intelligent English democratic constituency. He would not follow the hon. Member for Devonport through his labyrinth of statements and figures, nor refer to the Attorney General's brilliant speech, but would confine himself to some of the arguments used by the Prime Minister.

If any arguments were necessary against this Bill they might be supplied by the speeches of the Prime Minister and other gentlemen occupying seats on the Treasury Bench previous to their conversion to Home Rule. The Prime Minister had told them that they had arrived at the point where two roads met—one leading to autonomy, the other to coercion—but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be strangely blind to the road right in front of him, and which had been trod so successfully and with such material benefits to Ireland by Mr. Balfour. He questioned if the Prime Minister would have seen the road leading to autonomy if the finger-post of 80 Nationalist votes had not pointed in that direction, and he had not read thereon an imperative instruction to follow that road. As to so-called "coercion," he took it that while the same laws obtained throughout every county in England, if there was an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease or of swine fever, say in Lincolnshire, what happened? Exceptional and restrictive laws were at once applied to stamp it out. But did Lincolnshire complain? Or, if she did, would the rest of England pay much attention to it? And if there was an outbreak of clerical Nationalist enthusiasm in any part of Ireland, resulting in outbreak, mutilation, intimidation, and arson, why should not exceptional laws be applied? The right hon. Gentleman had also referred to Cook's prophecy about Irishmen in the Government, and he was glad to see that the Prime Minister had departed from the prophecy, and had given them the benefit of listening to one of the most brilliant Irishmen in modern times—the Attorney General. He rejoiced that Irish prophecies were sometimes not only inaccurate but utterly unreliable. Grattan wrote—

"You have destroyed our Parliament, but we will have our revenge, and we will send into your Parliament 103 of the greatest scoundrels in the Kingdom."

They had had 93 years' experience, but that prophecy had not yet been fulfilled. He ventured to believe that the trouble in Ireland arose not so much from agrarian as from religious causes. He had not one word to say against the Roman Catholic religion, but he had very strong opinions about the political priest. An ignorant peasantry, dominated by an autocratic and intolerant priesthood, did not usually indicate a happy and prosperous country—a priesthood which was so intolerant that at times it was at variance with the head of its own Church, so autocratic that it preferred to appeal to the superstitious imaginations of its votaries rather than to their reason and intelligence, and it was not to the Representatives of the people, but to the representatives of this priesthood that it was proposed to hand over the government of Ireland. Who were these Representatives? He meant politically. He was told that in private life they were most desirable and pleasant acquaintances; that to know some of them was a liberal education. He had not the advantage or pleasure of knowing those gentlemen, and, therefore, he could only form his opinion of them from what the Prime Minister had said of them and what they had said themselves. The Prime Minister had spoken of them in the most forcible terms of his most forcible and picturesque vocabulary. The Prime Minister had described them as men marching through rapine to the dismemberment of the Empire, and yet he now professed to have the most unbounded faith and confidence in them. These men, or their predecessors, had avowed undying hatred to England, had avowed sympathy with England's enemies, and their determination that Ireland should be a free nation among the free and independent nations of the earth; that they wanted no more Kings or Queens; but that they wanted a Republic, and that they would not be satisfied until they had severed the last link that bound Ireland to this country—and it was to these very men that the Prime Minister proposed to hand over the government of Ireland. How did this proposal affect England? Supposing Home Rule granted to Ireland; as a result confidence would be destroyed in Ireland, the landlords would be driven forth beggared and ruined, manufactures would be much more heavily taxed than they were at present, and industries would seek a more congenial home. Capital being withdrawn from Ireland and industries ceasing to exist, nothing would be left but the land to tax; and even supposing the tenant farmers—who, he understood, were the only people in Ireland who wanted Home Rule, except the Party Representatives—got the land rent free, they would be taxed to such an extent that they would be worse off than they were at present. The starving peasantry would come over to England in shoals, and swell the already overcrowded ranks of unskilled labour; the undue competition would reduce the already low rate of wages received by unskilled labour: the workhouses would be overcrowded with the poor, the helpless, and the idle; parochial rates would be increased; and every class of society would be affected by this measure. Ireland would be reduced to a state of bankruptcy, and probably might apply for funds to some foreign Power. Looking at the matter from the Imperial point of view, they could not afford to show weakness at home, for other nations viewed them with jealous and envious eyes, and if the demands of Ireland were acceded to they would be encouraged to make demands and encroachments upon their domains abroad. One hon. Member had told them that England's difficulty would be Ireland's opportunity, and if England was at war with any foreign Power they would endeavour to throw off the hated Saxon yoke. They had tried it before, and there was no reason why they should not be tempted to try it again. If they glanced at the map it would be seen that nearly the whole of their shipping in leaving or approaching their ports passed within measurable distance of Queenstown, which would make an excellent harbour for an enemy's fleet to take shelter in, and from which an enemy's cruisers might sally forth and attack their shipping, probably destroy it, and paralyse their trade. This was no fancy picture of the imagination, but it was quite possible—nay, he would say probable—and he was lost in astonishment that the nominal author of this Bill was so blind as not to see the dangers that might accrue from the passing of it. It was a curious coincidence that the Prime Minister's advent to Office was invariably followed by disorder, disaster, and disgrace; and he feared that should the right hon. Gentleman continue in Office they would see a recurrence of the events of the past administration, culminating in the most serious and greatest of disasters—a foreign war accompanied by a civil war at home.

MR. M'GILLIGAN (Fermanagh, S.) said that, as an Ulsterman and a Representative of an Ulster constituency, he rose to give his support to the Third Reading of the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland, which had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. It had been frequently asserted in the Debate upon this Bill by Unionist speakers that it was only those who resided in Ulster who were acquainted with the mind and feelings of the people there upon the subject of Home Rule; and, inasmuch as he was born and bred in the very heart of Unionist Ulster, he claimed to have that knowledge, and he asked the indulgence of the House whilst he endeavoured to briefly state it. The Nationalists of Ulster regarded the Bill as an act of deliverance from the system of government which prevailed there, and which practically excluded them from having a voice or participation in the management of local affairs, and they welcomed it as a necessary and long-expected reform to abolish the one-sided system of government which had so long been the bane and the curse of the Province. It would be the means of infusing national life and feeling into the working of local affairs, and of giving the masses of the people a share in the administration, which was at present wholly in the hands of the classes. As a matter of fact, the Nationalists of Ulster had had innumerable difficulties to contend with by reason of their political opponents having in their possession all authority and power. Hon. Members unacquainted with the state of the Province would, perhaps, be surprised to hear that in Ulster an office having income or profit attached to it was never, or seldom, given to a Nationalist. Unionists had as their heritage the control and dispensing of such offices, and he regretted to say that he could not recall a single instance—and he had lived his life amongst them—where a Nationalist had been appointed by them to a post of emolument. No Nationalist held any of the important offices of Clerk of Town, Harbour, or Water Commissioners, Clerks of Markets, Town Officers, Masters or Matrons of Workhouses, Medical Officers, to official positions, bank managers or cashiers, where these Unionist gentlemen could prevent it. Indeed, such was the position of affairs that no Nationalist would dream of becoming a candidate for such posts, knowing his chance of success to be nil. It was said that Ulster was opposed to the granting of Home Rule. But when hon. Members spoke of Ulster what did they mean by that term? Did they mean nine counties forming the Province called Ulster? If they meant that, then he said Ulster was not against Home Rule. But, perhaps, they intended to say that a portion of Ulster was against Home Rule. Well, he granted that there were in Ulster, as there were in other places, persons not disposed to advocate the concession of autonomy to Ireland. But if they looked into the reasons for their hostility, they would find that the people Ulster supposed to be hostile to Home Rule were continually goaded on by excited and warlike gentlemen, and made to believe that Home Rule was what those politicians represented it to be for reasons best known to themselves. What was the fact about Ulster? That more than one-half of it was Nationalist to the core, and joined with the other three Provinces in demanding Home Rule. On this question Ulster was divided into two sections. There was Nationalist Ulster and Unionist Ulster. There was a Nationalist Ulster true to the ancient traditions and patriotic aspirations of the Celtic race, who had survived all endeavours to expatriate them by the application of cruel and vindictive laws. And there was an Unionist Ulster often referred to in that House as the loyal minority. And what were they loyal to? Loyal to the ascendancy authority and power which was theirs at present. It was for the retention of that ascendancy they professed to be Unionists. Talk of depriving them of it and they were disunionists. Circumstanced as the Unionists were it would be passing strange if they did not object. The soft side of the Constitution was and had been extended to them. A mode of government which had been established 93 years was bound to have defenders, especially those who had benefited largely by it, and who saw in its discontinuance a termination of their privileges. Let them contrast the intensity of the feelings of the two sections in Ulster for and against Home Rule. With the Nationalists it was the settled passion of their hearts, which had increased year by year in their stern uphill fight, and which they would never relinquish. With the Unionists it was true that a large portion of them were strongly opposed to it; but anyone who attended meetings of Unionist Ulster farmers since the General Election knew that they were not satisfied with the existing order of things, and that they would welcome Home Rule, or any rule that would do them justice. They had no deadly animus to this Bill or its supporters. No doubt at the General Election they were frightened into a fear of the priests—that was a word to conjure with by Unionist Leaders. It served better than to discuss Home Rule on its merits. But this fear, he ventured to say, was a passing one. In their reflections the tenant farmers knew what Party in Ireland fought their battles and prepared their case for legislation, and what Party in England placed on the Statute Book the Acts of Parliament that released them from the power of landlordism. Merchants in agricultural Ulster would tell them that business had been on an inclined plane for years past, and, in the event of an unfavourable harvest this year, and the low price of cattle being maintained, commercial disaster would have taken place. Matters in those districts were just as bad as they could be, and it was useless of hon. Members to be talking of prosperity in Ulster. The emigration from Ulster was a grave commentary upon its alleged prosperity. During the most prosperous times in Ulster, in the Sixties, Seventies, and Eighties, about 750,000 people left it. For 18 years Ireland had her own Parliament, in sympathy with the people, and she prospered. For 93 years she had had a Government not in sympathy with the people, and she had decayed. To withhold Home Rule, which meant a Government in sympathy with the people, would be to continue the evil system which had wrought the decay, and meant the gradual extinction of the Irish nation at home—an event, he was afraid, that would not be patiently submitted to. After 93 years' rule of the richest Government in the world Ireland was the poorest. As she had not thriven under English rule, by all rules of logic and fair play she was entitled to some other rule. Speaking as one of the Representatives of Nationalist Ulster, it afforded him much pleasure to exercise his privilege in that House to thank the Prime Minister for his noble effort, for speeches which shed such a brilliant light upon the darkness, the ignorance, and the prejudice which surrounded the Irish Question of misgovernment, and for pleading the cause of an oppressed and down-trodden people. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to prosecute the work he had begun to a successful issue, and that work would complete the emancipation of the Nationalists of Ulster, who had been reared in the school of political and religious adversity, purified by the fire of persecution and strengthened by wrong suffering, and who indulged in the hope that the English Parliament would in the expiring years of the century make atonement and restitution for its act of spoliation and robbery in the beginning by restoring to Ireland her right to make her own laws in her own Parliament in her own land.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) desired to say a few words with reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Morton) and the brilliant speech of the Attorney General. It appeared from the confession of the hon. Member for Devonport that he was a competitor of the Prime Minister, because the hon. Member had told the House that he himself, either last year or the year before, had drafted a Home Rule Bill and that it turned out almost identical with the Bill of 1893. He should like to know whether the Bill of the hon. Member contained anything identical with or even similar or analogous to the Financial Clauses in the Bill of the Government as it now stood, or whether the Financial Clauses embodied in the hon. Gentleman's Bill were like those contained in the Bill of the Government as presented in February last? He should also like to know whether the hon. Gentleman proposed that the Imperial Government should undertake the collection of taxes in Ireland; whether any one of those taxes should be taken as representing Ireland's contribution to the Imperial Expenditure; but, above all, he should like to know whether this wonderful draft the hon. Member had compared in competition with the Prime Minister contained the "in-and out" clause that was in the Bill as introduced in February last, or the clause which was now in the Bill by which the Irish Members in that House were to have unrestricted powers upon all questions—Imperial and otherwise? Upon this question of the “in-and-out” clause the hon. Member ought to be an authority to some extent. The hon. Gentleman, he understood, occupied an official position in the English Home Rule Union, and he was assured, on the authority of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that at the recent election at Hereford a leaflet was circulated, bearing the impress of the Home Rule Union, which stated that the original “in-and-out” clause which was contained in the Bill of February last was the clause that remained in the Home Rule measure, although the Premier had then given unrestricted power to the future Irish Members in this House. He should have liked to have heard some explanation from the hon. Member for Devonport as to how that leaflet came to be circulated in Hereford upon the very day of the opening of the poll? The hon. Gentleman referred to one or two of the clauses of the Home Rule Bill, which he said had received discussion, and the first he referred to was the question of the Civil servants, and he thought he included the Police. Undoubtedly they had some discussion upon the clauses of the Bill which related to the Civil servants and Police, but nobody knew better than the Chief Secretary that what affected the Civil servants and the Irish Constabulary were not so much the clauses of the Bill as the Schedules of the Bill which were never discussed, except for some incidental references. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the question of the land, and assured the House that the Land Question was also discussed. The only discussion they had on the Land Question was that which arose on an Amendment with reference to the appointment of Assistant Commissioners. Turning to the speech of the Attorney General, he should like to call the attention of the House to what he regarded as rather a singular episode in the course of that speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman, with very great eloquence, deplored the time when, before 1886, the Nationalist Members of that House did not mourn with the English people in their sorrow and join with them in their joy, and he hoped and expected the time was coming when the Irish Members who had helped to build up this great Empire would learn what its real meaning was, and if a time of sorrow came would mourn with the English people in their sorrow and join with them in their joy. Previously to the Attorney General having made use of these observations, he had been cheered to the echo; afterwards, when he dealt with other subjects, he was cheered to the echo by gentlemen on the other side, but not one single cheer came from gentlemen representing Irish Nationalist constituencies when the hon. and learned Gentleman addressed these particular observations to the House. The Attorney General spoke as if this Bill was accepted by the Irish Members. He should like to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman either heard or read the speech delivered the previous afternoon by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond). The Unionist Members had always been protesting, both in this House and out of it, that this Bill was only a pro tanto Bill—only an instalment of what was expected from the Irish Benches—and there was no finality whatever in connection with it. What did the hon. Member for Waterford say? He said that no man in his senses could regard this Bill as a final or satisfactory settlement of the Irish Home Rule Question. Were the Irish Nationalists satisfied? They did not depend upon the hon. Member for Waterford for any statement with reference to the want of finality in this Bill. They had also the statement of the hon. Member for North Kerry, in the course of the Debate in Committee on the 9th clause, that the whole scheme of the Government was experimental, temporary, and transitory. That opinion was endorsed to a large extent by the Home Secretary, who appealed to the House and said—“Why not treat it as a mere temporary and transitional scheme?” The hon. Members for Waterford and Kerry, or their followers in Ireland, had made speeches upon Irish platforms in which they had elaborated the ideas as to want of finality in the Bill. One of these gentlemen (Mr. Haviland Burke), whose speech was a type of the speeches made in Ireland, speaking on the 2nd April, 1893, said he thought the Home Rule Bill ought to be accepted for want of something better, and that the Irish Members ought to do their best to improve it in Committee, and to enlarge its provisions and the liberties it gave, so as to make the Legislature worthy of a free and distinct nationality. He wished to draw the attention of the House to the expression "a Legislature worthy of a free and distinct nationality." That expression was really borne out by the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the House, because he thanked the Prime Minister for restoring to the Irish Nationalists the Parliament which they had lost in 1800. That meant a great deal more than the boon the Prime Minister was prepared to bestow on the Irish Nationalists. Grattan's Parliament was an independent Parliament; and they had it in the speeches made upon Irish platforms and in the addresses of Irish Members in that House that the present measure was only the basis for further demands on the part of the Irish Members, who, having 80 of their number in this House, would never rest until its liberties and scope were enlarged, and until they got a measure worthy of what they called "a distinct nationality." He should like to make one or two observations with reference to the speech of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman said that this Debate would not add to the fame of Parliament. He thought everyone of them on that side of the House would agree with such a statement. They did not believe that what had taken place in Committee of this House would add either to the fame or prestige of Parliament. This Bill in its Third Reading stage occupied a very peculiar position, and presented a very peculiar development indeed. The Bill was one of the very first importance, as was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who, on the 16th June last, declared that it was beyond all question the most important legislative proposal which had been made to the Parliament of the United Kingdom in the present century, and that it was a measure which ought to receive the most careful and most anxious consideration of every Member of Parliament. The Government had been for the last seven years pondering and deliberating on the measure which they introduced in February last, and, notwithstanding all the consideration they had given to that measure during those years, notwithstanding the time that had elapsed since August, 1892, when they were called upon to assume the reins of Government down to the time the Bill was introduced, the Bill had emerged from Committee and Report stage altered in its character and vital principles, and altered not so much by the Opposition who criticised and opposed it, but altered by the authors of the Bill themselves. The new clauses of the Bill were, to a large extent, wholly undiscussed in the Committee of the House. In his interesting speech yesterday the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury admitted that 26 clauses and six Schedules of the Bill were undiscussed. What were the clauses of the Bill which had been left undiscussed? They had had a superficial reference, but no discussion upon the constitution of the new Irish Legislature; they had had no discussion in regard to the Exchequer Judges, their duties, responsibilities, or the position they were to occupy; no discussion on the question as to the decision of Constitutional questions; no discussion on the power that was given to the Irish Legislature to repeal certain Acts of Parliament; and, above all, they had had absolutely no discussion, except the few hours given to them before the application of the Closure on the 13th July, on the question of the powers of the Irish Members who were to be retained in this House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), addressing his constituents last Saturday at Newcastle, admitted that the question as to the power of the Irish Members was one of the most important—he did not say the most important, but one of the most important—clauses of the Bill. He (Mr. Kenny), and hon. Gentlemen in the House who agreed with him, went further than the right hon. Gentleman in that direction, because they regarded it, and had always regarded the question of the powers of the Irish Members, as the crucial and turning point of this Bill. That it was the turning point that agitated the country at the present moment had been proved by the Hereford Election. They had discussed the retention of the Irish Members; but that was as to the numbers in which they were to be retained, or whether they were to be retained at all, but they had absolutely no discussion, save and except the few hours he had already mentioned, on the question of the powers of the Irish Members. They did discuss, to a certain extent, the question of the old 9th clause, now the 10th clause, and they discussed the question of the number of the Irish Members to be retained; but the right hon. Gentleman put off to a future day the discussion of a number of other clauses in the Bill, and included in that postponement the question of the powers of the Irish Members. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman considered the matter so very unimportant that he gave it the go by; but he should have liked to have seen the enthusiasm that would have been invoked at Newcastle if the right hon. Gentleman had told his audience that, after considering the matter from 1886, they had, at the very last moment, the day before the Closure was to be applied, changed their mind, changed it without giving this House, the Opposition, or the country the opportunity of criticising the details in their line of policy, and had adopted the clause as it now stood in the Bill, by which the Irish Members were to be retained for all purposes in the Imperial Parliament. If the House would permit him, he should like to go into the question of the way in which the Opposition and the country had been treated on the question of the retention of the Irish Members so far as their numbers were concerned, because they must differentiate, in dealing with the 9th clause, between the question of the number of the Irish Members and the powers to be given to them if they were retained. For three or four years past they had been informed and were aware that the Irish Members were to be retained in some numbers in the House; they were not concerned so much with the question of the retention of the Irish Members, knowing that was a matter determined upon, but they were concerned with the question of what the powers of the Irish Members were to be when so retained. In August of last year, upon the Debate on the Address, the Prime Minister, after setting forth the various modes by which the Irish Members might be retained, stated that if the Liberal Government were called to Office, it would plainly be their duty to select the best form of dealing with Irish representation in the House; that this could not be decided upon till they were in a position of responsibility; but that, when they had selected what they considered to be the best form to adopt, it would be their duty to carry it out. That speech had only been made a fortnight when the right hon. Gentleman assumed Office, and having assumed Office, and having to make a selection from the various modes which he had indicated, he and his Cabinet deliberately selected the in-and-out clause. They were satisfied with the declaration of the Government policy, but on the 8th May a question was put in this House to the Prime Minister by his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who asked the Prime Minister whether or not he intended to propose Clause 9 as it then stood in the Bill? The Prime Minister's reply was that they intended to propose and to submit to the House the clause as it stood. Last night the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) referred to another declaration of the Prime Minister's, made on the 30th May, that he intended to stick to the clause as it stood in the Bill. What happened? On the 13th of July one of the compartments of the Bill was closed, and in that was included the 9th clause. Upon the night before the Closure was to be applied, the Prime Minister, upon his own Motion, moved the omission of the sub-clause which provided for the restricted powers of the Irish Members; and on the following night, without the country having had any opportunity beforehand of knowing the policy of the Government, the Amendment of the Prime Minister was closed, and that was the only opportunity the Opposition and the country had had, up to this time, of discussing the question of the powers of the Irish Members who were to be retained. Was it fair, frank, and honourable of the Government to act by the Opposition and the House in the way they did? The House would remember that the Government focussed and fixed public attention on the clause as it stood; and with the attention of the House so focussed and fixed, the Prime Minister, the night before the Closure, proposed an Amendment which completely altered the clause from its original character. He thought the tactics adopted by the Government in connection with this question of the powers of the Irish Members would be a disgrace to an Irish Local Board of Guardians. No explanation was given until the night of the 13th July, when the Prime Minister vouchsafed some explanation to the House for the conduct of the Government in having kept this clause up their sleeve until the evening before the application of the Closure. On that night, the 13th July, before they arrived at the hour of 10 o'clock, the right Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), in his speech said they had a right to be frankly and honourably treated, but when they asked if there was any truth in the rumours afloat as to the change their questions were always evaded or refused an answer. And what did the Prime Minister say in reply to that? He interrupted the right hon. Member for West Birmingham by an exclamation of "Hear, hear!" That was that he pinned himself to what the right hon. Gentleman said that the questions were either evaded or refused an answer. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham then said—

"My right hon. Friend says, 'Hear hear!' but is that proper treatment of the House of Commons!"

And the Prime Minister said—

"The question put to me was one I understand the purport of, and I was determined to defeat it."

In that answer of the Prime Minister they understood the meaning of the Government; the Government first proposed a clause on which public attention was fixed, and then the Prime Minister came down and at the last moment announced to the House what the change of policy of the Government was, and that it was intended to confer on the Irish Members unrestricted powers. He (Mr. Kenny) submitted that was not the way to afford a free and fair opportunity to the House or the country to discuss the policy of the Government, and he thought he might further say that the Opposition deserved fairer and more honourable treatment. Having regard to the importance of the measure, to the fact that it involved not only Irish but British interests, and having regard to the way in which the House had been treated, he ventured to think that the treatment ought to be almost enough to induce Members not to pass the Third Reading of this measure. He now desired to say one or two words upon the question that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary referred to in his speech at Newcastle, and which had been referred to also in this House—namely, the question of the British vote in this country. If the House would permit him he would give the figures as they appeared in the Divisions upon the Bill, both in favour of the Government and against the Government. On the Second Reading the majority for the Government was 43, the British majority against the Government was 14. On the 30th June, on the first Closure Resolution, the majority of the Government was 32, and the British majority against the Government was 19. Upon the question of Clause 5 standing part of the Bill, the clause that dealt with the Executive, the majority of the Government was 35, and the British majority against it was 32. When they came to deal with Clause 6, the clause that dealt with the two Legislative Councils in Ireland, that clause which the Prime Minister yesterday stated was one of small importance, the Government majority was 15, and the British majority against it was 40. On Clause 7, dealing with the Legislative Assembly, the Government majority was 36, and the British majority against it was 23. On the question as to the entire exclusion of the Irish Members, the Government majority was 31, but there was a British majority against it of 28. And on the Prime Minister's Amendment, giving unrestricted powers to the Irish Members, the Government majority was 27, and the British majority against it was 33. He thought these figures showed not only British opinion in the country, but the opinion of the Representatives of Great Britain in this House in connection with this measure. It had been said by the Chief Secretary, and also, he thought, by the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) in the course of the Debate on the Address in 1892, that the majority of the entire united Parliament ought to be the majority that would decide every question in this House, and that they were not to subtract from that majority the votes given by Irish Members. He quite agreed with those observations of the right hon. Gentleman and any other speaker who might rely on the same argument when ordinary questions were dealt with by this House, but they had to remember that when the Act of Union was passed in 1800 they had to get the consent of two Legislatures, of the British Legislature on the one side and the Irish Legislature on the other. Therefore, when they were going to a certain extent to modify that Union, when they were altering the principles of that Union, why should not the bodies in that Union be restricted to their constituent elements, and the voice of the British majority be taken? [A laugh.] He did not understand why the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary scoffed at that; if they were to do that they would have a British majority against it; and surely the Irish partner in this business could not be allowed to separate from the partner with whom it threw in its lot in 1800 without the consent of that other and larger partner. One other topic that was raised by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech at Newcastle he wished to say a word about. In addressing his audience, the right hon. Gentleman said the arguments of the Unionists were based on the consideration that the Irish Members were either lunatics or rogues. The same argument had been thrown in their teeth night after night by the Prime Minister, and they had been lectured by the right hon. Gentleman and told they ought to have the most explicit faith in hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. But he (Mr. Kenny) would ask were they not justified; were they not entitled to look back upon the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, both in and out of the House; were they not entitled to consider what they had done in the past; and, above all, were they justified in dismissing from their minds the finding of a judicial tribunal of this country? [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen might sneer at that, but it was composed of three powerful Judges, and were they to dismiss that finding from their minds? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) yesterday assured them he had a most complete and explicit faith in his countrymen, in the moderation, the common sense, and the good feeling of the countrymen in Ireland. He did not know whether or not the hon. and learned Gentleman agreed with the views put forward by a Dublin journal, of which the hon. and learned Member was the Chairman of the Board of Directors. What was the opinion of the leader writers of that journal of the gentlemen who formed Committee Room No. 15? He only quoted their opinions for the purpose of his argument, and he said at once that he did not concur in them; he did not endorse them; but they were the opinions of the hon. and learned Gentleman's own friends. What did the leader writers of this journal say in the issue of the 11th October, 1892? They said—

"We see them now in fear of life, full of selfishness. many of them without a shred of anything beyond what they can borrow and foul-mouthed, destitute of every sense of loyalty; some of them disreputable, all of them apostles of downright tyranny, men who in a free country would correspond to a banditti of——"

(The rest of the quotation and the other blanks failed to reach the Gallery.) That was about as strong a condemnation as was ever seen in the Press; but he presumed the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) would endorse what the leader writers and editors of that journal had written. For his part he did not endorse it, and he thought the statement was unquestionably an exaggeration, still it showed at the present moment what the opinion of one section in Ireland was with regard to another section. He had only one word more to say. One thing was certain—that throughout the whole of the Home Rule business no effort had been made by the Government to carry out the promises made before the General Election. Two sets of promises were made in regard to the Newcastle Programme, but in addition to these promises had been made in the House by the Prime Minister to the Irish Members, and he (Mr. Kenny) wished to know what had become of those promises? In his speech on the Address in August last, the Prime Minister said the Crimes Act of 1887 should not be retained on the Statute Book longer than the condition of Parliamentary time required. They had had a good deal of Parliamentary time wasted in this House —["Hear, hear!"] Yes, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite took it in one sense, they (the Opposition) took it in another—they said that the time of the House had been wasted on a measure which could not become law, and which would not become law, and whilst the time was being wasted the Government found it impossible to give any attention to a Bill introduced by the hon. Gentleman who represented the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin (Mr. W. Field), a Bill which appeared on the Paper every night and adjourned every night to the next night—a Bill of one clause which proposed to repeal the Crimes Act of 1887. Why did not the Chief Secretary give to the hon. Member some facilities to pass that Bill? On the contrary, instead of giving facilities for passing that Bill, the Government proposed to re-enact in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill the 8th clause of the Crimes Act of 1887, and keeping alive the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act of 1881. The Chief Secretary, in one of those works of his which was so instructive and so interesting, and which now formed part of the standard literature of this country, had told them there was a Nemesis waiting for the Government. He ventured to say that the Government had been unscrupulous and profligate in its promises. They had come into power on false issues and false pretences, and he believed, in common with the great majority of people of this country, that that Nemesis of which the Chief Secretary had spoken was sure to come.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Mr. Speaker, like many of my Colleagues upon these Benches, I may say I have taken no part in the long discussion of this great question; but I know that the people of this great country and the Members of the House will not for a single moment believe that, either in my own case or in the case of my Colleagues, that silence was caused by any want of interest in these Debates. That silence was imposed upon us by a sense of duty to our people, because we declined to be parties to the conspiracy which became very soon manifest in this House to smother this measure by a forest of Amendments and by a needless stream of talk, instead of subjecting it to an honest and faithful criticism. The views of our Party and the interests of our people during the progress of this Bill through the Committee were in the hands of a Member who enjoyed to the fullest extent the confidence of his Colleagues, and who did as much as could by any possibility be achieved by any man to represent to and impress upon the House and upon the Committee the views of the people of Ireland with regard to this Bill. Sir, before I come to make the few observations which I feel bound to make on this measure ere it passes through this House, I desire for one moment to allude to a couple of points in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. D. Plunket), and in the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the University stood up in this House, as it seemed to me, in a very ill-judged and unwise fashion, and placed himself before us from the beginning to the end of his speech as the champion of Irish landlords. He viewed this Bill from the point of view of the material interests of the Irish landlord, and from no other point of view. And he set against the wishes and the aspirations, and, as we hold, against the hopes of future prosperity and peace for our people, one consideration only, and that is the claims which the Irish landlords have to the protection of their material interest in Ireland. Well, Sir, we have no desire to rob any man in Ireland; and notwithstanding all that has been said, and in spite of all the criticisms to which we have been subjected, if our past careers were critically examined and compared with the past history of Irish landlords, I do not think our action would come out worst. The Irish landlords, said the right hon. Gentleman, view this measure as one calculated to be ruinous to their country. Sir, the record and history of the Irish landlords hardly entitle them to call it their country, for in the days of their power, which lasted too long, and during which they controlled without responsibility the government of the country, they showed no interest in its welfare, and I will only make this further comment on the observations of the right hon. Gentleman—that that very expression has been used with regard to every measure of reform which ever was proposed for the people of Ireland. I challenge him, or any other of the Conservative Party, to point to one measure of reform which has been proposed and passed, or attempted to be passed, in this House throughout the long history of 70 years to which he has alluded, which has not been denounced by the Irish landlords as likely to be ruinous to the country. The list extends from Catholic Emancipation down to the Land Bill of 1881. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that it was universally admitted that this Imperial Parliament has the power, as we all know it has the will, to do equal justice to all, and that he thought it was not to be denied that for the last 70 years no injustice had been done by this Parliament to the people of Ireland. All I can say is this—that if we were to accept the proposition that for the last 70 years the Parliament of this country has been endeavouring to the best of its ability and power, which I do not admit, to do justice to the people of Ireland, then I say that on that test alone it stands condemned, and the only conclusion which we can draw from the history of these 70 years is that, whatever may be the case as regards the will of this Parliament, it has not the knowledge and it has not the power to do justice to our people. Why, Sir, within these 70 years what has been the history of Ireland? We have had two or three attempted rebellions. We have had two famines. We have had half the population of the country shamelessly exterminated, and one-half of the inhabited houses of Ireland razed to the ground by the greed of Irish landlordism. During that period, in spite of the verdict of Commission after Commission appointed by this House—in spite of the voice of the Irish people appealing to this House—the few Representatives who, in the days gone by, represented the people of Ireland here, met with deaf ears or no ears at all; because, when I first knew the House—when I first came to listen to Debates here under that Gallery—when any Irish Bill or any Irish matter came up, the House emptied, and Members never came in until the Division Bell rang. That has been the history of these 70 years. Oppression and the feeling of injustice at the hands of this House in our unhappy country had the inevitable results of oppression, which are not peculiar to the people of Ireland, but which have been the infallible results of the reaction against oppression wherever it existed, and amongst whatever race. Our country has been the victim of secret conspiracy, rebellion, and of social disturbance—a condition of things fatal to all hope or chance of prosperity or peace. I say that all the misery, and all the crime, and all the desolation and despair of those 70 years lie at the door of the Imperial Parliament. It ill befits any right hon. Gentleman who has studied the history of his country, who has studied the history of these years, and of the Irish question in this Parliament during these years, to stand up in this House now and say that the history of the past 70 years goes to prove that this Parliament had the will, or, if it had not the will, that it had the knowledge or the power, to do justice to the people of Ireland. Take the history of one question alone—the question of higher education in Ireland. What has it been? Generation after generation of young men growing up in Ireland have been denied the greatest gift that can be bestowed on the youth of a country. And why were they denied the gift of a University education? Because their conscientious convictions closed the doors of the Universities that exist in Ireland against them. Almost all the acquaintances of my youth, and those of the generation who went before me, were obliged to face the world without the inestimable advantages which are open to the people of England, Scotland, and Wales. Aye, the University which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) represents in this House kept its doors closed—not exactly its doors, but all privileges closed against the Catholics of Ireland until by the agitation which I can well remember the Test Act was passed. That concession was not granted to the pleadings of the Representatives of Ireland in this House. It was not granted from a sense of justice. It was granted because the agitation which was started for the foundation of a Catholic Institution was thundering at the doors of Trinity College, and they passed the Test Act to save themselves from confiscation. There is one just observation I will make in concluding what I have to say upon that question—that particular grievance, for the redress of which for years—for 50 years—appeals have been made to this House. It still stands unredressed, and still the youth of Ireland who chance to belong to the Catholic Church are obliged to face the world, great numbers of them from conscientious motives, without the advantage of higher education. And yet we had an example the other day in the course of the discussion in Committee on this Bill which must have convinced any Member sitting on those (the Opposition) Benches that if we had a home Legislature in Ireland with power to settle that question it would have been settled, to the satisfaction of Protestant and Catholic alike, 35 or 40 years ago. Who can tell us or estimate the amount of ill and injury that has been done to our country by leaving that question unsettled for 35 or 40 years? Now, Sir, I come to an observation which struck me the other day in a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, who always adopts, I must say, a very different tone in his observations in dealing with these Irish questions from most other hon. and right hon. Members of Unionist principles, because when he approaches the question he does not consider it to be his duty to assume that the Irish people are scoundrels and robbers, and he does not find it necessary to hurl insults at the Irish Members in the course of every speech he delivers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin sets an example which, in my humble judgment, would be very well followed by many of his friends. But he made this remarkable observation in the course of his speech which struck me very much, because it seemed to me to be one of the very strongest of all arguments in favour of Home Rule. What did he say? He said that in the case of the makers of the American Constitution there was one element which was totally wanting in the present instance—that was the element of necessity to do the thing at the moment; and that in the case of this Home Rule measure there was no necessity, and he emphasised the fact again by saying “no necessity whatever.” That is a very extraordinary doctrine to us in this House. What is necessity, or what does the right hon. Gentleman mean by necessity? Does he mean that he would deny to the Representatives of a people what the voice of the people has been proclaiming by overwhelming majorities at repeated elections? Would he deny the Representatives of that people the justice and the right which they claimed at the hands of this Parliament until the necessity arose? What kind of a necessity? Ah, Mr. Speaker, that is the fatal lesson which has been taught to the people of Ireland during these 70 years, and there is not a peasant in Ireland who does not know that if he comes here with justice and reason on his side those considerations have no value in this Parliament until a necessity is created. That was what gave birth to the Land League; that is what filled the Ribbon Lodges in Ireland, because the peasantry have been taught that you will not listen in this Parliament to the voice of justice, but that an imperative necessity must be created, and that then the reform and the justice which was denied the Representatives of the people will be granted because of the necessity. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin expressed a deep truth when he used those words. I believe that if it had not been for the intensity—and I should almost say the ferocity—of the Land League agitation, that the system of felonious landlordism in Ireland would be to-day untouched and unbroken. Our voices and our votes in this Imperial Parliament would have been as powerless to overthrow it, or to effect the great reforms which have been effected, as pea-shooters would be to attack a fortress. No, Mr. Speaker, I say that is a deadly doctrine. I say that the doctrine formulated by the right hon. Gentleman, but taught for long and weary and disastrous years to the people of Ireland by the action of this House has been the mother, the fertile mother, of secret societies, of crime, and of disorder. Now, Sir, I come to the question of this Bill, and I may say at the very outset that in approaching the consideration of the measure at this stage I approach it as a whole much more than as a question of details. The details are undoubtedly complicated, and were subjected by the Tory Party in this House to a most searching and microscopical criticism. That stage of the Bill is passed, and we have now got to this question—what is the measure, as a whole, as it now stands before this House, and what is its value to the people of Ireland? It has been said in the course of this discussion—I think said by men even professing to speak for the people of Ireland—that the Bill settles nothing in its present shape, and would satisfy no one in Ireland. Well, Sir, I confess I hold a diametrically opposite opinion. I hold—and I shall not be afraid to maintain this doctrine on any popular platform in Ireland—aye, or in Canada or in the United States or in Australia—where I know my countrymen as well as any other Irishman—that this Bill, so far from settling nothing, is a great Charter of liberty to the people of Ireland, and they will accept it in that sense. When I hear men talking about the question of finality, and when I come to consider or deal with finality and with the question as to whether this is to be accepted as a final settlement of the Irish National claims, I want to know what is meant by finality? If men mean when they speak of finality that this law is to remain like the laws of the Medes and Persians, as we are told in ancient books, remained, though I very much doubt it, without the alteration of a jot or tittle or clause or sub-clause, then such a finality is an absurdity, and never was heard of since human laws were first framed. Certain details there were in this Bill on which we differed from the Government, and on which, to some extent, we still differ; but I take the Bill as a whole, and if by finality we are to mean, as I think we ought to mean, that the people of Ireland, taking all the circumstances into consideration, and viewing this measure as a whole, would accept it, if passed into law, in good faith as a settlement of the National claims of Ireland, I say I believe they would. In my judgment, the great question which we have got to face and to answer is this—whether if this Bill were passed into law tomorrow or next week—and I wish to heaven it were—we, the people of Ireland, would accept it in good faith or not, or whether we would work it in good faith or not? I say we would work it in good faith. If the Government and the Liberal Party and the people of England are content to accept this as a final measure in the sense that it will be regarded as a substitute between the two peoples for the distrust and suspicion which have so long prevailed, I believe in that sense it will be received as thoroughly final. A good deal of criticism has been expended on the details of this Bill, and in this connection I wish to say for my own part, and speaking on behalf of the whole of my Colleagues and the people of Ireland, I desire to take the opportunity of expressing my grateful and lasting sense of gratitude to the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) for the way in which he has handled this difficult matter. I now take from the mouth of the Prime Minister himself the points which he stated as in his judgment covering the entire substance of the Bill, and I believe he was perfectly correct, so far as my poor judgment goes, in his statement that the eight points he mentioned cover the provisions of this Bill. I will go over those points seriatim, and I think I can say with reference to them that we are satisfied, and the people of England are satisfied, with regard to them. First of all, there is the supremacy of this Parliament. We accept the supremacy of this Parliament, and I am not aware that any considerable section of the Irish people wish to deny it. The second point is devolution and the responsibilities of the Irish Parliament. On that point also, as far as I am aware, the people of Ireland are content with the Bill. The third point is the constitution of the Irish Parliament. So far as that goes, on that point also substantially, I think I may say, we are content. A slight difference of opinion exists as to the number of Members, but that is a matter in reference to which no difficulty could arise. The fourth point has reference to disabilities and limitations. That is another point in reference to which some slight difference of opinion exists; but taking the measure as a whole, though some of the limitations and disabilities imposed on us are humiliating while others are wholly unnecessary, yet I think the people of Ireland have acted prudently, generously, and wisely in recognising the difficulties of a Government who wished to do them justice and in showing that they did not desire to hamper them unnecessarily. We have no objection to the disabilities, because we have no desire to do what the disabilities would prevent us from doing. The fifth point is the position and responsibilities and duties of the Executive. That is a matter of supreme importance. On that point also, I believe the people of Ireland are satisfied. I come to the sixth point. The retention of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament. On this point a slight difference of opinion has been indicated by a section of the people of Ireland; but I say, on the whole, that although we think that the Irish Members in their full strength might be left in the Imperial Parliament until, at all events, the reserved questions were handed over to us, yet I think I can speak for the whole of my Colleagues and for the people of Ireland when I say that we would not have thought of endangering the passage of the Home Rule Bill on a question as to whether we should have 80 Members or our full strength. The seventh and eighth points mentioned by the Prime Minister refer to the Financial Clauses and to pensions to the Royal Irish Constabulary. I shall say nothing on the first-mentioned point, because there is still a difference of opinion between us and the Government on the Financial Clauses. It is largely a difference of calculation. The Government and the Liberal Party have recognised that for the first years of its existence the young Irish Government ought to be supported. The Government is in negotiation with the hon. Member for North Kerry, and if he gets the better of them, as I hope he may, I think the Government will do justice to us when the facts are fully brought to light. I am speaking for myself alone when I say that I consider this question is one of great importance; but, after the discussion which has taken place, I do not consider that it is a question to be placed in the same category or on the same footing with the granting to us of an Irish Legislature, which will make laws for the people of our country. I do believe that in the future, having recognised the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for North Kerry, and having recognised the principle that we ought to have a surplus, that substantial justice will be done to the people of Ireland. As regards this Bill, I think I may say that the people of Ireland all over the world will accept it as a great measure of justice and liberty, and as some satisfaction for their national demands. As I have already said, the real question which we will have to consider and to solve will be whether, when the Bill is passed into law, the Irish people will work it in good faith or not. What I have to say in answer to that question is that if the powers which are to be granted to the people of Ireland by this Bill are used in the manner that has been suggested from the Tory Benches, and if religious liberty or the unity of the Empire is interfered with in any way, the experiment will have proved a failure, and the prophets of evil will have been fully justified. But if the people of our country act, as we know they will act, in good faith, like civilised human beings, and not like maddened savages, I ask the Members of the Conservative Party what right have they to assume that the people whom they have never given a chance to obtain their liberty will use it when they get it so madly and so wickedly? If the people of our country act wisely, and with good sense, they will substitute between the people of Ireland and the people of England for that sentiment of suspicion and distrust which has lasted for centuries a feeling of friendship, of trust, and of good-fellowship. Charges have been made, cruel and unjust and monstrous charges have been built up in the course of these discussions against the people of Ireland. We have sat silent on these Benches all the while, not because we did not feel those charges, but because we knew that the people we represented in this House would appreciate the object we had in view. I ask with confidence any man in this House, is there one single charge which has been levelled against the people of Ireland which in the past history of this country has not been levelled against the democracy of England? In the days of the Chartist agitation and in the days of the Reform Bill the Tory gentlemen of England who are now trying to stand between the people of Ireland and their liberty levelled against their own countrymen language as foul and dishonouring and as unjust as anything that has been heard from the Tory Benches in this House during these Debates against the people of Ireland. [Cries of "No, no!"] The Tory Party may not like to be reminded now that the Tory democracy has sprung into being of these things, but what I have said is the literal truth. I say that the pictures which were drawn by the Constitutional Tory orators of 1829, 1831, and 1832 were more lurid and more terrifying as to what would be the fate of England or of the Empire if the masses were allowed to rule. Yet the Reform Bill was allowed to pass, and the disparaged and denounced masses of the working men of England were allowed into the Legislative Temple. That Temple was not pulled down, and robbery was not practised. On the contrary, the might and majesty and happiness of England increased in proportion as justice was done. I assert that the real truth of the history of this whole transaction is simply this: that the evils and the misery which have existed in connection with the relations between England and Ireland are to be sought in the action and machinations of the propertied classes of this country. The fact is, that for many a long year there has been built up between the people of England and Ireland a wall which was reared and constructed by the selfish monopolists of this country. [Cries of "No, no!"] Yes; that is true. The people of England on one side of that wall were taught to regard the people of Ireland as enemies; and on the other side the people of Ireland were taught by the Governments of this country to regard the people of England as their enemies; but that wall has been broken down, and the people of Ireland and the people of England, looking through the gaps which have been made, where they expected to find enemies have found friends. I say that the passage of this Bill through the House of Commons marks a new era in the history of the relations between the two countries. The Members of the other House may do what they like. This is not the first time that they have destroyed a measure of reform and justice. Do what they will, I say that the Third Reading of this measure in the House of Commons can never be undone. Although time has been wasted, and although a good deal of talk has been expended during the passage of the measure through the British House of Commons, yet I hold that these three months or 80 days have not been thrown away; that these 80 days have been the means of forming a bond of union between the masses of the people of England and of Ireland, have been the means of drawing them closer together day after day; and while we sat silent upon these Benches giving no voice to our feelings, yet we felt that the discussions that were proceeding would yet bear good fruit in the struggle which has been going on between the peoples of the two countries. Let the Lords do what they think fit with the Bill. We, for our part, will advance into the future with confidence and with hope, knowing that for the first time in the history of these countries the millions of our race, whether they live in Ireland, or whether, by oppressive and unjust laws, they have gone to other lands, where they have flourished and multiplied—[a laugh—] I do not think it is a subject for laughter—the millions of our race, wherever they are, are still faithful to the land from which your laws drove them—the millions of our people, whether they live in Ireland or across the sea, will go forward in the battle with confidence to carry this great measure, side by side and shoulder to shoulder, with the millions of the people of England. Whatever may be the fate of the Bill in the House of Lords next week every man who sits here to-night knows perfectly well that such a combination is resistless, and that such a Bill is bound to become the law of the land.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he had listened to the hon. Member for East Mayo with great interest. His speeches were always interesting, and he (Mr. T. W. Russell) confessed that any stranger, hearing the close of the speech of the hon. Member, would be under the impression that there was an English majority in favour of the Home Rule Bill.

MR. BYLES: So there is.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, his hon. Friend might take such liberty with facts as he chose, but his assertion would not make an English majority in the Lobby.

MR. BYLES said, that what he meant by his somewhat inarticulate interruption was that there was a larger number of votes cast in Great Britain at the last Election in favour of the Liberal Party than were cast against them.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that the hon. Member for East Mayo observed that the Conservative Party had a great objection to their past history being raked up and exposed. Well, of all men in the world, the hon. Member ought to have been the last man to make such a statement, because if there were a Party which could not afford to have their past raked up it was the Party of which he was a leading Representative. The Attorney General, in his extremely able and brilliant speech, stated towards the end that they had heard very little of Ulster of late in these discussions. Indeed, he had expressed a hope that the Ulster question had disappeared. Well, he (Mr. Russell) was there to-night as an Ulster Member for the express purpose, almost at the end of this lengthened discussion, to make the opinion of that Province clear to the Attorney General and to everybody else. There had been a good many attempts of late to misrepresent the opinion of Ulster with regard to the Bill. The Prime Minister received a Memorial not long ago purporting to be signed by 3,000 Presbyterians in that Province. What was that Memorial? He had paid a great deal of attention to it, although he had taken no part in questioning the Prime Minister with regard to it. If anyone would look at that Memorial he would find that two-thirds of the space was covered by a request for a revision of judicial rents, and the remaining one-third expressed the sympathetic feeling which the memorialists entertained for the right hon. Gentleman's efforts on behalf of Ireland. He (Mr. Russell) asked the House of Commons to remember that the phrase "Home Rule" never occurred in the Memorial at all, and it was hawked through Ulster and put before the tenant farmers as a Memorial in favour of the revision of judicial rents, the very thing that the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary had not the slightest intention of doing. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for South Fermanagh (Mr. M'Gilligan), he had told them that the Ulster farmers were about to turn Home Rulers—

MR. M'GILLIGAN said, what he had stated was that the Unionist farmers of Ulster were not satisfied with the existing order of things, and would welcome Home Rule or any other rule which would give them justice.

Mr. T. W. Russell

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and he would say to the hon. Member—"Do not prophesy as to the Protestant farmers until you know." This much should be known to the hon. Member already—seeing that he had been obliged to leave the County of Londonderry in which he lived for South Fermanagh in order to obtain a seat—that no Home Ruler had the slightest chance of getting returned for his own county. He (Mr. T. W. Russell) wished to state for the benefit of the Attorney General two of the reasons, at all events, which animated the people of Ulster in their deadly hostility to the Bill. Speaking in their name, and without mincing his words, he said they objected to being governed by men whose record in the past gave no guarantee for just or good government in the future. He asked anyone to look over the record of the past for the last 30 years and say whether the people of Ulster were not justified in holding that opinion. He had been told—he thought by the Attorney General himself—that whilst gentlemen opposite had said and done things which were wrong and regrettable, they ought to rely on the sobering influence of power and responsibility. Well, if they were in a difficulty at any time they had only to go to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who explained everything. Here was an extract from the book of the Chancellor of the Duchy, on the very point the Attorney General had referred to. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"The chief lesson which a study of the more vicious of the State Legislatures teaches is that power does not necessarily bring responsibility in its train. I should be ashamed to write down so bald a platitude were it not that it is one of those principles which are constantly forgotten or ignored. People who knew very well enough that in private life wealth, or rank, or any other kind of power is as likely to mar a man as to make him, to lower as to raise his sense of duty, have nevertheless contracted the habit of talking as if human nature changed when it entered public life."

He commended that paragraph to the Attorney General. So far as the people of Ulster were concerned, they had no desire to rake up the speeches that had been so freely made during the past 13 or 14 years. The speeches were there, and they spoke for themselves; but, speaking on behalf of Ulster, he said they could not expect them to hand over their property and liberty to men who, during the past 14 years, had shown that they respected neither the one nor the other. He put that matter plainly, not as his own view alone, but as the view held all over the Province of Ulster. The next thing they objected to was this—they did not think that a Parliament, mainly elected by illiterate peasants, and certain to be governed and dominated by the most arrogant priesthood in Europe, was at all likely to be a just Assembly. The people of Ulster held that opinion. They had a right to hold it. The illiterate peasants were there, and the Government would not help them to get rid of the illiterate vote. The priesthood were there, and the Government proposed, instead of lessening their power, to increase it. They could not eradicate this feeling from the minds of the people of Ulster. The people of Ulster had seen these men at work—they knew what these men were, and they had not the slightest intention of trusting them. The Prime Minister said yesterday that the Irish people—and in the right hon. Gentleman's view there were no people in Ireland except those represented by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway—had never felt the Act of Union to be morally binding. It was carried against their wish, and they had never felt it to be morally binding. This measure, if it were carried to-night or to-morrow night, would be carried against the wish and the vote of the Ulster Representatives, who would not consider it morally binding upon them, and for the same reason. He came now to the Bill itself—to the pregnant fact that two-thirds of this measure had never been discussed at all. That one fact stood broadly out on the face of things. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. E. J. C. Mortou) had spent his time to-night in telling them what clauses of the Bill were discussed and what clauses were not discussed. That was useless so far as the people of this country were concerned. The plain fact of the matter was that the Government were proposing to read a Bill a third time, two-thirds of which had never been submitted to discussion in the House. What was the answer to that? When his right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin referred yesterday to the gag he called it "second-hand," and the Government seized upon that and proposed to tell the people of this country that they were not the inventors of this machine; they only took it second-hand. The answer to that was plain. It had been stated over and over again in the House. The six clauses of the Crimes Act, which were discussed fully in the House, comprised the whole operative portion of that measure. The Government had never answered that, or attempted to answer it. Could they say the same of the undiscussed clauses of this Bill? They knew perfectly well that they could not; and the Prime Minister yesterday, in his enumeration, pointed out that the great Reform Bill of 1831 took 39 days; but the Government had gone one better than that. They passed a Reform Bill for Ireland without discussing it at all, and also the arrangement for the redistribution of seats under the Second Schedule. They passed a new Reform Bill for Ireland and a new Redistribution of Seats Bill without discussion, and a pretty mess they had made of it! He did not think the Chief Secretary was responsible for that Schedule; he did not know sufficient of Ireland to have drawn it up. The Schedule was supplied by the ready-made department on the other side; it was merely handed to Her Majesty's Government, and it stood as their eternal disgrace.

MR. SEXTON [Cries of "Order!"] asked whether the hon. Member meant by the "ready-made department" the Party on that side? He wished to inform the hon. Member that the first the Irish Party knew of the Schedule was when they saw it printed in the Bill.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he meant exactly what he had stated. And now, so far as the gag was concerned, he wished to show what hon. Members opposite thought of it in 1887? They had made a prophecy—which, like many of their prophecies, had not come true. On June 25, 1887, a leader writer made a prophecy in United Ireland at the closing of the Crimes Act Debate. The paper was then edited by the hon. Member for Cork City, and the writing was so like the hon. Member's that he could almost swear to it as an expert in any Court. This was what was said—

“Debate is the lever by which abuses are removed. It is manifestly the interest of the mechanical majority of reaction to stifle Debate and extinguish minorities before they grew formidable. It is idle to hope that the weapon now used for oppression will be available for reform. A mechanical majority is unknown in the Liberal Party. No Liberal Prime Minister could lead a united Party to the merciless slaughter of free speech.”

Was he not right just now in warning hon. Members opposite not to prophesy until they knew? Was there not such a thing as a mechanical majority in the Liberal Party? Was not the Prime Minister ready to lead them to the merciless slaughter of free speech, and free speech not upon a Bill to put down crime, but upon a Bill to create a new Constitution for Great Britain and Ireland? The Government would not be able to convince this country that they had not gagged free discussion. [“Oh, oh!”] He had been quite as much about the country as hon. Gentlemen who cried “Oh!” and he could tell them they would find that the British people did not love proceedings of this kind. The next point with which he would deal was the representation of Ireland. He heard the Chief Secretary interrupt the hon. Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division (Mr. W. Kenny) when he said something about the feeling in Ireland on this subject. He wanted to deal with it, not from the Irish standpoint, but from the standpoint of the United Kingdom. They were in this House as citizens of the United Kingdom, and they had a right to discuss the question from the standpoint of the Imperial Parliament. A great deal had been made of what Liberal Unionists said on this subject in 1886, but he was not responsible for that, because at the time he was not in Parliament. Therefore, he was entitled to give his own view of the matter. There were only three ways of approaching the question. They must either exclude the Irish Members altogether, and they at one time proposed to do that, or they must retain them for limited purposes, and they proposed to do that in the beginning of the year, or they must retain them for all purposes as they proposed to do now. They had travelled the whole gamut, and they had the satisfaction of knowing that there was now nothing left of the road to be travelled. For the exclusion of the Irish Members this much was to be said—that the British people would then be masters in their own House, and, even more important than that, they would be masters of the whole British Empire, and the Irish Members would not be entitled to interfere. He objected to that in 1886, and he objected to it now. He objected as an Irish Member. It was a monstrous thing that they should call on the Irish people to pay taxes and give them no representation, and he thought it a monstrous thing that if this country reserved to itself the right of proclaiming war, Ireland should have no voice in the matter. Then, as to the in-and-out clause, what had the Chief Secretary said on that matter? Speaking to his constituents at Newcastle on the 21st of April, 1886, the right hon. Gentleman said that the result of retaining the Irish Members for Imperial purposes only would be that we should have all the then existing block of English business and all the existing irritation and exasperation continued. He said that English feeling would not be allayed by such an arrangement, that Irish feeling would be exasperated by it, and that the whole efforts of the Irish Members would be directed to throwing their weight first in favour of one Party and then of another until the barriers, limitations, and restrictions which ought never to have been set up had been removed. The right hon. Gentleman added that, for his part, he could not see how an arrangement of that sort promised well either for the condition of Ireland or for the English Parliament. And yet the right hon. Gentleman had since backed the Bill containing that very provision. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for this, because it only showed the extreme difficulty of the situation. The Attorney General had that night defended the retention of the Irish Members for all purposes, and said it would be quite impossible for the opinion of the Irish Members to over-rule ultimately the opinion of English and Scotch Members upon any English or Scottish question. He very much doubted that statement. In illustration of the contrary, he cited the case of the English Local Veto Bill, in regard to which it would be quite possible for the Irish Members to overrule the opinions and defeat the purposes of the English Members. And, at the same time, they would allow the Irishmen to have the option of exempting themselves from the operation of the Bill. He defied the Government and their supporters to defend such a state of things on any English platform. The hon. Member for Govan blurted out the true reason why the 9th clause of the Bill was wanted—to force the Newcastle Programme down the throats of English Members. Now, with regard to the Land Question, the opinion of the Liberal Government in 1886 was perfectly well-known. The Liberal Government of that day absolutely declined to trust the Irish Parliament with the settlement of the Land Question. Speech after speech was made by responsible Members of the Cabinet — by the Prime Minister, Lord Spencer, and the Chief Secretary, among others; and all the speeches were in the direction that such a concession to the Irish Parliament ought not to be made. Why did Ministers take up that position at that time? They had just passed through the horrors of the Land League Campaign; the soil of Ireland was red with blood, the moral code had been absolutely obliterated in that country, and right hon. Gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury Bench dared not take the responsibility of handing over the land of Ireland to men who had violated all sense of honour and morality in the matter. Why, then, had there been a complete change of front? Why were Ministers ready to do in 1893 what they declared in 1886 they could not and would not consent to do? They had changed their minds for one reason, and one only, because hon. Gentlemen opposite would not thank them for an Irish Parliament in which they would be debarred from dealing with the Land Question. The handing over of the Land Question to the Irish Parliament was the means by which it was hoped to commend Home Rule to the Ulster farmers. In 1882, after the Land Act was passed, and when it had been only a few months in operation, the question was raised on the Address. Rents had been reduced in a few months by 23 per cent., and some of the landlords brought the question before the House. Did the Prime Minister say that the Land Commission were right? Not at all. The right hon. Gentleman calmed the fears of those gentlemen, and said they had no right to reason generally from a few cases. He absolutely did not think that a general reduction of rent at that time would have been right or just. That was the position in 1882. The plain matter of fact was this—that Parliament in 1881 took, and rightly took, what the law called property from the landlords and gave it to the tenants. The Parliament of 1881 was right; but the Prime Minister pointed out to the Irish landlords, when that was done, that the residue left to them was absolutely safe and secure, and his Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) said the same thing. The same right hon. Gentleman who uttered those words in 1881 was now absolutely a party to handing over the whole of the Irish Land Question to the men who manned the Land League, who invented the Plan of Campaign, and who had made no secret of what they meant to do when the power came into their hands. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, addressing a meeting in County Tipperary on February 5, 1885, said—

“Remember that if our struggle is a long and a hard one the rewards and the prizes of victory are very great—prairie rents for the farmers, less than prairie rents for the labourers.”

The hon. Member was either expressing his true feelings or he was not. Did he mean prairie rents for the farmers? Then the hon. Member for North Louth said—

“I say that the property of the Irish landlords deserves to be abolished more than the property of the slave-holders deserved to be wiped out.”

Was the hon. Member fooling the people, or was he not? If he was, let him say so. If he was not, let him confess that he meant to rob the Irish landlords. That was the bribe to the Ulster farmer. He ventured to say that he knew the Ulster farmer rather better than hon. Members below the Gangway, and he ventured to tell them that they would not succeed in their mission. The Ulster farmer had ideas of his own about the land. Those ideas did not run in the direction of the revision of rents, but in the direction of the abolition of dual ownership. He longed to own his farm, and he knew that a pauper Irish Parliament could never effect that for him. He knew that what he might save in rent that Parliament would take out of him in extra taxation. He knew that with the advent of the new Government all guarantees for good government would cease, and the chances were 500 to 1 that when hon. Members below the Gangway went to him with their cry of cheap land he would tell them that man did not live by bread alone, and would refuse to sell his country for their mess of pottage. Now he came to the question of education. If there was one question more than another on which the Irish people distrusted this Bill it was the question of education. He concurred with the hon. Member for East Mayo that the question of University education ought to have been settled long ago; but he was now dealing with the system of mixed education set up 61 years ago. It had worked marvels and had reduced illiteracy in Ireland from 57 to 18 per cent., and he thought it was the most extraordinary thing he ever heard of that hon. Members opposite, who were always talking about the advantages of Irishmen working together, should be the very men to seek to separate Irish children and to decline to allow children of different denominations to meet in the same school. At the present moment minorities were not only protected by the Conscience Clause, but by the time table and an innumerable host of rules; and, as a matter of fact, in the most distant parts of Catholic Ireland the Protestant child was as safe in a National school as he could be, and the same might be said of a Catholic child in a National school in the North of Ireland. The Government were going to hand over that system which had done so much for Irish education to a Parliament which, on this question at all events, would be controlled by men who had sworn eternal enmity to mixed education. That was being done by a Party many Members of which fought Mr. Forster in 1870—led by the Chief Secretary, who was foremost in the fight—led by a man who had taught a generation of Englishmen to hate clericalism and sacerdotalism, and now sat on that Front Bench to carry out their behests. He was told that under the 4th section minorities would in every way be safe, that the Conscience Clause was a sacred subject that the Irish Parliament could not touch. But there was no need that the Irish Parliament should touch it, for by the Charter of the National Board the Commissioners could do it with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant without any Act of Parliament at all. An absolutely worthless Conscience Clause might be adopted in lieu of the present one. This was what was being done by the Party that made its political fortune out of its opposition to Mr. Forster's Bill in 1870. It was said that history repeated itself. Yesterday the Prime Minister had referred to Lord Macaulay, and he now proposed to read an extract from Lord Macaulay's history. Writing of a memorable epoch in Irish history, the great historian said—

“Unhappily James, instead of becoming a mediator, became the fiercest and most reckless of partisans. Instead of allaying the animosity of the two populations, he inflamed it to a height before unknown. He determined to reverse their relative position and put the Protestant Colonists under the feet of the Popish Celts. To be of the established religion, to be of the English blood, was in his view a disqualification for civil and military employment. He meditated the design of again confiscating and again portioning out the soil of half the Island, and showed his inclination so clearly that one class was soon agitated by terrors which he afterwards vainly wished to soothe, and the other by hopes which he afterwards vainly wished to restrain. But this was the smallest part of his guilt and madness. He deliberately resolved not merely to give to the aboriginal inhabitants of Ireland the entire possession of their own country, but also to use them as his instruments for setting up arbitrary government in England. The event was such as might have been foreseen. The Colonists turned to bay with the stubborn hardihood of their race. The Mother Country justly regarded their cause as her own. Then came a desperate struggle for a tremendous stake.”

They might look for King James to-night. The extract which he had read was an exact description of the present situation. The struggle was the same now as then, and the Mother Country might still rely, as she relied in the olden days, upon the hardihood of those who were proud to trace their descent from her. He believed also that those who stood at the outpost of danger, just as their ancestors did, might equally rely upon the Mother Country, to make an end of this precious scheme, and thus to bring peace both to England and Ireland.

*MR. BIRKMYRE (Ayr, &c.) said, he might frankly tell the House that he could not say one single new word upon this interminable subject of Home Rule. He ventured to think that the House would lose nothing if it proceeded at once to a Division upon the Bill. The country would not regret it if it could be so, and many weary and jaded Members of that House would find great relief. If, however, he could say nothing new upon this Bill, he could and did congratulate the House that at last they were within measurable distance of giving effect to the views of the constituencies as they were expressed at the last General Election, and of fulfilling other pledges which, at the same time, were given to the country. It must not be forgotten that this country was no less than seven years in arrears with Liberal legislation. He hoped that Members of all shades of Liberalism—even some of the Liberal Unionists—would join with the Government, and give them their assistance to pass many much-needed Liberal reforms. He hoped it would not be considered presumptuous in a new Member of that House to venture to remark that it was to be regretted that at every stage of this Home Rule Bill the arguments adduced against it had been of a dismal prophetic character, and that they had been so largely of a personal and recriminatory sort; of the kind known as the “you’re another” argument; for if ever there was a question which should be settled independently of any feelings of this sort, and simply upon its own merits, apart altogether from consideration of Party, he maintained that if national interests only were considered that was the question of the Third Reading of this Home Rule Bill, which might, he affirmed, pass without a Division. What mostly struck a new Member like himself, when he entered the House and took part in the business, was the terribly congested state of business that prevailed, and the utmost difficulty that there was for legislative action to be taken, and the great facilities given to the Opposition for opposing the express wishes of the people as declared at the General Election. He contended that as Irish Members occupied so much time of the House one of the first measures to be adopted in order to get rid of the congestion was to give the Irish a Parliament in Dublin. The first question to be asked upon that, he apprehended, was whether Irishmen were, judging from the past, politically capable of self-government? Irishmen representing the people of Ireland in the House of Commons had led the way in the great political movements of the century. The Irish were the first to lay down the political dogma that no man ought to suffer political disability on account of his religious belief, but he would not detain the House by naming any of the other great measures in which Irishmen had led the way during this century. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had a profound admiration for the Constitution of this country, and he contended, in all seriousness, that if they were to deduct from the Constitution the great measures which Irishmen had been instrumental in engrafting on the Constitution there would be very little left of the Constitution worthy of admiration. That incontestable fact gave him hope, and was, in his opinion, a reply to all the groundless fears which had been expressed to the effect that this Bill handed over the destinies of Ireland to the illiterate voters and priests of Ireland. If these illiterate voters and priests had in the past sent such a body of men to the House of Commons, who they must all acknowledge were adepts in Parliamentary procedure, it was not unreasonable to expect that in their own country, under the happier auspices of a new political life, Irishmen would at least maintain the reputation they had gained in this Parliament, and, perhaps, would be able to set an example even to this Parliament itself. The great influence of the illiterate voter and the priesthood in Ireland had been owing to the hateful measures embodied in the word “ascendency.” If Irishmen had been granted the system of education asked for years ago the proportion of illiterate voters in Ireland would have been much the same now as it was in other countries. But, speaking of the influence of the priesthood, he asked whether priests in Ireland were the only clergymen who interfered in politics? Hon. Members did not need to cross the Channel in order to get an object-lesson in the interference of clergymen in politics. There was this difference, however : that the beginning and the end of all the priesthood's interference in politics in Ireland was on account of their profound sympathy with the sufferings of the people. It was not for the sake of the loaves and fishes of the State. He wished he could say the same for the clergymen of Scotland, England, and Wales. It was but right to state that when ministers of the Established Church of Scotland preached at Liberal candidates, they usually prayed for them as well. If political consistency was a virtue, then he maintained that hon. Gentlemen representing Ireland were the most consistent of statesmen. The discussions on this Bill had taught them an object-lesson in consistency, for if there was one principle which gentlemen opposite held dearer than others it was that there should be a Second Chamber, and yet they voted against a Second Chamber for Ireland. Such political apostasy they had not found Irishmen guilty of. They had heard a great deal about the retention of Irish Members in Clause 9, but it must not be forgotten that gentlemen opposite voted for the full number, 103, being retained. He was not afraid of that clause, and he rather fancied that, if principles and political consistency were considered, the effect of that clause in the Ayr Burghs would be to increase at the next Election his majority of 7 votes to nearer 700. He was not afraid of all the arguments which had been advanced against the Bill. What he was afraid of was the envenomed hostile feeling expressed not so much in argument as in jeers and sneers, with which hon. Gentlemen opposite saluted the oft-quoted words "Union of Hearts."

SIR H. JAMES (Bury): I have trespassed so often and at such length on the attention of the House during the progress of this Bill that I had resolved to take no part in the Debate on the Motion now submitted from the Chair. But a speech of great ability has been delivered this evening by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and I desire to make a few observations on the arguments he employed. My hon. and learned Friend began his speech by saying that this Bill ought to receive the approbation of the House because it was founded on the plain natural right of self-government. When I heard, in the course of the speech, my hon. and learned Friend claim that this country was a united country, so that we could not distinguish for any purpose between the British vote and the Irish vote, I ask—How is it that within this United Kingdom there can be a claim for self-government by Ireland when the whole of this United Kingdom has self-government now? If this claim is made as a natural right on the part of Ireland, on what is it founded? If self-government be conceded to Ireland, why should it not be conceded to Scotland, Wales, and England, or within an area—if different blood be found to exist there—which comprised Cornwall or Yorkshire? We are determining the great question of Federal existence when such an argument as that is employed. If this argument is employed you must have complete Federation, and you must bring into existence, if not a Heptarchy, numerous divisions of the Kingdom, and say that they have a natural right to self-government. Will the Government dare to make any such proposition? If they do, they must make it as a whole, and not by a piecemeal and unequal Federation. The second argument of my hon. and learned Friend was that the reason the principle of Home Rule was not accepted in 1886 was because it was submitted to unprepared constituencies. "There was no preparedness amongst the constituencies," said my hon. and learned Friend. Sir, that is the reason that there is no substance in this Home Rule proposal. Some people say that this is a great revolution; others say it is a great reform. I put it to the House—Has ever a great revolution been submitted to the people by one man, and has a revolution ever been successful except it came from the people, and not from a command and order given to them that they should vote for it? Let us come to more peaceful proceedings. What reform has ever been carried by a people not in a state of preparation to receive it? The true growth of reform is within the ranks of the people, strengthened from within, urged forward by them according to the growth of public opinion, and so at last becoming accepted by the leaders of the people. There were members that were unprepared, as the whole Liberal Party was when, in 1886, one man commanded the reform to be carried out. Since that time there has been no natural growth of reform in the direction of this Bill. It has been merely a matter of Party action and Party policy, which the people had to receive at the dictation of one statesman. My hon. and learned Friend referred to 1832. Was it wise of him to refer to that period? In 1832 there was a national enthusiasm in the demand then made for Reform. We hear no such cry now. Why, even if you tried to raise it you could not. In those days the cry was—"The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." I would ask my hon. and learned Friend to try and raise that cry at the present moment. How near would he be able to get to it? It would be something like this—"The Bill, the new Bill, and nothing of the Bill." That is all that he could say after the Debates that have taken place in this House. My hon. and learned Friend then proceeded to press as an argument in favour of Home Rule the unanimity of opinion in Ireland. He said—"When has four-fifths of any portion of this country made a demand for a measure which we did not grant?" I thought this country was a united country. My hon. and learned Friend, strangely enough, used that argument at the same time that he said—"You have no right to apportion the majority—you have no right to distinguish between the Irish, the English, and the Scotch people." Some day it will be said that four-fifths of the Welsh people ask for Disestablishment, and that it is Welsh opinion only that must decide the question. I think we shall then be able to use the argument that the whole people, speaking as a whole, and not any part of them, should determine these questions. I demur entirely to the view taken by the Government and their supporters in regard to their right to prevent free discussion in this House. Hypothetically assuming it to be true, although I deny the statement that we have occupied more time than we ought to have occupied in discussing the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th clauses of the Bill; and supposing that we have overestimated the importance of those clauses, I say we are dealing with the gravest measure that has ever yet been introduced into this House that affected a whole people. It is, as I have said, a revolution of great and fundamental importance. Now that we are dealing with the action of individual Members, is it not fair that the punishment you inflict upon those who have so used the time of the House shall be in some way proportionate to the offence, and that it shall fall upon the right people? The hon. Member for Bedford said that really we ought to be very glad that the Closure had been applied, because it enabled us to get away earlier from the labours of this House. But if it be true, if we are glad to go, where is the punishment to us? The punishment is not upon the erring Member, but upon every Irishman who has nothing to do with this House, and who is dependent upon the wisdom of the provisions of this measure for his good government. Every man who is represented by hon. Members who sit near me may suffer the evils of arbitrary and class government, and what will it be for us to tell them—"The measure was never discussed, the provisions were not settled by argument, and the only reason is that some Members spoke too often, and at too great a length"? The punishment will fall upon our country when our country is suffering from the weakness imposed on it by this measure. The punishment will fall, not upon us—not upon the men who have committed the crime, but upon the innocent, who have taken no part in obstruction, and who have only desired that there should be serious discussion before any measure was placed upon the Statute Book. My hon. and learned Friend proceeded to utter in words almost of indignation—words cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway—a denunciation of the House of Lords; and he quoted a recent speech of the Leader of the Liberal Unionist Party declaring that the House of Lords would be justified in rejecting this Bill because it had not been discussed in this House. My hon. and learned Friend said that it was a monstrous doctrine, and a usurpation by the House of Lords. Let us consider to what result my hon. and learned Friend's indignation leads him. I have understood that in this Constitution of ours there were two deliberative Assemblies, and that they ought each of them to perform the function of deliberation. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that the House of Lords have no right to control the details of our procedure. They cannot say to us—"We think your Standing Orders ought to be altered, so that you can sit beyond 12 o'clock"; but they have a right to demand from us that we shall share the responsibility of legislation. They have the right to ask when we send up a Bill—"Have you deliberated upon it? Have you tested the wisdom of its provisions, or have you simply discussed one-fourth of its provisions and not discussed the other three-fourths, asking us to bear the full responsibility for all that you have not discussed?" Let us be just. If the House of Lords sent a Bill, even of four clauses, down to us, with three of the clauses undiscussed, what should we say to the House of Lords? And if that Bill had the slightest suggestion of Conservatism or Liberal Unionism in it the Attorney General would be still more emphatic than he was to-night, and he would say—"What have we to do with the idle and lazy men who will not discharge their duty? Why should we, the Commons of England, be called upon to do the work of the House of Lords?" Would he not ask that that Bill should be remitted to the House of Lords that they might duly exercise their duties as a deliberative Assembly? If we have not been sufficiently brief in order to satisfy, not the demands of Parliament, but the demands of Party, what have the House of Lords to do with that? They say—"We ask you simply to bear your portion of the deliberation, and when you have done that we will consider the measure. There are peculiar reasons why the House of Lords should say so in this case. If we ask that Chamber to perform our duty as to certain portions of the Bill, and if they do endeavour to discharge the double duty, what will follow? Let us take the financial provisions. If they were to criticise too much in this matter, where we have never exercised our discretion at all; if they were—in these clauses, which present all the features of a Money Bill—to reconstruct this clause and alter that, my hon. and learned Friend's indignation would break out again, and he would say—"What have they to do with such matters as these, which are within our peculiar province?" He would ask the House of Lords to accept our judgment in this matter—our judgment which we have not yet been able to express. Let us be just, even to those whom we regard as our opponents. There are Members, I know, who have no particular affection for the House of Lords. But what is their duty if they are to exist at all? We know, and the House of Lords know, that it is not to oppose the will of the people. They have given full proof of that during the last 60 years. The House of Lords have to act in two capacities. Personally, each Member entertains his own opinion; but, collectively, they submit them to the demands of the Constitution. The majority of the House of Lords did not agree with Catholic Emancipation, but they accepted the Bill. But that Bill had been for years before the public, and a majority of the House of Commons had considered every line of it. That Bill went to the House of Lords with the approval of the majority of the House of Commons and of the country. In 1832 the individual opinion of the House of Lords was against the Reform Bill; but there, again, they did not oppose the judgment of the people. But they knew that every line of it had been discussed in the House of Commons. As to the Irish Church Bill of 1868 and the Representation of the People Bill of 1884, the House of Lords did not oppose the will of the people. But whilst they have shown their wisdom in these instances, what do you expect from them next week? What is their duty but to say that before the Bill passes into law it shall have the sanction of the people of this country, and also that the sense of the House of Commons shall have deliberated not only upon every principle, but upon every detail that affects the Constitution? I wonder what would be said of the House of Lords if, instead of performing the duty of a Second Chamber in checking hasty, rash, and ill-considered legislation, next week they said—"We will accept this Bill? True, it has never been approved by a majority of the constituencies, as the Bill of 1832 was approved; true, the House of Commons has refused to go through its details and discuss it; but, nevertheless, we will pass it." Then, let the time come when, under this Bill, great disorder and disaster may arise, what would be said of that Chamber as a whole; what would be said of every individual Member of it? It would be said—"You had the power to stay the passing of that Bill; you had the power of asking the people of the country to say 'Aye' or 'No' do you approve of it; you had the power to remit it to the House of Commons for full and complete consideration, but you abdicated your function, and you refused to do more than blindly accept that which you believed to be wrong, and which you believed had neither been approved of by the people or by Parliament." There will be an attempt to pass this Bill some day, not upon its merits, but it will be an attempt to pass it by raising a cry. It may be a cry against the House of Lords for performing its primary duty. But, Sir, there is a good deal of common sense in the people of this country. There may be men who will ask that the House of Lords shall be abolished and cease to exist; but so long as it does exist it must at least justify that existence by the utility of its acts, and the first utility that will be found within its action will be not to refuse to pass a measure according to the arbitrary view of individuals who shall form that House, but to refuse to pass any Bill until it has received the sanction of popular approval. How ought that approval to be shown? In one breath the Attorney General tells us that we must take the constituencies as a whole, and in his second argument he said we should look, not to the constituencies as a whole, but to the Irish people; that they desired this measure, and that, therefore, we ought to give it. Well, Sir, we have heard these arguments before. We have now a demand made upon the House of Lords to pass a measure which shall separate the Union, for legislative purposes and Executive purposes, between Great Britain and Ireland. Well, Sir, who ought to express their views upon this subject? My hon. and learned Friend said—"Oh, you ought never to separate the countries to see what the opinions of the countries shall be." We have learned a lesson from the Prime Minister, who told us, in respect of the existence of the Irish Members in this House, that the British electors ought to determine that question, and we learned from him that the British electors had something special and separate to say when they were asked to allow Great Britain to have legislation imposed upon it by Irish Members, while we cannot legislate in return. I suppose when you are separating the bonds of Union both the entities that compose that Union should be consulted. When the operation of separation was proposed to be performed upon those two unhappy individuals, the Siamese twins, both of them were consulted beforehand as to whether it should be done or not. If they had asked only one and not the other the injustice would have been of the greatest, and the injury, I believe, would have been resented by the one not consulted on the subject. We demand at least that before Great Britain is to be separated from Ireland, and ruled by Irish Members in this Chamber, that Great Britain shall express its opinion upon it, and if it come to pass that there shall be found a majority in Great Britain, as there is now, opposing this measure, that voice must be listened to, and the House of Lords will not be enabled to say—"We will not listen to that voice, but we will, under all the circumstances, listen to the voice of the majority in respect of the Three Kingdoms. We will not listen to the more powerful Kingdom who resents the fact not so much of disunion, but of the Government of that country being carried on by Irish Members without a corresponding power being given to English Members." My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General became indignant, and said he had been shocked over and over again by the contemptuous way in which the Irish people had been spoken of. We have not been contemptuous of their ability, zeal, or personal worth. But peoples must be spoken of according to their conduct, and we speak of those who represent the political force of the Irish people not according to a fancy estimate we have to make of them, but according to their acts—acts which have been proved and established, and upon which judgment has been given. Of the Leaders of the Irish people we have spoken not so much in terms of contempt as in terms of censure and condemnation. They are men who have governed Ireland, not in the name of the law, but, in fact—some of them at least—for 12 or 13 years with the power of crime. Hon. Members sitting upon the Benches opposite helped to found the Land League, controlled and organised it, and that was a League which paid for the commission of crime out of the funds of the League. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members who say "No, no!" are ignorant of the facts which have been proved and established by documents written in the names of the Leaders of the Land League. [Cries of "No!"] If hon. Members challenge me, I will tell them who were the men who knew that payments were made to men who committed outrage and crime. And these are the men who, having thus controlled and governed Ireland, who were censured by none so acutely and so severely as by the Ministers now in power, whose crimes were known to them and condemned by them—to them is to be handed over the power of governing their fellow-men in Ireland. Sir, that is not the language of contempt, but it is the language of condemnation. Hitherto rewards have been given under every conditions of life to citizens, at least, for good conduct; but you are now about to reward these men for bad conduct. And apart from the main fact that you are now entrusting them with the government, not only of those who agreed with them, but of the men who disagreed with them, can the House refuse to recognise what effect this must have upon the Irish people who are not of the Leaders? Sir, they will recognise quickly enough that these are the men who preached defiance of the law, and who summoned the men of Ireland from the hill-side to defeat and break the law, and that they are the men who did not disapprove of outrage and mutilation, and in some instances of murder. And then the Irish people will be told that it is those men who led on that crime that the Imperial Parliament has thought fit to reward with high distinction, and power, and place. And what, in time to come, will those more humble Irishmen say? They will say—"Let us defy the law; let us attempt to defeat the representatives of law and order, and we,

according to this new political morality, shall receive our reward; we shall be as successful against our Leaders as they formerly were against theirs." We are to justify and approve the very lowest grade of political morality that it is possible to conceive. I now return unwillingly to the subject I just referred to. This degradation of political morality and true government has not come from the mandate of the people; it has come simply from the exigencies of a Party, who have bought the alliance of those whom it has placed in the position of governing them. The few arguments dealt with by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General referred to three portions of the Bill—the veto, and the position of the Viceroy in respect to it, and the power of the Exchequer Judges to enforce their decrees. In the first place, he told us—and I suppose it was satisfactory to the Irish Members to hear—that the Viceroy, as representing the Sovereign, was to act with a power in the Irish Parliament that no one, I think, has ever seen exercised in any Parliament—not in this, at any rate, since a certain bauble was removed from the Table. According to the Attorney General, the Viceroy is not to act Constitutionally under the advice of the Executive Committee, but to keep watch and ward. He is to say—I think the words were used by some Member of the Government—"My good fellow, you are not to pass this Bill. I really do not like it. I, the dictator of Parliament, tell you that I do not like it, and that if you pass it you are acting against my orders." This is the position in which you put the Representative of the Sovereign in this country—a position which, if there was no other objection to it, must produce conflict, and which cannot for a single moment represent the good government of Ireland. My hon. and learned Friend came to the point, and then he ran away. He depicted the view that had been presented by the Chancellor of the Duchy that the Chamber will say to the Lord Lieutenant—"We will refuse you supplies if you veto this Bill," and when we were all expecting him to tell us what would happen when that occurred my hon. and learned Friend passed from the subject, and left it without one word of explanation. He next told us he would deal with the land; but, again, on that subject he had nothing to say. Following the example of a celebrated Scotch Minister, finding the subject one of difficulty, he passed on to the next, and never touched the land at all. There was one other matter he did deal with. He knows the position of the Judges under the 19th clause, and he says—"Oh, they may enforce their decrees under Sub-section 5!" What is that? These two Judges, gentlemen of advanced years, learned in the law, make a decree, but they are without forces at their disposal. Are they to raise forces of their own to carry out their decrees? "No," said my hon. and learned Friend, "they are backed by the Imperial Executive." Imperial Executive where? There is none in Ireland. The Imperial Executive here? By whom will that Imperial Executive be represented? By military force, and military force alone; and if these Judges come and fail to obtain the assistance of the Executive power in Ireland—and it is upon that hypothesis that you will bring the Imperial Executive into play—that means conflict between the two Governments, and once you use the military forces of the Empire against the Executive Government in Ireland it is simply civil war. My hon. and learned Friend told us the interesting anecdote about Georgia, but he evidently did not know the facts. The Supreme Court of the United States granted a writ of habeas corpus, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court issued his decree. The President of the State of Georgia said, "Let him execute it," and the decree was sent to Georgia; but the State of Georgia laughed at it, and took no notice of it. The men remained in prison for months, and then made submission of their own accord. It was only then that the State of Georgia, having defeated the action of the Chief Justice of its own motion, released the prisoners. I may read from a book which has caused so many people to exclaim—"Oh, that mine enemy—my political enemy—would write a book!" I refer now to this well-worn book The American Commonwealth, and this is what the Chancellor of the Duchy there says of this incident—

"This successful resistance of Georgia in the Cherokee dispute gave a blow to the authority of the Court, and marked the beginning of a new period of history."

And this is the example which my hon. and learned Friend gave, not only to prove that the Exchequer Judges would be powerful men with the Imperial Executive at their back, but to prove, what is much more important, that we shall be able to see that their decrees given in the Imperial interest will be enforced, and will not be laughed at and treated by the Executive of Ireland as Georgia treated the decree of Chief Justice Marshall. I am not very well acquainted with local affairs in Ireland, but I have a recollection of some matters connected with the Corporation of Limerick. That Corporation refused to obey certain orders, and I picture to myself these two Exchequer Judges telling the Corporation of Limerick that they are to pay a certain sum of money, and the Corporation of Limerick, with the approval of the Irish Executive, saying—"We will not pay it." What is to be the remedy, and how is the position of these Judges to be different to that of Chief Justice Marshall, whose authority was shaken, if not destroyed, in the Georgia case? Would not their position be the laughing stock not only of this country, but of people throughout the world? There is one good reason (pointing to the clock) why I cannot continue to deal with the arguments of my hon. and learned Friend. I should have liked to have demonstrated that there has been no undue discussion of this Bill. We were told a short time ago by a Member of the Government that anyone could find something to say in the way of Amendments if dealing with a Bill of Rights or Magna Charta. I doubt whether you can draw any comparison between those great measures and this Bill. They were merely declaratory of the law; but here we have to deal with a measure of which the hon. Member for Sunderland said that every clause represents a Bill, and of which the senior Member for Northampton wrote that it was 20 Bills rolled into one. It is a measure which destroys one Constitution and attempts to erect another, and it is impossible that any one line of it can be treated as a declaration of the law. It is a measure dependent upon the thoughts and wisdom of men, and the men who have to deal with the measure are answerable for every word in it. In erecting a Constitution you ought to have a main concurrence in arriving at some definite conclusion according to admitted pledges to the country. But when you ask 670 men, more or less equally divided, every one of them, to bear the responsibility for this measure, and to be answerable to their constituents for all that is in it, you must expect prolonged discussion, and discussion which cannot be controlled by the precedent of olden times. In those days men were not answerable to their constituents as they are now. In those days men did not take the part in political discussion they do now, and they acted without due regard to the responsibility of their position as legislators. At any rate, we are in a different position, and it is impossible with us that this most contentious Bill should be otherwise than discussed with the greatest deliberation. This Bill, as my hon. and learned Friend anticipated, goes to its death, and we scarcely know whether we can ask even a decent sepulture for it, for we are sending up only the mangled remains of a Bill. It is not even a body that can be recognised in any feature. We send it to another place in order that it may, I suppose, be interred with some decency. Whatever may happen, we shall have nothing to blame ourselves for. We have done our best to prevent this insufficient and uncertain legislation, and if we fail the fault is not ours. It was said long ago that England would never be undone lest it should be by Parliament, and we who in this day are Members of this Parliament have done our very best to prevent the undoing of our country, and we believe we shall succeed, not by our individual efforts, but simply by the wise judgment and common sense of our countrymen.

*MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Longford, N.): I am afraid, Sir, I shall have hardly time to make any lengthened or elaborate reply to the right hon. and learned Gentleman to-night. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has made a speech to which we all listened with a great deal of curious interest. Before he started off, according to what the American war song says, "on his march in Georgia," he occupied himself with two special functions. We often hear of a speech made to the Gallery. The greater part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech—the early part of it—was a speech made to the Peers' Gallery. He addressed himself altogether to the House of Lords, pointing out to them what their Constitutional duty was, and laying down for them some strange and singular doctrines. The right hon. and learned Gentleman laid it down as one of the rights and duties of the House of Lords never to pass any Bill coming up to them from this House until they had first ascertained whether the feeling of the people of the country was in favour of that Bill. Now, I want to know whether there is any method by which the House of Lords can learn what the feeling of the country is except through the expression of this Representative Assembly? Then, again, he said to the House of Lords that if they should pass a measure which is not a measure that works well, they will be told by everybody whom the measure injures—"You are the guilty persons, because you, before you passed this Bill, should insist on having a fresh opinion from the constituencies of the country." Well, I want to know where in Constitutional Law any doctrine of that kind lies enshrined? Who ever gave the House of Lords power to appeal to the constituencies of this country, or in any way, direct or indirect, to enforce an appeal to those constituencies? The House of Lords has got to take a measure as it comes from this House, either pass it, or amend it, or mutilate it, or not pass it at all, but they must accept a measure coming from the majority of this House as a measure sent up by the majority of the people of this country.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) [GRANT].

Resolution reported ;

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an additional annual sum, not exceeding £5,000, for the purposes of "The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889," and the Acts amending the same, and the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of any sums lent by the National Debt Commissioners, under the provisions of 'The Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891,' for the commutation of the said additional annual sum."

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked for some explanation of the Resolution.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) said, the Bill which would be introduced, if this Resolution were agreed to, was for obtaining powers to provide the remainder of the money which was pledged by the late Government for making light railways. The amount required for the purpose was £1,142,000. There was at present available under the powers of the Acts already passed £976,000, leaving a sum of £166,000 to be provided for. The Bill was intended to provide the sum. Though it was originally estimated that the sum required would be £1,145,000, that amount had been since reduced to £1,142,000, a reduction of £3,000 being effected on the original Estimate.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Does this complete the whole?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It will complete the whole.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL remarked that he never intended to oppose this Resolution. He simply desired information.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) must raise his protest against this Resolution. It was all very well to sanction the expenditure of this money under the late Government when no Home Rule was contemplated, but he protested against his constituents being taxed to provide railways for Ireland in face of the fact that the Government were attempting to pass a Home Rule Bill which would cut off Ireland altogether.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir J. T. Hibbert and Mr. J. Morley.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 453.]

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 78.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection being taken,

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) asked the House to consent to the Second Reading of this Bill, which sought to enable agricultural schools in England to have small gardens attached to them for the purpose of agricultural teaching. The system had been adopted with good results in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): This is the sixth time I have heard the right hon. Gentleman speaking on the Second Reading of this Bill. How often has he a right to move the Second Reading?

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Might I move that the Order for the Second Reading be discharged and the Bill withdrawn, in consequence of the continued opposition of the Irish Members to it?

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

HABEAS CORPUS (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 452.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection being taken,

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked to be allowed to explain that this Bill consisted of one clause taken from the Home Rule Bill in accordance with the Motion of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir H. James), and which was voted for by the whole House. There was a perfect agreement on the matter, and he did not, therefore, see how anybody could object to it.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

SUSPENSION OF THE TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE.

THE PATRONAGE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire) gave notice that the Prime Minister would to-morrow

(Friday) move the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule in respect of the Government of Ireland Bill.

MR. BARTLEY : Can the hon. Gentleman say whether we can have the form of the Resolution promised by the Prime Minister ?

MR. MARJORIBANKS : That will be put on the Table of the House at the very beginning of the Sitting to-morrow.

MR. BARTLEY : It will not be circulated ?

MR. MARJORIBANKS : No.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

FERTILISERS AND FEEDING STUFFS
BILL.—(No. 263.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he hoped their Lordships would give a Second Reading to this Bill. It was not a Party measure, but was prepared on the lines indicated by the Departmental Committee appointed in March, 1892, by the then President of the Board. The Committee was presided over by the noble Lord the then Member for the Medway Division, and it had the advantage of the services of the Member for Northamptonshire, who had given special attention to the subject, Mr. Albert Pell, Mr. Peter M'Lagan, and various official Members. They took a great deal of evidence, and their Report fully established the necessity, in the interests of agriculture, of legislative action for the purpose of rendering it more easy for the purchaser to ascertain the real value of the article with which he was supplied. In the case of manures, or, as they were more delicately termed, fertilisers, the Committee reported that there was a preponderance of evidence to the effect that a considerable amount of fraudulent dealing (especially in the case of compound manures) existed; that they were sold as containing certain properties which they did not contain; and that there was a system, particularly among the smaller traders, of selling unguaranteed and comparatively worthless articles at an excessive price. With regard to feeding stuffs, the Committee reported that the trade in seed and oil cakes was a field in which the practice of adulteration was particularly prevalent, and that there was a large quantity of articles, more or less impure or adulterated, sold as genuine or pure products, certain ingredients being put into cotton cakes and linseed cakes which were positively injurious. They were, he believed, generally known in the trade as "buffum"; and even castor-oil seeds, which were very unpleasant to the cattle getting them, were included in buffum. The Bill proposed, in the first place, to place a purchaser in a better position to obtain his remedy, by civil proceedings, in cases in which the fertiliser or feeding stuff was inferior in quality to what he was led or entitled to expect when he purchased it, and did not contain the ingredients it was pretended to contain; and, in the second place, it made certain fraudulent practices the subject of criminal proceedings and penalties. If any person fails, without reasonable excuse, to give the invoice which, under the Act, must be given and was to have effect as a warranty; if the invoice or the description was false in any material particular, to the prejudice of the purchaser; if an article sold for use as food for cattle contained any ingredient deleterious to cattle; or if to any such article had been added any ingredient worthless for feeding purposes and not disclosed at the time of sale, the offending person was made liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £20 for a first offence, and £50 for any subsequent offence. At the same time, the Board of Agriculture were quite aware that the trade would object to having a Sword of Damocles of this sort always hanging over their heads when they sold their manures or feeding stuffs. It was represented by the traders that civil proceedings were extremely expensive; and that even if they showed they were right, they would be put to very great expense. They, therefore, represented to the Board that civil proceedings under this Act should not be taken except after special investigation by some responsible Body. The Board recognised the validity of the views urged on behalf of the trade, and the Bill, therefore, made a certificate of the Board of Agriculture an essential preliminary to such proceedings, except in cases where they were instituted by the Council of a county or county borough. With regard to machinery, the Bill made it incumbent on County Councils to appoint district agricultural analysts; and buyers of fertilisers or feeding stuffs would be entitled, on payment of a fee, to have their purchases analysed if they considered themselves aggrieved. This analysis, subject to appeal to a chief analyst to be appointed by the Board of Agriculture, might be made the basis of proceedings either by the person aggrieved, by a County Council, or by any Association—Farmers' Club or Chamber of Agriculture—authorised by the Board in that behalf. The Bill extended to Scotland and Ireland. Speaking generally, the Bill required sellers of goods to do what honest sellers were already doing — namely, to give a guarantee or warranty for what they were selling, and it added criminal liabilities in cases of fraud or of wilful contravention of its requirements. An endeavour had been made to frame it so that, although, on the one hand, it would be effective in minimising the malpractices to which reference had been made, it would, on the other hand, impose no restrictions or obligations which would unduly hamper business, and which would either have the effect of raising the prices of the articles affected to the consumer, or could be easily evaded or disregarded in practice. The machinery was simple, and the Board considered that while the trade would not suffer the consumer would gain very much by this proposed legislation. As he had said, the Bill was in no sense a Party measure. It had been the duty of the present Board to prepare it on the basis of the Report of a Committee which their predecessors appointed, and he trusted that their Lordships would consent to give it a Second Reading.

—(The Lord Ribblesdale.)

*LORD KNUTSFORD : I do not suppose your Lordships will in any way hesitate to give this Bill a Second Reading. As it has not yet been printed I have only had an opportunity of skimming through its provisions and hearing what the noble Lord has said about it, but it seems to me that its object is good, and I understand that its framework is based upon the evidence taken by the Select Committee, which, of course, is very much in its favour. But I hope the noble Lord in charge of it will allow a little time to elapse before it is considered by the Standing Committee. Of course, I speak without much authority, as none of my late Colleagues are present, but I do not imagine the Bill will be opposed at any future stage.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley) : We propose that it should pass the Committee stage in the House on Monday, and be considered by the Grand Committee on Tuesday ; otherwise there would be no chance of passing it now.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF CHILDREN) BILL.

Returned from the Commons with several of the Amendments agreed to, and one disagreed to, with a Reason : The said Reason to be printed, and to be considered on Monday next. (No. 264.)

EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 262.)

Read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (SWINE FEVER) BILL.—(No. 254.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to Order), with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

BURGH GAS SUPPLY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 226.)

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read, and discharged.

House adjourned during pleasure : House resumed : The Lord Kensington chosen Speaker in the absence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Commissioners.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

Brought from the Commons ; read 1<sup>a</sup> ; to be printed ; and to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on Tuesday next.—(The Earl Spencer.) (No. 265.)

House adjourned at ten minutes past One o'clock a.m., to Monday next, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 1st September 1893.

QUESTIONS.

ANTI-VACCINATION AT GRAYS, ESSEX.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state the total number of police employed to keep the peace on the day of the recent distraint for breach of the Vaccination Laws at Grays, Essex; how many were imported from outside the parish, and what was the cost; and is the cost borne by the county, the union, or the parish?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The Chief Constable of Essex informs me that the total number of police of all ranks employed was 28; the number imported from outside the parish was 21; and the total extra cost, which will be borne by the police district of Grays, was 16s. 4d.

MULTIPLE PUBLIC APPOINTMENTS.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. William Turner, Petty Sessions Clerk, Clones, County Monaghan, is frequently employed by landlords in that district as a surveyor and mapper, and that Mr. Turner is also relieving officer of the Clones District; whether he is aware that frequent complaints have been made by persons requiring to see Mr. Turner on Petty Sessions business that they have suffered inconvenience and disappointment in not being able to find him in consequence of his absence on other duties; whether complaints have reached him that, from the same cause, poor persons, requiring Poor Law assistance from Mr. Turner as relieving officer, have suffered hardship by being obliged to do without the required assistance, which in many cases they had travelled long distances to obtain; whether it is in accordance with the Rules of the Public Service that one individual should be permitted to hold the two offices of Petty Sessions Clerk and relieving officer, and also allowed to do other business unconnected with either office, to the duties of each of which the holder is supposed to devote his entire time; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made concerning the alleged facts in this case with a view to putting an end to the evils complained of?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): It is a fact, I am informed, that Mr. Turner, Clerk of Petty Sessions, holds also the office of relieving officer, and that he is employed from time to time in the work of surveying, &c. No complaints have been made to me, or to either of the Departments by whom he is immediately employed, of the nature indicated in the second and third paragraphs of the question; but I am having inquiry made in the matter. With regard to the fourth paragraph, a Clerk of Petty Sessions is allowed to engage in other occupations with certain exceptions; he is not debarred from acting as relieving officer.

TILBURY LEVEL CROSSING.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the accident at the level crossing at Tilbury, Essex, on Friday last; if he is aware that numerous fatal accidents have occurred at this crossing; and whether he will urge upon the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway the necessity of taking more effectual measures to insure the safety of the public at this point?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): My attention has been called to the accident referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, and I believe it is not the first that has occurred at that place. The Company inform the Board of Trade that they have long been anxious to get rid of the crossing, and took special powers in their Act of 1891 to do so. Some difficulty has arisen, partly from the opposition of certain owners and occupiers in the district, and partly from the fact that a portion of the land required to carry out the improvements is the subject of litigation. The Company state, however, that they are taking steps which they hope will enable them shortly to carry out the works.

THE BAHAMAS.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to an affidavit of Mr. Edmund Cogswell, accountant, of London, which states that it appears by the Votes of the House of Assembly of Bahama Islands, that on 22nd April, 1892, a Member of the said House of Assembly, named Alfred E. Moseley, moved a Resolution suspending for that Sitting the 11th Rule of the House, which prescribes the forms in the case of all Money Grants, in order to take the Second and Third Readings of a Money Grant to Sir A. Shea, Governor of the Colony; whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the distinct terms of this Rule, large sums of money were granted, the said Rule having been suspended for the purpose, to Sir A. Shea in 1891 and again in 1892, ostensibly for Sir A. Shea's expenses in coming to London in 1890 and 1891, whereas Sir A. Shea did not come to England at all in 1890, and only for a short period in 1891; whether he is also aware that under the said Votes sums amounting in the two years to £1,000 or thereabouts have been by the warrant of Sir A. Shea charged to the Public Treasury of the Colony and paid to him, and whether any details of such sums, or as to how they are made up, can be gathered from the said Votes; whether it has been brought to his notice that it is stated in the affidavit, and appears from the Votes, that the grants to Sir A. Shea for repairs to Government House, and for miscellaneous unforeseen and contingent services, have been largely in excess of grants to previous Governors; and whether the Government is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence between Sir A. Shea and the Colonial Office on the subject of the cable, and to state the details of the items of which the sum of £32,000, stated to have been expended for the cable, and borrowed on the credit of the Colony, is made up?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): (1) A copy of the affidavit referred to has been communicated to the Secretary of State. (2) In 1891 and 1892 the House of Assembly of the Bahamas unanimously passed Resolutions, which were concurred in by the Legislative Council, for the payment to the Governor, Sir Ambrose Shea, of the expenses incurred by him during his absence from the Colony in 1890 and 1891 in his efforts to further the interests of the Colony in connection with the establishment of telegraphic communication. On each of these occasions the 11th Rule of the House of Assembly, which requires such Resolutions to be thrice read and agreed to at three separate Sittings, notice of the Second and Third Readings being given one day previous, was suspended by the unanimous vote of the House, and the Resolutions were read a second and third time at the same Sitting. There was no mention of London in the Resolutions. Sir A. Shea went to Canada in 1890 and to London in 1891.

(3) The Resolutions did not specify the amount to be paid. Under the first of them £297 15s., and under the second £452 10s., were paid to the Governor. The Secretary of State has no information as to the details of these amounts.

(4) The Votes in the Annual Estimates for the repairs and furniture of Government House have been, on an average, higher during the tenure of office of the present Governor than in the time of his immediate predecessor. The Vote for miscellaneous unforeseen and contingent services referred to in the question does not relate especially to the Government House, but to the whole of the works under the charge of the Board of Public Works. (5) £30,000 was raised by loan and paid under contract for the construction and laying of the telegraph cable from Nassau to Florida. Further sums, amounting to £2,816, were expended from the Colonial Revenue in connection with the cable, the details of which can be shown to the hon. Member at the Colonial Office.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if the meeting of the Bahamas Assembly was not an irregular one?

MR. S. BUXTON: I believe it was perfectly regular, but if the question is repeated I will inquire further.

LONDONDERRY BARRACKS.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what time has elapsed since it was decided to make Londonderry the headquarters of a regiment; and when do the authorities intend to commence the necessary extensions to the barracks?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): It was about two years ago that it was decided to make Londonderry the headquarters of the battalion instead of Enniskillen. It is hoped that building operations will commence next year.

THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT'S STEAM LAUNCH.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether he can give the House any information as to the steam launch said to have been given to the Duke of Connaught for his use while Commander of the Army Corps at Portsmouth; whether he can say by what authority such launch was given; whether the authority of Parliament was ever asked or obtained for the expenditure of public money for that purpose; and whether a steam launch is required to carry out the public duties of a Commander of the land forces at Portsmouth?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. A steam launch has been supplied for the use of the General Officer commanding the Southern District, in order to enable him to visit the numerous forts and posts in his command without delay or difficulty. The necessity for its provision as essential for the efficient performance of the General's public duties had been recognised before the Duke of Connaught was appointed to the command. This launch was provided from funds included in the Army Estimates in the usual way.

LUNATICS IN BELFAST ASYLUM.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he can state the number of inmates in the Belfast District Lunatic Asylum, and also the limit of accommodation for patients there; (2) what is the number of lunatics in Belfast Workhouse; whether he is aware that the workhouse buildings have to be extended owing to the number of insane inmates; (3) what is the number of lunatics charged to Belfast

District now in Ballymena Workhouse; (4) and whether he will take into consideration the desirability of having a new asylum built on a new site at Belfast for the accommodation of the Belfast lunatics, or the advisability of having the districts of Belfast and County Antrim re-united, and a commodious asylum built at Antrim, where a site of 100 acres has been already secured for the purpose?

MR. J. MORLEY: (1) The total number of inmates in the Belfast District Lunatic Asylum is 594, and of these 368 are chargeable to the City of Belfast. The asylum at the present time has sleeping accommodation for 400 patients according to the scale of space laid down by the Board of Control. There is also day-room accommodation for 300 patients. (2) The number of lunatics at present in the Belfast Workhouse is 492, and the buildings are being extended to accommodate the insane lunatics. (3) One hundred and twelve lunatics, chargeable to the City of Belfast, are now in the Ballymena Workhouse. (4) With regard to the final paragraph, I understand that in May last the Board of Governors of the Belfast District Asylum decided to build a new asylum for the City, but that at their meeting in July the Governors, having regard, I believe, to the large expenditure that would be involved, rescinded the resolution in reference to the building of a new asylum, and decided to appoint a committee to consider the requirements for the accommodation of the lunatics of the City of Belfast, and to report on the best means of providing such accommodation.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: Is not the delay in building an asylum due to the introduction of the Home Rule Bill?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have not heard that.

MR. M'CARTAN: There is no foundation for the statement that the Bill has had any such effect.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): Has not a proposal been made to build a county asylum so as to keep the city and county lunatics separate? Are not the lunatics in the workhouse lunatics of a very mild kind?

MR. J. MORLEY: I think a county asylum is required. As to the classification of the lunatics, I cannot say.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): In view of the admission that there are 294 people in the asylum more than there is accommodation for, and many are seeking admission, will the right hon. Gentleman, bearing in mind the great evils arising from the crowding together of all classes of lunatics, take immediate steps to put an end to this serious state of things?

MR. J. MORLEY: I admit it is a serious state of things, and I have called for a special Report.

MR. SEXTON: As to the lunatics in the Belfast workhouses, can they legally be detained there?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will inquire into that.

GUNNERY PRACTICE OFF PLYMOUTH.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to a statement that recently, as the tender Sir Richard Grenville was proceeding to the Cape Mail steamer Dunottar Castle, upon the arrival of the latter at Plymouth, two projectiles (220 lb. shot) were fired from Fort Pucklecombe across the tender's bows, and a third under her stern, ricocheting in front of the port bow; and that subsequently, as the Dunottar Castle was making for Cawsand Bay, a shot struck the water ahead, and a second fell within 300 yards, creating great confusion among the passengers, and that two other shots followed; and whether any inquiry has been made respecting the truth of these allegations; and, if so, will he state the result of such inquiry?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have just this moment received the following telegram from the General at Devonport:—

"Report by post to-night. Purport herewith. The practice was perfectly correct and legitimate under the circumstances. The Dunottar Castle was in no danger whatever, the shot in question being directed at and falling close to a stationary object more than 500 yards beyond and 500 yards to the right of her as she lay alongside her tender, 2,500 yards from Pucklecombe Fort."

I am receiving further details.

MOUNTAIN ASH LOCAL BOARD.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state the reason for the delay in holding an inquiry for the purpose of sanctioning the loan applied for by the Mountain Ash Local Board on 18th April last; and when the necessary inquiry is likely to be held?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The application made by the Local Board on the 18th of April last had reference to a scheme in connection with which powers of compulsory land purchase were required, and could not be dealt with until the Provisional Order conferring those powers had been confirmed by Parliament. The confirmation of the Order took place on the 27th July. Arrangements have been made for holding the inquiry on the 14th of this month.

TORPEDO BOATS AT THE LATE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many torpedo boats, torpedo catchers, and large vessels composed each of the fleets that took part in the late manœuvres; and how many of each class of these vessels are allowed by the umpires to have been struck by torpedoes, captured, or destroyed?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The five fleets that took part in the recent manœuvres included 19 large vessels (including battleships); 24 cruisers; 15 torpedo gunboats, and 24 torpedo boats. Of these, 1 battleship; 9 cruisers; 3 torpedo gunboats, and 26 gunboats were allowed by the umpires to have been put out of action.

THE ARMY MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has considered the Memorial recently addressed to him by the Scotch Medical Licensing Bodies on the subject of the recent changes in the method of appointing Examiners for the Army Medical Service, which complains of the new arrangements as an unjust monopoly in favour of the English Medical Corporations, and as a measure of centralisation tending to attract students to the London Medical Schools, and tending to aggravate the evils of the cramming system;

whether the objections urged against the system by the Scotch Colleges are in the main identical with those previously urged against it by the Irish Colleges; and whether he has taken any, and, if so, what, steps to alter the new system?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Memorial, which is in the main identical with that received from the Irish Colleges, has been under my consideration, and I have replied to it that the new system involves no such monopoly as is apprehended, as I have already explained on the 21st ultimo, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Stirlingshire.

MR. JACKS (Stirlingshire): Having regard to this very important matter, has the right hon. Gentleman no explanation to offer as to the reason of these extraordinary appointments?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: They do not require explanation and the appointments were not extraordinary.

† MATABELE RAIDS IN MASHONALAND.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the event of a continuance of hostile raids on the part of the Matabele into Mashonaland, it is intended to seek, through the Portuguese Government, the assistance of the Mozambique Company for the purpose of assuring the safety of the British population; and whether all questions between the British and Portuguese Governments relating to the frontier disputes between the British South Africa Company and the Mozambique Company have been finally arbitrated upon in accordance with the Anglo-Portuguese Convention of 11th June, 1891; if not, what measures the Government intend adopting for the purpose of terminating the disputes?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I am not aware of any such intention. There have been no arbitrations under the Anglo-Portuguese Convention of June 11, 1891. The frontier, south of the Zambesi, has been surveyed by Major Leverson as British Commissioner, and a line laid down which is being discussed with the Portuguese Government.

THE BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, as the Government have informed the House that the British South Africa Company are responsible for the maintenance of peace and order in the territories comprised within their Charter, the Foreign Office will act upon a similar view as regards those of the territories comprised in the Charter of the Imperial British East Africa Company from which the Company has not retired; and whether Her Majesty's Forces are now carrying on operations at any places within the territory still nominally under the control of the Company?

*SIR E. GREY: Her Majesty's Government hold the Imperial British East Africa Company responsible for the due execution of the terms of their Charter in the territories from which they have not yet retired. One of Her Majesty's ships was sent to Kismaya on an emergency for the protection of British life and property; but it is understood that the operations are now over, and the reply to the last paragraph of the question is, therefore, in the negative.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

MR. W. ALLAN (Gateshead): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the total amount taken in this year's Navy Estimates for construction of new ships; and whether it is more or less than the amount taken in 1892-3; if so, by how much?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The present Board of Admiralty have proposed in their Estimates to spend £2,393,731, on new construction, or £81,110 more than the cash provision for new construction in the Estimates of last year.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what any other two Navies—say the Russian and German—are having spent on them this year in new construction?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I must ask for notice of that question.

COLLISIONS AT SEA.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what Orders in Council relating to the Regulations for preventing collisions at sea have been issued this year, and on what dates; and whether he proposes to issue any further Orders in Council relating to these Regulations; if so, when?

MR. MUNDELLA: The only Order in Council relating to the General Regulations for preventing collisions at sea that has been issued this year is that dated the 30th January last. An Order applying to dredgers in the Mersey was issued on 26th August. It is not proposed to submit any further Orders for Her Majesty's approval until after the Rules have been finally considered and reported upon by the Rule of the Road Committee.

GIBRALTAR TIME-BALL.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the time-ball at Gibraltar for giving Greenwich time to vessels, in order to enable vessels to rate their chronometers, is now worked?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The time-ball is not, as the hon. Member supposes, an Admiralty time-signal, nor is the senior naval officer in any way responsible for putting it in operation.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: When the time-ball was used was it not always worked by one of the naval officers in the Fort by the order of the senior naval officer?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That question should be addressed to the Colonial Authorities.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But this concerns the Navy. Does the right hon. Gentleman know whether or not it is as I say?

THE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT, 1889.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the mode in which the Act for the stamping of glass measures is being conducted by the Northumberland County Council, whereby manufacturers are themselves permitted to stamp the measures, receiving out of a total sum of £1,632 2s. 4d., £595 5s. 2d. for the use of their stamping machinery and labour, whilst an application by the Sunderland County Borough Council for a similar privilege on behalf of the manufacturers of glass measures, in the County of Durham, has been refused, thus causing a serious pecuniary loss to the Sunderland manufacturers; and will he state what steps the Board of Trade intend adopting for the immediate enforcement of Section 13 of "The Weights and Measures Act, 1889"?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the circumstances to which my hon. Friend refers. The Board of Trade are in communication upon the subject with the Northumberland County Council, to whom they have pointed out that the repayments referred to appear to be contrary to the provisions of Section 13 of "The Weights and Measures Act, 1889," and have suggested the discontinuance of the practice, which, as far as I am aware, is confined to Northumberland. The matter is still in negotiation with the County Council, but the Board have offered to approve or to make a General Regulation for the future guidance of the County Inspectors.

COMMITTALS IN IRELAND.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state how many persons have been committed in Ireland since the 22nd September, 1892, under the Act 34 Edw. III., c. 1?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that since August 22, 1892, which is presumably the date intended to be meant by the hon. Gentleman, the number of persons committed to prison in default of providing sureties to be of good behaviour, under the Act 34 Edw. III., c. I, has been 21.

BELFAST LOUGH.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is proposed to place a guardship in Belfast Lough?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: It is not proposed to place a guardship in Belfast Lough, but the Coastguard ship of the district has orders to visit Carrickfergus every year for a period, and is now under orders to do so.

GRETNNA POST OFFICE.

MR. MAXWELL (Dumfries-shire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has decided to change the situation of the post office in the parish of Gretna, Dumfries-shire; whether he has received a Petition from the inhabitants protesting against the proposed change; and whether any representation has been made to him in its favour; and, if not, on what grounds he intends to remove the post office to a less central situation, thereby causing inconvenience to the inhabitants of the district?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I have not come to any such decision. The office is now vacant, and a sub-postmaster has been nominated by the Treasury. I am awaiting an official Report respecting the position of his premises before confirming the nomination.

REPORTS ON INDIAN AGRICULTURE.

MR. A. CROSS (Glasgow, Cam-lachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he intends to lay upon the Table of the House of Commons, and, if so, when, Dr. Voelcker's complete Report as to the best means of improving Indian agriculture, which is now in the hands of the Government of India, and has formed the subject of Circulars to the several local Governments; and whether it is the case that many of Dr. Voelcker's recommendations cover the same ground as those of the Famine Commission of 1880, which have only been partially carried into effect?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): Spare copies of Dr. Voelcker's Report are available at the India Office, and copies will be supplied to the Library of the House for the use of hon. Members interested in the subject. Copies are also to be procured at the usual agents, at the price of 7s. 6d. It does not, therefore, seem necessary to incur the expense of reprinting Dr. Voelcker's bulky volume as a Blue Book. The Report, to a certain extent, covers the same ground as the Report of the Famine Commission. The action taken on the latter is described in the various Parliamentary Returns which have been presented on the subject.

RED SEA LIGHTS AND DUES.

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Turkey and Egypt with reference to the lighting of the Red Sea and the dues in connection therewith?

*SIR E. GREY: The correspondence, which is very voluminous and extends over several years, will be examined with a view to the publication of the more important Papers.

GIBRALTAR SANITARY BOARD.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Police Magistrate of Gibraltar, who gives effect to the Sanitary Board, has been appointed by the Acting Governor a member of that Board; and whether the appointment, if made, will be cancelled?

MR. S. BUXTON: Yes; two members of the Sanitary Board who represent the Civil Government are absent on leave, and the Police Magistrate is temporarily appointed to act in the place of one of them until his return.

POOR RELIEF IN THE EAST OF LONDON.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in possession of any further information respecting the case of Samuel Ely Hobbs, a dock labourer, lately residing at Love Lane, Ratcliff, who died at the Bromley and Stepney Sick Asylum; and whether an additional doctor to the Union, comprising the parishes of Limehouse, Stepney, and Ratcliff, is to be appointed?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Local Government Board have not yet received the reply of the Guardians of the Stepney Union to the communication which they addressed to them respecting the case of Ely Hobbs.

MISSION TO THE AMEER OF KABUL.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India why the proposed Mission is being sent to the Ameer of Kabul, especially at an unfavourable period of the year, and when it has been semi-officially stated that it is not due to any sudden development of Afghan politics; and whether he will place upon the Table of the House the instructions under which the Mission will act?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The Mission is sent because there are various questions which it is desirable to decide with the Ameer without delay. It would not be consistent with the public interest to publish the instructions to the Mission.

NORTH-WEST FRONTIER TROUBLES.

MR. SNAPE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the statement of the Indian Press is true that there is an intended concentration of troops for the Hunza-Nagar Campaign; if so, why such a campaign in the remote region of the Himalayas is being undertaken; whether extensive damage occurred to the telegraphs and bridges recently constructed in those foreign territories; and will he present to the House a Return showing the total expenditure during the last three years of the various Expeditions beyond the Northern boundaries of India to Gilgit, Chilas, Hunza, and intervening places?

MR. G. RUSSELL: There is no such concentration of troops for a Hunza-Nagar Campaign. According to the latest accounts, Hunza and Nagar are perfectly tranquil. Damage has, it is believed, been done to telegraphs and bridges in the Kashmir territory. The Secretary of State will ask the Government of India to furnish a Return of the expenditure referred to.

THE POST OFFICE AND THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the agreement he is now arranging with the National Telephone Company, he is giving that Company any exclusive powers that would confer upon them such a complete monopoly as would enable them to charge such rates as to pay interest on £4,000,000 of capital for which they have no corresponding property, and to repay at least £3,000,000 in the next 18 years for which the public can receive no consideration whatever? At the same time I will further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any information that would lead him to believe that the statement made by Mr. J. C. Lamb, of the Telegraph Department of the Post Office, before the Select Committee on the Telegraphs Bill of last year, to the effect that the then existing capital of the National Telephone Company was about £4,000,000, while their then existing plant was estimated not to exceed £1,000,000 in 19 years when the property came to be acquired by the Post Office, is correct; and whether the Post Office made a valuation at that time of such plant; and, if so, at what value was it estimated?

MR. A. MORLEY: The reply to the first question is in the negative. As to the second, I have no official information which would enable me to state the facts of the case. No valuation was made by the Post Office.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, seeing that he is now negotiating an agreement with the National Telephone Company, and is likely to have further negotiations, he can inform the House whether, of about £2,500,000 of shares in the capital of that Company in June, 1892, when the Select Committee on the Telegraphs Bill made its Report, about £2,000,000 had been created without any property being in existence to represent it; whether his attention has been drawn to the recent Report of the Joint Committee of the Lords and this House, in which they recommend, in Clause 6, that it is desirable in every way to facilitate the use of complete metallic circuits for telephones, and for that end to recommend statutory powers to be granted enabling a private company to enter the streets of a Corporation and lay trenches and wires; and if, instead, he will consider the desirability of placing in the hands of Municipal Authorities the carrying on of any undertaking such as this, which necessitates the opening of streets and interference with the soil and gas and waterpipes?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have no official information as to the accuracy of the statements made in the first paragraph of the question. In answer to paragraphs

2 and 3, I am aware of the recommendation of the Committee, and both that recommendation and the question of licensing Municipal Authorities to carry on Telegraph Exchanges business will receive the most careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

THE OPIUM COMMISSION.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it has been finally decided to throw half the cost of the Opium Commission upon the Indian Exchequer; and, if so, what are the grounds of that decision?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The ground on which it has been decided that half the cost of the Opium Commission shall be borne by Indian Revenues is the great extent to which India's financial position is involved in the inquiry.

BRITISH WAR VESSEL AT BANGKOK.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what British men-of-war are now at Bangkok, or at the mouth of the Menam?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: H.M.S. Swift is in Siamese waters.

THE ROYAL CHARTERED NIGER COMPANY.

1722 MR. SNAPE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether natives who attempt to cross the territory of the Royal Chartered Niger Company from one region outside the Company's jurisdiction to another have been summarily shot; whether, to prevent competition from Brass River merchants, that Company increased the export duty on palm kernels by 1,100 per cent. (from 2d. per cwt. to 2s.); whether, consequent upon the Charter, the exports of palm oil from that district alone dwindled in two years from 2,500 tons to 1,000 tons per year; whether he will lay upon the Table the Report of Sir Claude Macdonald, who, on the urgent representation of the West African merchants of Liverpool, was sent by the Government to investigate the charges which had been made; and why the Company does not present annual accounts of its revenue and expenditure as provided by the Charter?

*SIR E. GREY: I have seen these wanton acts of cruelty alleged in the Press, but without any definite evidence in support of them, and while such is not forthcoming I do not think such charges ought to be made or believed. The Company have raised the duty on palm kernels, but I am not aware that they had any reason for so doing beyond the obvious one of increasing their revenue. I have no information as to the diminution of the export of palm oil. Sir C. Macdonald's Report was a confidential document, and cannot be laid. The Company has furnished accounts to the Secretary of State, as provided in the Charter.

MR. SNAPE: May I ask whether there would be a more effective control of the Niger district if, instead of it being under the Department of the Foreign Office, it was under the supervision of the Colonial Office, as were the other settlements on the African coasts?

*SIR E. GREY: I cannot answer any question as to a proposed change in the Charter of the Company. The question is whether the Company have observed the Rules of the Charter or not. As long as they have done so—and as far as Her Majesty's Government are aware they have done so—we have no right to call the Company to account.

MR. SNAPE: But what about the transfer from the Foreign to the Colonial Office?

SIR E. GREY: I am not prepared to admit affairs would be better administered if such a transfer were made.

DEFERRED PENSIONS.

MR. LEASE (Lancashire, N.E., Accrington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what the term of service is which now entitles soldiers, under the Royal Warrant, to a deferred pension upon attaining the age of 50?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Under the Royal Warrant of 1848 soldiers were entitled to be registered for a deferred pension of 4d. if they had served 14 years and had two good conduct badges. This Warrant was cancelled in 1864, and no soldier enlisted after that date is so entitled. I regret that in answering a question by the hon. and gallant Member for Colchester (Captain Naylor-Leyland) on the 25th ultimo, I failed to observe that, in referring to this old Warrant, he spoke of 12 years as the qualifying period ; it should have been 14. All soldiers of 14 years' service now serving, if invalided under certain conditions, or on reduction of Establishment, are entitled to an immediate pension of 8d. and upwards, according to rank and service.

TELEPHONIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN DUBLIN AND BELFAST.

DR. KENNY : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Post Office has completed the telephonic communication between Belfast and other Northern towns and Dublin, and when will the service be open to the public ; whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to establish telephonic communication between Cork, Waterford, Limerick, Galway, Sligo, and other towns in the South and West of Ireland and Dublin ; and, if no such steps have yet been taken, when action in that direction may be looked for ; whether it is in contemplation to lay a telephonic cable between Ireland and England ; and, if so, when will this service be open to the public ; and what is the total amount appropriated for the development of the telephonic system by the Post Office, and how much of this sum it is proposed to expend in Ireland ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The Post Office is now constructing between Dublin and Belfast a telephone line of sufficient gauge to enable Dublin to communicate not only with the North of Ireland, but with Scotland and England. In the present state of knowledge, an efficient telephone cable between Ireland and England cannot, I fear, be provided ; but a cable has already been laid between Ireland and Scotland, and is available for the use of the public in Belfast and Glasgow ; and, when the main line now being erected between Glasgow and London is completed, both Dublin and Belfast will be able to speak to London. I regret I cannot answer the rest of the hon. Member's question until the negotiations for the acquisition of the Trunk Lines of the National Telephone Company have been brought to a conclusion ?

NAVAL OFFICERS' LEAVE.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether all officers have been denied their usual leave after the past

Naval Manœuvres, while it has been granted to the men ; and, if so, what is the reason ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The usual leave has been granted to officers who served in the Naval Manœuvres. Officers appointed to ships abroad have been allowed seven days' leave. Those who continue serving in ships at home will, in ordinary course, have the annual leave of six weeks, to which no addition will be made.

MAJORS IN THE ROYAL MARINES.

COLONEL LOYD (Chatham) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty why it is that majors in the Royal Marines have to serve three years in that rank before they can get the 2s. 5d. increase of pay, whereas majors in the Army have to serve only two years to obtain the increase ; and whether Her Majesty's Government will inquire into the matter, with a view to correcting this inequality ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : This matter has again been recently brought under the notice of the Board, and is now receiving their consideration.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN : Has there been no exceptional leave granted to the men which was not granted to the officers ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The question relates only to naval officers. I cannot say as to the men.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN : Why was a distinction drawn ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : If the hon. Member had asked about the men I would have ascertained the facts.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY QUESTIONS.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the circumstances of the Commander of H.M.S. Pelican at St. George's Bay, Newfoundland, in fixing the price of herrings as between the French ships and the inhabitants of St. George's Bay ; and whether he will direct the commanders of ships at Newfoundland not to interfere with the rights of the citizens to fix the price of herrings, or in any other way to interfere with the rights and privileges of British subjects residing in Newfoundland ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : Yes, Sir ; I have noticed that this has been the subject of several questions in this House. It has long been the practice for naval officers employed on the coast of Newfoundland, acting also in the capacity of local Magistrates, to consider questions affecting the inhabitants, and settle them according to their interests, and in such a way as to minimise friction between the inhabitants and the French fishermen, who have the right under the Treaty of Utrecht to catch bait for themselves. The arrangements made by the Commander of the Pelican, whereby the inhabitants supplied the French with bait, at a price fixed by him, appear to have been devised in the best interests of both parties, and seems not only to have caused no complaint, but to have given satisfaction on both sides, as the inhabitants were glad to sell the bait, and the French to obtain it promptly. Under these circumstances, no action appears to be called for on the part of the Admiralty.

MR. A. C. MORTON : Is it not a fact that the commanders of British ships try other cases than those arising under the Treaty referred to ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : They settle a variety of questions which arise in connection with the Newfoundlanders. Newfoundland is a country very sparsely inhabited, and it is the custom of the people on the coast, many of them poor fishermen, to get the commanders of ships to settle disputes for them.

MR. A. C. MORTON : Has the time not arrived when the people of Newfoundland might settle matters of this kind for themselves ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : As soon as the people of Newfoundland express a desire for a change, I have no doubt that the matter will receive the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he is now able to state whether Messrs. Ross and Co. are on the list of contractors to the India Office, or have furnished supplies to it or to the Government of India during the last five years.

MR. G. RUSSELL : Messrs. Rolin are not, and have never been, on the list of contractors to the India Office, and have not held any contract or order for the supply of stores for India during the last five years.

SHIPS' MAGAZINES.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what alteration, if any, has been made as regards the proximity of the magazines to the boilers in the designs for the vessels now building or to be built for the Navy, as compared with those constructed in recent years ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The magazines in the Majestic and Magnificent will be placed before and abaft the machinery and boiler-spaces, and therefore will not be in close proximity to the boilers, as in most of the large battleships recently constructed.

MR. HANBURY : May I ask whether the Admiralty have received any communications with regard to the danger of putting cordite into the magazines of battleships, and whether the attention of the Admiralty has been drawn to a speech delivered by the Inspector General of Ordnance in January last in which he is reported to have said that the Admiralty will "either have to shift their magazines or stick to black powder."

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I ask for notice of part of that question. I may say, however, that I have not had my attention called to the speech referred to by the hon. Member. I may also mention that in cases where the magazines were close to the boilers special arrangements were made in order to reduce the temperature.

MR. HANBURY : Does that apply to existing ships ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : Those arrangements apply to existing ships recently built. With regard to the new ships, entirely new arrangements will be made.

THE LAND COMMISSION DEPARTMENT, DUBLIN.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why, on the reconstruction of the Land Commission Department in Dublin in January, 1892, the Land Commissioners appointed to the office of Registrar a gentleman of less than five years' experience, thereby superseding Mr. Hugh Pollock who held the position to which he had been appointed in 1886 by the unanimous selection of the Land Commissioners of that time, on account of his special fitness for the office, and who had an official experience of over 21 years; whether Mr. Pollock's successor in the office of Registrar was appointed with a salary of £600 per annum, or £100 per annum more than that enjoyed by Mr. Pollock; and, if so, why; and whether, if no ground was to be found in Mr. Pollock's capacity in the discharge of his duties for appointing a junior officer over his head, and reducing him from the office of Registrar to that of Assistant Registrar, some step will be taken to compensate him for the loss which he has sustained?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): On the 11th April, 1892, a question was addressed to my predecessor on the subject of the appointment referred to, which, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, was made during the term of Office of the late Government upon the re-organisation of the Land Commission under the Act of 1891. The reasons for making the appointment were explained in answer to that question, and I am afraid I can only refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given on that occasion.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF FOREIGNERS AT KEW GARDENS.

COLONEL WARDE (Kent, Medway): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works how many foreigners are employed in Kew Gardens as gardeners or under gardeners; and whether, in view of the fact that these gardens have always been looked upon as a national school of instruction for higher scientific gardening, he will consider the advisability of employing British subjects only in them?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): There are four foreigners employed as gardeners at Kew. They have entered for the purpose of technical training. As large numbers of English gardeners, trained at Kew, find employment abroad, I do not think it would be expedient to prohibit the entry of foreign gardeners in the Royal Gardens.

WORKS IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, at the meeting of the Ross and Cromarty County Council, held at Dingwall on the 19th July, it was announced that Lady Matheson had refused to give the necessary guarantee in regard to the sum required in addition to the Government grant for the construction of piers and boat slips in the Island of Lewis; that in consequence of the poverty of the inhabitants it was useless to expect a guarantee from them; and that the meeting resolved to draw the attention of the Government to the case as being worthy of special consideration; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of providing the necessary funds to enable the work to be carried out?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): With regard to certain works for places in the Island of Lewis, the Treasury have made no difficulty about sanctioning the grants applied for by the Scotch Office after their object has been explained to them; but the Government in their operations are bound by the terms of the Western Highlands and Islands Act. According to this Act, if for any reason the estimate proves insufficient for the completion of the work—

“The County Council shall be bound to pay and provide for such deficiency.”

The County Council of Ross and Cromarty, in their meeting on the 19th of July, refused to give this guarantee as regards works in the Island of Lewis. It has been pointed out to them that such a refusal on their part is tantamount to declining to become the “undertakers” of the works, and under the Act those works can only be carried out under the superintendence of the County Council. The County Council should remember that the public money given under the provisions of the Western Highlands and Islands Act was voted by Parliament with special view to the needs of the Lewis, the more remote districts of Scotland, and that if it had not been for the condition of such communities no money would have been voted at all.

EUROPEANS IN MASHONALAND.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies about what number of Europeans—men, women, and children—are now resident in Mashonaland; what is the distance of the nearest British military force from Mashonaland; and what steps are now being taken by the Government to organise a mobile force for the speedy relief of British subjects in Mashonaland, in case necessity should arise?

MR. S. BUXTON : (1) It is estimated that there are about 1,500 adult European men in Mashonaland, of whom 500 are in the Volunteers or Police, and the other 900 liable to military service in the Company's Burgher Force. There are about 50 European women and children in Mashonaland, exclusive of 13 Sisters of Mercy, who would remain at their posts in any event. Most of the women are at Salisbury, which has not been menaced. Several of them have now gone to Beira. All European women are now out of the Matabele country. (2) The nearest British military force is a force of Bechuanaland Mounted Police, which has recently been reinforced, and is now about 280 strong. It is intrenched on the River Macloutsie, which is the boundary claimed by Lo Bengula as that of his country. For Macloutsie is about 50 miles from Tuli, the Company's nearest station in Mashonaland. (3) No special steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government for the purpose indicated in the third branch of the hon. Member's question for reasons which have been stated to him in the answers I have already given to previous questions; but the British South Africa Company, with the full approval of the Government, are strengthening their forces in Mashonaland; and Mr. Rhodes anticipates that in a short time he will be able to place on the spot, for service, if required, 1,000 effective men.

PIGEON HOUSE FORT.

DR. KENNY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War will he refer to the portion of the Report of the Army Sanitary Committee on Dublin Main Drainage Scheme which states that the scheme would be fraught with serious danger to the health of the garrison at Pigeon House Fort; whether it is to be understood that the Committee have reported that there would be more danger to the health of the garrison of Pigeon House Fort from discharge into Liffey Estuary at a point half-a-mile to east of Fort, as proposed by Corporation scheme, of the clarified and precipitated effluent of the sewage than now exists from the discharge of the crude sewage of the city into the river both above and below the Fort; whether he has received letters, dated 6th July and 28th July, from the Town Clerk of Dublin, on behalf of the Corporation, inquiring on what terms the War Office Authorities were prepared to part with the Pigeon House Fort to the Corporation; whether any reply, other than a formal acknowledgment of their receipt, had been sent to either of these letters; and whether he can state what are the negotiations between the War Office and the Corporation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The responsibility of advising the Secretary of State for War whether to give or withhold his assent to this scheme, as required by the Act, rested with the Army Sanitary Committee. They reported that one of two alternative modifications in the scheme must be adopted in order that the occupants of Pigeon House Fort may be sufficiently protected as regards health. The Committee made no such comparison as suggested in the second part of the question. The fact that the condition of the Liffey is bad would not justify me in accepting a scheme of which the Army Sanitary Committee expressed the opinion I have quoted. With regard to the latter parts of the question, as I stated yesterday, the letters referred to have been received, and I hope that an answer may very soon be sent.

THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

MR. DODD (Essex, S.E., Maldon) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government have received during the present year any Reports or official information with regard to the management by the Royal Niger Company of the African territory under the control of that Company; and, if so, what is the effect of it is; and what is the estimated population and size of the territory within the Company's control or jurisdiction, and what official in Her Majesty's Service has now any duty of keeping Her Majesty's Government informed as to the condition of that territory or the management of it by the Company, and to whom British subjects not belonging to the Company, who trade or desire to trade with that territory, may look for advice or assistance?

MR. S. BUXTON: I would suggest that this question should be addressed to the Foreign Office.

THE UNIFICATION OF LONDON.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can inform the House what is the state of the proceedings of the Royal Commission on the Unification of London; and whether the Commission is now waiting for evidence or information from either or which of the Municipalities concerned?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Royal Commission on the Unification of London have taken evidence as to the powers and duties of the Local Authorities in London, and also evidence on behalf of the County Council. The Commission have now adjourned until next month, and they hope, on re-assembling, to take the evidence of the Corporation and the Commissioners of Sewers.

RAG IMPORTS AND THE CHOLERA.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that there are now lying on the wharves at London Bridge over 300 tons of rags imported from cholera-stricken places in Europe, which the rag merchants of London refuse to touch or take from a fear of introducing cholera into our midst; whether, if this be so, the Local Government Board will immediately issue an Order to have these bales of rags shipped back to the ports from whence they came, or have them at once destroyed by burning; and whether, in consideration of the fact of Asiatic cholera having already been imported into Grimsby, the Local Government Board will forthwith rescind the Order of 9th August and prohibit the further introduction of rags?

Mr. Dodd

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: All possible inquiries have been made by the Local Government Board as to the rags which the hon. Member stated were lying at London Bridge, but no trace of them at all could be found. The hon. Member has, no doubt, put down his question with the assurance that the statements made in it are correct; and, therefore, if the hon. Member will give me privately the information as to where these rags are to be found, the Board will order a full investigation. As to the latter part of the question, I must act on the advice of the competent medical advisers of the Local Government Board, in whom I have perfect confidence. I have also the advice of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board, my hon. Friend the Member for the Ilkeston Division of Derbyshire. The medical experts concurred, and it was on their advice that the Order was issued. That advice has the full approval of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board, and I see no reason to alter the Order.

MR. MACDONA: The matter is of great importance to my constituents, and I shall, on an early occasion, call attention to it.

ROYAL MINES IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the case of the Royal mines known as Moel Ispri and Champion mines, situate near Dolgelly, the Crown has power at Common Law, or otherwise, to prevent the removal of fixed machinery (erected solely for the purpose of extracting gold) from these Royal mines; and, if so, whether, in the interests of the State and the industry, they will exercise such power; whether the Woods and Forests Office intimated to the late lessees, or their representatives, some time since, that the Crown claimed at Common Law (or otherwise under the rights of the Crown) the right to prevent the removal of such machinery; what was the date of the first application by Mr. J. R. Roberts and another, of Dolgelly, gold miners, for a lease to work the above-mentioned mines; what was the date when Mr. J. R. Roberts received intimation that the lease would be granted to him; what was the date of the sale of the machinery referred to; on what date did the former lease terminate; what was the cause of the delay in granting the lease to Mr. Roberts and another; and will he explain why the Woods and Forests Office, when requested by those interested in the gold mining interest at Dolgelly either to grant a lease before the sale, or to intimate that they would grant a lease to any person who purchased the machinery, did not accede to such request?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Crown has not the power to prevent the removal of machinery from the Moel Ispri, Prince of Wales, and Vach Mines. The leases are either determined or in process of surrender, and the late lessees are empowered to dispose of the machinery. When the leases were in existence the Woods and Forests Office intimated to the lessees that the Crown claimed the right to prevent the removal of the machinery. The date of the first application by Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. Pritchard Morgan for a lease to work the above-mentioned mines was 29th December, 1892. The application of Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. N. T. Williams was dated the 10th June, 1893. The offer of a lease was made to Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. N. T. Williams on the 22nd ultimo. The machinery was advertised to be sold on the 24th ultimo. The lease of Moel Ispri Mine was determined on the 20th December, 1892, and an agreement was entered into for the surrender of the other leases as on the 5th of April last, but the formal completion of the deeds of surrender has been delayed. There were several causes for the delay in offering a lease to Messrs. Roberts and Williams. An opportunity was given to those who had provided the machinery to obtain fresh capital for continuing their operation; and, when that failed, considerable delay took place in obtaining replies to the references given by Messrs. Roberts and Williams. The Woods and Forests Office has acted throughout with a desire to save the machinery from being removed; but it could not have given a general undertaking to grant a lease to any persons who might purchase it without knowing their names and qualifications.

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

VOLUNTEERS AT ALDERSHOT.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the Lieutenant General commanding the troops at Aldershot has submitted to headquarters any Report concerning the recent concentration under him of 20,000 Volunteers from all parts of the country; and if Sir Evelyn Wood in any way whatever endorses the denunciation of the drill, the efficiency, and the discipline of the forces by the correspondent of The Times and by the author of the essay lately published by the United Service Institution?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No Report on the recent concentration of Volunteers at Aldershot has yet been received from Sir Evelyn Wood.

THE GALWAY AND CLIFDEN RAILWAY.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the remarks recently expressed by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, as to the want of railway accommodation in certain parts of Ireland, he will take steps to insure the opening of the light railway from Galway to Clifden, at least as far as Oughterard, before the commencement of the next tourist season?

MR. J. MORLEY: I understand that the possibility of opening any section of this line depends upon the completion of the Corrib Bridge at Galway. The work is being vigorously prosecuted, and as it is obviously in the interest of the Midland Great Western Railway Company to open the Oughterard section as soon as possible, that company will, no doubt, avoid all unnecessary delay in completing the works now in progress.

PIGEON HOUSE FORT.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the site of Millbank Prison has been recently offered to the London County Council at a price much under the current value of ground in the neighbourhood, the War Office and Treasury will act similarly in respect to the Pigeon House Fort which the Dublin Corporation desire to acquire, in order to enable them to improve the sanitary condition of the City; and whether, in this negotiation, due consideration will be given to the circumstance that the Richmond Bridewell, now occupied as a barracks, was taken over by the Government without any compensation being allowed to the Municipality, although it was erected at the expense of the citizens, in whose interests the main drainage scheme is urgently required?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This is an argumentative question which can hardly be replied to in this form. But I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that when Millbank Prison and Richmond Bridewell were surrendered, it was because they were no longer required for their purpose; whereas Pigeon House Fort furnishes accommodation which is absolutely necessary for military purposes, and if it was surrendered compensating accommodation would have to be provided elsewhere.

DR. KENNY: Is it not a fact that many barracks have been taken over in Ireland in recent years without payment of any compensation whatever?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have no doubt that that has happened. I say, however, that this case differs from all others, because Pigeon House Fort contains buildings which are absolutely necessary for our purposes, and if we surrender it we must erect buildings at great cost elsewhere.

DR. KENNY: If the sewage effluent would be dangerous to Pigeon House Fort, is not the present sewage system also full of danger?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have answered that question already to-day.

POSTMEN AS PAINTERS.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the postmen in Reading are employed to paint the letter and pillar boxes during the time in which they are not engaged in the delivery of letters, with the result that the work is thereby taken away from the painters; if he will explain why no answer has been sent to the letters addressed to the local Postmaster and the Postmaster General on the subject; and whether it is intended to continue this practice?

Mr. Field

*MR. A. MORLEY: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The letter addressed to me reached me on August 22, and I authorised an answer to be sent on Thursday last.

MR. FIELD: Am I to understand that postmen are expected to be painters? Is that the effect of the right hon. Gentleman's answer?

*MR. A. MORLEY: The hon. Member must not infer anything of the kind. Many of the men are not fully employed, and they are thus enabled to occupy their spare time.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea): Am I to understand that they were auxiliary postmen, and the work was given them in the time they were not collecting and delivering letters?

MR. A. MORLEY: I will inquire into that.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Were they receiving Trades Union pay per day?

MR. A. MORLEY: I cannot say.

THE ALDERSHOT COMMAND.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to the command at Aldershot, the fact was considered that His Royal Highness was gazetted a General as recently as 1st April in the present year; and whether, in view of the fact that Aldershot is the principal training school at home, it is usual for the command to be held by a General who is likely to be chosen for command in the field?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The command at Aldershot is a Lieutenant's-General's command, but tenable by a General, and therefore the Duke of Connaught was eligible. He was selected, as I have said, on account of his fitness for the duties of the command. The selection of General Officers for command in the field must depend on the circumstances of the emergency when it arises.

MR. DALZIEL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the plea that seniority entitled the Duke of Connaught to this command is not based on the fact that he was appointed a General on the 1st of April.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir. He was appointed a General on the 1st of April in his ordinary turn, and that appointment gave him no increased seniority with regard to other officers. The Duke of Connaught has ever since he has been on the Generals' list been supernumerary to his rank. He has gone up on the list from grade to grade with officers who were above and below him, so that there has been no supersession on his account.

MR. A. C. MORTON ; Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what are the military qualifications of the Duke of Connaught ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Everybody acquainted with the Army knows them.

COLONEL MURRAY (Bath) : With respect to the latter part of the answer, the Duke of Connaught having served with distinction under fire in one campaign, is there any special reason why he should not do so in another ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have already said that the selection of officers for any future campaign would depend on the circumstances and requirements of that campaign.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : Will the Duke of Connaught's leave of absence in his new career be as long as it was at Portsmouth ?

[No answer was given]

MR. DALZIEL : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give a reply to the second portion of my question, whether it is not usual for the command at Aldershot to be given to a General who is likely to be chosen for command in the field.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is no rule on the subject whatever.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Lord Roberts is one of the one or two General Officers, senior to the Duke of Connaught, who, as he has stated, in one sense might be available for the command at Aldershot, but who are at present discharging duties from which it is not desirable that they should be removed ; and what duties is Lord Roberts now discharging ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No, Sir ; Lord Roberts is not one of the officers to whom I referred. Lord Roberts was not eligible for the Divisional command at Aldershot, because his appointment to it would have been derogatory to the dignity of the great office which he has for so many years filled with the highest distinction and public advantage. The office of Commander-in-Chief in India is a General's command ; it is perhaps the highest in the Military Service of the Empire, with the sole exception of the office of Commander-in-Chief at home, and it is in some senses even more important than that great position. It would be impossible that an officer who had just quitted the Commander-in-Chief in India should be appointed to the Division at Aldershot, which is a Lieutenant General's command, and which, I may add, is more than any other such command subject, in the interests of the service, to the immediate supervision of the headquarter staff of the Army.

MR. HANBURY : Do I understand that, while it is derogatory to the late Commander-in-Chief in India to hold the command at Aldershot, it is not derogatory to offer him the command at Malta or Gibraltar, one or other of which, I believe, has been offered to Lord Roberts ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No, Sir. There are three, and possibly four, appointments, more or less military in their character, which are tenable by an officer who has been Commander-in-Chief in India. There is the Adjutant Generalship, which is the one I reckon as somewhat doubtful ; there is the command in Ireland ; and the Governorships of Gibraltar and Malta. [An hon. MEMBER : Chelsea Hospital.] Chelsea Hospital is a retired position, and is not an active command of the kind I have spoken of. We were fortunately able, although through a most melancholy circumstance, to offer Lord Roberts immediately on his return to this country one of these high commands—namely, the Governorship of Gibraltar, which had become vacant through the lamented death of Sir Lothian Nicholson. At the same time, it was conveyed to Lord Roberts that if he desired to spend a few months of rest in this country the Governorship of Malta would be vacant at the beginning of next year, and that it would be reserved for him if he desired it ; but Lord Roberts declined both of these appointments.

MR. HANBURY : Is it not a fact that there are a good deal more than twice as many troops at Aldershot as at Malta or Gibraltar ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The dignity of a command is not to be measured by the number of troops included in it. Each of the two appointments at Malta and Gibraltar is that of the Governorship of a Colony, and is of the very highest dignity and importance. Those Governorships are precisely those which are fitted for an officer who has held so exalted a position as that of Commander-in-Chief in India.

MR. DALZIEL : Before this appointment was made, were any steps taken to ascertain whether Lord Roberts was prepared to accept it ?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I believe that at the time Lord Roberts would have been willing to accept the appointment—that is to say, he would have been willing to waive in his own person the considerations to which I have referred. But we have something more to take into account than the personal feelings of an individual ; and I think it will be generally agreed that it was desirable to do nothing in the least degree derogatory to the great position of Commander-in-Chief in India.

TELEGRAPH MESSENGERS.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will lay upon the Table a Copy of his Order varying that of his predecessor in regard to the appointment of telegraph messengers to permanent places under the Department ?

*MR. A. MORLEY : I will send a copy of the Order to the right hon. Gentleman, and if, after considering it, he desires to have it laid on the Table, I will do so.

THE PROTECTION OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN MASHONALAND.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared, in case necessity should arise, to take steps for the protection of British subjects in Mashonaland ?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : The British South Africa Company under their Charter are responsible for the preservation of peace and order in the territories under their control. Her Majesty Government have obtained information from Mr. Rhodes, through Sir H. Loch, and they have full confidence in the statement that the Company are willing and able to discharge this duty effectively. Mr. Rhodes anticipates that he can in a short time place on the spot for service, if required, 1,000 men fully armed and mounted. This announcement Her Majesty's Government regard as satisfactory. The question of what shall be done in case of necessity is a hypothetical question relating to a state of things which has not actually arisen, and is not, in the view of the Government, likely to arise. It is, therefore, one which, under the existing circumstances, they must decline to answer. If and when the case does arise the Government will, of course, be ready to announce their decision with regard to it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Is the question in Order ? Has it not been frequently ruled that such questions cannot be put ?

*MR. SPEAKER : Hypothetical questions are out of Order.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : In view of the facts that Colonists in Mashonaland are our fellow-subjects, and that they are undoubtedly threatened with raids by the Matabele impis, and questions have been submitted to the Government whether they are prepared to send an armed force for the relief of the Colonists, which questions have not been fairly answered, I submit my question can hardly be said to be hypothetical.

MR. SPEAKER : That statement does not alter the hypothetical character of the question.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) : Is it not the case that in the last few days Sir Henry Loch has telegraphed to the effect that substantially he has warned the people of Mashonaland and Matabeleland that the Imperial Government consider themselves responsible for their safety ?

MR. S. BUXTON : No, Sir. No such information as that has been given by Sir Henry Loch. What he informed the Company was that, while the Company were entitled to defend themselves, he would not allow an aggressive movement on their part without the assent of Her Majesty's Government.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treas-sure whether he can now state when the Government propose to issue the Royal Commission on the Financial Relations between England and Ireland which has been promised?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not think the time has arrived when an exact date can be fixed for issuing the Commission on the Financial Relations of England and Ireland, but it will probably be proper to issue it early in the coming year.

IRISH EVICTED TENANTS.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to include the question of the evicted tenants in Ireland amongst the subjects upon which legislation will be proposed by them in the Autumn Session?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: This is a question which I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer till Monday, because I do not think it is convenient now to touch questions which will inevitably lead to the raising of others.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the late date to which the Session has already been prolonged, and the still later date at which the Indian Budget is likely to be taken, if it is put down before the Adjournment, and considering also the important questions that are likely to be raised in the discussion, he will consider the advisability of postponing it till after the House meets again in November, and then giving two days for the purpose? I understand an appeal from Members on both sides of the House has been addressed to the right hon. Gentleman asking him to give two days to the Indian Budget.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have heard that an impression prevails that, in view of present and recent circumstances in India, the Indian Budget will require a longer time than usual for discussion, but I have not heard that a postponement till the Autumn Session is desired; and I am of opinion that the subject can be properly proceeded with and treated before the House adjourns. The Government feel it their duty to take that course.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in negatively replying to the representations recently made to him on behalf of the large number of persons in London and elsewhere now without employment, he has considered the state of affairs disclosed by the last number of The Labour Gazette, officially published by the Board of Trade, as to the decline in trade, the increase in pauperism, the 20,000 highly skilled artisans unemployed, and the widespread reduction in wages; and if the Government propose to take any steps to mitigate the consequences to the masses of the people?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I cannot help regretting that the hon. and gallant Gentleman has felt it his duty to put the question. It is put under circumstances that naturally belong to one of those fluctuations in the condition of trade which, however unfortunate and lamentable they may be, recur from time to time. Undoubtedly I think that questions of this kind, whatever be the intention of the questioner, have a tendency to produce in the minds of people, or to suggest to the people, that these fluctuations can be corrected by the action of the Executive Government. Anything that contributes to such an impression inflicts an injury upon the labouring population. Every and any suggestion with reference to the improvement of the position of the people, whether in respect to fluctuations in trade or any other matter, is always entitled to and will have our best and most careful consideration; but I believe the facts are not quite correctly apprehended. The decline in trade is not greater now than at previous periods of depression from which there has invariably been a recovery. Although there is a slight increase of pauperism as compared with last year, pauperism is much less in proportion to the population than at any previous period of our history. The Return of the Local Government Board for the year 1892 shows a percentage of 2.5 of the population, as compared with 3 per cent. in 1882, and 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. 20 or 30 years ago. The unemployed among the artisan population are at present about 6 per cent. for the Unions making Returns, but this rate is not specially high at this moment, and it has fallen pretty steadily since the beginning of the year, when it was 10 per cent., and higher percentages have been known in previous periods of depression.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Is it not proposed to take any steps at all in the matter?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have stated that I am not aware of anything in the present depression of trade which indicates any duty incumbent upon the Government except the duty of considering any proposal or suggestion which may be made, and which has about it the smallest promise of utility.

MR. J. BURNS: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider, with the President of the Local Government Board, the desirability of again sending a Circular Letter to all the Local Authorities asking them to give employment to the unemployed on reproductive and useful works, as was done in 1886, 1888, 1890, and 1892 by the late President of the Local Government Board?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes; I shall be happy to consider that question.

GLANDERS IN WIGTON AND SOUTH AYRSHIRE.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has any information of repeated outbreaks of glanders among horses in the County of Wigton; and whether the disease in each case had been traced to the horses of a certain dealer in South Ayrshire, the Local Authority of which county has repudiated all responsibility in the matter; and whether he will cause stringent inquiry to be made in order to bring to an end such a serious state of affairs?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I am sorry to say that it is the case that several outbreaks of glanders have occurred in Wigtonshire during the period named in the question. It has been stated by the Wigtonshire County Council that the disease was introduced into that county from Ballantrae in Ayrshire; but I am informed by the Ayrshire County Council that the disease originated in Wigtonshire. I have no authority to determine the question at issue between the two Councils, nor would there, in my opinion, be any advantage in my doing so. What is requisite is that both Local Authorities should take active measures against the disease wherever it may appear in their respective counties, and I have no reason to suppose that there is any disinclination on the part of either of them to do so.

SIR H. MAXWELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake a stringent inquiry such as I suggest?

*MR. H. GARDNER: The matter is not under the administration of the Board of Agriculture. Under the Glanders Order issued last year, the duty devolves on the Local Authorities to administer the Order, and I see no reason to intervene in the matter.

SIR H. MAXWELL: But suppose the Local Authorities fail to do their duty?

*MR. H. GARDNER: If it was reported to me that they failed to do their duty it might be for the Board of Agriculture to intervene; but in the meantime it is for me to hear what the Local Authorities have to say in the matter.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Ordered, That the proceedings on the Government of Ireland Bill, if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House.—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL. (No. 448.)

THIRD READING. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [30th August] proposed to Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Longford, N.): It has been contended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury that the House of Lords has a right, before passing any measure sent up to it by the House of Commons, to ascertain whether the feeling of the people generally is in favour of it. I will venture to point out that the only way by which the House of Lords can judge of the feelings of the people is through the voice of the House of Commons, and further that the House of Lords has in itself no right whatever to go behind the House of Commons and seek for a separate declaration of the opinion of the people. It has also been contended by the right hon. Gentleman that if a measure that has been passed into law does not work well, the House of Lords will be asked why they have accepted it without an appeal to the country; but I should like to know where such a novel doctrine in Constitutional history can be found. We have been told that because we have only given 80 days to the discussion of this Bill, the Lords will be entitled to call us idle and lazy men. Nothing could be more ridiculous. We have given the utmost latitude to the Debates in the House. What has occurred is that we have been listening night after night to a reiteration of the same arguments, which have exhausted the time of the House at the expense of certain portions of the Bill which might have been discussed with advantage. I will now turn to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. I should like, if I may use the words of Shakespeare, to "discourse with my philosopher." I think everyone in this House has the highest respect for the opinions and integrity of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), and I need hardly say that he is the philosopher with whom I wish to talk. I sometimes think, however, that he rather overdoes his independence, and I am a little sorry when the effect of his own ability on himself is to impress him with a conviction of infallibility. It is a curious thing how many a worthy man who utterly scorns and scoffs at the doctrine that the Pope in Council can be infallible is yet firmly convinced that he himself is infallible, whether in Council or out of Council. The right hon. Gentleman gave us a policy of his own, or rather he outlined his idea of what ought to be the policy of the English Government in Ireland, and he began with a suggestion which must endear itself to the mind of every Irishman when he commended the policy of Cromwell.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): The hon. Member does not, I think, wish to misrepresent me, and I think he was not here.

MR. J. M'CARTHY: I was.

MR. COURTNEY: Well, then, he misunderstood me. I did not wish to commend the general policy of Cromwell. What I meant was that Cromwell was the first person to assemble the United Parliament of the United Commonwealth.

*MR. J. M'CARTHY: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's correction, but I wish to say I heard his speech, and I was under the impression that he was commending the general policy of Cromwell. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman would recommend that the course which Cromwell followed with a Parliament should be followed to-day. However, what I particularly wished to deal with was the complaint of the right hon. Gentleman as to the manner in which time was spent in discussing this Bill, and the statement that there were several passages of the Bill that were not properly discussed. I suppose that is possible, and I may admit that it is true. But why were not those particular passages discussed? Was it not because the time of this House was so much taken up by the vain and idle repetition of the same arguments and the same charges over and over again that within the limits of human life it became impossible that every important part of this Bill could have proper discussion? Why did not the right hon. Gentleman and his friends make up their minds as to what were the important passages in the Bill, and discuss them instead of spending so much of their time in each repeating over and over again what the other had said? We listened in this House to reiteration night after night of the same arguments and the same charges until it was a positive weariness to hear them, and yet the reiteration was persevered in to the necessary and inevitable exclusion of some portions of the Bill that might have been more searchingly and fully discussed. During some nights in this House it might have been thought that the usual question under discussion and the sole question in which the country had any manner of interest was not whether the Home Rule Bill should or should not be passed, but whether the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) did or did not say something 10 years ago, and whether if he did it was consistent with what he said 10 weeks ago, or whether this, that, or the other right hon. Gentleman did or did not in the whole course of his career make any speech which seemed inconsistent with other speeches he had made. I want to know why time was wasted on such subjects? Then there was started a Debate by quotation. The hon. Member for the Altrincham Division of Cheshire (Mr. C. Disraeli) made a speech the other night to which I listened with very great interest, partly on account of the speech itself, and partly on account of the illustrious name he bears. He introduced several quotations into that speech, and one of them, he told us, was a particularly stale quotation. I should like to know why, if it was stale, he brought it under our attention? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) has invented a sort of discussion which I may call discussion by scrap-book. He seems to have got a regular treasury of quotations from the speeches and writings of all his political opponents. I was pleased to find that some passages from my own writings were enshrined in that interesting book. I trust that when this controversy is over the right hon. Gentleman will present his collection to the Royal Historical Society or the British Museum. I should be pleased to think that some descendant of mine, studying hereafter that most valuable book, might come upon my name written down, however humbly, in the right hon. Gentleman's roll of honour. But I would suggest that citations of that kind, however interesting, are irrelevant to the essential question the House wanted to discuss. Once I am bound to say the right hon. Gentleman broke away from political citations and burst out unexpectedly, to the joy of all of us, into a perfect anthology of Shakespearian quotation. But even that was hardly so much to the purpose as direct argument on the clauses. There was no time wasted on this side of the House in the discussion of the measure. What we wanted to discuss was whether this was a good Home Rule Bill for Ireland or not, but the utmost patience was shown by us. We of the Irish Party who, as everyone knows, belong to "a garrulous and impecunious race" certainly restrained our tendency to be garrulous during the whole of these Debates. We left the time to gentlemen opposite, and my complaint is that they did not make good use of it, even for their own purposes. I, for one, would ten thousand times rather have heard arguments about the Bill than statements as to what this man said or that man said. Now I come to the Bill itself. The question I want to direct attention to is a very simple and direct one, and one in regard to which, I hope—nay, I am sure—I speak the unanimous sentiment of the Party to which I have the honour to belong. I want to ask whether this Bill is accepted, or is likely to be accepted, by the Irish Party and the Irish people? Those of us who spoke in the Debate fought strenuously against certain sections and passages of the Bill. We fought them as much as we could, and got as much as we could out of the Government. The question is, whether the Bill as it now stands is a measure which we can accept? Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying, on behalf of my colleagues—and I am sure for the Irish people—that we accept this Bill with a cordial welcome, and we give our warm and sincere thanks to the great English statesman who has brought it before this House, and who, I hope, will ultimately carry it to a complete success. We have been asked over and over again—"Do you accept this measure as final?" My hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who addressed the House with so much force and ability in yesterday's Debate, dealt very well with this question of finality. We want to know what is meant by finality? If anyone asks us whether we suppose that the measure is never to be altered or amended in the whole succession of years to come, I say the question in itself is a foolish and a futile question. No measure that ever passed through this Parliament—no measure that ever passed through any Parliament—was framed on such perfect and on such a prophetic knowledge of what was to come in the future as to be in this rigid and pedantic sense absolutely final. Why, Sir, we had a question asked to-night as to the Commission that is to be appointed to investigate the financial relations of the three countries. Let us assume that this Bill has been passed, and that the Commission has reported that there are certain changes proper to be made in those financial relations—does anyone say that the fact of those changes being made would prevent this measure being fairly described as a final measure with regard to Home Rule? Suppose that the population of one of the Irish Provinces were to increase much beyond the others, and it became necessary to meet the increase of population by a re-adjustment of representation, does anyone suppose that there would be any difficulty in coming to the Imperial Parliament and obtaining sanction for such an adjustment? In one sense there can be no finality in Parliament, but there is a finality in principle. That is why you can arrange in what path the national work of the people may move. Take the great Reform Bill of 1832. It was about that Reform Bill that the phrase “finality” was first used in politics. It was used by Lord John Russell in a sense, as he afterwards explained, quite different from that which was ascribed to it, and he was promptly named by some of his opponents “Finality Jack!” He never meant finality in the sense in which it is sometimes used in this House, and in the sense which requires us to give a distinct and direct answer as to whether we will never at any future time suggest a single re-arrangement of the details of this measure. Since the Union Ireland has been kept down under one absolutely rigid principle—namely, that she should be governed by this Imperial Parliament, and have no right of control whatever over her own affairs. This measure, when carried, will put an end to that principle, and will set up the principle that Ireland is to look after her own domestic affairs for herself under the supreme control of the Imperial Parliament, and with certain limitations and restrictions, which are most gladly accepted. That, I say, is the principle which is final. I firmly believe that when we once set up this national domestic Parliament for Ireland we shall have found finality in the true sense, and that from that principle there will never hereafter be any deviation. I believe it will be a final settlement, because it will enable us to work in the most thorough cordiality with the people of Great Britain. They will have no further inclination or impulse to interfere with our affairs. If we go beyond the limitations imposed they will have a definite authority to restrain us; but as long as we keep within those limitations the people of Great Britain will be only too happy to see us working out in our own way our national prosperity. I call it, in the true sense, a final settlement which brings about that agreement. I do not believe, as far as one can look forward to the distant future, that there will ever be the slightest desire on the part of the Irish people to break away from the principle of this great Imperial settlement. The right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir H. James) asked last night what would happen if every other division of Great Britain were to ask for separate local government. He asked what would be done if Yorkshire asked for a Home Rule Bill? Well, I think we are supposed to be practical and reasonable men, discussing reasonable possibilities, and not wide and far-reaching speculations. I think that Yorkshire has at present means of local government, and of managing her own affairs to a great extent. I feel sure that if Yorkshire had the Irish Grand Jury system she would make her grievances well heard on the floor of this House. We Irishmen recognise perfectly well the possibility of times coming when other divisions of Great Britain may claim the right to settle their own local affairs. In the meantime, we decline to speculate as to what would happen if Yorkshire did this, Lancashire did that, and the sky fell. I remember that a very good answer was given in this House many years ago by the late Lord Sherbrooke. He was being questioned as to all sorts of dangers and difficulties that might arise if certain things were to happen which he did not think were likely to happen, and he replied in this way. He said—

“The Queen has an undoubted right to make every cobbler in this country a Peer. What would happen if the Queen did this day make every cobbler in the country a Member of the House of Lords?”

Then he answered the question by saying—

“I do not know; nobody knows, and nobody wants to know.”

For myself, I am inclined to give the same sort of answer as to what would happen if Yorkshire set up as an independent State. I do not know; nobody knows, and nobody wants to know. This Bill is now about to pass from this House. It is like the girl in the splendid Greek tragedy; it is to go to its death. We know perfectly well what will happen to it in the House of Lords. But we know it will come back again, and that when it comes back opinion will be a great deal too strong for the House of Lords, and some day or other, and before long, it will kindly and judiciously consent to pass the Bill. Those of us who have been watching this House for long remember how on one occasion all the supporters of the House of Lords in the country were rampant for a whole Session over the action of the Lords. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) remembers well—for he took a foremost part in the discussion—what happened when the House of Lords threw out the Bill for the repeal of the duty on paper. He remembers how all the supporters of the House of Lords declared that the Peers had done their duty; that they had saved the country from the horror of a cheap newspaper Press, and that they would never fall back from the path of duty they had so nobly taken. Well, what happened? Early in the next Session the House of Lords, with what could scarcely be called a discussion, passed the Bill for the repeal of the Paper Duty. I believe they were well advised then, and I hope they will be well advised now. But for the present we have this Bill as it stands, and, speaking for the Irish Party, we are perfectly willing to accept it. It closes an agitation which has been going on ever since the Act of Union was passed. I should long ago have given up the whole cause of Home Rule if there could have been shown to me that during any year, any month, or any week, since the Union was passed the Irish people had ceased to protest against it. Their protest has gone on from year to year, and from day to day. That protest has been sometimes made by rebellion. The first rebellion was not quite three years after the passing of the Act. Sometimes it has been made by Constitutional agitation, then by rebellion again, then by peaceful agitation once more; but from that time up to this, the Irish people have fought resolutely, unflinchingly, and unceasingly against the continuance of the Act of Union. Everyone who has read Irish history knows that during all that time a man was popular in Ireland or was unpopular just in proportion to the strength of his opposition to the Act of Union or to the servility with which he accepted it. Now, is not this long struggle to be closed by the passing of this Home Rule Bill? Is there not to be an end to all this controversy? Have we not obtained in principle what we desire? Why, then, should we want to rake the whole question up again, and to destroy the benefit we have, after so much trial and struggle, at last obtained? Many Members of this House will remember that Grattan, in the first speech he made in what is usually called Grattan's Parliament, said he had now to address a free people, and that ages had passed away since the Irish people could be addressed by that noble name! And what was the Assembly which he considered constituted the Irish a free people? It was a Parliament not nearly as liberal in its gift to the people of the management of their own affairs as the Parliament we are now asked to set up. Why, then, should we not accept this Bill as a final settlement? How could we avoid accepting it? We have the authority given by Grattan on so solemn an occasion. Mr. Speaker, I venture to say from my heart, and from my conscience, speaking for my Party and for my country, that we do accept it. As I said before, we give our most earnest and heartfelt thanks to the great and patriotic statesman who brought in this Bill and who is passing it through this House. We recognise the fact that he is the first great English statesman who ever risked power and popularity for the sake of doing justice to Ireland. We thank him for that; we thank those Members of the English Parliament and those of the English people, and of the people of Scotland and Wales, who have given him such noble and persevering support. We take the Bill at his hands, and we are glad and proud that it is at his hands we have to take it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I do not think that the earlier part of the speech of the hon.

Member in this high controversy was altogether worthy of his reputation. It was chiefly occupied with some criticisms, which I will venture to call scrappy, of certain details of the speeches of my right hon. Friends the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) and the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). The hon. Member took my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury to task because he had indicated his opinion that when a great measure came to the House of Lords, the House of Lords would endeavour to avail itself of the usual means of information, and that the opinion which it was thereby enabled to form of the general desire of the people of the United Kingdom would probably guide its decision. Certainly it seems to me a strange thing that amongst all the complaints against the House of Lords there is now to be added this new one, that it is likely partially to be guided by popular wishes. I think the hon. Member went on to criticise my right hon. Friend beside me (Mr. Courtney), and in the course of his remarks upon what he called "the gag" he certainly brought forward a new argument in favour of that innovation which I hope will be permanently connected with his name. He said that nowadays we can go round the world in 80 days, and he seemed, therefore, to think that it was impossible to contemplate that we should bestow upon any Bill—even upon a Bill which deeply and vitally affected a world-wide Empire—more time than it takes for this pleasure trip and geographical excursion. Then the hon. Member complained of what he was pleased to call the repetition of our arguments. I suppose there must necessarily be a difference of opinion in regard to that. I can only put my individual opinion against his, and say that during the whole time I have sat in this House I have never heard a great Debate conducted with so much relevancy and so little repetition. I can understand that the arguments which to us were fresh palled upon hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were only too anxious to get to the conclusion of the measure as quickly as possible. Then the hon. Member complained of what he was pleased to call "discussion by scrap," and he referred to myself as an offender. Well, if I have been an offender, no man in this House has been a greater victim, for my speeches have supplied Ministers and their supporters with ten times the number of quotations they have taken from any other source. I do not complain of that. I have sometimes complained of the unfairness with which those quotations were detached from the context; but if these quotations fairly represent the opinions at any time expressed, either by myself or anybody else, I really cannot see why they are not germane to our discussions. It is quite true, as the hon. Member says, that I have, for a long time past, read with the greatest interest everything he and his Colleagues—or nearly everything he and his principal Colleagues—have said in reference to Irish questions; that I have quoted many of these utterances, and that now I think it fair, and right, and extremely instructive to contrast them with the present schemes and present position of hon. Gentlemen. Sir, I do not see how that can be matter of blame, or how anybody can deny that such quotations, properly used, are likely to aid us in coming to a just conclusion. I pass, Sir, to what, after all, was the more important part of the speech of the hon. Member, and I think it will be generally admitted that there is a certain fitness in the selection which has been made of him to represent the Party with which he is connected at the close of the Debate. I do not refer to his titular position as Leader of that Party, but the hon. Member has been longer in this House than any other Member of that Party. [Colonel NOLAN: No!] I think that my hon. and gallant Friend who contradicts me does not belong to that Party. The hon. Member has been, as I have said, a long time in this House, and I am sure I pay him no empty compliment in saying that during that time he has gained the good-will and sympathy of men in all parts of it. Therefore it was natural that he should be selected, and also because of his character. On the present occasion it is, no doubt, felt that it is desirable to conciliate the British people, and the hon. Member is the man to do it. If it had been desired to bully or to threaten the English people—well, I suppose the Member for Cork City (Mr. W. O'Brien) or the Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) would have offered himself. I do not wonder at a certain tone of triumph in the speech which the hon. Member has just delivered. He has seen many vicissitudes during his long service in this House. I will undertake to say that in the earlier period of it nothing whatever would have seemed to him to be more improbable than that any Prime Minister—and, above all, this Prime Minister—should bring forward a Bill for giving Home Rule to Ireland. Therefore his tribute of gratitude and praise to the Prime Minister was called for, was graceful, and was well-deserved. The hon. Member addressed himself to what, after all, is one of the most important questions which can be dealt with by the House at this stage of our proceedings. He said—"We are asked whether this Bill is a final settlement," and he answered the question by saying that he accepted it with a cordial welcome. He went further, and said that if by "finality" you meant finality in no pedantic sense—finality of principle—he and his friends would in that sense accept the Bill. It is quite unnecessary for him to protest against any attempt, for none has been made, to fasten upon him any finality which would preclude slight alterations in this Bill such as those he refers to. But we also want to know whether in principle this Bill is to be finally accepted; whether the restrictions imposed upon the Irish Parliament, restrictions which have been grievously complained of by hon. Gentlemen opposite, are accepted by them with the determination that if hereafter in Ireland they should be assailed all the influence they can bring to bear shall be brought in order to maintain them in their present form? We want to know whether the supremacy of Parliament, about which we heard so much, is accepted as finally representing the relations which are to obtain between this Parliament and the Parliament of Ireland? These are questions to which we expect an answer, and I will not say the answer of the hon. Gentleman opposite was altogether satisfactory. I will frankly admit in that respect he went a long way. And, Sir, I am not going to question the sincerity of the hon. Member. So far as he speaks for himself I accept every word that he has said. But I cannot forget that on a similar occasion, and in a similar Debate, another Leader—and I may say, without any derogation of the qualities of the hon. Member opposite, a greater Leader than he—stood up in his place and told this House in very similar words that he and his Party welcomed the Bill that was then before the House, and accepted it as a full and complete settlement of the demands of Ireland. And I cannot forget also that in a few years afterwards that same Leader publicly declared that that statement of his in this House had only been made after a meeting of the Party at which they had agreed with him that the Bill of which he spoke was to be regarded as a Parliamentary bid—and was to be accepted pro tanto for what it was worth. I will not insult the hon. Member by even suspecting that a similar meeting may have been held before the Debate to-night. No; I will take it that he speaks for himself; and that he speaks for some, at any rate, of his friends around him. [Several hon. MEMBERS: For all.] I have said as much as I can say—he speaks, at all events, for some of his friends; but I say that he cannot speak for those who are to come after him. [An hon. MEMBER: Can you?] What is the sense of that interruption? I say the hon. Member cannot speak for those who will come after him; and in dealing with this, which is a national settlement, we have to deal not with the men of to-day, but with the generations for all time to come. Well now, Sir, it is not unnatural that at this stage of the Bill more than one Member should have thought it necessary to take some kind of retrospect of our proceedings, and endeavour to form some sort of estimate of the position which we have reached. Mr. Speaker, we are parting with a Bill which has occupied us long, and which has produced many interesting and some very exciting discussions. I know it is the opinion of some hon. Members that we have been wasting our time. That is the opinion of the Home Secretary—I do not see him in his place. That is evidently the opinion which he entertains, and he expressed it at a meeting held, I think, last May. The opinion of the Home Secretary is extremely simple. It is that a Government, however small the majority by which it is supported, however important the measure or series of measures it introduces in this House, is entitled, by its own mere motion, of its own sweet will and pleasure, to decide how long those measures should be debated; and if the Opposition does not agree with it the Opposition is to be punished by the gag, by the guillotine, and by All-night Sittings and Autumn Sessions. Well, I take note of the statement of the Home Secretary, and I beg the House to take note that we, in our opposition to the gag as it has been applied to us, have scrupulously guarded ourselves against any opposition to the Closure as a principle. We have humbly submitted to the Government that this was a Bill so exceptional in its character, so gigantic in its probable results, of such transcendent importance, that it must be treated exceptionally; we have begged of them to have patience with us, and to allow us even what they might think to be extreme consideration. Well, they have not seen their way to accept our applications, and they must take the consequences, because now let it be well understood that there is no Government which can sit on those Benches, and there is no Bill they can propose, that they will not have justification for closing after what they think to be a reasonable time, and without reference to any other opinion. I can conceive the possibility of a Unionist Government seated there that might think the time had come—as we do think—when there should be a review of the proportionate representation and power of Ireland and Great Britain, when there should be a redistribution of seats; and I can conceive that a Bill of that kind, brought in by a Conservative Government, might give rise to a great deal of discussion. On your heads be it if the discussion is unduly shortened. I do not entertain the view of the Home Secretary that our time has been wasted in this discussion, and I look back to see whether we have made any progress in the settlement of this great controversy—whether, at all events, we have been able to bring the issues to a more definite point, to put them more clearly before the people, the ultimate tribunal to which we all appeal, and whether, also, we have been able to throw any light on the consequences which are likely to follow on this legislation. I will ask the House for a minute or two to go back and to consider what was the position of the two great Parties when this question was introduced. I do not think anyone will say that there was great enthusiasm for Home Rule in the Gladstonian ranks. By far the larger part of the oratory of Gladstonian candidates before the last Election was undoubtedly expended on the promotion and explanation of the Newcastle Programme, and even with all the attractions of that programme, as we know perfectly well, you were unable to obtain a majority in England and Scotland together. Under these circumstances, we may fairly say that this question of Home Rule is not, and never has been, in its true sense, a British policy. It was not even initiated by a British statesman. It was accepted, under circumstances on which I will not now dwell, by my right hon. Friend from Mr. Parnell. It has since been forced through this House by an Irish majority. I say, then, that under these circumstances we may marvel at the influence and power which my right hon. Friend has exercised over his own supporters to induce them to accept this policy, but he cannot call it a British policy. I believe that all that has happened justifies what was said by Mr. Bright—that if this policy had been proposed by any other Englishman or Scotchman it would have been laughed out of the House of Commons. For the Prime Minister this day is a day of great personal victory; but I think it is a victory which some of its greatest admirers will hereafter see reason to deplore. Meanwhile, for myself, and I have no doubt for many others, I may say that while I am as strenuously opposed as ever to his policy, which I believe has struck a deadly blow at the honour and interests of this country, I am filled with admiration—[A laugh]—may I not admire the courage, the resolution, the resources, and the eloquence by which he has executed this marvellous tour de force, which has reversed all British statesmanship and policy, and has by implication condemned all his own policy up to a very recent time? His influence, and his influence alone, has been powerful enough to secure the acceptance by the Gladstonian Party here and in the country of the principle of Home Rule. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General last night quoted against me a speech of mine in which I said that the principle of Home Rule had been discussed for seven years, in order to show that I was inconsistent in saying afterwards that the Bill was not understood before it was introduced into this House. I have never denied that the bare principle of Home Rule has been before the country since 1886, and accepted by the supporters of my right hon. Friend; but what is a great deal more wonderful is this—and it is a point to which the Attorney General did not refer—that the Ministerial Party, which boasts of its independence, has sacrificed the right of private judgment in regard to all the details of the measure, many of which, being of the utmost importance, it has left entirely to the discretion of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. There was one Member of that Party who was not satisfied with this secrecy and concealment—I mean the Home Secretary, who protested publicly against it. He got snubbed for his pains. He accepted the snub, and now I have no doubt he has his reward. The Gladstonian Party were pledged at the last Election to vote for the establishment of an Irish Legislature to deal exclusively with Irish affairs. That cannot be disputed. But they accepted that principle subject to conditions of the greatest importance, which were laid down by my right hon. Friend himself. They were that the unity of the Empire should be preserved, that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament should be maintained unquestioned and unimpaired, and that there should be ample security for the minority in Ireland. Let me say how it strikes us that these conditions have been fulfilled. The unity of the Empire is preserved in name in the Bill; but there is not a military expert in the United Kingdom or out of it who will not tell you that our military strength will be weakened and our naval resources more largely called on in consequence of this measure. I say you cannot appeal to any military authority of eminence, either in this country or on the Continent of Europe, who will not agree with what I say; and with a separate Parliament and a separate Executive in Ireland, is it not perfectly clear that if they have the will they have the power to hamper and embarrass our foreign policy? There are 50 ways in which they could do so under this measure. They might, if they chose, make it very difficult for us to collect war taxation or to enlist troops in Ireland; they might also wink at the arming of the population. And what have we to rely upon? The only answer given to our fears is that we must rely upon the magnanimity, the generosity, and the continuous goodwill of the Irish Legislature, and at the same time we have given them every inducement to put pressure on us in order that they might secure the removal of the restrictions imposed by this Bill. Then there is the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. That supremacy was to be maintained intact and unimpaired over matters and persons local and Imperial. The Debates have shown that, so far as persons are concerned, the idea of supremacy is entirely abandoned. You will have a separate Executive in Ireland independent altogether of English control, and the Government have refused every Amendment which we have moved with a view to secure an Imperial Executive to carry out the decrees and the decisions of the Imperial Courts. At the same time we have heard again and again views expressed with regard to supremacy by the Representatives of the majority in Ireland which differ from the ideas enunciated on this side of the House. While we maintain that the supremacy ought to be complete, permanent, and easily capable of enforcement, they have warned us that any attempt to enforce it, unless under the most exceptional circumstances, of which their Legislature would be the judge, will be resented by them, and will lead to friction and irritation. I do not hesitate to say that the supremacy and the veto have become in this Bill mere Constitutional figments like the supremacy over self-governing Colonies—a mere Court sword which we shall never be able to draw with any purpose from the scabbard. Lastly, there is the protection of the minority in Ireland. The minority themselves are not satisfied with the protection which you have afforded. We have shown, with regard to every restriction which you have proposed for their advantage, how easily it might be evaded. We have asked you to add to those restrictions and to strengthen those provisions, but you have declined. Here, again, the whole security which we rely on does not lie in these paper safeguards; it lies entirely in your belief, and in such belief as we can summon, in the generosity, the fairness, and the justice of hon. Gentlemen opposite—those who will be the Leaders in an Irish Government, and who in the last few years have threatened and denounced the minority, and declared that they would take vengeance whenever they had the opportunity. These, then, are the three conditions which, in our view at any rate, have not been fulfilled. The Gladstonian Party, which relied on them, was bound to be very scrupulous in respect to them, to give the most careful consideration and criticism to the provisions by which they were to be secured. Have they done so? Why, during the whole of these Debates there has hardly been one single Amendment—I am not certain there has been one—that has been moved by a supporter of the Government and carried to a Division. My right hon. Friend the other day complained that we had made speeches in the proportion of more than two to one to the speeches made on behalf of the Government. He might have said much more than that. If he had omitted all the speeches—and very perfunctory speeches they often were—which were forced from the Government by their official position, and had also omitted those made by hon. Gentlemen opposite generally intended to strengthen the Government in resisting any possible concession, he would have found that he could have counted on his two hands the contributions which have been made to these Debates by his own supporters. As far as they were concerned, they might have retired from the House on the day when the Bill was introduced, if only they had been able to leave their proxies in the hands of the Government. We complain of the gag. They think that we are unreasonable. I do not wonder. “They jest at scars who never felt a wound.” They have no reason to dread the gag who are voluntarily silent, and who wear that instrument permanently as an honour and an ornament. It cannot be said that their silence was justified by the original perfection of this measure. Putting aside our Amendments, the changes which the Government have themselves made in their measure are vitally important, and have completely altered its character. The Bill, therefore, was not perfect at the beginning; but not a single improvement that may have been made in it is due to the enlightened criticism of any Member sitting on the Benches behind the Government. As far as the Gladstonian Party is concerned, you might have passed all the stages in a single day without the alteration of a dot or a comma. I observe, with reference to this matter, that the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) made an imaginative addition to current history in the speech to which I have already referred. He said that there were occasions when there was a rising spirit of independence in the Ministerial ranks, when the silent Member began to throb, and there was a fear that he would become articulate, and then, said the Home Secretary, the Government would have been in a tight fix. But, according to the right hon. Gentleman, a saviour appeared in the person of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who spoke again and again on these occasions, with the result that all the eloquence which was about to burst forth was at once repressed and the silent Member became himself again. That was a most complimentary view to take of the power of my oratory; but it is not complimentary to the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, for his position is that they whose consciences had been aroused and whose convictions were against the Government voted against their consciences and their convictions in order to show their opposition to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Of course, the silence of the Ministerial Party has thrown a heavier duty upon the Opposition. If there was to be any amendment of this Bill it was we who had to make, or at all events to suggest, the improvement. We could place no reliance on the supporters of the Government, who treated this matter from the first not as a great Constitutional change—almost a revolution—but as an ordinary Party Bill; and never, I should think, in the history of Party Bills were the bonds of Party discipline drawn so tight. In these circumstances, we have had to do their work as well as our own, and the whole duty of a deliberative Assembly has been thrown upon the minority. We have had to protect, as far as might be, the interests of the minority in Ireland and the interests of our English majority at home. We have pursued our path, with what success we may have had, undeterred by the arbitrary conduct of the Government or even by the insults which, with their tacit encouragement, have been flung at us from the Benches below the Gangway opposite (the Irish Benches). I think the country will do us the justice which the Government have denied us. Hon. Members supporting the Government say that our opposition has been factious, and that some of us have been influenced by personal rancour. I appeal to those Members. Cannot you at this last moment be for once fair to your political opponents, and cannot you ascribe to us motives a little less unworthy? Cannot you for once put yourselves in our place and feel as you would feel if for a moment you could share our convictions? We believe that the dearest interests of the country are involved detrimentally in this measure. We believe that obligations of honour which were once recognised as sacred by the Government have now been lightly repudiated. We believe that the greatness of the United Kingdom—that its strength and its influence—will be seriously undermined. We believe that these results will be accompanied by the degradation of our own Parliament, and that they will have to be paid for by an increase of the burdens upon the British taxpayer. Those are our opinions. You may not agree with them; but if we hold them, if we believe, as we sincerely and honestly do, that the policy of the Government is fatal to those interests which we are here to guard, do you think that any opposition could be too strenuous, too prolonged? We say that a fair issue has never been frankly and candidly put before the people. Who was there in 1885 who knew—or if he knew it told his constituents—that the first business to which he would be called in the House of Commons would be Home Rule for Ireland? Who in the Government of 1886 knew it? Not I, for I was told by my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that he was committed to nothing, and that all he wanted was a fair and full inquiry into the Irish demand in order to discover whether it was a practicable one. I wrote to my right hon. Friend in accepting Office and told him that I accepted on the understanding that his purpose was inquiry, and that he was not committed to anything.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): What I said was that the Government was not committed. I did not speak for myself personally.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not want to turn aside from my argument. I only say that in 1886, as a Member of the Government, I had no idea that that Government or that its head was committed to the policy of Home Rule. [Interruption.]

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Healy interrupts (referring to Mr. T. M. Healy, Member for North Louth).

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Again, in 1892, when that policy was before the country, as far, at all events, as the principle was concerned, who declared that he understood that the Bill was a Bill conceived as this Bill has been conceived? Who could say then that he was going to vote for the interference of the Irish Members in all our affairs, in all the details of our legislative business? Since the Bill was introduced the policy of the Government from day to day has not been known to the House. It may have been known to a few Gentlemen opposite, but it has not been known to the House, and great changes have been sprung upon us when there was not sufficient time left for their discussion. Even now the same policy is being pursued. The Government are not using all their energies to press forward this policy of Home Rule; they are not seeking that mandate from the country which they might have if the country were favourable to them now that it has a full knowledge of the contents of this Bill. No; they are seeing if haply they can extract something from the Newcastle Programme with which they can cloak this Bill, cover it up, and conceal it from the voters at the next Election. We believe that the majority which they have in this House has ceased to exist in the country. We say that when the discussion became dangerous, when the Government thought that the exposure of their policy was having some effect in the country, they proceeded to silence the Representatives of the British majority. If this had been your position—perhaps it will be before long—would thing as finality. But he would ask what was the alternative policy to that of Her Majesty's Government? Let some responsible Members of the Opposition say what they proposed to substitute for the policy of Her Majesty's Government; many had been anxiously waiting to hear what the alternative was to be. Was it to be a battering-ram to-day and a light railway to-morrow? The noble Lord the Member for Paddington had said there must be some measure of Local Government for Ireland, and that this was a subject which no Government and no Party could afford to shirk. Yet the Opposition did shirk it for six years, when they had the security that any measure carried through this House would pass in another place. Would the Opposition, if they could, enter into some new compact, or would they fall back upon resolute government and the policy of not hesitating to shoot? The policy of Her Majesty's Government was one of conciliation; it was offered by the democracy of England to the Irish nation at the hands of the leading statesman of our age, and for that reason he gave it his cordial support.

LORD F. HAMILTON (Tyrone, N.) should not detain the House for more than a few minutes, and he had the less compunction in rising, as he had occupied very little of the attention of the House during any of the stages of the Bill. He should, however, be wanting in duty to those who returned him to the House if he did not before the Bill was read a third time enter his protest, both in their name and his own, against this measure. They had been for 82 days discussing one quarter of a Bill three-fourths of which had been forced through the House without a word of discussion of any sort or kind whatever. What was the measure? It was a measure which introduced vast Constitutional changes, which bristled with difficulties, and which had been riddled through and through by the arguments of the Opposition during the Committee stage. He could only think of one reason which could excuse the introduction of the Bill, and that was that when the Government introduced it they were aware of the fact that it could not become law. It was a Bill made for show, and not for use. It was a species of article manufactured in Germany, or, perhaps, after what they heard last night, "manufactured in Devonport" would be a more felicitous expression. This Bill was the outcome of the labour of six years. Surely after such an abnormally prolonged period of gestation they might have expected some measure a little more creditable to those the impress of whose paternity it bore. There were only two clauses in the Bill upon which he should like to say a word. The first was the 9th clause and the other the Second Schedule, which might be regarded as part of a clause. The Irish Members were to be retained, and at that he rejoiced. The Members from Ulster were returned by the constituents to the Imperial Parliament, and not to a species of glorified Vestry in Dublin. The Ulster Members, he supposed, ought to congratulate themselves on the fact that the Prime Minister, in his graciousness, had only partially disfranchised their constituents. Instead of returning 102 Members to this Parliament, Ireland in future would only return 80 Members; but, at the same time, the constituencies in the North of Ireland had been gerrymandered in the most barefaced, though skilful, manner in order to reduce the present most inadequate representation of the Loyalists of Ireland to a still smaller figure. Why should the principle of electoral districts, upon which that House after long deliberation had finally resolved—why should that principle, which was considered best for England, be abandoned in the case of Ireland? The reason was perfectly obvious. It was to reduce the representation of the Loyalists. In the County of Tyrone, for instance, by this Second Schedule, it would mean almost the entire, if not the entire, annihilation of the Loyalist and Unionist representation. Coming to the Financial Clauses, he confessed that, as an Irish Member, it was a matter of most supreme indifference to him whether the financial burdens which were to fall upon England under this Bill were to be heavier than they were at present. Luxuries must be paid for; and if gentlemen chose to buy a pig in a poke, they must pay the price. It would be interesting to see whether the constituents of hon. Gentlemen opposite regarded this matter with the same indifference that the Irish Members did. The hon. Member for North Armagh had alluded to the attitude of determined hostility which the Ulster Unionists had adopted towards this Bill. There was one Member of the present Government who was an Ulsterman by birth, and he regretted to say that the only contribution he made to this difficult part of the subject was a sneer at the Unionist representation of his native Province. The other night there was a Debate on absentee landlords. He (Lord F. Hamilton) confessed he had very little sympathy with absentees of any sort. He regretted the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) was not in his place, and he would suggest to that right hon. Gentleman that it would be a most interesting, instructive, and novel experience for him to re-visit his native Province during the Recess. He could address meetings in Belfast and Derry, and ascertain how far Ulstermen coincided and believed in the views he himself expressed. Possibly it might fail to be an altogether agreeable experience to the principal performer. Much capital had been made out of the mysterious Memorial which was said to be signed by 3,500 Presbyterians, who were in favour of the policy advocated by the Prime Minister. The names of the signatories to this Memorial up to the present had been enshrouded in the darkest mystery, and the Unionists were a little sceptical as to the genuineness of the signatures. Assuming, however, that this number of 3,500 was correct; there were 500,000 Presbyterians in Ireland, so that the Prime Minister would actually have succeeded in convincing very nearly  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. of the total of the Presbyterians in Ireland—a most magnificent and convincing demonstration of opinion! It was, perhaps, natural that there should exist a certain lack of sympathy between the Unionists of Ulster and the occupants of the Government Bench. The Ulster Protestant, and especially the Ulster Presbyterian, was a man of few words. He was essentially and pre-eminently a man of action. It was natural there should be this lack of sympathy between men, on the one hand, who were practical and men of action; and, on the other hand, of men who were nothing if not theorists. But though this lack of sympathy might exist, he confessed the Protestants of Ulster had not received fair play in this matter. During the whole course of these Debates no more extraordinary argument had been put forward than that with which the Chancellor of the Duchy met the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leeds the other night. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was no particular force in endeavouring to meet a difficulty of one kind while leaving it open to the Irish Legislature to obtain the same ends by other means. In other words, the present measure opened the door to so many evils that it was no use guarding against any particular one. As well might a man decline to take any precautions against the inroads of cholera on the ground that there were so many other diseases to which human beings were liable that it was absolutely absurd to single one special disease out. Every one of them thought that Bill a dead Bill. They had been sitting round a corpse for the last few weeks, and it would be difficult to imagine a duller wake than they had had. Everyone who lived in Ireland knew that the Land Question was the very root of the whole Irish difficulty, and yet there was no attempt whatever to settle the Land Question in the Bill now before the House. There was one legacy the Government would leave. They had succeeded in fanning into a flame the dying embers of religious and racial animosity. Those who lived in the North of Ireland had hoped those flames had died out, but they saw again the old strong Party feeling aroused, and he feared it would take nearly a generation for those feelings to calm down. This was the only legacy the Government would leave when they had been turned out of Office and when this Administration had passed into the limbo of forgotten things.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he hoped the House would not think him wanting in respect for the able and diverting speech which, in common with others, he had listened to with very great interest if he did not pursue the heads of argument which the noble Lord too briefly, for their profit and instruction, placed before the House, except in so far as he might encompass them incidentally in the remarks he might have to make in seeking to address the House, because he felt he had hardly any right to intrude there not have been superadded to the distress and dislike which you felt for the policy forced upon you some legitimate feeling of irritation, even of indignation, at the un-English and arbitrary treatment meted out to you? Well, we have performed our task to the best of our ability. We have exposed the dangers, the mischief, the absurdities of this Bill. We have shown that it is likely to bring to Ireland ruin and strife, and to Great Britain a weakening of her strength, legislative impotence, and an increase of her burdens. But what effect have we produced upon the country? I look around at the various sections interested in this matter. There is the minority in Ireland, one-third of the population admittedly containing the greater part of the wealth, a very large part of the education, and most of the industrial energy of the country. They believe—they tell you that they believe—that to them this Bill means civil war.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Does that show their intelligence?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Their statements, their assurances, their warnings are received, as they were received just now, by the majority in a tone and with a temper which gives but small promise of that magnanimity upon which we are told to rely. They are sneered at; they are told that their sole object is to re-establish Protestant ascendancy. That charge is ridiculous. There is not a shred left of Protestant ascendancy. There is not a desire left to re-establish it. All that these men ask is that under the protection of the Imperial Parliament they shall enjoy equal laws and equal privileges with the rest of Ireland. They ask for nothing more. You refuse it to them, and they fear that in the place of the Protestant ascendancy which is dead there may be raised up another, even a worse ascendancy—an ascendancy of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and an ascendancy of the promoters of the Land League. Well, Sir, any way, as far as they are concerned, their opposition is unshaken. It is as strenuous now as it was when the Bill was introduced. I wonder what is the feeling in the case of the majority of the Irish people—the 3,000,000 for whom we are taking all these risks, and for whom we are to make all these sacrifices? There is one thing I note as significant, and it is this: that during all the time that has been occupied in the passage of this Bill, during all the time when there was a great agitation against the Bill going on in Great Britain and in Ireland, hardly any public meetings were in favour of the measure. That may be explained; but this, at all events, is certain: that if this Bill were to pass it would provoke bitter disappointment, unless in some way or another it speedily and directly promoted the material prosperity of the country. That is what they are looking for, not merely from sentimental considerations. Sir, whence is this improved prosperity to come from? We know that what is desirable is, if it be possible, to promote the industrial developments of the country, and, in order to promote the industrial developments of the country, I suppose you must have good credit and good security. Is there anyone bold enough to say that the credit and security of Ireland will be better after this Bill has passed than it is now? Where does the confidence of the industrial classes come from? The industrial classes will be in a small minority in the Houses of the Legislature which you are going to set up. They will be wholly at the mercy—I will not say of the ill-will and oppression, but of the ignorance, the economic ignorance—of the agricultural classes, who will be in a great majority. I do not believe, Sir, that there is any chance of this increased prosperity. We are told by hon. Members opposite that under the Bill their finances will be bankrupt. We know that the flood, the stream of British subsidies is to cease the moment the Bill is passed. Well, Sir, I can only say that if there is any truth, any economic truth at all, the last state of Ireland will be worse than the first. I have never heard in the course of these Debates any new sources of prosperity hinted at which are not open to them now, except the protection of Irish industries, which is forbidden by the Bill, and confiscation of the land which hon. Gentlemen opposite repudiate, and which, even if they attempted to carry it into effect, would certainly not give confidence to capital or security in Ireland. But I do not now dwell on the situation in Ireland. That is a matter for Irishmen to speak about with more authority than I can command. I am interested in Great Britain. I do not know whether I should not say that it is my misfortune to be a pure Englishman. I am afraid that the Prime Minister might think that almost a disqualification. I have regretted in the course of these Debates to hear him in his present position denouncing British policy, British statesmanship, and, of course, by implication his own. I have heard him recapitulating and exaggerating every error, every offence, every crime that was ever committed by the British Government, and at the same time ascribing all the Christian virtues to hon. Members opposite, who are, I firmly believe, answerable for the greater part of the disorder and the misery of the last 10 years in Ireland, and who certainly, during that time, have done nothing to promote its material prosperity. Well, Sir, I cannot agree with the Prime Minister. I do not think that all the sin is on one side. At any rate, for the last 20 years, he, I think, will admit that there has been on the part of the British Government and on the part of the British people an earnest desire to remove all proved grievances in Ireland, and to act generously to the Irish people. Even now I would say that there is nothing which the majority of the Irish people can ask, provided it is not contrary to the Ten Commandments, which they may not obtain from the Imperial Parliament. But there is one thing which the majority in this House, I believe, will never grant, and that is the power, through the Representatives of Ireland, vitally to injure this country, or to wreak their vengeance upon those who in past times have served her well. Now, Sir, I have referred once or twice to the British majority. It is, I think, a significant fact—and I do not think it will lose its importance by repetition—that on all the principal clauses of this Bill, and on all the principal Amendments, a large British majority and an immense English majority have voted against the Government. The Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) the other day referred to this argument, and condemned it as unprecedented and unconstitutional. I hope my right hon. Friend will excuse me if I say that his condemnation is childish and academic. Who first taught us to distinguish between a British and an Irish majority? Why, Sir, it was the Prime Minister, who in 1885 asked for a British majority in order that he might be independent of the Irish vote. And again, in 1886, when England was hostile to Home Rule, when Scotland was either hostile or indifferent, the Prime Minister introduced Home Rule. Why? Because, he told us, that an Irish majority demanded it. I say to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that what an Irish majority may demand a British majority may refuse. Does he really think that he can alter the Constitution of Great Britain without the assent of the British nation? Now, Sir, they have themselves to thank, for it is they who have revived this dangerous doctrine of separate majorities, and, Sir, we will meet them on their own ground. We will take up their challenge. We will appeal to the British majority. We will appeal to their good sense, to their Imperial instincts, to save us from being made the laughing-stock of all mankind. I notice that, in spite of the importance and influence of the British majority, wherever in this Bill what may be called British interests come into conflict with what may be called Irish interests, British interests go to the wall. I will take only two illustrations; they will be enough for my purpose. Take the case of the retention of the Irish Members for all purposes. My right hon. Friend spoke as strongly as anyone as to the evils of that course. He spoke of the temptation to intrigue, and the injustice—the apparent injustice—to which it led. But, Sir, in spite of that, after his pledge that he would never agree to it, after his promise that this matter should be determined by a majority of the British people—after that promise—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no—the majority in Parliament.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. I am really very sorry to contradict him. There is nothing whatever in my right hon. Friend's speech about Parliament; it is the voice of Great Britain. I have the quotation, here. I will read it if you wish, but I do not think that is necessary, because I quoted it before. I say that my right hon. Friend pledged himself that Great Britain should have a determining voice, and then a few days, or it may be a week, before the matter came on, he further pledged himself that the Government would stand by their clause, and would do their best to carry it. In spite of all these pledges and promises, when the time came he threw the whole policy, to which he had previously given his adhesion, to the winds; and he did this distinctly on the ground that what he then called the minor inconvenience was nothing in comparison with the cardinal importance of giving Home Rule to Ireland. Well, Sir, Ireland is to deal with her own affairs uncontrolled by us—practically uncontrolled—at the same time that 80 Irish Members, without British constituencies, without British responsibilities, are to come and take part in every act of British legislation and British taxation. “Ireland for the Irish” is a very good and a very plausible cry, but I think that “England for the English” will be a still better cry. Well then, Sir, there is the question of the financial arrangements. The principle laid down was that there was to be an equitable repartition, and that Ireland was to pay her share according to her taxable capacity. There is a great deal to be said for that, and there is a great deal against it, but at all events it is a fair principle, and one that can be defended. Unfortunately, the application of that principle would have made Ireland bankrupt, and it was a cardinal point with my right hon. Friend to secure to her a surplus of £500,000 a year. Accordingly, in order to secure that surplus for Ireland, England and Scotland are to be sacrificed, and the Irish taxpayer is to pay one-sixth of the sum per head paid by his brother taxpayer in Great Britain. Those are matters that have been brought out clearly in the course of our discussion, and our discussion is not wasted if they have sunk deep into the minds of the British people. Well, Sir, we know what we are going to lose in strength, in honour, and in money. What are we going to gain? We are to gain relief from the Irish controversy. We are to have a final settlement—not in the pedantic sense—we are to have a final settlement of the Irish Question. That was the promise that was made to the electors, and that was the promise made to the House when the Bill was introduced. It is absurd to put it before us now, when in clause after clause of the Bill we are referred to a future time when this Irish Question will again come up for discussion. But, Sir, even if there were no temporary provisions in this Bill, even if it were in the mind and view of the Government a final settlement, what could we say after the significant and remarkable speech that was made the other day by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond), the recollection of which has not faded from our minds, even after the speech—the pacific and conciliatory speech—of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. J. M‘Carthy). The speech of the hon. Member for Waterford was a remarkable speech, remarkable for the strength of its arguments, and remarkable for the weakness of its conclusions. But in one respect it was distinct and clear enough. The hon. Member said that no man in his senses could now contend that this Bill was a full, complete, or satisfactory settlement of the Irish Question, and he went on to say that on every page the word “provisional” was stamped as though in red ink. You have the assurances of the hon. Member for Longford; you have the statement of the hon. Member for Waterford. You may cheer yourselves with the thought that the hon. Member for Waterford leads in this House, I think, the smallest Party within its walls, but do you doubt—does any sensible man doubt now—that that which the hon. Member has said is felt by the great majority of all the most active elements in Irish agitation—I will go further and say, by almost all of the American-Irish—who are in these matters a not altogether unimportant consideration? Is it not certain that as soon as the fulcrum has been obtained, and as soon as what the Clan-na-Gael call the plant for revolution is in working order, from time to time what the hon. Member has said here will be repeated in louder and louder tones, and that pressure will be brought to bear upon Ministry after Ministry until at last some Ministry is found weak enough or base enough to buy his support? My right hon. Friend referred the other day to foreign experience—I think rather unwisely; but, at any rate, although we do not admit that any analogy can be found in any particular case which serves as an example for our dealings with Ireland, yet we can, at all events, find in every example which can be quoted one constant, one significant lesson. And it is this—that in every case in which a superior Power has given limited self-government to an inferior it has never been accepted or treated as a final settlement. It has always been the starting point for new demands, and they have gone on, and are going on, and will go on until complete independence is secured. What the Secretary for Scotland said some time ago has never been disproved. There is no half-way house between Home Rule and Separation. For my part, I gravely doubt whether Separation itself would not be better for the country than the Home Rule which is proposed. At any rate, we should know what it is we have to guard against. We could take our own precautions. Home Rule would lull us into security, and the time might come when we should find ourselves unprepared, with an enemy on our flank. The Attorney General said, in the concluding portion of his speech last night, that Home Rule was inevitable—that the principle had been accepted by the Liberal Party, and every principle accepted by the Liberal Party was certain, in the long run, of success. I might answer the hon. and learned Gentleman by saying that a few years ago the Liberal Party pledged itself, even more strenuously than they have ever pledged themselves to Home Rule, to the maintenance of the Union. A section of the Liberal Party has changed its mind. [Cries of "No, no!"] It may change it again. In the meantime, I am perfectly ready to admit that the mischief which you have done by introducing this policy is irreparable; that you have made enormously more difficult the government of Ireland; that you have postponed indefinitely the hope of a complete and fuller Union. You have stimulated the idea of a separate nationality, which the greatest popular leaders of our time, whether in this country or abroad, have wisely desired to merge in a wider conception of national existence—men who certainly cannot be accused of being wanting in Liberal faith or Liberal aspirations—men as different in character as, in this country, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, and Mr. John Stuart Mill; in Italy, Count Cavour and Mazzini; in Austria, Kossuth; and in Germany, Bismarck and Karl Blind. These men, who have been popular leaders, all disapproved of the policy of stimulating the Separatist or Particularist idea of promoting national competition, and separating national interests. The Bill is going, as the hon. Member opposite said, to another place to meet its fate. I am not so certain as he is that we shall ever see it or its like again. Whether we do or do not, I am convinced that the British people will give the policy embodied in it its death-blow on the first occasion. The Bill will be defeated. But the weakness of the Liberal Party, its lack of independence, its readiness to treat the vital interests of the country as though they were mere incidents in the Newcastle Programme or the Plan of Campaign—these things will not be forgotten and will not be forgiven by the British democracy.

*SIR E. GREY—[Cries of "Morley!"]: The impatience of hon. Members will be gratified in the course of the evening; but I ask indulgence meanwhile, because I have not previously spoken on this Bill. Though following the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, I do not intend to complain of want of freshness in his speech, first, because we like his dialectical skill and the dramatic force which invests everything he says with interest; and, secondly, because, I regret to say, I shall be bound to travel over much of the same ground myself. We have recognised the old arguments in the right hon. Gentleman's speech; we have recognised the old omissions. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman has not explained how Home Rule on the principle of the Bill of 1886, and Canadian lines, which he himself advocated, would have satisfied that military opinion which he told us in the early part of his speech would be fatal to this Bill. He has also omitted to explain how that form of Home Rule which he once advocated would have attained, as regards Ireland, that finality the absence of which he alleges in this Bill. If this Bill is not to be final, much less will any similar Bill containing real concessions, which the right hon. Gentleman himself may have advocated, and much less would any sham Bill be so. As to the methods by which the Bill was passed in Committee, and of which the right hon. Gentleman complained, they were in some degree due to the advice of the right hon. Member himself. Some time ago, on another occasion, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“The object of all reasonable discussion is to pave the way for the settlement of a question before the country—the object of much of the discussion in the House of Commons is to prevent any settlement from being arrived at.”

Well, in all the discussions on clauses from 1 to 5 in Committee on this Bill, how much was due to the desire of the Opposition to bring about a final settlement in the sense in which those words were used. The object of the Bill is to bestow legislative authority upon Ireland; and if, on the Committee stage, the Opposition had not occupied the time by endeavouring to divert the clauses from a real to a sham object, there would have been ample time to discuss other parts of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman complains that time was not allowed, and I ask why he wanted more time? He told us some time ago that he wanted time to prove to the country how thoroughly unworkable and bad this Bill was. Has he had time to do that or not? If he has not had time to do it, why is it that the Opposition were continually asking for an Election immediately? Are they impartial judges on this question? Have they not said that every day and every hour spent on the Bill will be brought up against the Government as subtracted from British legislation? Is not that one of the weapons on which they will rely when the General Election comes? Did not Lord Salisbury the other day, in answer to a letter from the unemployed—although he gave no hint as to what measure he desired to see introduced—blame in a vague way the present Government, because by the time occupied over this Bill they prevented important British measures being introduced? Why do they want time? Is it only to discuss this Bill, or is it to use it as a weapon against us in the country? If it is for the latter purpose—as I think they have shown it is—then I say they have no title to be considered impartial judges of the amount of time that should be devoted to the Bill. Their judgment on it is suspect—already their verdict before the country is tainted by the suspicion they have themselves attached to it. I will not say much as to the motives imputed by the right hon. Gentleman to our votes.

He told us that we were a mechanical majority, that we had voted for the Bill without really believing in it. The right hon. Gentleman has used every effort in Committee to defeat the Bill. These efforts have failed, strenuous and energetic as they were, and he is left with only two consolations—one is the prophecy that the Government will be defeated in the country, and the other is that the votes by which he was defeated in the House were worth nothing. That is a matter which each man must settle for himself. One of the main charges against the Government is the 10th clause, dealing with the retention of the Irish Members. The Duke of Devonshire said the other day something which we can understand on this point—that he and his Party had scarcely realised until now how objectionable the retention of the Irish Members was. They have realised it to the extent that if the Bill is to pass the Leader of the Liberal Unionist Party says they must endeavour in the new Parliament to give liberty to the British House of Commons. Why this horror of the retention of the Irish Members? By what standard do you wish to judge the proposal before the House? It is not as if the House had a blank sheet of paper, on which nothing had been written, before it. Then how is this a change for the worse? I presume it is not because the number of the Irish Members in this House is to be reduced, though the votes given in the House on the question of the exact number of the Irish Members were most confusing. If that is not the charge against us it must be that the conduct of Irish Members in the House will be more embarrassing and inconvenient than it is at present? Why more so than now? I understand the Liberal Unionist position to be that it will be worse than it is now, or at least as bad because they say—“When the Bill is passed you will not have that control over Irish affairs—that lever with which to affect the action of the Irish Members in the House of Commons.” Sir, when the control of this country over Ireland was most strict and rigid, and when it extended even to the physical restraint of Irish Members was the presence of those Members so satisfactory, from a Unionist point of view, that they wish to continue it? The real reason for any feeling in the House or in the country against the retention of the Irish Members is that their presence in this House is considered to have made the conduct of government difficult. But the friction which has taken place has been owing, in the first place, to our legislation as to Ireland having been ill-considered; and, in the second place, to the management of the details of domestic affairs in Ireland having been in the hands of a Central Authority. This Bill removes the causes of that friction which have existed between the Irish Members and the Government. The Opposition complains that under this Bill there will still be left incentives to the Irish Party to operate in a sinister way on the British Government; but if hon. Members opposite had had their way they would have crammed the Bill full of incentives. The fact is, that the whole political energy of Ireland has been devoted in this House to expressing a sense of dissatisfaction with the condition of affairs in that country, and their demands for a Home Rule measure; and in proportion as this Bill provides as it does a great and legitimate channel for that energy, in the same proportion will it lessen the concentrated force and amount of that energy which will be expended in this House. If hon. Members want further argument I would point to the growing tendency in this country—as exemplified in our County Councils and Municipalities—to remove the control of local affairs more and more from this House. I have a further reason why the presence of the Irish Members in this House will not be so objectionable, if this Bill passes, as hon. Members contend that it has been in the past. The objection is not only to the conduct of the Irish Members in this House, but to the solid bulk of the Irish majority. But when this Bill passes you will have a natural cleavage in the Irish Party. You see signs of divisions in it at present, signs which evoke the ridicule of the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and other Unionist Members. But they are healthy signs. The persistently overwhelming majority of the Irish Party in this House on one side has been due to their overmastering passion for Home Rule, and if that pressure were removed, you would find that the cleavage would no longer be on one side. To sum up, I would say that first of all you reduce the Irish Members; secondly, you diminish the incentive of these Members to embarrass the British Government; thirdly, by the Bill you have provided conditions under which the 80 Irish Members shall give their votes, subject to the same healthy line of cleavage, the same normal perspective, the same attention to other than ulterior objects, as any body of Members who sit for British constituencies. Again, the opponents of the Bill object that under it the Executive in Ireland will be a real Executive. Let us, again, adjust our view by a reference to the present state of things. Our opponents say that the change we propose will be intolerable. But we have their word for it that the present state of things in Ireland is intolerable as regards the Executive. Is there any need of a change in the Executive in Ireland? Dublin Castle is an anachronism. It is an “alien Board of foreign officials.” [Cries of “Oh!”] I admit the language is strong, but I cannot altogether withdraw the words, for they are not my own, but the words of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Why has the Executive in Ireland been a trouble to this country, and a difficulty to the Government of Ireland? I do not think it has been solely because of the failure on the part of the Executive officers, such as the Magistrates and the Irish Constabulary. I throw no blame on them, for I consider they have never had a fair chance, because they are looked upon in Ireland with jealousy as the officials of an extrinsic and alien Government. An Executive to be useful must be strong. Its acts must sometimes be disagreeable acts. If there is jealousy of the Executive it stands no chance, because every disagreeable act is suspected. You stand no chance with public opinion; your task is for ever uphill; you contend always with those influences whose support and sympathy is the very first essential, not only of an easy, but of a fair performance of duty. A change of Executive is therefore necessary, and that Executive should be attached to the Irish Legislature. The possession of the Executive power will give a sense of responsibility to that body, and will have the same steadying influence in Ireland which it has upon Parliamentary Oppositions in this country, when they in their turn become the Government of the day. Now, we have got to the real difficulty. The real objection is that the Government we have proposed is a real one; that the Legislature and Executive in Ireland are to be real, with a full sense of responsibility. That is the gravamen of the charge against the Government. It is said that the minority will be unfairly treated. I should like to say a few words upon that. There are a few things still to be said on it. It is not the strength of the feeling of hon. Members from Ulster that is in doubt—it is the strength of their arguments. The feeling is strong and genuine, but, after all, it belongs to a minority of the people of Ireland; and when the Government are asked, as the Member for West Birmingham says, to withdraw their Bill because of this feeling of the minority, they cannot do it without proof, full and convincing, that that feeling is justified. Has that proof been given? On this question of religious intolerance, instances have been adduced where, in Protestant districts, a large Catholic minority have failed to get representation; other instances have been given where, with a large Catholic majority, a Protestant minority has had its full share of representation. The one instance wanting is an instance of a Roman Catholic majority altogether excluding a Protestant minority from representation. But supposing that the Ulster people should be, after all, right, in spite of their arguments being weak—supposing there were that off-chance—there are in the Bill such guarantees as can be put into any Bill, and, if these are not effective, no paper guarantees can be effective. But are there no guarantees outside the Bill? There is, first of all, the danger to the Home Rule Parliament of provoking the resentment of Ulster; and after Home Rule is passed, Ulster is physically strong enough—if she has moral right at her back, and the sympathy which it would provoke; moral right given by her own treatment, or by the treatment of her fellow-religionists scattered over Ireland—she is strong enough to make government by the Irish Parliament impossible. I ask hon. Gentlemen in opposite to give the Nationalists credit only for the lowest motives, and then to say whether these men, whom we all admit to be masters of Parliamentary strategy and political tactics, do not know Ulster's power as well as anyone else? This guarantee will be always present and always effective. The second outside guarantee is the certain resentment of this country if the minority in Ireland are in any way treated unfairly. Well, Sir, I have only been a short time at the Foreign Office, but I have been there long enough to have experience of the resentment which is aroused when there is any supposed ill-treatment of minorities in foreign countries with which Great Britain has no immediate concern. How can it be doubted that that resentment will be swift and sure and strong with respect to the minority in Ireland—if it should be necessary? This, too, has to be remembered: that Ireland will be so near—nay more, she will be in our very midst—that no injustice or intolerance there will escape our notice. On the Ulster question I would say that, in the first place, we are entitled to put before the country that we have no evidence that the danger to Ulster is real, practical, or imminent; and, secondly, that there are all possible guarantees in the Bill, as well as others outside, ever-acting, ever-present, inherent in the circumstances of the case, which it is not in the power of the House, or the Government, or the Bill to weaken or destroy. Then it is said that the Bill will be unworkable. Why? It is not unworkable on paper—far less so than the British Constitution itself, if it were put on paper. But the practice under the Bill is to make it unworkable. That is proved by a simple method. The worst is assumed on both sides, both as regards the Irish Members and the Government, and then the argument proceeds as well enough. The wildest language used by any Irish Member under circumstances of exasperation and despair is taken, and then it is assumed that that language describes what will be the exact letter of procedure in power. But, Sir, I would point out that in every civilised country in the world it is found that Oppositions become moderate in power. Even the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) was looked upon as an Executive officer of great trust and capacity. But in Ireland, by some per-versity of nature, they are going to proceed to still wilder excesses contrary to all knowledge of history and human nature! With that assumption the right is claimed to doubt the truth of every word that the Irish Members now say, while these earlier words are to be held true then and now. In a greater or less degree this responsibility can always be relied upon to produce—if they do not exist—qualities of moderation and prudence. Again, it is held that the veto is unworkable. That is proved by attributing to successive British Governments a large amount of jealousy, and a desire to exercise a nagging interference with the Irish Parliament. Sir, the Bill is an act of faith on both sides. The Irish people and the British Government have been brought into touch for the first time; and it requires an act of faith on the one side, as on the other, to accept the Bill. The Government trust that the Irish people will make good use of the powers conferred on them; and the Irish must trust that the restrictions will not be lightly, wantonly, or provokingly used. It has been sought to destroy the Bill by attacking it piecemeal. The restrictions were taken one by one, isolated from the context, and then it was shown that they would break down or be a source of difficulty. Each provision is a part of a whole; and there is no right to suppose that in every case there will be the maximum of folly on the one side, and the minimum of wisdom on the other. They argue as though the one object was to seize on the weakest provision and to break it down, and so to wreck the rest. But it is not a fair assumption to say of a living man that his greatest strength is that of his weakest limb. They argue that because there might be oppression there would be oppression—that because there might be injustice there would be injustice. The Government, however, believe that by this Bill they are giving the Irish people an instrument which they will use for their country's good, and which it will be worth while to use and preserve. They feel a sense of relief in passing the Bill, and they were entitled to take the view that the measure will be accepted as something which Irishmen shall endeavour not to destroy, but to foster and preserve. They feel a sense of relief in passing this Bill in regard to the prospects of British legislation, and of the time devoted to Irish affairs from which the British Parliament will be free. It is reasonable to assume that this measure, accepted by one Party and freely granted by the other, is something which both will strengthen, foster, and preserve, instead of trying to destroy. Sir, the Government are accused of waste of time on this Bill, because it must be rejected, first of all in another place, and afterwards in the country. But that is prophecy, and the recital of the speeches of hon. Members opposite during the last 12 months is perfectly strewn with broken prophecies. A few fragments more or less will make little difference. As to what will happen in another place, the prophecy of hon. Members may come true, as it is in the power of their Party to realise it. But where will the Opposition be when the Bill has been rejected? Will they be on the high road to the Local Government Bill for Ireland of last year? I understand them to say that in 1885 there was no alliance between them and the Irish Party. I do not want to press that point. I only say, Sir, that the old system broke down—the action of the Tory Party broke it down, and this Bill takes its place. The Bill introduced in 1886 was worth something—it produced the Tory Local Government Bill of last year. That was not worth much, but it was worth something, considering the quarter from which it came. But if the Bill passes through the House of Commons it will be worth something more, for if it be once passed through the House you cannot go back. Can anyone suppose that the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons will not alter the standard by which future proposals will be judged by the country? I ask the House to turn to the confession of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He said that the Bill had done irreparable mischief. It is worth while for hon. Members to remember that, when they console themselves with the action likely to be taken in another place. The passage of this Bill through this House will certainly remove the idea that it is impossible to get a majority of the electors of the United Kingdom in its favour, and it will remove the idea that it is impossible to get such a Bill through this House, and the removal of those two ideas is worth something. How can you go back even if the Bill were rejected at the next Election? Some hon. Members say that the electors are not interested in Home Rule—that they do not believe it; that they are interested in social and local measures. It is said we would be glad to see the subject dropped, as our friends care more for eight hours for miners, labour questions, and Parish Councils. Supposing that to be so, I ask whether the Opposition expect to get support in the future for 20 years of resolute government? The Union has failed. We have been unable in the past to attract the support of the people of Ireland to that system. This is a paper Constitution, as the Union was, mere dry bones; but we maintain that it has a prospect of life; that it will attract and exercise the energy and capacity of Ireland; that within the four corners of this Bill Irish politics can exist and be active, no longer as a disturbing and adverse element, but filling their proper place, and fulfilling their proper work as a part of the Constitution of these Islands. The Leader of the Opposition admits this problem. He says it is insoluble; but there we differ from him. We differ as to the solution, but that is because we differ as to the nature of the problem. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) believes in the policy of bringing the people of Ireland and the people of England near to one another, a policy which he said Cromwell first conceived. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman takes a long time for its realisation. It has been a long time since Cromwell, and how small the result has been! We have come to the end of our tether with regard to that policy. The late Conservative Government had the best chance of making that policy successful that any British Government ever had. They used British credit so largely as to arouse the susceptibilities—I think unreasonably—of many of the British electors, and they went so far in reducing Irish land rents as to strain the consciences of some Members of the Tory Party. Never was there such a chance of conciliating Ireland to British rule; but it has not led to confidence, gratitude, and content on the part of the Irish people. In bringing forward this Bill, we find the aspiration of the people of Ireland to resume the thread of Irish self-government; to control her daily business; to be free to meet the most pressing of her needs as they arise—not unnatural. Some would have us believe that the cause of all discontent is to be found in the land difficulty. But we do not find that opinion prevailing amongst the Nationalists. Others urge that we have done so much for Ireland that this aspiration after Home Rule is unreasonable and perverse. They point with triumph to Land Acts and other remedies, of our willingness and capacity to treat Ireland justly and generously. But they forget that some of those remedies came too late. They forget, too, the bitter opposition to those remedies which was only overcome by the pressure of accumulated disorder and wretchedness in Ireland. Again, some of our best intentions, such as the Encumbered Estates Act, produced the most disastrous results. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) said last night that for the past 70 years Ireland has had nothing to complain of. But all we have done has shown, not the measure of our readiness and capacity for governing Ireland, so much as the evidence of Ireland's need and of our delay. The lesson of the past is that in the future Ireland will need constant and unremitting attention, and that concentration and sympathy and knowledge in dealing with her affairs which can only be given by a Local Authority. I would ask the House to consider the difference of the problems in Ireland and in this country. In Ireland you have a tenant's problem. Here you have a labour problem. Here we have congestion of towns and depopulation of country districts. In Ireland they have congestion of country districts and stagnation of towns. The initiative for dealing with the problems is left entirely in the hands of this one Parliament. The Unionists grudge the time we are spending on Irish affairs, and say it should be devoted to the consideration of British affairs. What, then, is the situation? If we attend to the wants of Ireland we keep the British electors waiting. If we leave Ireland alone, we are soon distracted by a state of affairs which plunges us into a discussion of controversial and desperate measures, which not only occupies our time, but distracts the House of Commons by friction and Party feeling. We are anxious that that should not be the case in the future as it has been in the past. We maintain that our view of the situation and of the possible relations between the two countries is the more just and reasonable. We therefore think the Bill is wise and prudent. We have faith in it. We admit that the opposition to the Bill was a stern reality. In their enthusiasm our opponents frequently forgot their tactics. They would have us believe that they were overcome solely by a love of Office on this Bench and by time-serving behind it. I say that nothing but a faith on our part real and strong as their own opposition would have enabled us to carry this Bill. I have travelled, I am afraid, only over well-worn ground. I cannot pretend to assume for myself that in the performance of the task allotted to me I have contributed any novelty or new force to the arguments in favour of the Bill. But I am glad of this opportunity to say, speaking as an English Member, and looking to the future of this country, that I give my vote for the Third Reading of the Bill, believing in the good results not only of its passing, but of its future working; in the principles on which it is founded, and in the present application of them; and my conviction that what has taken its place as an article of faith in the Liberal Party will endure in the House of Commons and triumph in the country.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I listened with that interest and attention which is always accorded to the words of the hon. Baronet in defending this Bill. He says he approves of the Bill as it is now presented to the House. How, then, can he have approved of the Bill as introduced? The two Bills are in many points absolutely opposed to each other. I suppose one reason why the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was chosen to speak on this occasion is, perhaps, because in his view, as well as in the view of many others, Ireland will soon become a foreign country. Speaking of Dublin Castle, the hon. Baronet allowed a word to slip from him which rather indicates that that is his view. He referred to Dublin Castle as being alien—

Sir E. Grey

*SIR E. GREY: What I said was that the Board of Dublin Castle had always been an alien Board of foreign officials. The words, however, are not mine. I should not have selected them. They are the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: But the hon. Baronet adopted them; and it is a very curious thing that at the present moment the only alien in Dublin Castle is his colleague the Chief Secretary. To one part of the hon. Baronet's speech I listened with satisfaction. That was where he spoke of the guarantees that existed in the future for the Irish minority. Apparently, we have at last persuaded a certain section of the Radical Party, at all events, that the threatened resistance of Ulster is not a sham and a dream. We have at last persuaded hon. Gentlemen opposite that the stand taken by Ulster has not been idly adopted; that it is, in fact, a fixed and unalterable stand taken up by perhaps the most determined section of Her Majesty's subjects. The hon. Baronet spoke of another guarantee which did not convey to my mind any degree of satisfaction. He spoke of the protection of the Irish minority by Imperial assistance. The hon. Baronet is acquainted with Imperial affairs. I ask him, what suffering minority has this country ever protected? I venture to say that the history of Parliament does not recall one; and, therefore, I gain little from allowing my life, liberty, and property to depend on Imperial assistance. The people of Ulster have never come cringing like cowards for the assistance of the British. We have always said that if Britain will let us we can take care of ourselves. Whether Britain allows this or not we intend to do so should necessity arise. I find fault with the hon. Baronet and his colleagues that they base their belief in the success of Home Rule on sunny prophecies as to the effect the Bill will have on the prejudices and even the hatred of the people of Ireland. These prophecies, however, do not warrant hon. Gentlemen opposite in attempting a fundamental change in the Constitution. The Prime Minister is always ready to talk of the happy future for Ireland should this Bill pass. This always reminds me of the triumph of hope over experience. The Government know that experience is against them. Every right hon. Gentleman opposite knows right well that the experience of past Irish history is directly against the probability that the Home Rule Bill will bring peace, order, and good government to Ireland. The Government, however, found all their anticipations on a sanguine view of the future, though we cannot see that that is any foundation for the hope. The Prime Minister has quoted the experience of foreign countries as to the benefits of Home Rule. But it has always struck me that there is one country and one people which the right hon. Gentleman forgets to mention, and that is the country of England and the English people. The English people are now in the black books of the Prime Minister, and I do not think that recent elections will place them on better terms with the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me to be a most unparalleled condition of affairs that the Parliament of England is asked by the Prime Minister to accept a policy with assurance because other countries approve of it, while the right hon. Gentleman knows his own people condemn it. But it is said that all will be changed in Ireland. The granting of responsibility to the Land League and the priesthood of Ireland will change everything. There is to be a Parliament of reformed Irishmen. Why should they reform? All the experience of the past shows that the more authority and the more power the Nationalist Party possessed the more they used it to tyrannise and grind down all who dared to oppose them. In that Irish Parliament there will be probably two factions fiercely hating each other—the Land League faction, elected by the priests; and the Fenian Party, led by the hon. Member for Waterford, whose policy the Chancellor of the Exchequer described as Fenian Home Rule.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: It is so long since the right hon. Gentleman made a speech about Ireland and Home Rule that he actually forgets his own words. I, however, cannot see any prospect that the Irish Parliament will become in the future other than it was before, representing the most merciless, most tyrannical, and the most oppressive tyranny that ever existed in any civilised country. I can conceive a condition of affairs where, if the Irish people were united and claimed Home Rule with the same united voice as Hungary claimed autonomy, a statesman might say that the only hope for pacifying the country and in seeing it advance would be to grant its request. But is there anything in the condition of the Irish people which would lead any sane man to believe that the granting of autonomy in the case of Ireland will make her a peaceful and happy country? There are two sections in the Irish Party hating each other more than they hated the Loyalists, and that is saying a good deal; a third section will arise which will take the opportunity where it offers to crush the other two. Is there any country so unfit for self-government as Ireland, containing as it does those contending Parties? I venture to say that as one of the outcomes of Home Rule, if we allow the Irish Parliament to settle its differences alone, it will be found that in a short time there will be only one Party. What Party that will be is hard to say, but we all hope to belong to that Party. There appears to be an idea in the mind of the Attorney General that the Ulster people are becoming lukewarm in this fight, and the Prime Minister said that the Irish landlords should keep their eyes open as to the future action of the Ulster tenants. I know the Ulster tenants better than the right hon. Gentleman; and though the Ulster tenants would be glad, naturally enough, to get cheap land, there is one price which they will never pay for the privilege, and that is to place their lives, liberties, and property at the disposal of the men who led the Land League during the last 10 years, supplemented by the action of the Roman Catholic priests. I do not exaggerate in these fears for the future. I will read a very short quotation from a speech made by the hon. Member for Waterford. The hon. Member for Waterford invariably states what he believes to be true, even though it militates against himself. I entirely disapprove of the policy of the hon. Gentleman; but I make that concession to his political conduct. At a meeting in Dublin on August 10 one of the inducements held out by the hon. Member to the meeting to adopt this Bill was that the whole Criminal Law of Ireland would be in the hands of the Irish Parliament, and that it could by a stroke of the pen abolish Grand Juries and elect County Boards. The Ulster farmer does not like the idea of criminal procedure and the powers of legislative enactment being in the hands of his former enemies. I do not believe that Land League Judges, or priestly-elected Judges, as they will be, or Land League prices would give him fair play. I do not say that the Irish Parliament would, if they were allowed, openly persecute their opponents. I believe they would execute the operation in the most legal manner possible. They would simply sweep away one law and enact another, and in the hands of the Irish Parliament the country would be a hot place for the minority. One of the great charms held out for the Home Rule Bill to be supported was that Parliament would get rid of the Irish Members. This was the Chief Secretary's view. Undoubtedly, that was one of the lessons which my right hon. Friend said had induced him to become a Home Ruler. But you are not to get rid of them. You will have 80 Irish gentlemen here, and I invite the Chief Secretary to explain how he reconciles that change of view. We were told that this was to be a final settlement. But where is the finality? It has gone with the retention of the Irish Members. The hon. Member for Mayo said the Bill will settle something. I believe it will. It will finally settle Imperial supremacy, and it will finally settle the Irish minority. There is one thing I cannot understand, and that is the systematic abuse which we hear of England in regard to her dealings towards Ireland in the past. I venture to say that there is no more miserable cant than expressions like these, which are appeals simply to the ignorance of the people, or are made in the belief of the people's ignorance of history, to try to persuade them to press this Bill in order to make reparation for England's disgraceful dealing with Ireland in the past. During the last 50 years the record of England's dealing with Ireland is one of which any great nation might be proud. What is the condition of Ireland now compared with what it was? The people of Ireland are infinitely more prosperous, better fed, and better educated than they were; and, with the aid of British capital, many industries have been established in their midst. One hon. Member has spoken about the ruin which England has brought upon Ireland. The population of Ireland has undoubtedly decreased; but the diminution of population is no test of decreased prosperity. Population has decreased simply because the people, being more educated, have learned that there are more countries besides Ireland in which they can live and thrive. They have gone abroad, and they have thriven there, I am glad to say. Irishmen in America would look upon it as a poor prospect if they had to leave New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia, and live in a congested district in Ireland. The argument as to the decrease of population has, therefore, no bearing whatever on the prosperity or non-prosperity of Ireland. As a matter of fact, the wealth of Ireland is ten times greater now than it was at the Union. I have tried, on behalf of the section of the Irish population which I represent, to show the country that our opposition to Home Rule is an opposition which we will never recall, and I believe the House is beginning to credit it at last. Is there any instance in history of a great country like this being forced by the gag to pass a measure for pulling down its Constitution and for the re-erection of another? I say there is no instance which has any analogy to this monstrous attempt to subvert the Constitution of a country without Debate. But despite the gag, we have been successful, to some extent, in fixing the attention of the country on the iniquities of this Bill. There is one critical point on which the country is now wide awake. That is the 9th clause. You will never be able to convince the English people that it is right to give the Irish not only the right to control their own affairs, but to come here and control the affairs of England. At the present moment there is growing in the country a belief—we have heard echoes of it from the bye-elections—that this Bill is an attack upon England; that you are not only willing to gag England in the House of Commons, but that you are going to enslave her outside, there is no doubt that you will get a very broad, clear, explicit answer from the country when the opportunity arises. There is one other thing we have also shown. We have shown that the safeguards put into this Bill are shams and delusions which are not worth the paper on which they are written. I think we have amply justified the attitude which Ulster has taken. I think the speech of the hon. Baronet is proof of that. He says that in the attitude of Ulster is the best guarantee for the safety of the minority. We have been accused of disloyalty to the Crown. We are not disloyal to the Crown. But we never owed obedience to the power of the majority in Ireland, and we will never acknowledge it. The stand taken by us has been acknowledged in the country, for no sentiment is more applauded by the British people than that expressing the ultimate and irrevocable determination of Ulster. We have shown the British people that there is a strong and determined minority in Ireland that will have to be counted with. Before Home Rule can be shoved down our throats the forces of the Crown must be employed; and there is no case in contemporaneous history where autonomy was forced on a country at the bayonet's point, against the will of the most influential section of the people. It will, no doubt, be said that the very fact that Irish Unionists moved Amendments to this Bill showed that if the Amendments had been adopted we would have become Home Rulers and have adopted the Bill. Nothing could be farther from the truth. We moved Amendments not because we believed the Bill could be made acceptable, but in order to show up the corpse we had been dissecting during the last five months, and I think we have succeeded. We have also shown that we intend to force the Government to go to the country on Home Rule alone. The cry of obstruction has been raised, but the country has given no indication that it approves of that cry. We have shown a determination, and I believe we will be able to defeat any attempt to sandwich Home Rule between other measures of the Newcastle Programme. I have never doubted that the Government would carry their Bill in the House of Commons, knowing from experience something of the character of British Radicals. But it will be beaten in another place; and why? Because in the House of Lords there is not a Catholic majority. It is only because the Government have a Catholic majority here that they have brought in the Home Rule Bill. These things shall be made plain to the country, and we shall do it with this laudable object—that right hon. Gentlemen who have sown the whirlwind shall reap the storm.

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said, that in the course of the Debate the argument had been freely used by the Opposition that there was an absence of independence amongst the occupants of the Benches behind the Government, and that there was no real honest feeling in support of the Home Rule Bill. At all events, the new Members could say that they were not controlled by the powerful incentives which influenced some of the older Members of the House. In the first place, their opinions and judgment were not warped by personal antipathy, nor had they been under the painful necessity of bringing down to the House long selections from old speeches—annotated, expurgated, and often retracted. There were two arguments advanced by the opponents of the Bill which would have no effect in his constituency. One was that the Bill had not been sufficiently discussed in the House; and the other was that it was not understood by the country. He represented an agricultural constituency, composed of clear, common-sense men, and he ventured to say that if any eminent Member of the Liberal Unionist Party were to go down to the agricultural districts of Lincolnshire—for example, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), whose services to the agricultural labourers nobody would attempt to underrate—and advance these two propositions, he would find that, while he got a most respectful hearing, his arguments would not have the effect which he expected. He had found one of the most powerful expositions of the case of the opponents of the Bill in an article which the Leader of the Opposition had written for a popular paper with his usual lucidity and moderation. The right hon. Gentleman there said that the Liberal Party were influenced by two fallacies, which were at the foundation of most of their arguments. One was that they paid by the Home Rule Bill a debt they owed to Ireland for past delinquencies; and the other was the theory that the majority must rule. He did not deny that these were two very powerful motives, so far as he was personally concerned. The fact that large sums of money had been unjustly taken by the landlords from the pockets of the Irish tenants in the shape of rents, and that equally large sums had been appropriated for many years by an alien Church, were powerful reasons why England should in financial concerns deal generously with Ireland. He was not ashamed to admit, also, that he believed in the good old doctrine that the majority must rule. When the Leader of the Opposition challenged that doctrine they were justified in expecting from him some clear and logical exposition as to when the majority must and when they must not rule. Take the Province of Ulster. Protestantism was in the ascendancy there. He supposed that, according to Unionist opinion, there the majority must rule. In the South of Ireland, and in Ireland as a whole, Roman Catholicism was in the ascendancy. There the minority must rule. Again, they were told that an important section of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, embracing the culture, the wealth, and the intelligence of that Church, was against the Bill. In that case, they were told, the minority must rule. Now, apply this same doctrine to the Presbyterian Church. The vast majority of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland was opposed to Home Rule. In that case they were expected to turn the doctrine completely round, and say that the majority must rule. In fact, when they once got away from the principle that the majority must rule they were landed in anarchy, sedition, and disorder. It was said, too, that the Nonconformists of England had turned a deaf ear to what was called the plaintive appeal of their fellow-Protestants in Ireland. He belonged himself to a Nonconformist Body which had 34 candidates in the last General Election, every one of whom was in favour of Home Rule, and he was persuaded that they would not have got 34 men of the Methodist Church to stand up in this country as defenders of the Bill if it were tainted in any degree with religious persecution. He believed the Irish Nonconformists were in earnest, but the danger they feared was not real. Among the Protestant ministers of Ulster who had taken part in the anti-Home Rule campaign was Dr. Nicholas, who had written a pamphlet which had been widely circulated in the English constituencies; and the peculiarity of the pamphlet, as of the speeches made by the ministerial delegates, was that the appeals to English Protestants were based mainly on secular grounds, and not on any alleged intolerance exhibited by Catholics towards Protestants in Ireland. The chief contentions were that Home Rule would send down Bank Stock and Railway Stock, and otherwise affect trade. This was not an appeal by Dr. Nicholas to his fellow-Methodists, but to mere capitalists. They reminded him of a Petition presented by the City of London years ago with regard to the question of the naturalisation of the Jews. The Mayor and Corporation of London came to the Bar of this House and presented a Petition that Jews should not be permitted to be naturalised—first of all, in the interests of religion; secondly, in the interests of the trade and prosperity of the Empire; and, thirdly, in the interests of the City of London in particular. So also in this case there was a large mixture in the appeal to sordid considerations. There was the amplest possible protection in this Bill for every section of Nonconformity in Ireland. He did not know how to account for the extraordinary state of panic into which the Protestants of Ireland seemed to have fallen. There were only 25,000 Methodist members, with possibly 50,000 adherents, in the whole of Ireland, and a great number of those were living in Roman Catholic districts. They had Committees appointed to bring forward any case of persecution, but they had not heard on this side of the Channel of any case of Methodists having been persecuted in districts where they were surrounded by Roman Catholics. No particular religion was established or endowed under the Bill, directly or indirectly; no disability imposed on account of religious belief; no ecclesiastical property could be diverted without the consent of the parties interested; no denominational education, he presumed, in the Training Colleges and elsewhere could be prejudicially affected; and, further, they had the Conscience Clause for the protection of children in the elementary schools. In the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford the other night, which was not a very wisely-worded one, they were told that in legislating for a people there was no such into this Debate with the view of offering any contribution to the discussion as a Debate. He rose to ask the indulgence of the House more on a personal ground in consideration of the somewhat unfortunate, to him almost calamitous, relation which he had now got into with respect to the Third Reading of this Bill. He had the satisfaction of voting for the Second Reading of the Bill, and it was to him a true gratification. He regretted to discover that he should not be able to repeat that satisfaction in connection with the Third Reading; but not from any change that had come over him or from any cause for which he was to blame. He said in all sincerity that it was for him a sorrowful experience to find himself separated from his Party in voting on this Bill, but he declared that it was not his fault; he had not gone away from the Bill and the Party, but the Bill and the Party had gone away from him, and had left him in a predicament. Like Joseph—he referred of course, to the patriarch of that name—he found himself, if he might use a colloquialism, “in a hole,” but it was a hole in which he had been put by his brethren, who had thereupon abandoned him. Since the Second Reading of the Bill a good many things had happened, especially in what was to him a vital part of the Bill—he referred, of course, to the powers conferred upon Irish Members in this House. The Prime Minister, with the support of the Government and the Party, had adopted tactics which seemed to him to be diametrically opposed to his principles, and he was so much attached to his principles that he supposed, owing to some constitutional peculiarity, he was not able to follow his tactics, with the result that he found himself reduced to the position of a political curiosity, being he supposed now, on that point at all events, the only Gladstonian extant.

All his late co-believers thirsting and gone.”

Japhet in Search of a Father, Cælebs in Search of a Wife, were works of fiction that once had a certain vogue; but under the title of Gladstonius in Search of a Leader, or Item in Search of a Chief he could tell a tale of woe, but he would refrain and draw a veil over his feelings. But, besides this change to which he had briefly referred, he found other aspects of the Bill which filled him with regret. As it was originally introduced the Bill was an honest and substantial attempt to bestow self-government upon Ireland, but marred by the, to his mind, regrettable and needless reservations. Against these reservations, as inconsistent with Home Rule and also as being in themselves absurd and vain, if viewed in the light of conciliatory concessions to an absolutely and necessarily irreconcilable Opposition, as being in fact, if he might so say, in the nature of unworthy dodges which were, besides, useless, being a spreading of the net in sight of the bird, he said against these he protested, ineffectually it was true, but as well as the limited opportunity of doing anything enabled him to do. At the same time, he steadily supported the Government in their resistance to the endeavours of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, which he admitted were perfectly natural from their point of view, because though he held their opposition undoubtedly contained sporadic, perhaps more than sporadic elements of destruction in it, yet to a certain extent it arose entirely and distinctly out of their deep, though to his mind erroneous, aversion to the principle of the Bill. As originally introduced, he supported the Government in resisting the efforts of the Opposition to make Home Rule practically as well as theoretically a subordinate dependent, but he found, in respect of its being an independent Home Rule measure, the Bill had come out of Committee worse than when it entered it. Amendments had been made or resisted, postponements and limitations had been introduced or persisted in to such a degree that he found now many of the most practical friends of the Bill describing it as a transitory, experimental, and a partial version of Home Rule. If that be so, if that description be right, then he had to remember that he was sent there to support Home Rule and not half-Home Rule; he was sent here to support virtually a final settlement, and not a mere instalment or scrap instalment of Home Rule. Of course he should be told he was not much hurt by that, because half a loaf was better than no bread; but he demurred to that application of this piece of proverbial philosophy, and in its relation to Home Rule to take a position upon this half-loaf policy which he regarded as one of those articles which were entirely more mischievous than integrated falsehood. Let him ask what was a loaf? A loaf seemed to him to be a homogeneous mass of semi-evaporated dough in which the homogeneity was the emphatic term. Owing to its homogeneity, if they halved the loaf they got something which was worth taking, because, though diminished in quantity, it still possessed all the qualities of the original. But if they tried their maxim upon something that was similarly homogeneous, but an organism, such as a political Constitution like Home Rule was, they would find a defect in its application. Would they say that half a watch was better than no chronometer? It was worse, because it was a burden. Or that half a fiddle was better than no orchestra? It was worse, because it was a nuisance. Or that half a man—whether they bisected him vertically or horizontally—was better than nobody? It was worse, because they would have to bury the moieties, whereas no body would cost them nothing for undertakers' or other fees. And similarly he put the question, was half-Home Rule necessarily better than no autonomy? He thought it was possible, without pushing the analysis too far, to put that proposition in doubt. It might be that in the present case the result of half-Home Rule would be the creation of Irish discontent and cabal in Dublin, with a continuation of the old Irish controversy and intrigue at Westminster. Now, on that point he had rather failed to new follow the action of his hon. Friends from Ireland. He thought that they wanted thorough Home Rule, but he had found them often voting against the most elementary characteristics of what he had considered as Home Rule. He had protested against all the absurd reservations proposed by this Bill upon Irish autonomy, but he had not experienced much sympathy from the Irish Benches. He voted for the complete control of Ireland over its own taxation, but he found Irish Members going into the other Lobby; they would not have self-taxation on any account. He voted for giving the immediate control of the land to Ireland, but he found Irish Members, for the most part, at all events, going into the other Lobby; they would not have their own land at any price. In these circumstances, he was tempted to ask whether Home Rulers really wanted real Home Rule? At all events, he had objected to the use that was being made of this half-granting—this partial postponement of Home Rule. They were told they must keep the Irish Members here for all purposes, because they were keeping so much of their business with them. In passing he would ask, even if that were a sound argument, why for all purposes, why for more than their own purposes? But, leaving that point, he said that that plea was no answer to the like of himself, who objected to Irish rule in British business, because he said that he did not want their land, or their taxation, or their Police, or their Judges to be left here for them to deal with; he wanted them to take away these things with them, and to manage them themselves. He said they were artificially creating a false excuse for perpetuating a wrong, and when they had done the wrong they said it was necessary, and justified by the false excuse they had first artificially created; they did exactly what the street impostors did—that was to say, they got up fainting fits, and then fell down in them in order to lay a basis for brandy, half-a-crown, and a cab home. It was very old, and he thought by this time an exploded strategy, the same as for his Irish friends to vote against the taking away of all their property with them, and then come round and say, "We must stay behind in order to watch our property, and must have complete power over you and yours, in order to do it effectually." He was not able to follow them in this matter at all. His doing them a favour was no ground for their insisting on interfering in every respect with him and his. They insisted on leaving a large part of their farewell luggage in his hall. He said he did not want their luggage to be left there, but if they would insist on leaving it, that gave them no right to sit down upon it, far less to insist upon wandering all over his house and doing whatever they pleased. They might be very thankful he did not throw their luggage out into the street, and, in the meanwhile, he thought they ought to retire in order to make sure of their not losing the train. At the same time, he said, much as he disliked this imperfect aspect of the Bill, in all the circumstances, it was not a consideration that would have prevented him from supporting it, and regarding it as he had still been able to do—if there had been nothing else to find fault with—as a substantial though imperfect assertion of the principle of Home Rule. Then there was another feature which he disliked intensely in the Bill as it now stood, and that was the Second Chamber constituted upon a narrow property qualification. He asked, why did a Liberal Government and a Liberal Party create and sustain a monstrosity like this? Amongst the Amendments which they rescued from the guillotine, why did they not put down one at least that would have placed this Second Chamber suffrage on a rational basis; or, if Ireland demanded this Second Chamber, based on this qualification, of which he saw no evidence, because submission was a very different thing from demand; but still, if she did demand it, why did not the Government cast on Ireland herself the responsibility and the duty of framing, of fabricating, her own Second Chamber to her own mind? He heard great talk among some of his friends on that side of the House of the terrible things that were going to be done when the House of Lords threw out this Bill. For himself, he was anything but a friend to the principle of hereditary legislation, and accordingly he regretted deeply that he thought that this Bill, in the hands of this Government, would prove rather a strengthening than a weakening of the position of the House of Lords. It seemed to him, in present circumstances, a pretty Government and a pretty Party to attack the House of Lords, and a pretty Bill to attack it upon. A Democratic Government that spent a considerable part of its energy in creating and distributing hereditary honours with a special leaning to wealth over worth, a Democratic Party whose most iconoclastic Members were actually tumbling over each other in their steeple-chasing after baronetcies, with the wild whoop of “knighthood take the hindmost,” proposed to attack the House of Lords upon a Bill, one of whose most characteristic clauses created a privileged tribunal of landlords empowered to veto the will of the people. His own belief was that considering the mess into which this Bill had got in this matter as well as in one or two others, when the House of Lords threw out this Bill the country would not go off into paroxysms of grief and rage; some part of it even might laugh, and say—“Serve them right as a Democratic Government and Democratic Party that takes such singular methods of working out Democratic principles.” But even that blot, considerable though it be, in the Bill, would not have made it impossible for him to support it if it had remained what it was at first, a coherent assertion of the principle of self-government. But that the Bill no longer did. By the sudden and absolute sacrifice of the protective sub-sections of the 9th clause—or, as he should say, of the old 9th clause, for he believed it was now in the amended Bill the 10th clause—by the sudden and absolute sacrifice of those protective sub-sections the Government had changed the Bill essentially, and, in his opinion, had converted it into a self-contradictory measure. The Bill now said that self-government was right for Ireland, but it was wrong for Great Britain. It said, and it said rightly, that Irish affairs ought to be managed in Ireland by Irish Representatives to the complete exclusion of non-representative British interlopers, but it also said that British affairs ought not to be managed in Britain by British Representatives without the inclusion of non-representative Irish interlopers, and in that way he said that the Bill was not merely wrong, but he said further it was incoherent and did not hang together, and was inconsistent; it was an attempt to construct a yes-no or black-white proposition, and which, therefore, by the necessity of the case, when they attempted to grasp it, not only repelled assent, but actually transcended the apprehension of a sound understanding. The former opponents but present apologists of this Constitutional heresy attempted to extenuate it as something that was trifling, minor, and secondary, and he had considered, as it was his duty to do, very carefully what they had said on this matter; but he was not able to see it in that light. No one could have put the case more powerfully than the Attorney General did yesterday, but he could not see that he had been successful in upsetting those formidable and preponderating reasons which were assigned by the Prime Minister for proposing the now, as he thought, unwisely and weakly abandoned sub-sections of the 9th clause. At all events, he would say of this change in the Bill that, so far from seeming secondary and minor, it seemed to him to be a vital, a supreme, and a perilous innovation—subversive of the principles of representative Government and pregnant with the possibilities of political disaster; and, until he saw the contrary, he should continue to believe that the country would take the same view. He thought when the Scottish people came to understand that while not one individual of their 72 Members was to have a syllable to say in Irish affairs, which would be all separately transacted by the Irish themselves in Ireland, there were still to be 80 Irish Members here who would have exactly a ninth part more control over Scotch affairs than Scotland would have itself. He said that when once it came to be understood in Scotland that when this Bill became law, if it ever became law, it would then undoubtedly become the interest of Ireland to oppose Scotch Home Rule—[Cries of "No, no!"]—yes, the interest of Ireland to oppose Scotch Home Rule—because that would be the best way of retaining Scotch matters here in order to enable them more effectually to coerce the Scotch vote on Irish affairs—they would be of opinion that this was a very unjust and dangerous proposal. When once they came to understand that, they would be of opinion that that was a very unjust and dangerous proposal. It would be a surprise if the English people took any other view when they came to understand that the Irish presence meant, in practice, the casting vote of Ireland in the mass of English and Scottish concerns. Of course, if at a General Election Scotland and England, with their eyes open, declared that they desired to be ruled by an outside authority, if the cry of "One man one vote, one Irishman two votes" carried the day, then he, for one, would be not, indeed, convinced, but he would be silenced; but until that, to him, inconceivable course, he, for one, would do what one very humble individual could to warn such portions of the constituencies as his voice could come across against the iniquity and the danger with which he believed this Bill was charged. Of course, he was told that he had got his answer, because the Liberal Party as a whole, almost in its entirety, voted for retaining the Irish Members for all purposes. But he desired to ask, Had the Liberal Party, in the vote, the mandate of the constituencies on this point? From his own experience in different parts of the country, he should conclude that if this point had been clearly put to the constituencies at the last Election, they would have declared against the Irish usurpation in British politics. But, putting that aside, he wished to ask whether there were not many Members who voted in the majority upon totally different grounds from that of an eager desire to bring about Irish domination in British matters? He would ask liberty here to introduce a quotation from one who would be recognised as undoubtedly one of the best informed commentators upon the proceedings of this House. He referred to his Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). That hon. Member, like some other Members of the House, was not satisfied with the opportunity of stating his mind from his place in this House, but kept a newspaper to himself for the ventilation of his views, which, from the pardonable belief he had, no doubt, on his part, that it was the true centre of political light—and it certainly was the focus of political and other heat—he courageously called The Sun. As it happened, it was part of his hon. Friend's solar system to present the public with a weekly review of the Debates of the House under the heading of "At the Bar of the House," which, whatever hostile criticism might think of its good feeling, good thinking, or its good taste, or even its good facts, was always, at all events, good copy. The week after the Prime Minister turned his remarkable and unexpected somersault on the 9th clause, by which he voted out his own just and reasonable proposal for retaining the Irish Members only for the common affairs of the Empire, and moved in the very opposite proposal, his hon. Friend darted some sunstrokes from the "Bar of the House" on the proceedings in Parliament, which were to this effect—

"Last week we were down in the very depths of the dumps, when we were certain that last Thursday would see the end of us and the Government of Mr. Gladstone, and, above all, of the Home Rule Bill. We had heard all kinds of tales about the desertions which were going to come from the faddists, from the cranks, and from the half-hearted."

Then the hon. Member gave a list of those persons, in which he was astonished to find his name included. And his hon. Friend went on—

"Well, the great day has come and gone, with the result that the Government is stronger than ever. The malcontents, trimmers, and the disgruntled have done their worst and the Government still stands secure, and indeed is now stronger than ever before, and the voice of the trimmer is soft in the land, and the crank and the faddist have gone back to the dark recesses of their cave."

He (Mr. Wallace) might be allowed to remark that, inasmuch as the opinions he and others advocated were, and he supposed are, the opinions of the Prime Minister and the Government, they thought they found themselves in very good company when they were called disgruntled faddists, and cranks, and trimmers. If they were disgruntled, who was the leading disgruntler? He would say the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). If they were faddists, who was the chief faddist? The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce). If they were cranks, who was the leading crank? The Secretary for Ireland. If they were trimmers, who was the arch trimmer? Why, the Prime Minister. His hon. Friend, however, proceeded to trace the causes of this, and to give an explanation of the happy Party unanimity and unity which he had just signalled. His hon. Friend traced it to a mysterious influence which he called by the monosyllabic name of "Joe."

"To Joe it should in justice be said that the chief honour belongs of having produced this transformation."

To him this was considerably mysterious. "Gee" he knew, and Gehu he knew, but who was Joe? Was it an African potentate? Was it a chemical substance? Was it by any possibility the redoubtable client of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, whom in his absence the right hon. Gentleman so ably represented in this House? In the pre Confucian days he knew there was a Chinese deity called Foo. Was Joe possibly his second cousin?

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: It was the Brummagem idol.

MR. R. WALLACE said, it could not be a Member of this House, for in all the circumstances that would have implied a vulgarity of literary form, of which he knew the hon. Member was perfectly incapable. Accordingly he (Mr. Wallace) dealt with the difficulty in the traditional way of commentators; and having looked it squarely in the face he passed on. The hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) continued—

"The other night, when we were discussing the 'in-and-out' clause, there were a certain number of Liberals, as I have always said, who were a little shaky, and some of them even would have gone the length of voting against the Government; but when they heard Joe and the malevolence of his attack their minds underwent a conversion, and many of them who would have voted against us were able to summon up their courage and Party loyalty so far as to walk out of the House. Whether that is what the voters who elected them intended when they sent them to Parliament is a matter which may be left to their constituents. Not the eloquence of Gladstone, not the subtlety of Balfour, not the stern sense of Party loyalty did half so much good as the malignant tongue of Joe."

Whatever the occult power called Joe might have been, it clearly was not faith in the propriety of Irish control in British affairs, and this was really why he (Mr. Wallace) had taken the liberty of inflicting this long quotation upon the House. Because it showed that, in the opinion of one of the best-informed and competent critics and historians of their proceedings, the majority did by no means consist entirely, or to a large extent, of believers in British subjection to Irish supremacy. According to the hon. Member, it was due to entirely other causes. The Member for the Dumfries Burghs (Mr. Reid) had told them that he knew 15 or 20 who were believers in the principles of the Prime Minister and of the Government; and from his (Mr. Wallace's) own ordinary channels he gathered indications that in this majority there were a very considerable number who had an aversion to Irish intrusion in British matters, but who voted as they did for the purpose of what seemed to them the right purpose—of avoiding the discredit and the danger of Government defeat. He himself held that the very worst Liberal Government must be better for the country than the very best Tory Government; and if a Liberal Government announced that it was going to make a certain vote a Vote of Confidence or of No Confidence, he could conceive himself, while nominally voting in apparent support of a measure which gave him the greatest dissatisfaction, making an avowed protest against the measure on its merits, and declaring that his votes were not given in support of it, but for the totally different purpose of preventing a Tory Government from coming into power. Accordingly, so far as this particular majority vote upon which so much stress was laid was a vote given merely to keep the Government in Office, he declined to regard it as any indication of the opinion of the country that Irish rule of Great Britain ought to be one of the conditions and parts of Home Rule. The Prime Minister had said that the House was master. No doubt; but the House had a master, and that was the country. The verdict of this higher master he awaited at the General Election. Hitherto he had not heard that the country had welcomed the proposal of Irish usurpation with any very great signs of enthusiasm and cordiality. He noticed that the Chief Secretary at Newcastle and the Home Secretary in Northamptonshire last night gave this aspect of Home Rule, and, indeed, most of the aspects of Home Rule, a very wide berth, and very prudently confined themselves to copious and, he should not say, undeserved abuse of the plaintiff's attorney. Since the brief and inadequate Debate upon the protective sub-sections of the 9th clause he had studied all that had been said in defence of the form that the Bill had now assumed by his friends on the Government side of the House with the honest desire of being converted by it, if possible, and brought into line with the voting of his Party, but he was bound to say he had not been so successful as he could have desired. He applied his mind, of course, naturally, first of all to the Prime Minister's Midlothian letter. He had there expected to find the highest authority upon a matter such as this. In his recent speech the right hon. Gentleman had said nothing with which he (Mr. Wallace) could not cordially coincide, and, therefore, he had no trouble in applying his mind to the letter. He had made that application of his mind in the reverential frame of spirit in which he always regarded deliverances from such a quarter, but he must acknowledge that it did not seem to him to be one of the most successful of the right hon. Gentleman's performances. It presented itself as an artless account of how the right hon. Gentleman came to turn the Bill round to precisely the opposite of what had been originally introduced, and of why it was that he was now the more or less ardent opponent of what, after all the pros and cons, he had decided and still thought to be the right course on the merits of this question. He said he had deferred to the opinion of the House and the Party which he had ascertained, not as in his simplicity he would have expected the right hon. Gentleman would have done, in the formal Debate and deliberate pronouncement of the House upon the matter, but by private inquiry, as was done in connection with divorce cases and the like. Through his private inquiry agency he ascertained that the real majority of the Party thought he and the Government were right in this matter. Again, in his simplicity, he (Mr. Wallace) should have supposed that if the right hon. Gentleman had convened his Party, and had urged on them to take the right course, he would have persuaded them to follow it; and he could not help thinking it was a very great misfortune indeed that the finest head in this Assembly should have been put to no better use than counting the noses of duller men. But the right hon. Gentleman thought he could not carry his own view; and as, apparently, he must carry something, he determined to carry the opposite view; and carry it he did. In declaring the "in-and-out clause" unworkable the Party did not act with that servility which was sometimes attributed to them; but, in his opinion, a high-handed and unreasonable masterfulness commended them. The famous "Herod" illustration was perfectly inapposite in this case. On the subject of the "in-and-out" clause the items did not say—"It is the voice of a god, and not the voice of a man." They said something very different. They practically said—"It is the voice of a botcher, and not of a master." Of the "in-and-out clause," which he himself regarded as a just and rational proposal that might have worked well if it got a chance, they went about saying, "In-and-out, Ho, ho! Out-and-in, He, he!" and this harmless chuckling proved too much for the solemnity of the Liberal Party, and then the

Liberal Party proved too much for its Leader, and that was how the great change actually came about. Regarded as political coachmanship, he must say he thought it was coachmanship extraordinary. The coach was being driven slowly but surely uphill. The most experienced and the wariest driver upon the road was upon the box. All seemed to be going well, and it was merely a question of time to reach the summit. But the guard—a new guard—came forward, and said he understood the horses did not like the up road, and wanted to turn and go down. Strangely enough, the champion driver, instead of saying, “I know better than that,” merely remarked, “Is that so?” He turned the team round, gave them their heads, and off they ran, with the result that the whole cavalcade must be turned into the nearest available potato field in order to insure a halt, although it should cost a spill. “The country,” said the right hon. Gentleman, “will be of opinion that in the actual circumstances of the case we judged aright.” No doubt, if they were put to it, an overturn was better than a smash. But let them hope that when the Home Rule coach, after the necessary repairs—and they must be considerably extensive repairs—was next put upon the road, it would be the driver and not the horses that would settle the course. At the same time, he (Mr. Wallace) was bound to admit that, having made up his mind to revolutionise the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman executed the operation with perfect nerve and consummate address. Although himself one of the credulous victims who had to be sacrificed in the matter, he could still admire the style of his immolation. Never should he forget that Wednesday afternoon seven weeks ago, when in the quietest manner possible, just as if he were going to do nothing in particular, at the last moment and without one word of warning to those who had put faith in the sagacity of his proposals—proposals which he had declared to be demanded by a dangerous political intrigue which he had described as more than he and his Colleagues had been able to face, proposals which he further stated to be the best plan that he and they, after much labour, had been able to fashion, and which had been for months before the country stamped with his own and the country's imprimatur—the right hon. Gentleman, in a few hours, without calling for the vote of condemnation on them which he himself had invited, before the country had an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion, or even of apprehending what he was doing, and in the teeth of his own express declaration that he could not propose any alteration in the clause, took up the proposals, and, in the very eyes of the House, who still valued them, not only for their sakes but for his own, threw them straight and clean overboard—

Whatever might be thought of the performance in other respects, it was inimitably done. He did not think that dexterity of transaction had yet been properly understood or appreciated in the country. To his mind, it was one of the ablest things of the kind ever done in any Parliamentary arena. In France their lively neighbours would have recognised its merits; they would have raised it to the dignity of a coup d'état, and have handed down its author to immortality as the man of the Twelfth of July. He said, in language of the most unaffected admiration, that all the smartest men of ancient and modern times—Ulysses and Simon—Jeremy Diddler and Sam Slick—the Artful Dodger—the Patriarch Jacob, and the heathen Chinese—all found their special exploits eclipsed, while at the same time redeemed and rehabilitated, by this marvellous tour de finesse. Although occupying the position of a yokel at a country fair, deluded by the clever gentleman from London living upon his wits, he was still glad to have participated in any capacity in this brilliant performance. He once knew a man, not personally, but by reputation, whose boast it was to his dying day that, under memorable circumstances, he had been kicked by George IV. He would always regard it as a distinction of a kind that during a large portion of the history of the Bill he was illusionised, no doubt for his own and his country's good, but surely by the deftest manipulator who ever for lofty purposes practised the art and mystery of political prestidigitation. The Prime Minister, in his Midlothian letter, did not condemn upon their merits the policies either of total exclusion or retention with limited powers. He did not say, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that the "in-and-out" clause was unworkable. He could not say that. He was careful to say that many Members were of that opinion, leaving for himself the reflection that, just as "a book's a book, although there's nothing in't," many Members might also be Members possibly upon the same footing. What the Prime Minister said on behalf of the policy of Irish intrusion into British affairs rested upon half-a-dozen distinct predictions, the general effect of which was that notwithstanding what had been said of dangerous and wholesale political intrigue, these persons might not, after all, do the damage some people expected. But even if that were so, it would be of little consolation to him. If a stranger was in his house against his will, he should not be comforted by being told that the stranger would probably not break the furniture or empty the larder. There would be no saying what he might come to do if he got hungry, or if he became angry. At any rate, however harmless, the stranger would be out of place. He would be a trespasser. His very presence would be an annoyance and a burden, which he (Mr. Wallace) would do his best to get rid of. When he tried to think of Home Rule actually at work as proposed in the Bill, with 80 exotic gentlemen from Ireland in the House, with no representative character any longer for British interests, and with no interest in British affairs, and when he thought of them forcing their interference, he thought the whole thing would come to be found to be an intolerable irritation, burden, and nuisance. The Prime Minister said that the Irish Members would be fewer than they were now. Still they would be as numerous as they had any right to be. The transition from 103 to 80 was not the great concession it was represented to be. The transition from wrong to right was in no way a concession, and the Prime Minister had put forward 80 Members as a just and equitable quota of representation for Ireland. Their plea on that head was really the plea of the knavish attorney who, having had an over-charge of 25 per cent., struck off his extortionate bill of costs, wanted to pass it off as a generous 20 per cent. discount. They never could cancel one fraud by a second. Eighty Irish Members were not only numerous enough for justice, but for mischief. The Prime Minister's second prediction was that when Home Rule had been carried the Irish Members would be more busied with their own affairs, and would not trouble the Imperial Parliament. Yes; but just as if to blast the hope which was rising in some quarters, the Bill made a special feature of creating a special representation of Ireland, the Members of which were to come to the Imperial Parliament and find some employment for themselves. Everyone knew what that representation would be. It would consist of London Irishmen, voting under telegraphic orders from Dublin. Although it was a far cry to Cork and Tipperary, even the most otiose of Irishmen could easily come from Highgate or Brixton whenever he was wanted, and more particularly when he was not wanted. The third prediction was that the natural restraints of good feeling and goodwill could not but check meddlesome and undue intervention. He must say that in times like these, when the business of Parliament could not be made to move at all unless the majority used the persuasion of the gag, it appeared to him that that prediction possessed all the beauty, but all the futility, of childlike innocence. It might have done very well for the Garden of Eden during the supra-lapsarian history of that institution, but he did not think it was well fitted to a fighting and fin de siècle House of Commons. The practical politician, whether English or Scotch, was generally a hard and a worldly person, and he would feel that good feeling and goodwill was not likely to act as a powerful Parliamentary protection against an Irish Member securing all his own, and certainly in some cases all other people's. Then the fourth prediction of the right hon. Gentleman was that after Home Rule was granted the Irish Party would in all likelihood be returned in greater variety of sections, which would balance each other. But his (Mr. Wallace's) second sight informed him that it was far more likely they would be a solid Irish majority in that House, whose object it would be to support that solid Irish majority across the Channel, and to aid that majority to get rid of the Imperial veto, to ameliorate the conditions of Irish finance, to break down the absurd restriction upon Irish autonomy contained in the Bill, and to leave the Irish Legislature free to deal as they chose with education and with religious endowments. In these matters the Irish Representatives would act, and be obliged to act, as one man. Then, the fifth of these predictions was that, after all, they would not have the same motive for direct intervention as in 1885, and, as hon. Members opposite would add, in 1886, when the Home Rule Question, which happily Parliament was now seeking to dispose of, was all in all to them. His clairvoyant faculties, however, seemed to show him that the motive of the Irish Members would be substantially the same in the future as it had been in the past, though the direction and aim might be different. For Ireland having obtained independence, their great work would be to retain and, if possible, to extend it. Intervention in British interests would be their natural and most effective weapon in the second stage just as it was in the first. Then the sixth and last of the Prime Minister's predictions was that a repetition of what they had suffered under the present system on Ministerial crises, and that almost certainly with mitigated features, would be the worst that could happen. Was that not enough? The right hon. Gentleman said, lightly, that the worst that could happen would be the occasional destruction of the Liberal Party. To an earnest and anxious Liberal that seemed but very cold comfort. This would be brought about, said the right hon. Gentleman, by dangerous wholesale political intrigue, but the right hon. Gentleman's rhetoric seemed only the thumping of the big drum for lack of better music. When was it the right hon. Gentleman told them this wholesale and dangerous political intrigue was likely to occur when some vital British measure was before the House? But was that a rare occurrence, was it not rather so common as to be actually habitual? As to the 500 British politicians in the House who "never, never would be slaves," the difficulty was that, in present circumstances, the 500 British Representatives were usually divided in the proportion of 260 against 240; and, therefore, it was unlikely that they would combine for the purpose of preventing one or other of the Parties from obtaining a majority by the assistance of the Irish Members. He trusted that, having gone through with the care and respect due to what the Prime Minister had said in defence of the changes in the Bill, and having found them unsatisfactory, he (Mr. Wallace) was freed from the responsibility of considering what others might have said. He had addressed the House mainly for the purpose of explaining and defending the somewhat painful and difficult position in which he found himself placed. He regretted extremely that the Government should have decided to pass the Bill in its present form. He thought the Government might have made some compromise, at all events, in the way of numbers, rather than have pushed that point to the extreme. It seemed to him that both Parties in this House had got into a position of extremity. The Unionists thought nothing too evil could be said of Ireland and the Irish. The Tory Party, on the one hand, would not trust the Irish Members with the portage of a parcel or the expenditure of a sixpence; while, on the other hand, the Prime Minister and the Government seemed to have got into the opposite frame of mind, and thought nothing was too good for Ireland and the Irish; that they ought to be trusted, not only in true positions, but in false positions, and that they ought to have the management, not only of their own business, but of the business of everybody else as well. For a moderate politician like himself to be placed between these two cross fires was to realise all the disadvantages of that proverbial position which is bounded on the one side by the deep sea. Surely in this matter the truth lay somewhere in the middle between the Hibernia-phobia of Birmingham and the Hibernia-mania of Downing Street; and he would appeal to the Government, even at the eleventh hour, whether it would not be possible to work back, and work the country back, to some of the earlier solutions of the difficulties in which, if he was not mistaken, some of them maintained unshaken confidence? The Government having marred their measure, his chief regret, when the House of Lords should throw it out, would be that an opportunity would have been lost of aiming a great blow at the hostile power of the hereditary Chamber. This Bill would not, in his view, be the final form in which Home Rule would be conceded, and he would live in the hope that the failure of this Bill would lead to some other proposal founded upon those considerations of reason and justice, which had been the weapons which had won for the Liberal Party all its triumphs in the past, and without which, or against which, it would gain no victories in the future.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he did not rise because of the personal allusions which the hon. Member who had just down had good-humouredly made to himself. At the same time, he felt bound to thank the hon. Member for supplying the journal with which he (Mr. O'Connor) was connected with gratuitous advertisement which otherwise would cost a great deal of money. But he had risen to say a few words only as to the retention of the Irish Members. He thought the hon. Member had, no doubt unintentionally, misunderstood and misrepresented the final form of the Bill in regard to the retention of Irish Members. It was perfectly plain that if the Government had proposed the exclusion of those Members they would have been attacked with equal violence by both the Unionist and Tory Members, and a great many of their own supporters would have been obliged to withdraw support from them. The hon. and learned Gentleman the late Solicitor General, at an earlier period of these Debates, had alluded to some remarks which he (Mr. O'Connor) had made on this subject in 1886. Well, he had no hesitation in saying that the views which he had expressed on this subject in 1886 had been considerably modified by the events which had intervened. Since then the Liberal electors had declared that they would not regard any Home Rule Bill as satisfactory which excluded any part of the Kingdom from representation in the Imperial Parliament. In the face of that generous confidence and expressed wish of the English people, it would be foolish for the Irish Members to raise any objection to their retention in that House. This point had been settled far more by English than by Irish opinion. The Irish Members were willing to accept any settlement that seemed good to the English mind or to English opinion; and even yet, if the settlement arrived at seemed to be unsatisfactory, the Irish Members would be ready to have the question reconsidered. The hon. Member who last spoke had raised a number of bugbears, and he (Mr. O'Connor) was at a loss to know what was the object of the hon. Member's speech. He had applied a number of epithets to the Prime Minister. He had called him a Jeremy Diddler, an Artful Dodger, a Sam Slick, a Simon, a Jacob, and had used many other expressions culled from his ecclesiastical, his journalistic, and legal experience. But he (Mr. O'Connor) failed to see what the object of the hon. Member's speech was, unless it was the wish of the hon. Member that the Bill of the Government should be destroyed. Was that his wish; if not, what did he mean? Look at the dangers he had conjured up. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Irish Members would be 80 strong. But did he think that all would be of the same opinion? Would the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) and the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) be found always acting together? If an attempt was made to denominationalise education in Ireland, or to endow a Church which, in the opinion of the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston), was the origin of most of the evils of the world, would the hon. Member for North Kerry and that hon. Member be found in the same Lobby? His hon. and learned Friend was a splendid metaphysician, and had been a good journalist, but he was a bad politician. In his (Mr. O'Connor's) opinion Parties would remain much as they were, and much as if there were no Irish Members. As to the sending of London Irishmen to the Imperial Parliament, he did not believe in it. Ireland would be foolish to send here a lower or meaner class of Representatives than she sent to College Green, and she would send to London men having their roots in the soil of Ireland. These men would only come when an Irish question or an Imperial question was under discussion, and was their right to do that denied? In practice the in-and-out plan would be followed in a better form than the scheme originally proposed by the Government. As to interference by the Irish Members with English, Scotch, or Welsh business, he would give a warning to his brethren from Ireland, though he did not believe it to be required. It was perfectly plain that they could only be there occasionally when an Irish Bill was under discussion. If they interfered to defeat a Welsh Bill which was desired by the Welsh people, a Scotch Bill which was desired by the Scotch people, or an English Bill desired by the English people, they would soon have forced on Ireland a Bill which was not desired by the Irish people. He would conclude by hailing the Bill as a generous and great act of emancipation to the Irish people at home and abroad, for which he thanked the Government and the English people.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I am far from complaining of the two preceding speakers in that they confined their remarks to one clause in this Bill, because probably there is not a man in this House who conceals from himself the fact that when this controversy is reviewed in the country before different audiences, and before a final tribunal, the clause which was 9, and is now 10, will probably occupy a large amount of the attention of the orators and the audiences on those occasions. But I should like to remark that the two hon. Gentlemen have not altogether in this respect followed the example of the Front Bench. The Third Reading stage of the measure has, up to the present time, been considered to be that stage of a measure in which the House, looking back over its labours on the First and Second Reading in Committee and on Report, finally pronounced whether the result of its labours be good or be bad. We are not in that position. We cannot look back as to a Bill discussed in Committee and discussed on Report, because, for reasons familiar to the House, and on which I do not mean to dwell at length, we have never discussed three-fourths of the Bill either in Committee or on Report, and what is the result of that? The result is that this is not a Third Reading discussion at all. It is a Second Reading discussion—a First or Second Reading discussion, for the most part seasoned with criticisms and invectives against those who have ventured to offer reasons why this or that clause should be rejected, and why, if not rejected, it should be amended. I do not know that the House has wasted its time wholly in venturing to criticise the Bill and engaging in these long Debates. The Prime Minister and the Attorney General and the hon. Baronet who made so interesting a contribution to our Debate to-night, as well as the Home Secretary, who yesterday spoke in another place, have spent their time in explaining or endeavouring to persuade the country that if the liberties of Parliament have been interfered with—if debate has been curtailed—the fault rests with gentlemen on this side. They urge that we, and we alone, are responsible for the fate which has overtaken us; and yet when I listened to the speech of the Attorney General, which was devoted to this interesting and fertile theme, I arrived at the conclusion that we had not devoted enough time to Clause 5 and Clause 10 to satisfy the wishes of those who have charge of the Bill. For how did the learned Gentleman spend most of his time? The hon. and learned Gentleman spent most of his time in delivering on the Third Reading fragments of speeches which he himself admitted would have been appropriate to the Committee stage or to the Report stage, but he had not delivered them for fear of wasting the time of the House. I do not mean to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman, because his arguments have already been completely exposed; but the impression produced by his speech upon my mind was that the Government themselves had suffered more acutely by the gag than any gentleman sitting on this side of the House. The gravamen of the Government charge rested upon certain statistics which they presented with regard to the length of time taken up on this Bill. The extraordinary uniformity of example brought forward, first by the Chief Secretary at Newcastle, then by the Prime Minister, then by the Home Secretary at Althorp, then by the Attorney General, and to-night by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, shows that all the statistics emanated from a common source; that they have been got up by some diligent private secretary, circulated among the Members of the Government, and freely used as material and padding for the speeches which they have delivered. The favourite example of a measure which ought to have taken longer is the Reform Act of 1832. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has ever read that Act? but there are literally only two principles involved in it, one the principle of substituting genuine constituencies for what were known as rotten boroughs, and the other the settling of the franchise upon which the new electorate were to vote. The whole mass of that long Bill was occupied solely with discussing whether this borough should have one Member or two Members, whether the boundaries should be settled in this manner or in that, how constituency representation was to be divided; and there was not in that Act questions of principle which were contained in more than one or two clauses. One clause and one appendix in this Bill contained both these questions. On Clause 6 of the Bill you not only had to determine—or you would have had to determine if you had taken the trouble to discuss it—not merely the question whether there should be two Chambers, not merely the question of the Constitutional relations of those Chambers, but what the franchise for the electorate was to be; and in the appendix you had questions which, though they did not apply to an area as large as Great Britain, involved questions not less important, not less vital to the interests of the populations concerned. Grattan's Parliament was mentioned by the hon. Baronet (Sir E. Grey) and other speakers, who said that it was established in two days. Under what circumstances was Grattan's Parliament established? Grattan's Parliament was established when England was at the lowest depths of her fortune, and when the English Ministry felt they had no choice but to surrender to the Irish demand. I can well believe that it only took two days to run away, and I think it not impossible if this Bill or any Bill like it becomes law, and if England again finds herself involved in great foreign complications and warlike difficulties, that it may happen that Ireland will again make demands upon the British Administration, and that the British Administration may again run away, and that it will only take them two days to do it. But we are not legislating in a panic. We are not now—or do not profess, at all events now—to be making a Bill the insufficiency of which is to be exposed, as was the insufficiency of the Act of 1782, in the course of a few years. We profess to be making a Bill which in its main outlines and in its fundamental provisions is to last through many generations and to be a law to us and to our descendants for ever. These are circumstances, if circumstances ever could exist, in which the full discussion by this House of every detail was required, in order that we, at all events, should be bound by the agreement to which we came with the Irish Parliament, and in order that some moral obligation would rest upon us to carry out the treaty which this Bill, were it to become law, would establish between England and Ireland, now no longer one United Kingdom. Before I part from the question of comparative statistics I should like to refer to the interesting and able speech made by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. E. J. C. Morton), to whom I listened with great pleasure, and who, I am sure, will be an ornament in our Debates. He went more than almost anybody else into the question of the period taken in the discussion of different measures. He gave a long list of Bills, including the North America Act, all of which he said could be pressed into the 83 days which were taken by an obstructive Opposition over this measure. I have two observations to make: The first is, that it is wholly absurd to compare the procedure of this Democratic Parliament in 1893 with the same Parliament 100 years ago. If we are so much a superior Assembly to our forefathers, three or four generations ago, undoubtedly one result of the great changes which have taken place in the political life of England since they lived has been in the direction of an increased participation in our Debates from all sides and all quarters of the House. There was a time when the whole business of Debate was carried on by a number of gentlemen whom you could enumerate upon the fingers of your two hands. Practically, the whole Business of the Government was carried on by three gentlemen, and the whole business of the Opposition by three more, with a certain admixture of independent Members. That way of carrying on

Debate is wholly impossible under modern conditions, and, therefore, it is absolutely ludicrous for anyone with the slightest perception of historical perspective, with the slightest power of projecting himself into the life of the past, to institute these statistical comparisons between the time it took to discuss a great question in 1793 and the time it took to discuss a similar question in 1893.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON: The Act to which I referred, and to which the right hon. Gentleman has himself referred, is only 26 years old. It only took two days to pass.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. That Act was wholly uncontroversial. I mean, as a matter of fact, it was uncontroversial; there was nobody who differed from it. My criticisms against the hon. Gentleman were not directed to that final sentence in that part of his speech in which he dragged in the Canada Act. They referred to the whole of his interesting statistics. I have not misrepresented him or the Prime Minister when I say they dragged into this controversy a Debate which took place under Parliamentary conditions absolutely different from those under which we live and with which all fair comparison is impossible. Why did not the hon. Gentleman deal with Bills opposed by gentlemen with whom he sits, who were elected under the same franchise to that under which we were elected, and who fought Bills under the same conditions under which we fight them? I will remind him of two Bills, one very small but very controversial; the other more or less complex, but not controversial. They were the Crimes Act of 1887 and the Land Act of 1891. I was myself in charge of both these Bills. I had to do my best to pass them, though I have a very lively recollection of the sort of opposition they encountered. The Crimes Act of 1887, which, as we all know, was closed, took before it was closed 41 days. Every principle, speaking broadly, of that measure had been discussed and approved and sanctioned by Parliament on previous occasions. Most of the clauses were copied verbatim from the legislative efforts of the present Prime Minister. I do not wish to overstate the case, and I will not say there was nothing new in the Bill. There was. But, broadly speaking, the Bill was framed on familiar lines and copied from familiar models, and had been discussed and dealt with in this House over and over again. As for the second Bill, it was not a controversial Bill at all. It took two days on the Second Reading. I do not believe there was a Division on the Second Reading; and the Irish Members, who naturally and properly took the great part in discussing it, themselves would have been bitterly disappointed had that Bill not ultimately become law. It will be observed, therefore, that these two Bills, taken together, were fought under far more favourable circumstances, so far as Parliamentary time is concerned, than the Bill we are now dealing with—a Bill new in its provisions, with unheard-of details, involving every kind of principle, dealing with every sort of interest and every class in England, Ireland, and Scotland. I do not think it will be denied—I do not think it can be denied—that these two Bills together—the one, I say, brief but controversial, the other uncontroversial, although undoubtedly complex—together do not equal the sum of legitimate controversy which this Bill arouses. Who can maintain that these two Bills—and I can assuredly add many others to them—are equal in the bulk, scope, and importance of the issues they raised to the vast measure now being thrust through an unwilling Assembly? I do not think anybody will maintain it. These Bills together took within two days of as long as the Bill we are now discussing, and I recommend the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. E. J. C. Morton) not to go back to ancient history, not even to go back 25 years, but to consider the Parliamentary performances of his friends and allies. I do not ask him to read the Debates; I do not ask him to see which is the most relevant and most important, in which there was the least unnecessary expenditure of Parliamentary time; but I merely ask him to go to the proved evidence of figures, and I am sure he will agree that, whatever may be the performances of the present Opposition, they pale before the performances of the Opposition which preceded; and that we, at all events, can feel that if the dignity of the House is to be raised by honest, relevant, and earnest discussion of the details of a Bill we have done something to raise Opposition criticism from that slough in which it was left by gentlemen opposite. There is but one other point in connection with the conduct of the Opposition to which I wish to refer. The Chief Secretary was good enough at Newcastle on Saturday to quote a sentence of mine in regard to the attitude of the Opposition on this Bill, and to quote it as an adequate ground for the interference with the liberty of Debate in which this Government have so lavishly and with so much satisfaction to themselves appeared at times to indulge. What was that sentence? I said that our intention was to improve the Bill and, if possible, also to destroy it. That is the substance of what the right hon. Gentleman quoted with perfect accuracy. Is there anybody who objects to that proceeding? Our duty in Committee is to improve all Bills, and our duty at any stage of the discussion is to destroy Bills of which we disapprove. It is mere cant to say we are to come down to this House and in Committee to discuss the details of measures which we think destructive of the greatness of the Empire merely with a view of improving them, and to exclude from our minds, to throw away as an accursed thing, the very thought and project of, if we can, destroying them in the process. If the Chief Secretary thinks that wrong, I would ask him what his views are as to the course he took upon, let us say, the Crimes Act, I presume for the purpose of improving it? Would he have thought it consistent with his duty to omit any opportunity of destroying that Bill in its passage through the House?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: You would have destroyed it.

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course he would have destroyed it. Every Opposition dealing with a Bill of which it disapproves in its essential and immutable principles is bound by the same policy, which I have the courage openly to avow, which the right hon. Gentleman apparently does not disavow across the Table of the House, which, nevertheless, he apparently thought it consistent with the respect due to the intelligent electorate who sent him here to use as a justification for the interference with our liberties and their liberties which he and his friends have perpetrated. I think I have said enough now upon what I am bound to say under ordinary circumstances would hardly be relevant; but as such matter has filled the whole of the speeches of gentlemen on the Front Ministerial Bench, I thought I could not pass it altogether without some comment and some reply. I pass to the Bill. I do not mean at this time of night to review in detail the many defects, and worse than defects, which, as we think, attach to the measure. The Prime Minister, in his opening address on the Third Reading, enumerated seven points which we had urged, and which, he said, if they were true were conclusive, or almost conclusive, against the Home Rule Bill of which he was in charge. I think the enumeration of the Prime Minister was an admirable enumeration. I think every man would be well-advised if when he has to fight this question in his constituency he was to placard the seven deadly sins of Home Rule on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman. But I shall not repeat the proofs which the Opposition have given that these deadly sins really are incident to Home Rule. I shall confine myself to a much briefer area of discussion, and I would ask this question: What exactly is the gain to Ireland which you think this Bill will introduce? Gentlemen below the Gangway in their speeches always hold out to us the prospect that when they come into power with an adequate financial sum at their command—which they do not think at present they have—they are going to regenerate Ireland materially. The whole condition of the people is to be raised. Emigration is to cease, because Irishmen will find employment at home; poverty is to be arrested, agriculture is to be promoted, industries are to be fostered, and if all their prophecies are to come to pass, there are few nations in this world likely to be so blest as the new Ireland under the new Irish Government. But I confess that, looking back now over the whole 14 years in which I have been a Member of this House, and in which Members below the Gangway have arrogated to themselves the exclusive representation of Irish interests, I have seen a wonderful display of Parliamentary ability, perseverance, tact, and eloquence; but I have never seen or heard, anxiously as I have looked for it and listened for it, the slightest sign that any single one of those gentlemen has at his disposal a plan of dealing with Ireland which would commend itself to any economist, to any statesman, to any man of moderately large views. I have heard attacks on landlords; I have heard them attack Castle officials; I have heard them deal destructive criticism against every action of the Irish Government, but never yet have I heard from them a single proposal likely to be of permanent ameliorative effect upon the long-standing ills and troubles of the country which they aspire to rule. Now that is a challenge I throw down, and I hope it will be taken up by the Chief Secretary opposite. I do not count such expedients as the Evicted Tenants' Restitution Bill. I say that, outside the facile policy of spoliating landlords, I have not seen or heard from any one of those gentlemen any large or well-conceived plan by which the great mass of their countrymen might be elevated in the social sphere. If such a plan had ever been propounded by them, if any such plan had come from gentlemen below the Gangway, I say, without a moment's hesitation, that, whatever Party had been in Office, that plan would have been eagerly grasped at by every British statesman.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): You have always refused it. The late Mr. Parnell introduced a Light Railways Bill, and you refused it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Speaker, I shall modify the statement I have made. I go this length: that over and over again attempts have been made, crude and impossible, upon the purse of the British taxpayer, and in that sense gentlemen have always been ready to bring English money into Irish pockets. I am talking of a well-considered scheme, and I say boldly no such well-considered scheme, so far as I am aware, has ever been propounded by gentlemen below the Gangway, and such schemes as have been propounded could never have been carried out by Irish resources, and Irish resources alone. Before I pass from that let me say a word with regard to the attacks made upon what is called the centralisation of Castle government by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir E. Grey), who, much as I believe he knows of Irish questions, knows very little of Irish Government. He has no need to know of it, and the attacks of the Attorney General, who ought to know something—attacks unworthy of gentlemen of their position, and which should have been left to third-rate politicians, who perambulate Ireland and who take at second-hand old wives' fables which, in my opinion, ought not to be used in this House by responsible politicians. Well, what is the centralisation of Castle government? Do the gentlemen who appeared to approve of the remarks about the centralisation of Castle government know anything about it? The police in Ireland are centralised, and, in my opinion, ought to be centralised. But, apart from the police, what is called Castle government answers, Department for Department, to the various offices which you preside over in Whitehall. Local government is not more centralised in Ireland than in England. The Board of Works is not more centralised. It is quite true that as yet there is no county government in Ireland on a representative basis. [Laughter.] Yes; but that does not make the government of Ireland centralised because, although the county government which does exist in Ireland is not popular, it does not depend upon the Castle. That is familiar to everybody who knows anything about Ireland. At this moment this Castle government, which you choose to denounce, is carried on by members of your own Civil Service elected in the same way as every member of the Civil Service is elected, and is modelled upon the same principles as the Civil Service of England and Scotland. I do not say that there are not minor differences; but this I do say: that to describe government in Ireland as centralised, and in England as not, shows great ignorance of the facts. I think even gentlemen opposite will be disposed to grant that we cannot expect from Home Rule the material advantages to Ireland which were so lavishly promised by Members below the Gangway. Still, they will say that Ireland is governed as much by ideas as by material facts, and that it is better that Ireland should be governed by her own ideas and live in poverty than that she should be governed by us and live in wealth. I am the last man in this House to under-rate the value of ideas. I agree with those who think that these are things which cannot be ignored, but I do not agree with the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when he says that experience and history have shown that it is impossible for us under the Union to govern Ireland in a manner which will meet all the aspirations of that nation. The hon. Baronet, however, under-rates the magnitude of the task he has undertaken. He himself belongs to the school of politicians who talk of seven centuries of misgovernment by England. I take it from them that for the six centuries before the Union Ireland was brutally tyrannised over by England. If so, how can you cure in 93 years woes of such long standing? I do not talk of our intentions. Everybody admits they are good. ["No!"] Everyone but the hon. Gentleman who says "No." I ask not whether the intentions were good, but whether they have borne fruit, and I think any man who chooses to examine with impartial eyes any contemporary account of the condition of the peasantry of Ireland in the beginning, middle, and end of the last century will see that an incomparable improvement in their lot has been effected during the 93 years of the Union as contrasted with the corresponding class in England and Scotland. I believe the improvement in the condition of the working class in England has been immense, but I do not believe that it is to be compared with the progress made by the Irish working class, politically, socially, and materially since the Union. They have been endowed with civil and political rights, their material condition has been greatly improved, and, in spite of the famine by which Ireland was overwhelmed, and for which we were not responsible, I say that the improvement in Ireland, the contentment in Ireland, and the diminution in the causes of agrarian discontent in Ireland are such as in my judgment to clearly show that England and Ireland may be left to settle their own affairs without the meddling and muddling of politicians. One further question remains. If you are not by this Bill, as you cannot hope to be, placed in a position to improve the material condition of Ireland, who, at all events, are you going to satisfy by passing it? That is a very simple question. If you improve Ireland in a material form by it, you may say that you will satisfy sentimental opinion. But whom are you going to satisfy? I will begin with the smallest class—a class who are not dependent on this House. You will not satisfy the Civil servants of Ireland at any rate. Henceforth every Civil servant in Ireland will know that Home Rule means to him the absolute destruction of every prospect in life. He may have been in doubt, he was in doubt before the Bill was brought forward as to that fact, but he knows now that he is not likely to have a Chief Secretary more devoted to his interests than the present Chief Secretary, and that he is not likely to have any statesman over him as his protector more anxious to see justice done than the right hon. Gentleman, and yet he knows that a Home Rule Bill formed under the auspices of that very Minister is one which puts an end absolutely to that career to which he had a right to look forward when he entered the service of this Imperial Parliament. Do you think you will satisfy the Loyalists? Whatever else has come out in these Debates, this at least has come out plainly—that not one single man who has been returned to this House by the Loyalist minority in Ireland has been reconciled to the measure by any change suggested or promised in it. Their hostility is as embittered as it ever was, and they know now, on the authority of the hon. Member for Govan, that they must rely for justice in future not upon the paper guarantees of the Bill, but on the strength of their own right arm. As the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has stated to-night, the Loyalists of Ireland, whether in Ulster or in the South-West, must rely upon that for the protection of their dearest interests. You may say that though you do not satisfy the Civil servants, or Constabulary, or the Loyalists, you have satisfied the Nationalists. I have heard speeches delivered in this Debate by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who represent Nationalist opinion, in which they have expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with this Bill as a final settlement of the question. But there was one exception to this. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), speaking for an important section of Nationalists, has told us that it is absolutely impossible that the Bill could be regarded as a final settlement of the question by the Irish nation. His view is that though we give to Ireland by this Bill more money than she has a right to, though we hand over the lives and property of the minority who depend on us, and though we even hand our own local affairs to be managed by an Irish delegation, we still have not done sufficient, and that when the Nationalists reach the height of their demands this Bill will be found insufficient, and they will ask for more. I am disposed to believe that the hon. Member for Waterford is pretty correct in this. You have established in Ireland by this measure all the ponderous machinery of national government, and it is perfect folly for you to suppose that you can prevent that machinery having full play. You have imposed restriction upon restriction by the Bill; out Ireland looks upon itself as a nation, and you have encouraged it to do so, and having given it the machinery for national government you may be certain that not one of these restrictions is worth the paper it is written on. I am perfectly aware that other gentlemen take a different view, and that the hon. Member for North Longford and the hon. Member for East Mayo have pledged themselves with a splendid recklessness not only for Ireland, but for the whole of the Irish race across the seas. I do not attack the credibility of those gentlemen, but we have to compare their utterances now with their utterances in the past. They are sincere now; they were sincere then; and the question is which of those two forms of sincerity is likely to be the more permanent, which represents the real opinion destined to last? On that I refrain from dwelling. I will only say that whilst they have acted consistently year after year upon their old opinions, their new opinions are the growth of a few hours, and may perish in a similar period. Well, if you have not satisfied Nationalist opinion, have you satisfied British opinion? The Chief Secretary for Ireland at Newcastle was very angry with us for talking about British opinion. [Mr. J. MORLEY dissented.] And his indignation, real or assumed, has been copied by many gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. I am not going to justify this talk about a British majority, because it has been effectually dealt with by my right hon. Friend opposite; and it does not lie in the mouth of gentlemen who wish to talk about a Welsh majority, a Scotch majority, and an Irish majority to condemn us for talking about a British majority. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said to-night—

“You talk of your British majority and you have it, but what right have you to suppose that that majority is not in process of being still further converted to Home Rule? In 1886 there was a majority against Home Rule in Great Britain; there is a majority against it still, but it is a largely reduced majority. There is evidently, therefore, a growth of opinion, and in the long run the British elector will come round to the opinions already held by the Irish elector.”

That argument is ingenious, but it will not hold water. What were the circumstances in 1886? The whole Liberal Party were asked to execute a volte face at a moment's notice. The capacity for that particular evolution differs with different individuals. It is immensely developed in some quarters, in others it shows but a slight development, and when the Election of 1886 took place there were still some Members of the Liberal Party who were stupid enough to hold to the opinions in which they had been brought up, stupid enough to believe that what every British statesman—the Prime Minister included—had said until 1886 represented, after all, a fair Liberal policy, and who therefore, for the moment, were not prepared to follow their Party these lengths. The process of conversion in their case was slower than in the case of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for example; but it has taken place, and Party discipline has shown itself stronger than ancient convictions, or even reasonable argument. But why are we to suppose that that process is going on? I admit it took place in 1886 and 1893; but, surely, it has come to an end now, and as far as I can judge the signs of the times—I do not go by bye-elections, or regard them as a perfectly true index of the feeling of the country, and I do not wish to overrate them—but, as far as I can judge by any signs of the times which have come to our notice, the feeling of Great Britain—which, after all, is one of the parties to the Treaty of Union—is getting more and more adverse to a plan by which they feel that their dearest interests will be sacrificed. If you have pleased neither the Loyalists nor the Nationalists, nor the British public, have you pleased the House of Commons? The House of Commons, I suppose, is going to vote for the Third Reading of this Bill. But I am sure there is not a single man who feels the force of Parliamentary tradition who does not look back upon this Session with regret, as the moment in our Parliamentary life when we can distinctly trace and note the beginning of a decadence, and when it became clear for the first time that this House is not in the future to be what it has been in the past. The House of Commons, at all events, will not look back upon our proceedings with pleasure, whatever view may be taken of the particular measure before us. So far as I can judge, there is but one body of men in the whole country who have reason to congratulate themselves upon the part you are compelling them to play—that is the House of Lords. The Attorney General filled up his speech with a certain amount of criticism of the Tory Party as being the Party that had invariably resisted reforms desired by the people. I think myself that that is a shallow view of history, but I will not dispute it now. However, it must be a gratification to the learned Gentleman to feel that at last the Tory Party have the people on their side, and that there is not an elector in the whole breadth of Great Britain who will not feel, after the proceedings of to-night and the proceedings of next week, that if he has to look anywhere for the discussion of matters nearest to his heart and for the protection of interests which he holds to be vital it is not to the Chamber which he has done something to elect. These, after all, are facts which do not depend upon opinions. They depend upon statistics, and it is a mere question of arithmetic as to whether the House of Lords, in any action they may take next week, will or will not back up the majority of the Representatives of Great Britain. That is not a question of opinion; it is a question of fact. I say that by your insane action you have done more than a hundred Tory Governments to demonstrate the necessity for the House of Lords and the part it may play as the bulwark of the interests and greatness of the Empire. Well, Sir, I have already detained the House far longer than I intended, and, considering how often I have addressed it during the last seven months, I have been ashamed of this invasion upon their patience. I will only say, in conclusion, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary reproached me with expressing a desire to destroy the Bill. Well, Sir, I have desired it, and I feel that we have accomplished it. You may pass this night, by what proportion of the 670 Members of this House I know not, the Third Reading of this measure. Every man who votes for this measure to-night knows that he is endeavouring to put life into that which is dead. Never again can you come before the constituencies of the country, and with all the mist of ingenious rhetoric pretend to them that you can give to Ireland everything she wants and to subtract from Great Britain nothing which she cherishes. This Bill has brought you into the open. Every elector will now know what the grant of Home Rule involves to him—a diminution in the authority of this House, a diminution in the security and unity of the Empire, a diminution in the safety of those in Ireland to whom his honour is so deeply pledged. Every elector must now know, and will know, that in the management of his affairs will mingle the voices of 80 irresponsible Members from Ireland, of 80 gentlemen not belonging in any full sense to our political system, not bound by our traditions, not looking forward to the same object; and every elector will know that in order that he may obtain a questionable privilege he must give up everything that his fathers cherished, everything he was taught to revere, and that he must throw upon himself a perfectly unnecessary and superfluous burden of taxation. Do not tell me that if this Bill be Home Rule—we know it to be Home Rule now—that Home Rule will ever commend itself to the views of the majority of the British people. I have reason to coincide in the opinion expressed by a subordinate Member of the Cabinet. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE : Of the Government.] I mean of the Cabinet—the head of the Board of Works. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] Well, I will say a man of equal authority to the Prime Minister, who stated in 1892 that a measure like that of Home Rule ought to be carried by a large majority; that it was a Constitutional change which ought to have in its favour a large majority of all the Representatives of all the four countries; and who stated that he would never be satisfied unless they had that majority in England, and in Scotland, and in Wales, and in Ireland, which would justify them in saying that the majority of the people of all parts of the United Kingdom were in favour of this great Constitutional alteration. It has been my misfortune to differ from that important Member of the Cabinet on many different occasions. Allow me to express on this occasion my heartiest agreement with him, and let me indulge in the prophecy, as prophecies are fashionable, that until that comes about, and until England and Scotland, the great contracting parties with Ireland in the Treaty of Union, are satisfied that the dissolution of that Union is for their best interests, that dissolution will never take place.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman wound up his speech by expressing his satisfaction that as a result of all these prolonged Debates they have drawn us into the open. I have observed in the course of these Debates more than once that it does not follow, because a subject is very important, that therefore the speaker should make a very long speech upon that subject, and it is not my intention to detain the House very long to-night. But when the right hon. Gentleman says that he has brought us into the open, I can only say that I for one greatly rejoice at the issue which on this stage of this great controversy is to be decided to-night; and I do not think after that issue is stated to the country, with all the light which the right hon. Gentleman and his allies and confederates have brought to bear upon it, that we have anything to lose. It is a new thing in one who has been himself Leader of this House, in one who has taken a great and important part in the discussions of this House for the last six or seven years, that he should now appeal from the authority and from the decision of the Representative Chamber, should make naught of that, and should appeal to a Chamber which is non-representative. I can understand that on the great controversy of Irish government there may be differences of opinion, and that this may be an issue on which the country may have searchings; but as to the question whether, after the legitimately constituted majority of this House has pronounced its verdict, that verdict should be over-ruled by a non-representative House we have no fear. I will travel as briefly as I can over the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman. He found some fault with me because I had accused the confederate Opposition of bad faith in the Debates which have taken place since the Bill was first introduced. He began by noticing that certain figures had been produced by various speakers in which all of us seem to agree, and that this seems to indicate some plot on our part. We have those figures in our favour, because they all emanate from the obvious source of the true facts of the situation. I do not say in the country what I am afraid to say in this House, and I repeat here what I have said before—that the opposition to this Bill has been an opposition conducted in bad faith. I do not for a moment say that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and many of you, and many of the Gentlemen behind (the Liberal Unionists) are not absolutely sincere in your aversion to Home Rule; but I say, from a Parliamentary point of view, this discussion has been an insincere discussion, a hollow discussion, a discussion in bad faith. The House declared it was expedient that a Legislature should be set up in Ireland for the peace, order, and good government of that country. If you had been discussing a Bill resting on that foundation in good faith you would have made Amendments, of course, and you would have, I quite agree, done your best to overthrow the Bill; but that has not been the conduct of the Debate. What did the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) say? That by resort to the Closure we were subverting the very foundations of the British Constitution. But my hon. and gallant Friend made a very interesting declaration on that subject which sheds a great deal of light upon the question. The hon. Member said in some speech in the country—

“We detest this Bill; we shall obstruct this Bill; the Government may tax us with obstruction”

—those are his very words—

“as much as they like; in a case of this kind obstruction is patriotism.”

That is an aphorism. I will make him a present of another—Where obstruction is patriotism Closure is patriotism. The House assented to the proposition that it was expedient that the Irish Legislature should make laws for the order, peace, and good government of Ireland, and then you began to whittle it all away with a view not to amend the Bill, but to destroy the foundation upon which the Bill rested. I submit I was absolutely justified, and we are absolutely justified, and shall be, in charging hon. Gentlemen opposite, and their confederates, with conducting these 82 days' discussion on this Bill in a spirit which has never before marked our Parliamentary Debates. There has been resistance before, but there has never been resistance of this kind; where you endeavoured to smother, to choke, and to extinguish every principle on which the House has agreed, and which the great majority wish to see carried out.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: There never was such a Bill before.

MR. J. MORLEY: Of course, for the purposes of the moment, it answers very well to say that this is a gigantic measure, and that it contains a thousand Bills. One would suppose that this Parliament had never before granted local self-government to any one of the Colonies. I do not under-rate the importance of our proposal; but when the right hon. Gentleman says that this has been an honest, a relevant, and an earnest Opposition, we do not believe a word of it. The right hon. Gentleman says—“What is the gain to Ireland by this Bill?” He admits that, in Parliamentary ability and Parliamentary knowledge, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway show a competence in which they have scarcely any superior, and not many who are their match. Then he says—

Mr. J. Morley

“Where is there any sign in all the parts they have taken in the discussions in this House during the last 10 or 12 years of a plan for dealing with Ireland that would recommend itself to any economist or any statesman?”

I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by a plan, but this I do know, that since 1880 hon. Members below the Gangway have been pressing upon Liberal Ministers and upon right hon. Gentlemen opposite a series of suggestions which, in the long run both by gentleman here and gentlemen opposite, have been accepted, and without which Ireland to-day, I do not scruple to say, would be ungovernable. Does the right hon. Gentleman expect hon. Members below the Gangway, without responsibility and without official knowledge, to produce some Utopian scheme for the regeneration of their country? It is not possible; it is not reasonable. He cannot expect it. Can he look back to his own experience. I will give him one case, and one case only, the case of the Revision of Rents Bill of 1886. The right hon. Gentleman opposite withstood that proposal which was pressed upon him. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not.] The right hon. Gentleman says he did not resist it; but I will undertake to say, within one month of the passing of that Bill, he said it was an inexpedient and immoral measure which could not be reconciled with common honesty. The Conservative Prime Minister in the other House up to the very eve of the passing of that Bill denounced it, and the right hon. Gentleman himself sitting here declared that it would be most dishonest, inexpedient, and immoral to accept the proposal which hon. Members below the Gangway pressed upon him, but he was bound to and did accept it. Take the Land Act of 1881. It was a great measure, but nobody—I doubt if even the right hon. Gentleman himself, who has watched the working of that Act—can deny for an instant that it would have been a far more effective measure if the suggestions of hon. Members below the Gangway had been accepted by the Ministry of that day. The right hon. Gentleman does not think so, because he objected to the Bill altogether. Then the right hon. Gentleman made some remarks upon Dublin Castle. He taxed my hon. Friend the hon. Baronet who has made so admirable and interesting a contribution to our Debate this evening with using strong language about the Castle. The right hon. Gentleman said—"Oh, that is the language of third-rate politicians who go perambulating about the platforms of the country showing their ignorance about Ireland and Irish affairs." Who is the third-rate politician? It is no less a person than my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. It was he who, in 1885, declared Dublin Castle to be an irritating anachronism. I do not wish to pursue that subject further, but I must say that it is very awkward for us, who have to thread our way through the mazes of the present Parliamentary situation, to find two coadjutors using this kind of language of one another. The right hon. Gentleman asks, How can you cure? He admits, for the sake of argument, that for 600 years, more or less, the government of Ireland by this country was not a blessing, but something like a curse, and he says, How can you cure in 93 years the evils that grew up in 600 years? But how many of those 93 years were years of improvement? Take one case of which he will understand the significance. In 1843 there was the Devon Commission, which made that terrible Report as to the condition of Ireland. And what was done? Nothing at all. True, in 1848 or 1849 the Encumbered Estates Act was passed; but that Act, as the House by this time is aware, did a great deal more harm than good. It was the result of what the Prime Minister has called "the heedless and unreflecting good intention of this Parliament;" and that Act is one of the best arguments in favour of the Bill now before us. I suppose there are no two men in this House who agree more than the right hon. Gentleman and I do in our perception of the difficulties of Irish government. We have both—if he will allow me to join him with myself in this matter—endeavoured to look at these difficulties with a clear gaze. Napoleon said that he hated a general who made pictures. He liked a general who looked through a field-glass and saw things as they were. And the right hon. Gentleman and myself have both of us endeavoured to see things as they are in Ireland. He has had great experience of Irish government, and I have had some, though much less. In diagnosis of Irish maladies there is, I fully believe, considerable agreement between us. It is when we come to remedies that we disagree. That is what I felt all through the course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and it is what I feel every time he speaks on this subject. Our disagreement can be stated in a sentence. The right hon. Gentleman is for a persistence in the conditions which have produced that state of things now baffling and confounding us. I and those with whom I have the honour to act are in favour of a resort to those conditions, those maxims, and those principles of government which the English-speaking race have tried all over the globe, and have never tried without finding in them healing and a remedy. The right hon. Gentleman says, "You do not satisfy the Civil servants." That is a matter, Sir, which I feel strongly about. If the right hon. Gentleman himself were to come into Office with a different Irish policy to his old Irish policy, that he felt would go to the root of the matter, he would have to reorganise the Civil Service of Ireland. Whether he would do it on more generous and liberal terms than we have devised and proposed I very much doubt. Then we had from the right hon. Gentleman, as we had from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the usual argument about finality. But I, for my part, never claim finality for any solution of any large and deep-rooted political question. There is no such thing; and I should like if it were not too late to quote some most wise and sagacious words of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham in 1885, when he declared that finality was out of the question in practical politics. So far as I can make out, all politics are an affair of second best; you do not get perfect ideal solutions. All that we contend for our proposals to-night is that they open a new way in regard to Ireland, but an old way in regard to our own experience over the whole field of our self-governing Empire. In every part of that Empire where there is self-government the principles on which we rely as the foundation of this Bill have been a uniform and a great success. It is quite true that my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford—whom I, for one, always listen to with interest and respect—said that there was nothing approaching to finality in our proposal.

MR. J. E. REDMOND : I did not say there was nothing approaching to finality. I did not use those words.

MR. J. MORLEY : I shall be very glad to draw from my hon. Friend a limitation of the proposition which the House, I think, understood him to lay down, and which was used by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman opposite in the course of their arguments.

MR. J. REDMOND : What I said on the question of finality was this : that in my opinion this Bill could not be regarded as a final settlement, because no partial concession of autonomy could in the nature of things be final ; that this concession was in the nature of an experiment, and that if it was successful no doubt the Constitutional liberties conferred would increase and develop ; but if, on the contrary, it was a failure, those Constitutional liberties would be narrowed or destroyed, and in that sense I said this Bill was not a final settlement.

MR. J. MORLEY : I, for my part, understood my hon. Friend to go much further than the line he has now traced ; and, so far as that declaration and enunciation go, I do not believe any reasonable person can find fault with it.

MR. J. REDMOND : Those are the exact words I used.

MR. J. MORLEY : I was referring less to the exact words used by my hon. Friend than to the interpretation put upon them by many Members of the House, including the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I beg to say that I gave no interpretation. I quoted literatim et verbatim the words of the hon. Member.

MR. J. MORLEY : I was dealing with the argument which my right hon. Friend based upon the quotation. My right hon. Friend says that the Member for Waterford represents the most active element in the agitation both in Ireland and the United States. I do not know how far that is true ; but I submit with great confidence to the House that if it be so—I do not believe it is—the strongest bulwark that you can set up against these active elements, so far as they are mischievous—and everybody knows what I mean by that—whether in Ireland or across the seas, is such a Legislature and such a system of government as we propose to confer on Ireland, and such as gentlemen sitting round him have accepted. Sir, let me go to the argument the right hon. Gentleman used on another point. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think I was very angry at Newcastle because of some remarks I made upon this leaning upon the argument of a British majority, and he said—“British majorities ! Oh, there have been wonderful evolutions in the relation of English Parties to the Irish Nationalist Party !” That is quite true : and when I have been listening to these prolonged Debates of 80 days ; to the language used about Irish Members and their sense of political honour and morality ; upon my word, when I look back upon the political transactions of the past seven years, I think gentlemen from Ireland might very well retaliate upon gentlemen from England, and point out to them that their standard of political honour and morality is at least as high as theirs.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The right hon. Gentleman has rather mistaken me. I attacked nobody's political honour ; but if I attacked the political honour of anyone, it was not that of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway.

MR. J. MORLEY : But in attacking the honour of gentlemen who sit on this Bench, I think he must have forgotten the history of his own Bench. If there were by chance an Irish Mephistopheles sitting below the Gangway, what food he would have for enjoying his own arts and views on human nature, if he reflected upon the machinations of the Conservative Party. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR : When ?] Has the right hon. Gentleman—have you forgotten the October of 1885 ? You think that is all past and gone. Have you forgotten Lord Salisbury's speech when he declared that he was musing in a disinterested spirit upon the possibility of an Austro-Hungarian Union as applied to Ireland, and in a kind of abstract way—which I can imagine the right hon. Gentleman himself employing—meditating that boycotting was the Irish version of mediæval excommunication?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course I have no right to interfere on behalf of Lord Salisbury, and I am not responsible for Lord Salisbury's words, but in the words which the right hon. Gentleman has put into his mouth he has entirely misquoted him.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not carry all Lord Salisbury's speeches about with me, but I will undertake to say—and hon. Gentlemen will do me the credit of believing that I try to quote correctly—that I am not misquoting him by a jot. It is a locus classicus. Why, I see sitting opposite to me, next to the Leader of the Opposition, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer. Did he or did he not taunt the Tory Party of that day, of which he is now a Member, with that utterance of Lord Salisbury?

MR. GOSCHEN: My right hon. Friend remembers my speeches better than I do. I have no recollection of it.

MR. J. MORLEY: I leave the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition to settle it with another of his coadjutors.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Prime Minister always exacts from us, when we quote him, that we should give the exact words, and my right hon. Friend should have provided himself with extracts from the speech. I do not remember it.

MR. J. MORLEY: I believe that my right hon. Friend used the word "coquetting." Of course I may have been mistaken with regard to Lord Salisbury, but I think Lord Salisbury's words were as I have quoted. At all events, I will venture to say, with all Parliamentary certainty, that my right hon. Friend opposite did make it an article of charge against the Tory Government of that day, that they were coquetting with these traitors and rebels sitting on the Irish Benches. I am all for letting bygones be bygones, but I really think that you ought not so rapidly to forget your own past. You have taunted us during these 82 days with our tergiversations. Do not forget your own. Now, Sir, I will proceed to deal with one or two other points if the House will bear with me. Last night the right hon. Member from South ruption—that prolonged for as

▲. [FOURTH SERIES

Tyrone—[Hon. MEMBERS: Not "right hon."] Well, not yet. The hon. Member taunted me with carrying out the behests of clericalism and sacerdotalism. He said here I sit to carry out the behests of clericalism and sacerdotalism. Sir, no one knows better than the hon. Member who used that language last night that it is not true. There are more kinds of clericalism in Ireland than one; and from what I have heard of the Tyrone Election, what Milton said is still true—that "new presbyter is but old priest writ large." My answer to that taunt is that, in my judgment, there is no surer bulwark against what is illegitimate in the pretensions, or claims, or practice of a Clerical Order so far as it is illegitimate and outside the spiritual sphere, than a lay, political, secular, national authority. A much more interesting speech than that of the hon. Member for Tyrone was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket). That speech was marked by a fine and touching eloquence. It was marked by what I do not dispute for a moment—love of country. But what country? That speech, I can well suppose, made a deep impression upon the House, because the right hon. Gentleman has never played for Party or factious purposes with the Irish Question. But what country? Sir, I cannot help saying, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, that the country he loves is the Ireland of the ascendancy. That is the Ireland to which all his attachments, honourable and moving as they are, cling. This is not merely a personal argument. You have here the very best spokesman the Conservative Party could have from Ireland. And what was that eloquent, moving speech of his yesterday, from first to last? What was it? It was a vast, bitter cry on behalf of the landlords. It was a narrow view. He is sitting next a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson) who was once Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I do not think he will agree with the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin in the doctrine and position that the Irish landlords constitute the people of Ireland as to whom only, or principally, we need concern ourselves.

MR. D. PLUNKET: I never said a word of the kind.

MR. J. MORLEY : It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman did not put it in that way ; but I listened to his speech, and I understand what he means, and that speech from first to last was a speech upon the attitude of the Government upon the Land Question, and a plea on behalf of the landlords.

MR. D. PLUNKET : I am unwilling to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but what I said at the beginning of my speech was this : that I would not impose upon the House any speech upon the subjects which I had before had an opportunity of dealing with in Debate, but that I did insist upon having some explanation upon that one subject as to which we had not been able to extract one word of explanation from the Government.

MR. J. MORLEY : The whole point and substance of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was a plea for the landlords. I go with him. I am now just as adverse to being a party to permitting any injustice to the landlords as I have ever been. The right hon. Gentleman's whole speech made out that the possibility of injustice to the landlords was the great and substantial objection to our policy. I do not mean to say for a moment the right hon. Gentleman has not other objections. He said Parliament has been doing its best for 70 years. I have already said in answer to the Leader of the Opposition that Parliament has by no means been doing its best, and that it was not until 1870 that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister took up this question that anything serious was done, and even that was only a nibble at the fringe of the question. Therefore, it is a mere delusion to say that for 70 years this Parliament has been freely dealing with the Irish Land Question and endeavouring to reform the Irish land system. I do not know how many of these reforms, of which the right hon. Gentleman is now so proud, and which he makes the foundation of his case for the retention of the power by this British Parliament over the whole government of Irish affairs, he and his Party have supported. I do know how many have been resisted and have been deferred by his Party in another place. I do know that resistance and procrastination have robbed all these remedial measures of which he boasts of all their efficacy. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the power of the Land League. The Land League was the terrible result of these blind, these heedless, these selfish delays, for which the right hon. Gentleman and his Party here and in another place are mainly responsible. Sir, nobody has been clearer in sight than the right hon. Gentleman. In 1884, in this House, in a speech that all who heard it will always remember, he presented to the House his fears and his prophecies that the extension of the franchise which Parliament then was going to concede to Ireland would lead up to and would precipitate the demand for the establishment of a separate Irish nationality. He knew very well what that extension of the franchise would lead to, and he warned the House against it. That was consistent in him. But does he not now see, and do not those who are affected by his great eloquence see, that he is the soldier of a lost cause? The hon. Member for Tyrone last night talked about their being the last outpost of danger against the aboriginal inhabitants of Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I did not use the words. I made a quotation from Lord Macaulay's history in which they occurred, but I never applied them myself.

MR. J. MORLEY : I admit it shows a want of literary tact on my part, but I really did not know where Macaulay ended and the hon. Member began. I will pass over some topics which, if there had been more time, I would willingly ask the House to listen to me upon.

AN HON. MEMBER : Clause 9.

MR. J. MORLEY : The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) talked about the great Reform Act. With what he said as to the scope and purport of it I am afraid I cannot agree ; but one circumstance about the passing of it is worth a minute or two. This Debate has been a Debate of prophecies. In intervals of this Debate I have looked at some of the prophecies about the Reform Act. Let them be a warning to some gentlemen sitting opposite as to the view that perhaps will be taken in the House 30 or 40 years hence, and how their prophecies will be quoted as being just as great examples of absurdity and folly, because they are the same prophecies. One Member said—

“Before 10 years have passed away, all the institutions of the country would sink under the effects of the measure. The Reform Bill was like the plan of Cromwell for the assassination of the Monarch and the destruction of the Peerage. The Peerage enjoyed its rights under an instrument granted under the Great Seal. The Bank of England, the East India Company, the Corporation, all existed under Charters, and all of these would be reached by the mischievous principle now promulgated, which left no safety for monied interests, landed interests, the Peerage, or the Church.”

I commend the last passage of this prophecy to my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)—

“He who broke into and bore away the archives of the Town House”—which means destroyed the rotten boroughs—“would not hesitate much about plundering a cathedral.”

Sir, the House of Commons to-night takes a step which can never, never be retraced. At the end of seven-and-a-half years of incessant controversy and passionate conflict this branch of the Sovereign Legislature of the Realm, freely chosen, popularly representative, and virtually supreme, passes a Bill which grants to Ireland a Legislature with power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of that land in the future. This great affirmation can never be cancelled and never recalled. Let them do what they will in other places to delay, to resist, to obstruct this solemn declaration. [Laughter.] Well, you may laugh; but it is a solemn declaration. Try to undo it if you can—[Cries of “We will!” and “The country will!”—but do not deny—[Interruption.]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. J. MORLEY: Do not deny that the fact that this Representative Chamber passes this solemn declaration is a very solemn fact. [Cries of “The gag!” “The gag!”]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. J. MORLEY: Do you suppose—I note that interruption—that if the Debate had been prolonged for as many months as it has filled weeks; do you suppose that the Bill would not at the end of the time have been passed just as it will be passed to-night? We may have been right or we may have been wrong in the Closure; but who in his senses really can contend that, at the end of the discussion, if it had been 120 day instead of 80, the Bill would have been read a third time? [Cries of “No!”] Gentlemen above the Gangway are beyond the reach of argument. Nevertheless, I submit, even to them, that this solemn declaration constitutes a recognition of the national demand of Ireland—constitutes the giving of a promise which can never be taken back. Sir, whatever may be the immediate future of this Bill, to the ultimate future of the Bill, to the cause, we at least look forward with hope invincible and with confidence that cannot quench. We have had during these seven years long, toilsome, and harassing marches under skies that were sometimes starless. We have had many dark moments, which were not only dark but tragic. But we have had an indomitable and unfaltering captain. We have had a great band of comrades in this House, and out of it, who have “scorned delights and lived laborious days,” and whose courage, whose patience, whose tenacity, whose faith bear witness to the awakened conscience and mind of England as to the case of Ireland. Whatever may happen, there is a Party in Great Britain who have made up their minds that Ireland shall no longer be the sport of an aimless destiny; that she shall no longer be the cockpit in which English factions choose to fight out their battles. Let us for to-night—we at least on this side of the House, aye, and even gentlemen opposite—let us raise ourselves above the mire and the confusion of ephemeral faction. You, Sir, in a few minutes will declare this Bill to have been read a third time. When you have made that announcement it will be felt by this time to-morrow that wherever the Irish race toils, and hopes, and yearns, wherever Englishmen and Scotchmen are weary of the inveterate stain on the fame and honour of their country—it will be felt that we at least have taken a decisive step towards the true incorporation of Ireland in a United Kingdom.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he did not think the Debate ought to close without some protest against the Financial Clauses of this Bill. [Cries of "Oh!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

COLONEL NOLAN said, Ireland had been extremely badly treated under these Financial Clauses. He made out that altogether the loss to Ireland under the Bill would amount to £3,290,000. The effect of the Financial Clauses would be to stereotype the bad and unjust financial system which had been pursued towards Ireland for many years. They would not be much better off than they were at the present time. Ireland had been robbed in the past. She would be neither better nor worse off under the Bill than at the present moment, and he considered it his duty to protest, even at that late hour, against the perpetuation of the injustice that had been inflicted in the past.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS, 1869, AND AMENDING ACTS, AND WELSH INTER-MEDIATE EDUCATION ACT.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

*THE BISHOP OF CHESTER moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent to the following portions of the Cardiganshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme:—Page 10 (Clause 48), lines 29 to 37 inclusive; pages 16 and 17, the whole of Part VII., namely, the whole of page 16 and also page 17, down to the end of line 27.”

He said that, though the matter to which he was calling their Lordships' attention was in one sense trifling, it raised an important question. The scheme affected only a sparsely-populated district in Cardiganshire, containing not more than 8,000 inhabitants, and it involved very little in money or even status; but it involved principles of justice, religious liberty, and respect for the rights of conscience. The scheme provided no county school for the Lampeter district. There was already a good school there, largely attended by the sons of Nonconformist parents, but it was connected with St. David's College, and the Education Committee had determined that boys from the Lampeter district who won County Scholarships should not be allowed to go to the school connected with St. David's College, but must go either to Aberystwith, Aberaydon, or Cardigan. In the next county, Carmarthenshire, there was also a flourishing school—Llandovery—and the authorities had wisely determined that it might be attended by boys winning County Scholarships. Referring briefly to the growth of this school, after the Report of Lord Aberdare's Commission was issued, the authorities of St. David's College had to consider what their attitude would be as affecting both primary and intermediate education in Wales, and the first plan upon which they corresponded with Lord Aberdare was to transplant the College to the little City of Llandaff, which had Cardiff at its doors, the object being to have the two Colleges close together in order to gain the advantages afforded by proximity. Lord Aberdare, and others who were consulted, considered the proposal favourably. Though they were all in sympathy with the proposal, it had to be abandoned, owing to insuperable practical obstacles. That showed what the attitude of Lampeter had been towards the University. An endeavour was then made to develop St. David's College at Lampeter, and among other things a College School was founded with the aid of friends and members. The Lampeter school adopted from the first a remarkable Conscience Clause, proposed by Lord Aberdare's Commission, which required that every parent should choose for his son whether he should or should not have religious instruction, thus placing the brunt of responsibility on the parents. In 1885 the school contained boys whose parents belonged to the six principal Nonconformist denominations, and to-day all but Roman Catholics were represented. There could be no doubt about the efficiency of the school, and yet the scheme deliberately deprived the ratepayers from taking advantage of this school close to their doors. The cost of education was greatly increased when a parent had to send his boy to a distant school as a boarder. In Carmarthenshire quite a different plan had been adopted, and he failed to see any reason which applied there specially as against Cardiganshire. It might be said to be now too late, and that if this clause were struck out of the scheme the House would be obstructing the course of intermediate education in Wales; but the real obstructionists were surely they who had introduced a narrow-minded and unjust restriction into this scheme. The Lampeter County Council, the Lampeter School Board, and the Lampeter Board of Guardians had each petitioned against the scheme as “unjust and injurious”; and if their protest was rather late, it was because they thought that more equitable terms were to be offered to the neighbourhood by the Charity Commissioners or the Education Department. The Charity Commissioners did, in fact, propose an alternative scheme, which would permit parents to send their children to Lampeter School if it were brought within the Endowed Schools Act; but that scheme could not be accepted by the College Authorities until they had seen it, for the school was in the grounds of St. David's College and was maintained largely by the College funds. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that the College should know what the scheme was going to be before they could accept it. It was suggested by the Vice President that the difficulty might be met by a supplemental scheme; but it was better to prevent than to cure injustice, and Parliament ought not to allow a scheme which committed flagrant and acknowledged injustice to go out with its imprimatur. The success of this Motion need not entail any delay, for that part of the scheme dealing with the Scholarships would be alone stayed, and the rest could go forth. He thought at first that certain words in Clause 84 obviated the injustice by permitting the School Managers upon the request of the parent of the holder of the Scholarship to choose the school; but he now found that that interpretation of the clause was not correct, and that it rather bore upon the interchange of boundaries as between the county schools of Carmarthen, Cardigan, and Pembroke.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent to the following portions of the Cardiganshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme:—Page 10 (Clause 48), lines 29 to 37 inclusive; pages 16 and 17, the whole of Part VII., namely, the whole of page 16 and also page 17, down to the end of line 27."—(The Lord Bishop of Chester.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): My Lords, I am not at all able to admit that there has been flagrant injustice done here, in the very strong words used by my right rev. Friend. I do not think there has been any injustice done at all. This is a matter of arrangement, and I will explain to your Lordships exactly what has occurred. As the right rev. Prelate has observed, the simple case is that there is a particular district in Cardiganshire where there is no county school; and, therefore, the Scholarships to be established in that district will have to be held elsewhere—that is, in accordance with the precedent in the Carmarthenshire case, where there is a similar scheme. It is provided for the scheme that, unless otherwise ordered by School Managers on the special request of parents, Scholarships shall be tenable at any county school. I do not read those words in the narrow sense which the right rev. Prelate has attached to them. I look upon them as giving a plain discretion; so that, if there were parents who desired that their children should go into a school in this district not being a county school, that discretion may be exercised by the Managers. This provision seems to meet, as it was intended to meet, the difficulty raised by the right rev. Prelate. As to the alleged hardship that Llandovery School in the neighbourhood should be recognised whilst Lampeter School was not, the former is a large endowed school in which the Conscience Clause is adopted, and Lampeter is not endowed under the Act of Parliament. The Joint Committee objected to placing in the position of a county school a school over which the County Authority will have no jurisdiction. Upon the whole, no injustice is done. It is following established precedents; and it will be possible that Lampeter School shall hereafter be adopted as a county school. I simply look upon this as a case where an arrangement has been fairly made; and if hereafter it is thought that Lampeter School, having come within the Endowed Schools Act, may reasonably be recognised as an endowed school, that may easily be done. I hope, therefore, that your Lordships will not adopt the Motion.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: My Lords, I should like to ask the noble Earl whether the scheme suggested by the Charity Commissioners was considered by the Department?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Yes.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: And whether that scheme was upon the basis that if any school hereafter became an endowed school under the Charity Commissioners it should be open as a school for holding Scholarships?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Yes. Perhaps I might state exactly what has been done. In the original scheme, as proposed here, was a provision which would have admitted any endowed school, but in the scheme as now framed there is no such provision. That was considered by the Charity Commissioners.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : That is what I mean. As a matter of fact, the Education Department have overruled the Charity Commissioners that there should be a wider scope given in the education of children. The Department was desirous that the children should be put on an equality. The question is not so much between the two schools as it is a question for the children and parents, who are cut off from the use of a good local school existing in their midst. It was proposed by the Charity Commissioners, and rejected by the Education Department, that in such circumstances parents should be able to send their children to the local school, and should not be obliged to send them to a distance to obtain their education. The general idea is that in all parts of the country scholars who gain prizes and Scholarships shall be educated in the district to which they belong. Under the scheme the scholars of the Lampeter district would have to be sent to a county school away from the district. This is not compatible with a system the main object of which is to bring a cheap education to every man's door. I cannot understand why the scheme has been drawn so narrowly in regard to places where county schools are not in existence. What has been done is to make it an absolutely exclusive system against the wish of the Charity Commissioners, who wished it to be otherwise, and the mistake can be remedied by suspending the clause until Lampeter comes under the Endowed Schools Commission.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I have only one observation to make. I do not understand whether the right rev. Prelate wishes to omit the whole of Part VII. I am not saying that I agree to the omission of Clause 84 ; but why he wishes to suspend it with regard to Scholarships over the whole country I do not understand. I thought the object he had in view would have been entirely satisfied by moving as to Section 84.

*THE BISHOP OF CHESTER said, he had no wish to be unreasonable, but it seemed desirable that the whole question of Scholarships should be reconsidered, and there would be really no delay. He was glad to hear the Lord President's interpretation of Clause 84, but he had heard quite another interpretation of it, and must still be rather sceptical. As to Llandoverly School, its Head Master was required to be in Holy Orders ; whereas at Lampeter he was not. With regard to any jealousy as to Llandoverly School, it was really not a question between the schools at all, but for the parents, and the strong language to which the noble Lord referred was simply a quotation from the protest of the Local Authorities concerned. He asked their Lordships to adopt the Motion in order to secure the reconsideration of what seemed at the best somewhat ambiguous treatment of the Scholarships and Exhibitions in Cardiganshire.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS, 1869 TO 1889, AND WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

*THE BISHOP OF CHESTER, on behalf of the Bishop of St. Asaph, moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent to the following portion of the Merionethshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme :—Clause 91 (b) from the word ("boarding-house") to the end ; Clause 91 (c).

He said, the Merioneth Scheme contained a very important element. The portion of the scheme to which he objected proposed to introduce the undenominational system of religious teaching and worship into boarding-houses ; and this, in his opinion, would constitute a very serious precedent in the case of like institutions in England. He believed the intention of the authors of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act was to leave boarders attending intermediate schools in Wales under Clause 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, and, therefore, on the same footing as boarders in England. Several discussions had taken place on the subject, and particularly in Committee of the House of Commons on the 23rd July, 1889, when attempts were made by Mr. Stuart Rendel, Mr. Ellis, and others to get the word "day" before "scholars" left out in the Conscience Clause; but Sir W. Hart Dyke declined to accept the alteration. But it appeared that in this scheme the Charity Commissioners had made a kind of flank movement. In Clause 91, Sub-sections (b) and (c), they had introduced an entirely novel interpretation; and he would ask whether the Welsh Intermediate Education Act was not intended to leave the position of boarders as regarded religious instruction and family worship on the same footing as boarders in England? He would also ask whether the interpretation of the clause by the Charity Commissioners was a legitimate one? The Vice President of the Council had stated in the House of Commons that he was not responsible for that interpretation, and it was, undoubtedly, a very serious departure and most radical change. Under Section 91, and under the interpretation by the Charity Commissioners of Clause 16 of the Endowed School Act, a boarding-house master or the master of a hostel might himself be a Churchman, all the boarders might be the sons of parents who were also Churchmen, and yet, say on Easter or Trinity Sunday, the use of the Collects for the day would be out of order. It was further provided that while the teaching in general should be undenominational, yet, with the permission of the County Governing Authorities, instruction might be separately given in matters of a denominational kind. He objected that to put this matter under the direction of County Governing Bodies was to make a serious departure from the Endowed Schools Act. He contended that even if the interpretation placed upon Clause 16 was a legitimate one, such a change ought not to be introduced by a side wind. If it was intended to deal with the work of religious instruction and family worship in boarding-houses and hostels on new lines, it ought to be done in the clearest and most direct way, so that everyone should understand what a change was coming over our educational system. On these grounds he asked their Lordships to adopt the Motion.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent to the following portion of the Merionethshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme:—Clause 91 (b) from the word ("boarding-house") to the end; Clause 91 (c)."—(The Lord Bishop of Chester.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, with regard to what I understand to be the right rev. Prelate's interpretation of the effect of the 16th clause of the Endowed Schools Act of many years ago and of the clause which the Charity Commissioners have inserted in this scheme, I do not think he precisely explained the point. I do not think the Act provides for any such special restrictions as those referred to; but that the provisions are only of a general kind, enabling parents to withdraw their children in case the religious instruction is not such as they approve. I can tell the right rev. Prelate unreservedly that the Charity Commissioners, who are charged with the preparation of these schemes, are distinctly of opinion that what they have done in the present case is in no sense ultra vires. I am not now speaking of the merits, but that Sub-section (b) is distinctly within their powers. With regard to the policy of the sub-section to which objection has been taken, I think that, looking to all the circumstances of Wales, and the state of opinion there, it is highly undesirable to allow denominational teaching in boarding-houses or hostels connected with intermediate education in Wales. In a matter of this kind you must take account of the general feeling which exists. Speaking of Sub-section (c), the Joint Committee proposed that the teaching of denominationalism should be absolutely forbidden in those houses. That was the mode in which the proposal came before the Department; but the Department thought, looking to all the circumstances of the case, it would be much more likely to work smoothly if the Governing Body were permitted to act subject to any regulations which might be made on the subject. Those words were inserted at the suggestion of the Education Department. The whole matter is one which is, no doubt, difficult of adjustment. There is a great deal of feeling upon all these subjects, and it is exceedingly hard to devise such a system as will meet the wishes of all who send their children to those boarding-houses. But there is really no hardship here, because in Sub-section (a) it is provided that the boarders shall be allowed to attend such places of worship as their parents may desire, and should have reasonable facilities for such religious instruction as their parents shall choose for them. That seems to me to provide for the case of parents who desire that instruction of an undenominational kind shall be given. Those who attach enormous importance to their children being taught a dogmatic theology, and who have a strong objection to any religious instruction which is not of that character, can have it provided elsewhere than in the hostel itself; but it may be provided in the hostel itself if the Governing Body will permit it. On the whole, I suggest that the arrangement is fair and reasonable, and does not act against the conscientious feelings of anyone. Looking at the whole circumstances of the case, and at what I am afraid are the animosities which prevail in that part of the United Kingdom, and considering how desirable it is that you should not in any way force denominational education upon these institutions, I think it is reasonable and fair that the scheme should remain in the form in which it has now been framed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, my objection to the course which the Government are taking is that they are making a very large and vital change in a small clause in a small scheme—a change which, when its scope and effect are known, will cause the bitterest feelings on the part of a considerable number of Christians in this country. Whether the Government are right or wrong, if Parliament determines that undenominational education is to prevail, and succeeds in defining what education is, I do not raise any further objection on that point. But I do demur most strongly to a change of this great extent and area and effect, which is so likely to embitter the feelings of religious educationists in this country, being introduced in a small scheme for a Welsh county. Now, the point is this. In all the battles we have had here upon the Endowed Schools Act and the Intermediate Education Act we have always drawn a very strong line between day scholars and those who reside in the family, and are subject to teaching, as it were, night and day. Certain arrangements were made for day scholars; but in the Act of 1869, and again in the Act of 1889, it was carefully stated that the exclusion of denominational education should apply to day scholars. When that is done in an Act of Parliament it means that others shall not be subjected to the exclusion. If the noble Lord is right in saying—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It is the view of the Charity Commissioners. I am not giving my view of it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think the noble Lord is quite wise to dissociate himself from it; but whether that is right or wrong, undoubtedly the meaning of the clause is that others which are not denominational shall not be subject to that enactment. But now, when the day provisions have been in force for 20 years, by a side wind the Charity Commissioners are trying to thrust in the application of the principle in the much wider case of those who are brought up in the family. Your Lordships will see at once what the difference is. Undenominational education means education in religion, leaving out anything to which any person can object. Giving undenominational education to children means teaching without any dogmatic statement which any body of religious persons can object to. It means without teaching the divinity of Our Lord. That is the real point on which, in the long run, all these regulations will turn, whatever the local circumstances in particular places may be. Now we say that to do that is really to put out of gear religious teaching altogether; that religious teaching is not possible in that hypothetical way. Just consider what is the position created by Sub-section (c). In the general schoolroom the teacher has to say that he does not know whether the divinity of Our Lord is to be maintained or not; but in a neighbouring schoolroom, if a bit of paper is produced from the pocket of the scholar, the teacher will be required to teach the very doctrine which was forbidden in the other case—he will proceed to give his reasons for believing in the divinity of our Lord. In what state of mind do you imagine a boy will be when he has been subjected to that extraordinary proceeding? You cannot play fast-and-loose with the deepest religious convictions of the human mind in this way, and you had better utterly abandon the idea of any attempt at religious education, if your conditions of religious education are to leave out the fundamental doctrines upon which all religious feelings and all religious motives must ultimately turn. The notion that there is a religion expunging that upon which men differ, and leaving nothing but that upon which all men can agree, is the wildest chimera that ever entered the brain of a politician. A politician cannot make these things happen as he desires. The religious conviction is much too strong for him. It will have its way; and all you will do by this attempt to force an impossible neutrality upon the mind you are attempting to teach the most important things will be undoubtedly to propagate infidelity in the first place, and, in the next, to promote a bitter, angry religious reaction, from which the education you are trying to press forward will be the first to suffer. My Lords, I entreat you, if you mean to undertake this anti-crusade, if you desire to exterminate all religious belief from religious education, do it in the open; do it by a bold general measure; do it by something we can discuss here in public, and to which we can call the attention of the country; but do not attempt to do it by a side wind, by this wretched introduction of insidious words into a scheme of the Charity Commissioners.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, with regard to what the noble Marquess has said, I cannot assent to the suggestion that a scheme of this sort, if carried into effect, will be likely to destroy religious belief and promote infidelity. I believe that to be an absolute delusion, and that it springs to some extent from a want of acquaintance with what is called undenominational religious teaching, which is, nevertheless, as truly religious, and which is as truly calculated to influence the mind and heart of man as what is commonly called dogmatic, or religious, or Church teaching. There are boarding and other schools carried on upon undenominational principles, from which the inmates go to confirmation as from denominational institutions. I venture to say, and I speak from knowledge of some of these institutions, that the children who issue from them go into the world as imbued with religious teaching and as far removed from infidelity as from any other schools in the Kingdom. I demur to the view that what is called undenominational teaching is necessarily either antagonistic to religious teaching or to religious feeling. In a question of this sort we have to deal with the matter practically, and I do not know exactly what it is at this moment that the noble Marquess desires. Does he desire that every one of these hostels should become a place of denominational teaching for some Religious Body or another; that there shall be no common Christian worship among those who go there unless they are willing to adopt the worship of some denomination to which, perhaps, they do not belong? We are dealing with a mixed population in Wales, among whom, I believe, this matter will be largely freed from difficulty. I do not believe there would be the slightest difficulty in the young people in Wales taking a common part in family worship without exciting any susceptibilities. The truth is, these difficulties are more imaginary than real. They can be conjured up into something pretentious; but I do not believe that in practice the difficulty arises. If this were a proposal to promote undenominational teaching where it was not desired, I could understand objections being raised to it; but here no parent is debarred from obtaining religious teaching for his child. Is not that a fair compromise in the matter? Such religious teaching is given generally in the school-house as may be made use of by those belonging to different denominations, and as would not be offensive to these different denominations; but as regards the particular religious teaching which any parent desires for his child, that is practically secured by this proposal. The child may attend a place of religious teaching, and may have such facilities for all religious teaching as the parent desires. I do not say the scheme is a perfect one. It would be impossible, perhaps, to have a perfect scheme for this purpose; but, in dealing with a matter of this sort, I submit to your Lordships that this scheme is not creating any such dangerous precedent, as the noble Marquess suggests, or likely to lead to the terrible irreligion which he appears to anticipate.

THE BISHOP OF ELY asked whether the county schools would only have one hostel in each case? Parents might wish to send their children to a hostel which had a different religious teaching. They might be hostels for Roman Catholics, hostels for Wesleyans, or hostels for Baptists, and if the head of the hostel was to announce that he proposed to teach the children therein in accordance with the wishes of the parents, and if the parents chose to send all their children to one hostel, why was a clause put into the Bill to limit that hostel in using the formularies of a particular denomination for family worship? It was possible for the head of a hostel to say he would have undenominational education, and why should not the head of another have other teaching? A boarding-house was a place where the children residing there spent a large part of the year, where they obtained the main part of their religious teaching, and where their religious feeling was developed day by day. He ventured to hope their Lordships would support the Motion.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I wish merely to make an appeal to the noble Lord. It appears we are to have an agreeable November and December in this admirable climate, and I think it would be agreeable to your Lordships if he would join in providing us with some little work for the period. I do not think the noble Lord has taken advantage of us, or done anything of which we have a right to complain; but, as a matter of fact, this Bill did slip through without any of us knowing what had been done. This is due to the extraordinary extent to which this House requires that system of reference as to which we so often have had reason to complain. I defy any lay person upon a mere reading of the Bill to find out what it means; but with all the advantage of having the Statute Book by one and tracing from point to point what it refers to it is very difficult to find out what the object of it is. It has come as a surprise not only upon us, but upon the persons whom it directly affects, who are principally fishermen engaged in sailing vessels on our Eastern Coast. As I understand the case, there is already an Act which subjects those who work steamers in the fishing industry on the East Coast to an examination under the Board of Trade, and this is a measure proposing to extend the liability to examination from steamers to sailing vessels. Now, to the principle of the measure, I have no objection at all. I am not quite such a believer in examinations, perhaps, as the noble Lord; but it is quite reasonable, I think, that persons should be subjected to examination who have the charge of other people's lives in their hands. What I demur to is that this demand should be made upon men who have already entered upon their career, have spent a considerable part of their lives in this work, and who you may be quite certain, whatever happened, could not pass an examination. It means to them the cutting off of their livelihood, a condemnation to poverty. I do not think there is any case of inconvenience or danger made out which justifies you in enforcing so hard a measure upon an industrious population, and I am not in the least surprised at the terror with which these fishermen have heard of the fate in store for them. I would ask your Lordships, with all the advantages of your education, if it was suddenly said that you should not enjoy your incomes unless you passed in a competitive examination, how many of you would look at the prospect with equanimity? That is the measure which you are preparing for the unfortunate fishermen in sailing vessels on the East Coast. No doubt the noble Lord will tell me that the Board will not be allowed to impose this examination unless it is absolutely necessary. I am sure that will not be considered a satisfactory answer by the population whom it concerns. I believe the Board is guided by equity and judgment, and I do not, in the least, fear that any ill-use would be made of its powers by the present Board; but nobody can foresee into whose hands its powers will fall, and I simply desire to take care, as far as the Department is concerned, that no evil use will be made of those powers when given. I can quite understand that these people upon whom you are inflicting this measure would demur to it very much. I might have proposed a number of Amendments which would have expressed my views; but they are difficult to deal with in a full House, and it seems to me more reasonable, if the noble Lord will agree, to send it back to the Committee, and there to discuss the provisions one by one in detail, and see whether some better arrangement cannot be arrived at by the Board of Trade with reference to these people, who are, I am sure your Lordships will think, worthy of every consideration.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Moved, "That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the whole House."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

*LORD PLAYFAIR said, this was not a Government Bill, but a private measure originally brought in in 1892 by Mr. Heneage, the Member for Grimsby. It was modified by the Board of Trade during that year, and Mr. Heneage approved of the modifications, and introduced it again. It was, therefore, before the fishing population, if they had chosen to take any interest in it. It was not for the purpose of imposing any examination upon fishermen generally. It simply provided, as vessels were growing in size, that upon those above 25 tons, if any accident happened to the master, there might be somebody aboard with a knowledge of navigation sufficient to safely bring the vessel home. It was, therefore, for the purpose of applying examinations to the second hand, or mate. The Board of Trade had already power to require that a certificate of competency should be obtained by a master. That was the whole of the Bill. At the same time, he agreed with the noble Marquess that they should not push the measure through rapidly without the knowledge of the fishermen who were interested in it. They were, he believed, divided in opinion. It originally arose from the action of one section of the fishermen at Grimsby, and there was another section represented by the Smack Owners' Association who did not approve of it. He had taken every precaution that the Bill should not be hurried through the House, and he had postponed it from week to week, and from month to month, in order that those interested might have the opportunity of considering it. He would be glad to meet the views of the noble Marquess, and to obtain the opinion of the Board of Trade on the matter during the Recess.

Motion agreed to; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House accordingly.

THE FRANCO-SIAMESE CRISIS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the position of the Franco-Siamese crisis? He said he put the question because of several disquieting rumours which had lately arisen in respect to the carrying out of the terms of the French ultimatum, and because of the fact that several fresh demands were reported to have been made as to Chantaboon, the dismissal of European officers, the Commercial Treaty, and the cutting of a canal through the Malay Peninsula. Perhaps the noble Lord could now give more complete information than was supplied when similar questions were asked in the House of Commons. But he also desired to call attention to one or two points in connection with the ultimatum itself. In the first place, could the Secretary of State say what was to be the fate of the States of Nan and Luang Prabang, neither of which could by any pretence be considered to be anything else than strictly Siamese, and whose territories lie on either bank of the Mekong? Would Parliament have any opportunity of considering the boundaries with reference to those States, and as between ourselves and France, before they were ratified? In the second place, he wished to call attention to the new principle introduced into the ultimatum of prohibiting a country from having troops on their own territory. As their Lordships were aware, within 25 kilometres of the right bank of the Mekong the Siamese were restricted from having troops for aught than police purposes. That vitiated the agreement as being a permanent settlement of the frontier question, and was a constant threat to the independence of Siam. He could believe that the French Government were acting in perfect good faith, and intended honourably to respect the independence of Siam; but the official who drew up the terms of this ultimatum must have had a good laugh in his sleeve when he inserted this section. Why, outside of Bangkok the only police were soldiers, and these would not be allowed to set foot in this belt of territory. Who would keep order then? It would not be long before the French found occasion to interfere in some paltry quarrel. If this restriction were imposed for the mere purpose of the avoidance of misunderstanding or animosities between the Siamese and French Annamite troops, why did the French not stipulate that they would not themselves have troops within 25 kilometres of the left bank of the Mekong? There was no use in disguising the fact that practically the frontier was 25 kilometres west of the river, and not the river itself. What, then, was certain to happen if the great Annamite chain of mountains, crossed by only a few paths, was an ineffective barrier to French aggression on the clashing of rival interests? What possibility was there of an imaginary line drawn through goodness knows what country, towns, or villages restraining the zeal of those who desired in the Indo-China Peninsula to recover a lost India? And, as he had said on a previous occasion, no neutral frontier existed between the Mekong and Menam Rivers, the country being a tableland. He fully accepted the assurances of the French Government to respect the integrity of Siam; but it would be hardly in human nature, and certainly not French human nature, to avoid pressing on into the richer and more fertile districts of Siam. What would happen to the valuable teak forests situated in the large north-eastern bend of the Mekong? The best method of working would be to float the logs down the Mekong to such a point where they could be put on the railway that it was proposed to make in continuation of the Bangkok-Korat line. It was to be remembered that it was the taking in hand of this railway and the consequent attraction of traffic from the Mekong to Bangkok that probably decided the French to put into execution their long-determined policy of having all lands east of the Mekong. Would the French, then, allow of the teak being worked in this manner? He greatly doubted it. It was more probable that once floated on the waters of the Mekong it would never be allowed on to a Siamese railway. This was only a detail, but one which showed what constant causes there were of future friction. There was no use in blinking our eyes to the fact that, though it might not be the intention of their Government, the French in Indo-China desired the whole of Siam, and when they made the move they would be supported by the Press at home. The only chance of making the new frontier a permanent solution of this vexed question was to hedge it round with every possible safeguard that diplomacy could suggest, and to state frankly that to break these guaranteed boundary arrangements would be regarded as an attack on British interests. So far it could not be said, except indirectly, that the large mouthful of Siam that France had swallowed had affected our interests; and taking action, as was the usual practice of the Foreign Office, very late in the day, the noble Lord had done the best under the circumstances. But the limit of our forbearance should now be reached—it was not only the trade with this country and our Colonies that would be at stake, but it was our Indian Empire that was so closely concerned in the preservation of the Kingdom of Siam. It would be interesting to know what was the opinion of the Secretary of State for India in this matter, and it would re-assure those engaged in commerce in the East, and many thousands of Indian subjects living in Siam, to know that the Indian Government was fully alive to the necessity of keeping free from the rule or influence of any European power. And, as connected with the Indian Government, he asked whether it was not their intention to ask for Consular posts wherever the French might be allowed to establish them? He had asked this question at length, but it was most unfortunate that no other Member of the House had interested himself in the question, as if, because Siam was some thousands of miles away, the fate of our fellow-countrymen and of our subjects were a matter of small importance.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of ROSEBURY): My Lords, I can assure my noble Friend that I always hear him on this subject with deep interest as a real expert on all Siamese matters; but he will also allow me to say that he speaks with greater freedom from responsibility than I can in the Office I have the honour to hold. His question is put so broadly that it could only lead to a statement on the whole position of the negotiations with regard to Siam which, in my opinion, would be in the highest degree detrimental to the public interest at this moment to make. It was only the other day that Lord Dufferin left England for the purpose of renewing those negotiations which were interrupted by the course of the French Elections; and I hope, therefore, that at this particularly delicate and critical moment my noble Friend will be satisfied with the assurance, which I am happy to think he may receive with the more readiness from the opinion he has been good enough to express upon our efforts so far, that Lord Dufferin has returned to Paris with the fullest and most definite instructions for the protection of British rights so far as they are affected by what he has called the Franco-Siamese crisis.

EFFICIENT ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD SANDFORD called attention to a recent Circular (No. 333) of the Education Department; and asked the Lord President under what statutory authority the Department claims the right to say that "they will no longer take a school into consideration among those giving efficient elementary education" if the managers at any time "refuse to permit inspection" to which the school is not subject by law? He said, the Circular referred to the fact that, at the time of the inquiry into school provision in 1870, certain schools not under Government inspection were passed as giving efficient elementary education. Some of those schools might not be now efficient, and the Inspectors were asked to report such cases to the Department; and if the Report was unsatisfactory the Department would no longer accept the schools as among those giving sufficient elementary education to the district, and would take steps to supply the deficiency existing. On the first inquiry into the subject in 1871, all schools were invited to send Returns if they wished to be recognised, and those which did so were inspected. A list was made out of schools either receiving the annual grant, or which held aloof from the system from disinclination to take public money, or from dislike to the Conscience Clause, which they objected to as interfering with the ordinary religious instruction of the school. The latter were religious schools, the managers of which wished religion to permeate the whole daily education. No inspection was enforced in those schools beyond that ad hoc, and the fact that they were recognised as an efficient part of the school provision of the country did not give the Government the right to inspect them permanently. That was not considered very satisfactory, because there was no guarantee of efficiency; and when the Acts were amended it was proposed to introduce a clause to the effect that so long as a school was on the list of the school supply of the country as an efficient school it should, from time to time, be liable to inspection. He well remembered Mr. Forster's answer—it was very characteristic. He said—"No; I am not going to let you fellows bully the School Managers, simply because they do not want to have anything to say to you. They will soon come in, because the cost of education must rise, and they will want funds." Mr. Forster, at the same time, pointed out that the Act of 1870 allowed the Department from time to time, not oftener than once a year, to hold a survey of the school supply, either of the country in general, or of any particular district. He also pointed out that under the bye-laws, if a question were raised, it could be tried at any time. Under this Circular there was no certainty, as under an inquiry, that the public would be made acquainted with the matter. Everything necessary to start an inspection might be done in camera. If, on the Inspector desiring to inspect a school, the Managers declined, saying they were not liable to inspection, the Circular allowed the Inspector at once to declare the school inefficient, and refused to recognise it as part of the school supply of the district, and then the ultimate powers under the Act would be enforced. Mr. Forster thought that everything connected with the school supply of the district, however small, ought to be done openly, and with due notice to the parish. On what authority had this Circular been issued? There were very few schools now which had not come in under Government inspection, and had declined to be recognised. Mr. Forster's prophecy that the want of funds would drive them into the regulations of the Department had been realised. No fewer than 2,000 parishes in England had populations not exceeding 100, and there were 3,000 parishes with populations not exceeding 150. Those places could not possibly, from their size, be called upon to maintain schools of their own. This question about the distance of the schools from the population they supplied was carefully gone into at the time of the survey, and many schools were enlarged in order to enable them to accommodate children from neighbouring parishes upon which a School Board would otherwise have been thrust at great expense. The Managers of these schools, which had been apparently settled with, desired to know, therefore, why at this moment arrangements which had worked well for 20 years past should be interfered with? It was for the Inspector to say what was a reasonable distance for the children to go; and if the Department did not settle it, the bye-laws settled it for them. There was not a single district in England where the reasonable distance for attending schools had not been fixed; and now the Inspectors were instructed, if they did not think the distance reasonable, to open up the whole question by reporting to the Department. Not a word of guidance was given in the Circular, as was generally done, as to what was reasonable, and different Inspectors might form different opinions; and the last part of the Circular especially would affect small schools in the rural districts. He desired to know on what authority the Department had acted in issuing the Circular?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, with regard to the last question which the noble Lord asked about the reasonable distance, I do not know why he should be so extremely jealous of the Department requiring information upon that subject. The arrangements are not in every possible case what they ought to be. You cannot stereotype these things. Conditions of population change; the means of communication alter, and it is desirable that you should, from time to time, have power to see how your system works, and whether there are any defects in it. I cannot see why the noble Lord thinks it the duty of the Department to dwell in a dark cave, and to refrain from remedying anything which might require to be altered in any particular school. It seems to me that the proper mode of conducting a great system is from time to time to obtain the necessary information to enable you to know what ought to be done. Of course, the Department may act without discretion; but, if so, that cannot be helped, because Parliament has entrusted to the Department the administration of a great system, and it seems to me that its first duty is to obtain all the information necessary to enable it to administer the system discreetly and wisely. With regard to the other point, I think I shall be able to entirely satisfy the noble Lord. I am sure he would wish that these schools which stand outside the system should be tolerably efficient. Of course, it would be exceedingly unjust, when education is made compulsory, that there should be schools which do not supply the necessary education. I do not think anything could be more reasonable than that there should be some inquiry into the condition of these schools, more particularly when you remember that no less than 23 years have elapsed since they were recognised as efficient. Can anybody suppose that during the whole of that time no changes have taken place, and that those schools may not require to be looked into? The Circular may look very formidable, but I do not think there is anything very alarming in it. In the first instance, it requests that the Inspector shall propose to the Managers an inspection of the schools. If the Managers are willing, of course the matters go on without further difficulty; but the Department think that it is only right to let the School Managers know what will be the result if they receive this overture unfavourably and refuse to allow the inspection. The noble Lord asks upon what authority that is done. The Act of 1870 provided that a Return should be made, in the first instance, to enable the Department to determine where throughout the country the schools were efficient and where they were not. But the Act did not confine itself to a single Return. It said the Department might require Returns from those schools at any time, provided only one Return was required for each year.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Does the Act say they shall not only give a Return, but allow the Inspector to inspect?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Yes, that is in the Act. The 1st clause says the Return is to be made; and the next that the Inspector may inspect the school after the Return is made. I would point out to the noble Marquess that if access is refused to our Inspector, technically a Return might be called for; but that merely means that we should have to use so much red tape and foolscap in sending to the Managers. We have a right to require the Return, and, having done that, we have a right to inspect everything which follows. But we do not wish to put the schools to the unnecessary trouble of making these Returns, and, therefore, we ask them to allow the Inspectors to visit the schools. If they do not do that, the consequence is pointed out to them. There is no intention to act harshly to the schools. All we desire is simply to know what their condition is; and I think, when we reflect that for 22 years and more there has been no inspection of them, anybody will say that it is the plain duty of the Department to ascertain what their present condition is. My own impression is that it would be better they should be inspected yearly, and it seems to me the Act contemplated there should be constant Returns made, because it provided that not more than one Return should be made in a year. They are schools which, for certain purposes, are recognised as part of our elementary educational system, and it is quite proper that they should be inspected by the Department and reported upon. I can only say there is not the slightest desire to destroy those schools, or to act harshly towards them.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF CHILDREN) BILL.

Commons' Reason for disagreeing to one of the Lords' Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I beg leave to move that the House do not insist upon its Amendment. The point was whether these schools should be allowed to be established or not under the Bill, and the words which were left out were—

"In granting or withholding their consent under this section"— that, is to the establishment of the schools—

"the Education Department shall take into consideration the sufficiency of accommodation available for the blind and deaf children in existing schools."

And the Commons dissent for this reason—

"Because it would diminish the powers given to School Authorities under the Bill, and raise considerable difficulties of Departmental administration as to limits of distance and otherwise."

The objection is really this—that although the Department ought to have made some inquiry, and will make inquiry, with regard to the facilities afforded, it will hamper the action of the Department very much if you put this in. For instance, take London, it would be impossible, if there were any institutions in and around London, to say to what distance you might have to go. That Amendment, therefore, it seems to me is quite unnecessary. I am told there is a considerable feeling in the matter on the part of many Members of the other House, and that to insist upon this Amendment might incur some danger of the Bill being thrown over altogether.

Moved, "That this House doth not insist upon their Amendment with which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Ordered, That the Evening Sitting of the House To-morrow do commence at Four o'clock.

House adjourned at half-past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 4th September 1893.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table, and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

MIXED TRAINS ON THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY.

MR. BEITH (Inverness, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that much agitation exists in the Northern Counties of Scotland regarding the Order of the Board of Trade as to the marshalling of mixed trains on the Highland Railway; that the Directors declare, if the Order be enforced, that the number of mixed trains must be largely reduced, causing the greatest inconvenience to the sparse population in these Highland counties and small coast towns, to which such travelling accommodation is of the utmost value; if he is further aware that the Highland Railway Company have worked the existing system of mixed trains for nearly 40 years, to the entire satisfaction of the general public and with remarkable freedom from accident or loss; that the Directors believe that "The Railway Regulation Act, 1889," allows ample discretion to the Board of Trade in respect of the Order complained of; and that, in addition to dislocating their working arrangements, compliance with the Order would entail a large capital expenditure for loop sidings, besides outlay in fitting and working their trains with the automatic brake, which they assert the experience of nearly 40 years proves not to be required; and whether, in these circumstances, the Board of Trade will insist upon enforcing the Order?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MCNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I am aware of the agitation with regard to the Order made by the Board of Trade in February, 1891. That Order directed the Highland Railway Company, among other things, to provide on all their trains carrying passengers continuous automatic brakes before the 31st December next. The Railway Regulation Act, 1889, was passed by Parliament in the interests of public safety. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature that continuous automatic brakes should be provided, if not for every vehicle on trains carrying passengers, certainly upon all those vehicles in which passengers are conveyed. This cannot be done under present arrangements if the goods waggons in a mixed train are placed in front of the passenger vehicles. Although the Board of Trade are willing to allow a limited number of mixed trains, it is an invariable condition that in such trains passenger carriages must be placed in front, so as to allow of their being provided with a continuous brake. The Highland Railway is one with severe curves and steep gradients, and upon such a railway it is especially necessary that the travelling public and the servants of the Company should have that protection which is afforded by continuous brakes. The absence of such protection has led to many accidents in various parts of the United Kingdom, and to several such accidents on the Highland Railway itself. Compliance with the Order may involve the Company in some expense, but not to the extent referred to by the hon. Member. I am unable to exempt the Highland Railway Company from an obligation which has been willingly accepted by all the principal Railway Companies of the United Kingdom, and by so doing to allow them to endanger the safety of their servants and the travelling public.

MR. BEITH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Highland Railway Company comply with all the terms of the Order, with the exception of that one term affecting their method of marshalling mixed trains; and whether, in all the circumstances, he will consent to postpone the term at which the Order in this respect would be put into operation?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am aware that the Company has complied with all the principal conditions except one, and that principal condition it is impossible to forego.

ARMAMENT OF NATIVE TROOPS IN INDIA.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the frequent employment in India of mixed forces of British and Native troops, and of the great inconvenience and danger likely to arise from the fact that a different kind of ammunition is used by British and Native troops respectively, the Indian Government will consider the advisability of converting the Martini-Henry rifle, now in the hands of the Native troops, by substituting the Lee-Metford barrel for the Henry barrel?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): A reply to a somewhat similar question by the hon. and gallant Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire was given on the 7th July last. In the absence of any proposals from the Government of India, there is no intention of taking any steps in the direction suggested by the hon. Member, the cost of which would be very considerable.

THE TELEPHONE.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Department make it a condition of any new licence that the telephone system be constructed entirely of twin wires or metallic circuits so that there may be an assurance of its efficiency; whether he is aware that in the large cities the present system of a single wire with an earth return is causing great dissatisfaction; whether his attention has been drawn to the serious loss the Telegraph Department is suffering owing to the extended use of the telephone in the cities and crowded areas from which the profitable part of the revenue for telegraphs is derived; and how he proposes to protect the public interest?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): By the terms of the Treasury Minute of the 23rd May, 1892, in the event of a licence being given to a new company, one of the conditions would be that their system must be constructed of metallic circuits. With reference to the remainder of the question, I may say that I am engaged in carrying out the policy of the late Government, who had before them expressions of public dissatisfaction, as well as the question of the effect of the telephone system on the telegraph revenue. It was no doubt with the intention of protecting the public interest that they decided to acquire the Trunk Telephone Lines and to place certain additional facilities at the disposal of the public. Their proposals were considered and approved by the House of Commons.

Mr. Mundella

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) (for Mr. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the policy of the Department, with reference to the granting of Telephone Exchange licences is that no new licence should be granted unless with the consent of Corporations and Municipal Authorities; and, if so, if any application has been made with such consent; what statutory powers, if any, the present private Telephone Company possess; and whether, in pursuance of the policy recommended by the Treasury in their Minute of 23rd May, 1892, which stated that the object was to meet, as far as possible, the views of Municipal Authorities, any application has been made by a Corporation; and, if so, from what Corporation?

*MR. A. MORLEY: In answer to the first paragraph, I would refer the hon. Member to the Treasury Minute laid before the House of Commons on the 27th May, 1892—

"For a licence to establish an Exchange in a particular town no application will be entertained unless a formal resolution in its favour has been passed by the Corporation, or other Municipal Authority, and evidence given that there is sufficient capital subscribed to carry out the undertaking."

In one case, a resolution of this kind, qualified by conditions, has been conveyed to me by the applicant for a licence. The Telephone Companies possess no statutory powers. Application for a licence has been made by the Corporation of Glasgow.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has any objection to state the period for which the agreement with the National Telephone Company will be made; and whether the maximum rate to subscribers will be inserted in the agreement?

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg at the same time, to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will undertake to submit the agreement negotiated between the Department and the National Telephone Company to Parliament for approval, in order that its terms may be properly considered in the public interest; and whether, in view of the fact that a twin wire metallic circuit is absolutely necessary, he is making the adoption of such system by the present Private Company operating the telephones a condition in the agreement he is negotiating with such company?

*MR. A. MORLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer both questions at the same time. I would explain that it is not proposed to confer a new licence on the company; the date for the termination of their licence is the 31st December, 1911, and that date will remain undisturbed. So also will the freedom they at present exercise in fixing their charges for Telephone Exchange wires. The main object of the new agreement is the purchase of the Trunk Lines and the consequent withdrawal of the right of the company to erect and work such lines. As to the submission of the agreement to Parliament, I must refer to the answers which I gave in this House on the 31st July and the 18th and 31st ultimo. In answer to a question I have received from my hon. Friend the Member for the Blackfriars Division of Glasgow, I have to say that this not being a new licence to the Telephone Company, I have no power to insist on a double metallic system.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): In view of this answer and of an answer previously given by the Postmaster General on this subject, to the effect that the agreement would be laid on the Table of the House when completed, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee, I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the recommendation of the Committee did not include the words "when completed." Did the Committee, in the view of the right hon. Gentleman, intend that the agreement should be laid on the Table only after it was completed?

*MR. A. MORLEY: I have referred to the recommendations of the Committee, and I take it that that is so.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman considers the Committee recommended that the Report should only be laid on the Table when it would be useless to the House?

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): Do I understand that these matters will not prevent Municipal Authorities from getting licences?

*MR. A. MORLEY: There is nothing to interfere with that at all.

Mr. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the words "when completed" were in the Report, and, if so, where?

*Mr. A. MORLEY: I did not profess to give the exact words of the Report. I only gave the effect of the Committee's Report—that the details of the agreement would be carried out on the responsibility of the Government, and that the agreement would be laid on the Table.

Mr. PROVAND: Is this agreement not the same as other agreements, such as for mail contracts and telegraphic service over the sea, which are always signed when laid before the House, but do not take effect until this House has signified acceptance of it?

*Mr. A. MORLEY: No, Sir. In those cases I believe it is done in accordance with Statute.

Mr. PROVAND: Is it not by Standing Order of the House?

*Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman received a deputation from Glasgow, and what answer has been given?

*Mr. A. MORLEY: The Memorial dealt with two matters, and my answer was that the whole matter would receive the careful consideration of the Government as soon as the purchase of the Trunk Lines had been completed.

ANNUAL EXPENDITURE AT THE INDIA OFFICE.

Mr. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he could lay a statement upon the Table of the House showing the details of the annual expenditure at the India Office since the institution of the grant on objects of a literary, scientific, or antiquarian character (see page 9 of the Home Accounts), and the objects to which literary patronage is extended, as well as details of any analogous expenditure not included in the grant—e.g., the cataloguing of the Records of the India Office, the indexing of the Indian events recorded in The Times newspaper, and the recent Literary Missions to Portugal?

Mr. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has no objection to giving the information for which my hon. Friend asks as an Unopposed Return; but I should be glad if he would confer with me as to the terms of his Notice of Motion before putting it on the Paper.

SURVEY OF NORTH TIRHOOT.

Mr. NAOROJI: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government intend to commence the survey of North Tirhoot—i.e., Darbanga, as owing to most unprecedented floods the time is most inopportune; whether ryots' Representatives were invited to the last Survey Conference at Muzafarpur; and whether the new Record of Rights Scheme of the Bengal Government is only a modification of the discredited Patwari Bill of 1885 that was stopped by Lord Dufferin?

Mr. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has not yet received the proposals of the Government of India as to the Record of Rights alluded to in the third question of my hon. Friend, nor has he received any official information as to the matters referred to in the first two questions.

THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD.

Mr. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is the average number per week of applications for admission to the hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums Board; what is the average number of admissions per week; and how long does it take for a suitable case to obtain admission?

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of certified requisitions received by the Metropolitan Asylums Board for admission of infectious cases to the Asylum Board's Hospitals during the months of June, July, and August, the number of cases received, and the average interval between the date of requisition and the reception of the patients; and whether it is the fact that the Metropolitan Asylums Board are unable for want of space to accommodate a large number of cases seeking admission?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): I am informed that it has been impossible to establish any such system of registration of applications for admission to the hospitals of the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylums District as would enable the Managers to make any accurate statement with reference to the number of such applications. The average number of actual admissions per week during the last 14 weeks has been 390. The actual admissions during the months of June, July, and August were 1,633, 1,736, and 1,803 respectively. The number of admissions possible each day is determined by the number of vacancies created by discharges and deaths. A selection is made each day from amongst all the applications received on that day of those cases which appear from the statements made as to their circumstances and surroundings to be the most necessitous and urgent. Unsuccessful applicants are instructed to renew their applications. I am informed that it is impossible to give the average interval between the actual requisition for removal and the admission of patients; but that, looking to the system adopted of admitting those which appear to be the most urgent, it is clear that with regard to the majority of cases which are received the interval is brief. It is the case that the Managers for the last three months have been unable for want of space to accommodate the whole of the large number of cases seeking admission.

ASSAULT ON A PLANTER, COOLGREANEY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a murderous assault committed on William and Robert Franklin, who had recently taken a vacant farm on the Brooke Estate, Coolgreaney; and whether he is aware that Franklin and his brother were seriously injured on the occasion by two men named Kavanagh and Mulligan, and if either of these men have been arrested?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The circumstances connected with the occurrence to which the hon. Gentleman refers will form the subject of magisterial investigation at Avoca Petty Sessions on the 19th instant. So far as I am aware, only one man, Kavanagh, was actually concerned in the assault on the Franklins, and he was arrested shortly after the occurrence.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Has Mulligan been arrested?

MR. J. MORLEY : I believe not.

ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF A BAILIFF,
CO. MAYO.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that within the past month a man named Deskin, a bailiff on the property of Lord Ardilaun, accompanied by other bailiffs, attacked the hut of an evicted tenant named Nicholas Noonan, living near Ballinrobe, and forcibly ejected him and his family without any decree of ejectment or other process of law, and that the hut was completely destroyed; whether Deskin was armed with any legal warrant for such proceedings; whether he is aware that, on Noonan offering resistance, Deskin presented a loaded revolver at his face and threatened to blow his brains out; whether Deskin had a licence to carry a revolver; and, if so, will it be revoked; whether, if Deskin had not a licence, the authorities will prosecute him for carrying a revolver without legal authority; and whether Noonan was prosecuted for resisting the bailiff, and returned for trial, while Noonan's application for a cross-summons was refused?

MR. J. MORLEY : I understand that the bailiff acted in this case under a decree of ejectment obtained at Quarter Sessions on July 20 last. It is a fact that the bailiff drew a revolver on Noonan, but not, as I am informed, until after Noonan had stabbed one of the bailiff's assistants with a pitchfork and was about to make another attempt to stab. The bailiff has a licence to carry a revolver, and there are no grounds for revoking the licence. Proceedings are pending against Noonan, who has been returned for trial to the next Quarter Sessions at Galway on October 19. His application for a cross-summons against the bailiff was refused at Petty Sessions, the Magistrate stating that, in his opinion, the circumstances of the case warranted the action of the bailiff in drawing his revolver.

THE CASE OF MR. TUPHOLINE.

MR. A. C. MORTON : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Tupholine, against whom warrants have been issued for alleged theft and various debts in Dover, has managed to elude the police since the 7th July last; whether in the interval Mr. Tupholme has been recognised in Folkestone and London, and information given to the police; and whether he will cause steps to be taken to get Mr. Tupholme arrested?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. Tupholme is said to have been recognised since July 7 on two occasions in London, but not at Folkestone. All the usual and necessary steps are being taken to obtain his arrest.

UGANDA.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has yet received a Report from Sir Gerald Portal on Uganda; and, if so, when will copies of that Report be sent to Members of this House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): Reports have been received, and those which have already been considered by Her Majesty's Government will shortly be laid upon the Table of the House; but I may remind the hon. Member that, in view of the fact that Sir Gerald Portal is still in Uganda, no Report hitherto received from him can be considered as final.

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, seeing that the Merchant Shipping Bill, read a first time on 24th August, besides consolidating the existing law, introduces changes in the law by increasing the powers of the Board of Trade, as in Clause 720, by substituting summary jurisdiction for procedure before Justices as in Clause 579, by reducing punishments, imposing new penalties, and creating new offences, he will undertake not to press forward this Bill without allowing an adequate time for its previous examination, and giving to the House adequate opportunities for its full discussion?

Mr. A. C. Morton

MR. MUNDELLA: There is no intention of hurrying this Bill through the House. We have circulated over 70 copies of the Bill to bodies and authorities interested in its administration, and have invited their observations from the point of view of consolidation only. We propose now merely to read the Bill a second time, with a view to its reference to a Committee of both Houses, who will consider the suggestions received, and who will satisfy themselves that the Bill in no substantial sense increases the powers of the Board of Trade, imposes new penalties, or creates new offences.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I give notice that if this Bill is brought in after hours I shall oppose it.

RATES PAID BY FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the total amount of rates paid by the Government on the houses of Representatives of Foreign Powers; which Representatives of Foreign Powers pay their own rates on their houses either in whole or in part, and what amount is paid by each; and which Representatives of Foreign Powers, if any, pay no rates at all?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The net amount payable by the Government on this account for the present financial year is about £1,825. Representatives of Foreign Powers have no relief from rates, except on the terms of reciprocity, and then only for certain kinds of rates. I may say that, practically, all important Powers have agreed to the arrangement made by the late Government and embodied in the present Estimates.

ARKLOW HARBOUR.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state on what ground a grant of money is asked for Arklow Harbour, and what the character of a Royal harbour imports?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: £3,500 was granted by the late Government towards £7,000 required for building a new breakwater, and was voted last year. It was found impossible to spend more than £2,000 last year, and therefore £1,500 has to be re-voted. It is not a new grant. Arklow is not now a Royal harbour, and there is a mistake in the description of it in the Estimates. A Royal harbour is a harbour which is the property of the Government.

PLURALISTS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can say when the Return of Pluralists in the Public Service will be ready?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: A Circular was issued to all Departments calling for the information required. Many have replied, but I am afraid that I cannot yet say when the Return will be complete.

THE DEER FORESTS COMMISSION.

MR. W. WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the evidence taken by the Deer Forests Commission, up to the present time, will be printed and laid upon the Table of the House before the House is asked to vote any money for the expenses of the Commission?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): No, Sir; the Commission have not considered the question of submitting Evidence for presentation to Parliament by instalments; and, in any case, it would be impossible to have it all printed and presented during the present Session.

YACHTING DISASTER ON THE TAY.

MR. W. WHITELOW: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a yachting disaster took place in the Firth of Tay about 24th July last, and that the cause of it has never been ascertained; that the opinion is freely expressed that the yacht was hit by a shot from the artillery guns on Barry Links; and that it is asserted that shots frequently strike the water near the spot where the disaster occurred; and will he inquire into the matter?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The General Officer commanding in Scotland telegraphs that this is the first he has heard of any shots from Barry Camp having passed near vessels. He has had no complaints, and every possible care has been taken. A Report has been called for from the officer who was in command of Barry Camp on 24th July.

REGULATION CORDITE POWDER CARTRIDGES.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many regulation cordite powder cartridges can be fired from the Maxim machine gun before the barrel becomes unfit for accurate shooting?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is impossible at present to give a decided answer to this question, as, up to the present, no trials have been made with the object of determining the number. Experiments are, however, now being carried out at Aldershot with the gun in question, of which one is so arranged as to finally decide this matter.

TREASURY COMMITTEE OF 1891 ON RAILWAYS IN THE NORTH-WEST OF SCOTLAND.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that the Treasury Committee of 1891 on Railways in the North West of Scotland, consisting of Major General Hutchinson, R.E., C.B., Rear Admiral Sir G. S. Nares, K.C.B., and Henry Tennant, Esq., reported Loch Broom, Ross-shire, to be encumbered with islets and rocks, and that this Report has been repeatedly quoted in this House as a reason for refusing the promised grant in aid of the Garve and Ullapool Railway extension scheme, while the Admiralty charts show no islets or rocks in the course of vessels sailing to and fro from Ullapool, and the sailing directions, as well as the Admiralty officials, state that Loch Broom is remarkably free from rocks and islets, steps will be taken to contradict the inaccurate statements contained in the Report referred to, and thus obviate the injury to the district which they are calculated to produce?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I do not think the course suggested by the hon. Member can be taken.

PASSENGER VEHICLES OF TRAINS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the passenger vehicles of the trains run by the Highland Railway Company are provided with automatic continuous brakes as required by the Order of the Board of Trade, in pursuance of "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889"; and whether, as the limits of time allowed for this provision expired on the 16th August last, penalties will be imposed if the Highland Railway Company have not complied with the Order?

MR. MUNDELLA : No, Sir; on several of the trains run by the Highland Railway Company continuous automatic brakes are not provided. The Order of the Board of Trade in this respect was extended at the special request of the Company from the 16th August till the 31st December next, when it will come into force. It is my intention to take the steps provided by the Act for enforcing compliance with that Order.

IRISH GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if, having regard to the Resolution of the House of Commons, dated 13th February, 1891, that in all Government contracts every effort should be made to secure the current wages for competent workmen, he will direct that the operation of this Resolution be put in force in Ireland; and if specific instances, whereby the effect and benefit of this Resolution have not been observed in Ireland, are brought under his notice, he will, in the interest of the parties concerned, direct the carrying out of said Resolution?

MR. J. MORLEY : At the request of my right hon. Friend I shall reply to this question. As I have frequently stated, steps have already been taken to give effect to the Resolution in question in the case of all Government contracts in Ireland; and the Government are not aware that the provisions of the Resolution, in its application to such contracts, are infringed. If, however, the hon. Member will bring under my notice specific instances in which it is believed the Resolution is not complied with, I shall have immediate inquiry made into the matter.

THE MUZAFURPUR CONFERENCE ON THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that every non-official present at the Muzafurpur Conference on the Behar Cadastral Survey rejected the scheme of the Government of Bengal for the maintenance of the Record of Right, as unjust to the agriculturists of Behar; whether he is aware that a Memorial to the Secretary of State, setting forth the objections of the people of Behar to this scheme, is being signed by large numbers of leading landowners and ryots in that Province; and whether the Secretary of State will withhold his sanction from this scheme until he has had an opportunity of considering the objections?

MR. G. RUSSELL : The Secretary of State has not received any official information about the Muzafurpur Conference; but from the newspaper reports the facts seem to be as stated by the hon. Member. I can only repeat the answer which I made to a similar question of the hon. Member's on the 25th August, that the Secretary of State has already given his sanction to the Survey.

SIAM.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government will negotiate with the Government of Siam for equality in respect of commerce and concessions between British subjects and the subjects of the Most Favoured Nation; and whether, in Siamese dominions, British Consuls or Vice Consuls will be appointed at whatever places French Consuls or Vice Consuls are stationed?

SIR E. GREY : It is laid down in Article X. of our Treaty with Siam of April 18, 1855, that—

"The British Government and its subjects will be allowed free and equal participation in any privileges that may have been, or may hereafter be, granted by the Siamese Government to the Government or subjects of any other nation."

This seems sufficiently comprehensive without the negotiation of a fresh stipulation. It would entitle Her Majesty's Government to ask for the appointment of British Consuls or Vice Consuls at any place within the Kingdom of Siam where the Consuls of other Powers are permitted to reside. But the question whether Consular officers shall be so appointed must depend, in each case, on the amount to which British interests are involved.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I should like to know whether we are to understand that whatever arrangements are made between France and Siam the Government will insist on the continued observance of this Treaty?

SIR E. GREY: As long as the Treaty remains in force, we shall uphold those provisions of it which are in our own interests.

SWAZILAND.

SIR R. TEMPLE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, before the Adjournment of the House for the Autumn Recess, he will state the arrangements to be settled for Swaziland, so that time may be allowed for discussion of the same?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I very much regret that I am not yet in a position to state to the House the terms of the proposed Swaziland Convention; for it is not yet signed. I may say that the delay has not been on our side. But I still hope, before the House rises, that the Convention will have been concluded; and if and when it is concluded, I will immediately communicate its terms to the House.

COLLISION NEAR AUCHNASHELLACH.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Inspecting Officer of the Board of Trade, in his Report on a collision which occurred last autumn near Auchnashellach, on the Highland Railway, made the following observations: that it is satisfactory to know that very shortly, when the Order issued by the Board of Trade, under "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889," regarding the use of continuous brakes, comes fully into operation upon the Highland Railway, it will be obligatory to have an automatic continuous brake in operation upon all the passenger vehicles of mixed trains, so that a recurrence of an accident of this description, which upon many parts of the system might be very serious, will be well-nigh impossible; and whether the Board of Trade Order is now in operation and has been obeyed; and, if not, what steps he proposes to take to enforce the Order in the interest of the public safety?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the Report in question, and the accident to which it refers adds one more to the many instances in which the necessity for a continuous automatic brake has been practically proved. The Order of the Board of Trade made by the right hon. Gentleman comes into force on the 31st December next, and, in the event of a non-compliance with its requirements, the statutory steps will be taken to enforce it.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES IN MALTA.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the result of his inquiries in Malta as to the Contagious Diseases Regulations existing there, especially in regard to the system of making soldiers point out the women from whom they allege they have contracted disease, and as to the compulsory examination of women; and what steps he is taking to put a complete stop to the entire system?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A Report has been received from Malta on this subject. It appears that the Ordinance of 1861 imposing restrictions on prostitutes is still in force. The Local Government attempted in 1888 to repeal it, but were defeated in the Council of Government by 13 votes to 6, the six being all official Members. A soldier admitted to hospital suffering from venereal disease is requested to indicate the woman from whom he contracted it; but he is not punished if he declines to do so. Formerly this was obligatory on the soldier, but that is no longer the case.

SENTENCES ON LEWIS CROFTERS.

*MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to the sentences passed by Sheriff Johnstone, of Dingwall, upon Robert Saunders, aged 60 years; John Graham, 55 years; Murdo MacIver, 40 years, and James Makay, 40 years, crofters of Borge, Island of Lewis, for taking their horses from a poindfold into which they were placed by Mr. Paul Helm, a local Magistrate and tenant of the farm of Galston adjoining the township of Borge, a farm covering an area of 24 square miles, and formerly occupied by crofters, from which they were evicted and their houses destroyed without compensation; and whether the sentences Sheriff Johnstone passed on these crofters will be remitted?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I have inquired into this case. Until within the last few years the farm of Galston was fenced, and there were gates on the public road at each end of the farm preventing cattle from outside from straying on to it. Within the last few years these gates and fences have been on many occasions maliciously destroyed. In consequence of this the cattle and horses from outside frequently trespassed upon the farm. In order to prevent this trespass the tenant of the farm (Mr. Helm) recently applied for and obtained interdict against the crofters of the Borge township, and the original interdict and decree were personally served upon every member of the township and explained to them. Notwithstanding this, 30 or 40 horses were apparently encouraged to graze upon the farm, and ultimately were poinded by the tenant. A crowd of 30 crofters armed with sticks then proceeded to break the poind, and four of them were convicted of a breach of the peace, and imprisoned for terms of from 15 to eight days. I think the question of the gates is for the County Council to deal with, and I do not see any ground for interfering with the sentences. I am informed that a considerable part of the farm has been apportioned by the Crofters Commission to the township of Mid Borge.

STORNOWAY FISHERY PROSECUTIONS.

*MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to the sentence of three weeks' imprisonment passed by Sheriff Johnstone, of Dingwall, on Norman Macmillan and Donald Macmillan, fishermen, of Stornoway, in consequence of some sea trout having become meshed in their nets whilst they were fishing for herrings in Stornoway Harbour near the mouth of the River Creed; whether he is aware that previous Sheriffs have always allowed the right of fishermen to set herring nets in any part of the harbour; and whether this sentence will be remitted?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The fishermen in question placed their net obliquely across the mouth of the river. They had 18 sea trout in their boat, and 50 more in the undrawn net, and no herring. The proprietor of the fishing prosecuted. The sentence was not three weeks' imprisonment, but, under the Statute, a fine; and, failing payment, three weeks' imprisonment; and at the request of the men 14 days were allowed them to pay the fine. I see no ground for remitting the sentence.

*MR. WEIR: Will the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues facilitate the passage of the Scottish Fisheries Bill to prevent cases of this kind?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: There are some very important provisions regarding salmon fishing in the high seas which my hon. Friend behind me proposes to introduce into the Bill, but these provisions would not have met this case.

HIS HONOUR JUDGE LEONARD.

MR. CLOUGH (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Lord Chancellor is aware that at a special sitting of the Winchester Bankruptcy Court, held on Friday, the 18th August, 1893, before Mr. Registrar Godwin, a Petition in Bankruptcy was presented by Mr. C. S. Wooldridge, solicitor, against His Honour Judge Leonard, of the Hampshire County Court, Circuit 51; that the petitioning creditor was Mr. James Moore, Sheriff's officer of the said Judge, an auctioneer of Grove Road (South), Southsea, the amount of the debt being £278 for money lent; that the act of bankruptcy alleged in the Petition was the failure of His Honour Judge Leonard to satisfy two judgments obtained against him by the said Moore, in respect of the amount referred to, one being dated 19th March, 1891, and the other 17th April, 1891; that, on the presentation of the Bankruptcy Petition by the said Mr. Wooldridge, the learned Registrar said he had been advised that he had no power to make a Receiving Order against the said Judge in his own Court; and that the said Registrar adjourned the case for a month to enable the petitioning creditor to make arrangements for the transfer of the proceedings to London; and what steps the Lord Chancellor proposes to take under the circumstances?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): The Lord Chancellor is causing inquiry to be made into the matters referred to in the question put by my hon. Friend, but I am not in a position to make any further answer.

EVICTED TENANTS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.), for Mr. J. REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to include the question of the evicted tenants in Ireland amongst the subjects upon which legislation will be proposed by them in the Autumn Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): As I am about to move a Resolution, in proposing which I shall refer to the Business of the Autumn Session, it will, perhaps, be better that I should defer particulars for a short time.

MASHONALAND.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that Her Majesty's Government hold the South Africa Chartered Company responsible for the protection of British subjects in Mashonaland, Her Majesty's Government will give the Company a free hand in dealing with Lo Bengula, and withdraw their prohibition against an offensive movement; whether it is not a fact that in warfare, especially with savage races, defence is often best secured by taking the offensive; and whether it is a fact that, within the last few years, Lo Bengula's impis have massacred over 10,000 unoffending Mashonas?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is not the intention of the Government to modify the instructions they have already given with regard to the conduct of the Company. As to the question whether it is not the fact that in warfare, especially against savage races, safety is often best secured by taking the offensive, I am extremely reluctant to make myself a judge of the rules of warfare. It may sometimes happen that it will be wise to jump out of a carriage going full gallop—[laughter]—though rarely, or to jump out of an upstairs window where there is a fire. But these questions, I think, must be left to decide themselves according to the circumstances of the case. I find that the Colonial Office have no information to the effect suggested by the hon. Gentleman, that Lo Bengula has destroyed more than 10,000 unoffending persons. But if they received such a statement as that they would view it with some degree of incredulity.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not substantially the fact that Lo Bengula's impis have massacred a number of unoffending people in Mashonaland?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am quite sure that the Secretary of State will give any information that he has to submit to the hon. Gentleman; but I do not think it would be wise in me to give an answer without having made particular inquiry.

CHOLERA ON THE HUMBER.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can give any definite and reliable information with regard to the number of cases of Asiatic cholera in the Humber ports?

SIR W. FOSTER: I am sorry to have to inform the right hon. Gentleman and the House that we have received from the Humber ports news of a very unsatisfactory character. Early last week it came to the knowledge of the Local Government Board that a fatal form of diarrhoea was prevalent at Grimsby. On obtaining that information we immediately sent an Inspector to that port, and he found that the persons who had already died had been speedily buried. While he was there—in fact, on the day after his arrival—another death occurred, which has since, from post mortem examination and subsequent investigation by experts, proved to be a case of Asiatic cholera. There was a second death on August 31, and two deaths on September 2, in the Grimsby district, from Asiatic cholera. As regards the Port of Hull, three deaths, at least, from cholera have occurred within the last few days. We have no information from Hull or Grimsby as to the course of the disease yesterday, and that is, so far, favourable as regards the position since Saturday.

MR. HENEAGE: Is it not a fact that the number of cases which have been actually ascertained to be Asiatic cholera is limited to five at Cleethorpes, and that there is not a single case in the town or Port of Grimsby?

SIR W. FOSTER: The cases are given to me as occurring in those ports to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes—the two cases at Cleethorpes occurred, one on August 31 and the other on September 1; but the serious element in the situation lies not so much in the number of cases, as in the fact that, for some weeks past, there has been a fatal form of diarrhoea prevalent in that port.

MR. HENEAGE: Are not all the five cases at least a mile from the town or Port of Grimsby?

SIR W. FOSTER: I do not dispute the accuracy of the topography of the right hon. Gentleman. The cases are returned to us by the Urban Sanitary Authority; and, therefore, I have been obliged to give the facts broadly as occurring within their district. We have every reason to think that during the past week, and possibly previously, the Local Authorities have done all they can to prevent the spread of the disease.

COMMANDER BETHELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say definitely what is the character of the disease which has broken out at Hull?

SIR W. FOSTER: It is definitely known; and I am sorry to say that it is Asiatic cholera.

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) rose to move the

Sir W. Foster

Resolution of which he had given notice with regard to the Business of the House during the remainder of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman said: In rising to move the Resolution of which I have given notice, I may just as well state at the outset that, on two points which I will presently explain, we propose somewhat to relax and modify that Resolution; but I will not refer to that matter now. We have already apprised the House that we shall propose—of course, we cannot tell on what day the discussions upon Supply and upon the Appropriation Act will come to their termination—but whenever that day does arrive we shall propose to adjourn till November 2 for what we have termed the Autumn Sittings. These Autumn Sittings are expected to last till the Christmas holidays, and I think before I propose the Resolution which would give greater stringency to the Rules limiting the proceedings in this House with reference to the increase of despatch, I ought to indicate to the House what are the views of the Government with respect to the employment of the time which will be made available during those Autumn Sittings should they be accepted by the House. I can assure the House that the Government are sensible to the difficulties of determining that question at the present moment. They have felt that it is their duty to remind the House that—where the quantity of time is limited, which it would be in this case—the limits of time are inexorable. They can only be accepted and submitted to, and the best way to turn that time to account is, in our judgment, carefully to view the calls upon us as a whole, and to make the best and fairest selection of Business that we are able to devise for the employment of that time, and not to hold out vague and indefinite hopes, when a laborious Session such as this has already advanced so far, which in all probability we may not be able to fulfil. We have considered many urgent claims upon the time of the House, and what we feel is that our only choice is to select the best and the most urgent claims among many which are both urgent and good, but which the time of the House, we fear, at present will not enable us to satisfy. We have arrived at the conclusion that there are two claims to which it is our duty to give a prominent place during the Autumn Session. One of those is the claim attaching to the Bill relating to employers' liability, which has already reached an advanced stage, and with regard to which we think the labour bestowed upon it ought not to be entirely thrown away. The other is a Bill which, we believe, by the majority of the House, will be thought to have the highest of all claims upon us—namely, that Bill which is known by the name of the Parish Councils Bill. It would be premature if I were to endeavour minutely to point out the allocation of the time in the Autumn Session, from day to day and week to week, and that will not be expected. But the course which will be taken at the outset will be this: that we shall ask the House to read the Parish Councils Bill a second time, and, it having been read a second time, in the brief interval which would naturally occur before going into Committee, we should propose to take the Employers' Liability Bill, with the hope of bringing that to its conclusion. Looking at the two Bills, we think that the time between November 2 and the Christmas holidays will be amply sufficient in all reason for disposing of those measures. With regard to anything beyond them, our opinion is that we should not be justified, in the present state of circumstances, in holding out any expectation. It is a matter which hardly admits of an absolute mathematical decision, but in these cases it usually happens that expectations as to time are more apt to be exceeded than to allow of any economy. Therefore, I think it right to say, with regard to various questions which have been addressed to me as to other subjects which undoubtedly have a very high place in the minds of many hon. Members, that we do not see our way with any confidence to get beyond the amount of Business that I have indicated in connection with these two Bills, and we cannot bind ourselves to any other expectation. In our opinion, the two subjects I have named stand very distinctly, in public interest and importance, at the head of the list, and we have endeavoured to meet what we think is the prevailing opinion of the House in the selection we have made. With respect to the Resolution which I have to propose, the House will remember, no doubt, that, under the peculiar circumstances of the present Session, the House, at an early period, placed at the disposal of the Government nearly the whole of its time; and, unless the House had taken that course, it is quite clear that we could have made no effectual progress with the important measure the discussion upon which was concluded upon Friday last. The ordinary Session of Parliament lasts from six to seven months, but I am afraid that the Session in which we are now concerned promises to last from eight to nine months, and we have, therefore, no desire in the remaining Sittings to ask for what is beyond the necessities of the case. There are two points upon which I understand, through various channels, that some uneasiness and anxiety prevail. While I believe that there is a very general wish to meet equitably the necessities in which we stand, and to give all reasonable facilities for greater despatch in carrying through the Business of the House, in the first place it is suggested that the absolute prohibition of what are called dilatory Motions in relation to Government Business is a stringent measure. This I am not altogether prepared to deny. In fact, the case is wholly presented to the House as a case of urgency, and a case, generally speaking, of necessity; but there is such a thing as satiety of contention, and if there be a limit to the human appetite in this respect I must say I think the rich banquet which we have enjoyed now for six or seven months must have produced a sentiment approaching to that satiety; and, therefore, we are not indisposed to meet any demand which seems to us not to be unreasonable. We therefore propose that the prohibition of dilatory Motions shall be limited to the hours before 1 o'clock, and shall not extend beyond that hour. There is another change which is of some importance, perhaps of considerable importance, with reference to the Autumn Sittings. The apprehension has prevailed that there was on the part of the Government a general intention, in fact, to temporarily abolish the Twelve o'Clock Rule, and to prolong our Sittings far beyond the hour of midnight. We think we may venture to give up the proposal to deal wholesale with the Twelve o'Clock Rule during the Autumn

Sittings, and the Motion will run in these words—

"That for the remainder of the Session (unless the House otherwise order) the House do meet on Friday at Three of the Clock. That Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to every day of the week, and that the Question on any Motion appointing a Saturday Sitting be put forthwith. That, until the Adjournment for the Autumn holidays, Government Business, and the appointment thereof, may be entered upon at any hour though opposed, and be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House, except on Wednesdays ;"

—therefore, the Autumn Sittings will be exempted from any interference with respect to the Twelve o'Clock Rule—

"and that, before One o'clock a.m., no dilatory Motion be moved thereon except by a Minister of the Crown."

The House has already shown its disposition to make great sacrifices in the discharge of duty. I believe that disposition is not yet exhausted. I feel sure that the House will think that the Government, in making these modifications of the Resolution, have done what they could to economise their limited means, and to make the proposals for such economy as acceptable to the various quarters of the House as it is within their power to make it. I beg to move the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That for the remainder of the Session (unless the House otherwise order) the House do meet on Friday at Three of the Clock. That Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to every day of the week, and that the Question on any Motion appointing a Saturday Sitting be put forthwith.

"That, until the Adjournment for the Autumn holidays, Government Business, and the appointment thereof, may be entered upon at any hour though opposed, and be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House, except on Wednesday, and that, before One o'clock a.m., no dilatory Motion be moved thereon except by a Minister of the Crown."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Before I discuss the important statement which the Prime Minister has just made, I should like to ask him whether I have rightly caught the observation made in the earlier part of his remarks that the Appropriation Bill is to be taken before we adjourn for the holidays? That, surely, is an unusual course, and one which will be extremely inconvenient to the officers of the House, who will have to remain here during the week in which the Appropriation Bill is carried. Neither does it further Government Business, inasmuch as the Business of the Autumn Session could be carried on while many of the stages of that Bill were being proceeded with. I only throw that out as a practical recommendation. I pass now to the right hon. Gentleman's statement. He has told us that he means to have an Autumn Session, and he has told us what Bills of importance he means to take in the course of that Autumn Session. In my judgment, an Autumn Session is both unnecessary and inexpedient. I do not believe that the legislative machinery can work smoothly or effectually if you ask from it too much; and I think to ask the House of Commons to carry on not merely the ordinary Business of an ordinary Session, but business of exceptional difficulty, involving an exceptional strain on every Member of the House; to ask them to carry on that Business from January till the end of September, and then to meet again in November, after perhaps not more than a month's holiday, to discuss other questions which, whether they be controversial or not, are, at all events, very complex and very important, involving very great interests, is to throw a burden on the machine which I do not believe can properly be carried. I am afraid we shall find, when the Autumn Session comes, we are not in a position to deal as effectually with the very important problems brought before us as we might have been had we come to their consideration fresh after the ordinary Recess. It would be superfluous, and would lead to unnecessary controversy, to go in detail into the mismanagement which, in my opinion, has given that justification of their proposals which the Government allege to exist, and I shall content myself with the general protest I have made. I pass to say one word about the Business which the Government mean to take in the Autumn Session. I must say if the Government meant to select from their not inconsiderable programme two Bills which have not a Party character about them, and which are, I think, desired in some shape or other by a considerable number of persons in this country, I think they could not have done much better than choose the two Bills which they have selected. Whether it will be possible really to discuss these two Bills within the time specified is a question which I am quite unable to answer, as it depends not on Party considerations, but on the number of important questions which may be raised in the course of the discussion of these two important measures. With regard to the Employers' Liability Bill, I can only say that, though it is not a measure which, to my mind, shows very great originality or grasp on the part of those responsible for it; though it is rather taken wholesale, without apparently very much meditation or consideration, from the programme of the Trade Unionists, yet I think it is possible when it is passed it may settle, not perhaps in the most satisfactory way, the question with which it deals for some time to come. Two great questions undoubtedly must be discussed upon it. They have not yet been discussed, and will have to be dealt with at length by the House. One is the question of contracting out, and the other is the question raised by the manner in which the Bill deals with the shipping interest. These are questions of very great importance, and I think it improbable that the House will be able to dispose of them quite as quickly as the Government hope. With regard to the other Bill, I need only say that, whatever be its merits or demerits, it is certainly not a Party question. We on this side are, at least, as anxious as gentlemen on the other side of the House to see the broad foundation of Local Government which we have laid completed. But I cannot conceal from myself that the Bill does raise a great many important issues, and, while it may require limitations in some directions, I think extensions in other directions ought to be attempted; and probably it will be found, when we come to discuss it—if the Government mean to deal in one Bill with the whole measure which they have sketched out to the House—there may be some difficulty in adequately and completely discussing it, unless we are to look forward to a repetition of those strange measures of furthering Government Business with which we have become too unhappily familiar in the course of the last few months. I pass from the Autumn Session, which only indirectly comes within the scope of the Resolution, to the discussion of the Motion itself, and I congratulate the Government in having on two most important points profoundly modified the Resolution as it originally stood on the Paper. When I heard the terms in which the Government couched their proposal I felt that a blow was being aimed at Parliamentary liberty, perhaps even more far-reaching in its character and more capable of abuse in the future than even those other extraordinary measures to which I have already alluded, and on which I do not intend to say another word. But the Government, in a conciliatory spirit—on which I congratulate both them and the House—have altered the Resolution in two great respects. They have altered it as regards the power of moving dilatory Motions, and they have altered the extent of their action in regard to the Twelve o'Clock Rule, so as to limit it strictly to the period which is to intervene between the present time and the beginning of our Autumn holidays. I think the Government were well advised in making the change with regard to dilatory Motions. What was the old procedure when some of us first entered the House? There was then no Twelve o'Clock Rule; there was no limit put upon the Business of the House except the fatigue of the Members. What protection, in these circumstances, had the minority when the small hours of the morning came? They had this protection only:—They proceeded to move alternately the Adjournment of the Debate and the Adjournment of the House until it became perfectly clear to the Government that the controversy was one which, if continued, would redound neither to the convenience of Members nor to the credit of the House, and after a brief period a compromise was arrived at and everybody went happily to bed. I do not know whether that was a very good system. I think it has been greatly improved by the employment of the Twelve o'Clock Rule. To abolish the Twelve o'Clock Rule and to sweep away the old system at the same time is to hand over the minority bound hand and foot to the majority, and, as we know, not this particular Opposition, but all Oppositions, are the people upon whom devolves the carrying on of such criticism of Government Bills as may be necessary. The Government themselves usually take so favourable a view of their own legislative projects that they think they are quite good enough to pass through the House without any discussion at all. It is plain that there would be a very great temptation to the Government, possessing, as they must always possess, a large majority towards the end of the Session, to carry to an undue length the discussion of their Business unless the minority had restored to them the weapon with which alone they could fight before the Twelve o'Clock Rule was established. I pass from the question of dilatory Motions—which does not prevent the Adjournment being moved before Business commences—to the other great concession which the Government have made—namely, that which refers to the time during which the Twelve o'Clock Rule is to be abrogated. As the Motion originally stood, there was to be no Twelve o'Clock Rule during the Autumn Session. I am glad the Government have not adhered to that view, and have now confined it to Supply; and, having done so, I hope they will not ask too much either of their own Party or of the officers of the House; and that if the Adjournment does not take place at 12, at all events the discussion will not go on for an undue length of time. Only one question remains for me to call attention to, and that is the question of Saturday Sittings. I had rather hoped that the provision in the Resolution about Saturday Sittings was to be confined, as the provision about the Twelve o'Clock Rule is confined, to the remainder of the present Session, and that the right hon. Gentleman did not contemplate in the Autumn Session requiring us to attend, not only from Monday till Friday, but on Saturday also. I think that is a power so easily abused, a power which throws such an enormous burden on the House, and such a crushing load on the officers of the House, that, when we are in Session treating of Bills, the Government ought not to be permitted to indulge in Saturday Sittings without being required to debate the question first. Of course, if the Government were content to confine this Resolution to Supply, they would only be carrying out the invariable practice. I think the Government would not object, acting in the conciliatory spirit which they have already shown, to extend the limitation they have adopted with regard to the Twelve o'Clock Rule to Saturday Sittings. We are now in the eighth month of an arduous Session, and I think the Government really cannot ask us, when we come to the tenth month, to sit not only five days, but six days a week. When the Autumn Session arrives, if the Government find they have not sufficient time to carry out their programme, they will be able to come forward with some new proposal, which we can discuss in an equitable spirit. After the conciliatory speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I do not wish to sit down after having given expression to any criticism of which the right hon. Gentleman may think he has a right to complain; but I must say that I think our convenience would have been better consulted if we had had rather longer notice of the Motion, and especially of the terms in which it was to be proposed to the House. Owing to the want of that notice, we all came here expecting to have a more arduous battle to fight than, I am glad to say, now lies before us, and much individual trouble would have been saved had the House known what the Government intended to propose. Though I venture to hope that the slight further modification which I have asked for may be granted by the Government, I am happy to say that the proposals made are incomparably better than we had reason at one time to fear they would be.

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said, that there was only one word in the courteous and conciliatory speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) of which notice need be taken. That was the word "unnecessary," which the right hon. Gentleman applied to the Autumn Session. The sole cause of an Autumn Session being necessary was the position that had been taken by gentlemen opposite with regard to the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill. The object of the Opposition had been that that measure should be held over to next Session. An offer had been made on the subject—[Opposition cries of

“No, no!”]—he did not say by the Leader of the Opposition, but certainly an offer had been made by the organs of the Party with regard to that Bill. The object of the supporters of the Government was to deal with the Bill during an Autumn Session, in order that the course might be clear for the Welsh Disestablishment Bill next Session. The Prime Minister had spoken of the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill under a name which often filled him (Sir C. Dilke) with dread—the name of “The Parish Councils Bill.” He was bound to protest against the use of that name, because it was not the proper title. The Bill applied not only to parishes, but to every inhabitant of England and Wales, and the portion which did not apply to parishes was of overwhelming importance. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) thought that the Employers’ Liability Bill was likely to take a good deal of time during the Autumn Session, but it had been fully considered in Grand Committee, in which, in spite of the absence of a considerable number of Conservatives and Liberal Unionists, all sections of the House were well represented. Although it might be thought necessary to revive that discussion, the questions raised by the Bill could not be better argued out than they had been in Committee. He thought, also, that but little time need be expended on the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill, which was called by the Prime Minister the Parish Councils Bill, unless gentlemen opposite were so minded. He took it that the object of suspending the Twelve o’Clock Rule during the present Sittings was mainly to enable the Government to make progress with certain non-contentious measures which had been passed in the other House. In that connection he wished to know what the Government proposed to do with respect to the Bill for the abolition of the Presidency commands? He trusted that some of the moments after 12 o’clock might be devoted to the passage of that Bill, which it was absolutely necessary to pass at the earliest period if the Armies of India were to be placed in a position to meet any forces that might be brought against them. He should like to know, also, whether the Prime Minister would consider the advisability of devoting Saturday Sittings during the Autumn

Session to the Eight Hours (Mines) Bill, and whether the Indian Budget would be taken during the current Session, which, he thought, would be more satisfactory than deferring it till the Autumn? He thanked the Government for the course they had taken, as he believed that their supporters in the country expected of them some such action. He thought, also, that the two measures which they had selected were well chosen, and hoped that, having initiated a strong policy, they would go forward with their programme and complete it in the course of the present year.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The Resolution which the Prime Minister recommends to the acceptance of the House, even with the Amendment which has been introduced, is a very strong order indeed. As it stood on the Paper it amounted to very little less than a revolution of Parliamentary practice and procedure, and as it stands now it is a very considerable extension of what has happened in previous years. As I understand it, there are three points on which the Government require the assistance of the House. In the first place, they propose to have an Autumn Session, and during that Session to take the whole of the time for Government Business. In the second place, they propose to extend all the Sittings, prior to the Autumn Session, practically till 1 in the morning. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] The Prime Minister, in suspending the Twelve o’Clock Rule and preventing dilatory Motions till 1 o’clock, will, I think, produce the result of prolonging the Sittings until 1 in the morning. The third point is that the Prime Minister proposes to reserve practically to the Government absolute discretion with regard to Saturday Sittings during the whole time that the House is to sit. With regard to the Autumn Session, my right hon. Friend (Sir C. Dilke) has enunciated a very curious doctrine. He said that it had become necessary, owing to the action of the Opposition with regard to the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill. But, as far as I am aware, the Opposition have taken no action whatever. I certainly know of no offer or compromise such as has been suggested having been made from the only quarter from which it could come—namely, the Leader of the Opposition—and I challenge the Government to say whether any such compromise has been suggested to them? My right hon. Friend, with his experience of newspaper literature, actually took what appeared in what he was pleased to call the organs of the Opposition as though they were serious and bonâ fide offers from the Opposition to the Government. I venture to say that no such offer has ever been made. It is certainly a very strong thing that after such a Session as we have gone through we should be asked to have another Session in which, inasmuch as the whole time is to be taken up by Government Business, the constant attendance of Members will be necessary. It is that very thing that has made the present Session so burdensome to the Officers and Members of the House. We have not been discussing, as in ordinary Sessions, alternately Government Business and Private Business, which generally only interests a comparatively small proportion of the House; but for the whole time we have been discussing Business to which it has been necessary for the whole House to give its attention. However, I will assume that in the hole in which the Government find themselves they are obliged to do something. My right hon. Friend said that the course proposed by the Government was expected of them, and it is well known that the present Government always does what is expected of them from a certain quarter. The 1 o'clock extension, I think, was a proposal to which the Government might give further attention. It is proposed that the Ministers of the Crown only should make dilatory Motions. That is another extension of the responsibility and power of the Ministers of the Crown, and it is a precedent which may afterwards be found very distasteful to those who now support them. I gather that it is not the desire of my right hon. Friend that our Sittings should, as a rule, last till 1 o'clock; and if that is so, will he see any objection to arranging that a dilatory Motion cannot be moved by anyone other than a Minister up to 12 o'clock instead of 1? On another point, is it intended that there is to be any protection for Sunday, or are we to sit on Saturday nights until the Government have decided that they have done the requisite amount of work, without reference as to whether we have entered on the hours of Sunday or not? As to Saturday Sittings, I have only to express my entire agreement with the opinion that it would be an extraordinarily arbitrary thing to have them throughout the Autumn Session. I do not think that a Motion of this kind ought to be regarded as a Party question. If there is any advantage connected with the increased powers we are giving the Government, you may be sure that some other Government will benefit by them. Whatever the benefit is both Parties will share it, and we have to regard the matter only from the point of view of the interest of the House and of the Debates, and not from the consideration whether at the moment it will benefit one Party or another. Whenever a Government takes a new departure and extends an old precedent, as they are doing now, what they, perhaps, intend as an exception becomes hereafter the rule. No matter how much the Leaders of the Opposition for the time being may object to the extension, when it comes to their turn and they are subjected to pressure from their supporters, they will be obliged to follow the example. I think we have a proof of that in what has been going on in the present year. The Government have based their action this Session in regard to the Closure on a precedent which they themselves opposed at the time. They have felt themselves compelled not only to adopt the precedent which they disapproved of, but to go far beyond it. I say that, whatever you do to-day—and, for my part, I care very little how much or how little you do—it is our duty to warn you that what you are doing now your opponents will certainly do hereafter. As to the Business of the Autumn Session, I understood my right hon. Friend to say that the Autumn Session will terminate when the two Bills to which he alluded had been got through.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend has gone a little beyond what I said.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Of course, it is perfectly clear that these two Bills will take a considerable portion of the available time of the Autumn Session; but the point on which I want information is whether there will be an assurance that, supposing they are got through quickly, the Government will not bring on other Bills or Business? My right hon. Friend below me (Sir C. Dilke) suggests that they should take advantage of the Autumn Session to deal with the Eight Hours Question. Well, Sir, I am in favour of the Eight Hours Bill, and on two occasions have voted for it; but I would point out that the opposition during the Autumn Session will be of a very different character if it is understood that any spare time which may result from the diminishing attention of the opponents of the Government is to be employed in pushing forward other measures of an extremely contentious character. I, therefore, think it will be very important that the Government should make it perfectly clear what their intentions are. As to the two Bills it is proposed to take, I entirely agree with what has been said as to their non-Party character, but they are highly controversial. If I take the Employers' Liability Bill, on which I consider myself somewhat of an expert, I may say that, although I do not think that Bill is likely to occupy a very lengthened time, a considerable number of days may fairly be claimed for the discussion of the very important points raised by it. My right hon. Friend (Sir C. Dilke) referred to the discussion of that Bill in the Grand Committee. Well, that Committee was arbitrarily and tyrannically appointed by the Government to consider the Bill, against the wish and desire of the whole Opposition, and against the wish and desire, no doubt privately expressed, of a considerable number of the supporters of the Government. They thought that the Bill was one which might have been safely left to a Committee of the Whole House, and had that course been followed I am sure it would not have taken up more time than it will do now. Under the circumstances we are not going to give up our right of discussion upon Report. The Leader of the Opposition referred to several important questions arising under that Bill; but there are others which, in the interests of the working classes, ought to be discussed. The Bill, in my opinion, is extremely incomplete and imperfect, and will not do justice to those whose interests it is intended to serve. It will be our duty to extend and complete it. As to the Parish Councils Bill, my right hon. Friend (Sir C. Dilke) says there are very few points on which it will require discussion. Well, in the first place, there is the whole question of the administration of the Poor Law, which, for the first time, has been brought before the House in a Local Government Bill. There is also the whole question of the boundaries and grouping of parishes—a question which concerns and interests every parish in the country, and in reference to which several important points of principle have to be decided. In the last place, there is the question of the future administration and government of local charities. All these are questions of very great importance, and when they occur in a Bill of 71 clauses and two Schedules, I think the Government are rather sanguine in imagining that, without very strong measures indeed, they will be able to force them through in the Autumn Sitting. I have just calculated how many ordinary days there are in the Autumn Session. Reckoning five days in the week, there will be just 32 days. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: 37.] My right hon. Friend says 37 days. In that case the Sitting would last up till Christmas Eve. I have hardly attached sufficient importance to the zeal of the Government and their supporters. I thought that probably they would stop about a week before Christmas Day. Does the House know how long it took upon the consideration of the Local Government Bill in 1888, which did not raise any greater question of principle, and certainly no more questions of detail, than the present Bill—I mean in the shape in which it was presented? I do not think it would be disputed—the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would not say it was of less importance than the Bill he is in charge of. Well, that Bill took 41 days; and if it took 41 days, it is reasonable to ask how long a Bill of this importance, plus the Employers' Liability Bill, is to take, and whether it will be possible, or anything like it, to get through both in 37 Sittings? That is a matter we can consider when we come back fresh from our holidays in November. I only want to say that, with a Bill of so much detail, the Government certainly do run some risk of finding that even their good intentions are a little falsified. We only ask the Government now to consider whether, with regard to the future as well as the present, they are really wise in pressing these extreme advantages and privileges both for the Autumn Sitting and the continuance of Supply?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby):

I am sure, Sir, it must be a satisfaction to both sides of the House that a matter regarded by some as very contentious has been met in this friendly spirit. We all feel that there must be as much give and take as the circumstances admit of on all these questions of business. I am prepared to answer some of the questions; but there is hardly anything left to argue of a contentious nature. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, in his courteous speech, asked as to the Appropriation Bill. It is not usual, but it is not unprecedented, to take it before the conclusion of the Session, and, under extraordinary circumstances, to take other business afterwards. That was done in 1882. We propose to do it this year. There are some financial difficulties which might be got over; but still inconvenience would be caused by putting the Appropriation Bill down for November. My right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) asked as to the Indian Budget. It has always been the practice to take it during the progress of the Appropriation Bill, and we propose to take it during that period. I am extremely glad that my right hon. Friend has declared that the measures selected for the Autumn Sitting are not regarded as Party measures. I accept that declaration, and I think he need not have addressed to me those warnings against accepting the dogmatic declarations of Party newspapers. I am glad of his repudiation of the declaration of omniscient editors as to the policy of the great Parties in the State. We may take it that the two measures proposed for the Autumn are measures which everybody wishes to see pass into law in some form or other. My right hon. Friend said truly that powers taken by one Party to-day will be taken by another Party to-morrow. We do not act on any other assumption than that. The other day the Leader of the Opposition remarked that matters were discussed in a very different manner under the régime of the modern democracy from what they were in former times in an unreformed Parliament. That is true. One of the consequences is this—that more power has to be given to the Government, who are the organic Representatives of the majority of the House. We are coming more and more to see that Bills cannot to any great extent pass except in the hands of the Government, and that is the reason why from year to year it has been found necessary to give to the Government more control of the time of the House than was given in former times. My right hon. Friend asked as to the method of dealing with other Bills besides those mentioned. The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. Dilke) asks for a day for a particular Bill. The Government feel, in asking for these powers from the House, that they are not at liberty to pick and choose other measures and give them precedence. We are asked if we intend to take any other measures. Our object certainly is to promote these two measures; and although we cannot bind ourselves for the House, it is not our intention to promote other measures than those two in the Autumn Sitting. I hope that is regarded as satisfactory. Something has been said about Saturday Sittings. It cannot be supposed that Ministers are particularly eager for Saturday Sittings. The Saturday Sittings are proposed principally, almost exclusively, for the purpose of concluding Supply. That is desired by us—desired, I think, by both sides of the House. With regard to the Autumn Sittings, it is not in our contemplation to use Saturday Sittings as an ordinary instrument; but we do not wish to exclude ourselves from the benefit, if necessary, in particular cases. My right hon. Friend referred to the Sabbatarian question of Saturday Sittings extending into the Sunday with the Twelve o'Clock Rule suspended. At present there is no protection against Saturday Sittings going on into the Sunday. I think he may trust us—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Will you move the Adjournment?

SIR W. HARCOURT : There is not the least protection now. I think the House may trust the Government—[“No, no !”]—well, if you will not trust the Government, perhaps you will trust individual Ministers of the Crown that they will have no desire to prolong the Saturday Sittings. Under these circumstances, after the concessions which have been made, I think the Resolution may be taken as accepted by the House.

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he did not rise for the purpose of introducing a discordant note, but he desired to draw attention to the Government arrangements for this Session. Supply was always regarded by Ministers as a nuisance ; but the House of Commons had always held that its main function was the control of Supply. But how could they deal with Supply if they had the Estimates thrown at their heads in the month of September ? This was the first Session in which Parliament would have sat in every month of the year except one. He did not deny that when the House decided to bring the Session to a close, it was the duty of the Government to arrange the business for the remainder of the year. That was the course always pursued in the House. But he would point out that, in present circumstances, the House could not control Supply as it ought to do. The House was not a mere law-making machine. They had a function to discharge in reference to the expenditure of the country. The result of the present action of the Government would be that the acceptance of this Resolution would be converted into a precedent, and that they would be told in the future that the House of Commons had agreed to it unanimously. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Resolution, as amended—

SIR W. HARCOURT : I did not use the word “ amended.”

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, the word might have not been employed, but it conveyed in substance what the right hon. Gentleman meant. He wished to impress upon the House that the rights of private Members—their rights and privileges—had been diminished by the Government in the past, and now it was proposed still further to encroach upon them. He must especially enter a protest against the novel proposal that no Motions were to be accepted of a dilatory character unless from Ministers of the Crown. It was the first time they had heard of such a doctrine as that. He had always been under the impression that one Member of Parliament was as good as another ; but that, it appeared, was to be the case no longer. The Government had taken a course that would altogether snuff out the rights of independent Members who in the Constitutional period before the days of “ gagging ” had been inaugurated, refused, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was aware, to be bound by any agreements which might be come to between the two Front Benches when any interference with their privileges was involved. He protested against the action of the Government in this matter. He wished to know whether the Government gave a pledge that no business of a controversial nature other than Supply would be taken before the Recess ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : The Government propose to take only one or two non-controversial Bills, such as the India Command Bill, before the Adjournment.

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, of course he did not wish to press for an immediate statement in full detail, but no doubt the Government would be in a position in a short time to state distinctly what Bills they proposed to take before the Adjournment.

SIR W. HARCOURT : Certainly.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Mr. Deputy Speaker, so far as the Irish Members are concerned, I believe I can say with confidence that we wish to give the Government every assistance, and even to make all sacrifices that may be necessary, in order to enable them to carry their programme in the Autumn Sittings. The Irish Members will have to make considerable sacrifices—much greater sacrifices than other Members. [Laughter.] Yes ; we will have to make greater sacrifices, because we live at a greater distance, and it is, indeed, a great sacrifice to have to come here. But, so far as that goes, we are perfectly prepared to do so. I am, however, inclined to urge upon the Government that when they make concessions after the experience we have had during the present Session, I hope, and we hope, that they will not make any concession which would be likely to render the Autumn Sittings abortive, but that, out of consideration for all their supporters, they will take care that the Autumn Sittings will realise the expectation with which they are looked forward to by the British people. I observe that the Prime Minister, in the statement he made, did not make any specific reference to the Evicted Tenants Bill. I admit that the Autumn Sittings are extremely likely to be occupied by the Employers' Liability Bill and the greater measure by which it is to be succeeded; but I did not understand him to withhold the hope of making progress with the Evicted Tenants Bill. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) makes merry at the expense of the misery of homeless people in Ireland.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I must resent that remark. I did not laugh at the people at all. I laughed at the idea of any progress being made with this Bill at that period of the year.

MR. SEXTON: If the hon. Member will be good enough to keep quiet when an inoffensive speech is being made I will make no allusion to him. The Government themselves a year ago appointed a Special Commission, and after that Commission had reported we balloted for a day and obtained one for a Bill on this subject. That Bill was debated throughout nearly the whole of a Wednesday, and I think, after the speech that was delivered on that occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. J. Morley), we would have carried the Second Reading had not it happened that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) thought it convenient to rise at the last moment and talk the Bill out. Well, Sir, it is a duty I have to perform—it is a duty I cannot postpone—to make specific reference to the question of the Evicted Tenants Bill on this occasion. The Report of the Royal Commission was that the question was an urgent one. It is an urgent one. It is one of great gravity, and it is most intimately connected with the state of social order in Ireland. I think the Chief Secretary will acknowledge that, and there is no man in the House who knows it better. [Mr. J. MORLEY signified assent.] I only rise to say these few words indicating my view, and the view we take here on these Benches, of the case. What I have to urge—and I urge it by way of a question—is to ask whether before these Sittings conclude the Government will be willing to take advantage of any occasion which may arise to enable us to receive, what I think we have a right to obtain, if we possibly can; and that is, firstly, a decision and an expression of the judgment of the House upon the principle of this Bill; and, secondly, whether the Government will be disposed to afford facilities, whether now or in the Autumn Sittings, to make further progress with it? In connection with that inquiry, I would also ask whether the Government themselves have come to any conclusion upon the Report of the Royal Commission which they appointed; and whether, if not, the subject is, at any rate, not excluded from consideration, and that we may hope that, in the near future, whether in connection with the Bill of the Irish Members or apart from it, we may trust the Government will consider it in their power to aid us in arriving at a reasonable conclusion?

MR. J. MORLEY: The appeal my hon. Friend the Member for North Kerry has made is one the Government ought to deal with without delay. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the question of the evicted tenants is one of great gravity and some urgency, and one that goes to the root of social order in Ireland. In all these propositions of my hon. Friend I cordially agree; and he only stated the truth when he said that no one had better reason for knowing the truth than I have. Both from what happened before the Session began, when, last August, the Irish Government nominated the Commission, from what passed in the discussion on the proceedings of this Commission, from what passed in the discussion upon the Bill to which my hon. Friend has referred—introduced, I think, by the hon. Member for North Leitrim (Mr. P. A. M'Hugh)—the Government earnestly feel the necessity of dealing with the question. And although, as I indicated on the Second Reading of the Bill, the Government could not accept all the details of the Bill, they did accept the principle upon which the Bill was framed, which was one of the principles laid down in the Report of the Evicted Tenants' Commission. We could not accept the doctrine of compulsory indiscriminating reinstatement; but otherwise we accept the principle of the Bill as laid down in the Report of the Commission on this question. As the House and my hon. Friend will understand, owing to the great pressure to which the House has been subjected upon Irish Business during the previous months of this Session, it would be asking almost more than human nature—political human nature—could be expected to give, for us to undertake to provide more time for discussion of another Irish Bill even so important as this. Therefore, the conclusion to which the Government have come is that the question is too important to be trusted to the chance of a Saturday Sitting, in which they would probably not carry the measure further for ultimate practical and effective purposes; and, therefore, the subject is one which can only be efficiently and satisfactorily dealt with by the Government themselves. Next year, therefore, it will be my business and my duty to lay before the House proposals for settling this question.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): When? Next year?

MR. J. MORLEY: Surely my hon. and gallant Friend must perceive that I have gone a good way in stating the intention of legislating next year, and that I can be hardly asked to state the precise month or week in which the proposal can be laid before Parliament. I think it would be unreasonable now to expect me to state it. I am sure my hon. and gallant Friend and the other gentlemen from Ireland will understand that. I began by saying, as I shall end by saying, that no one is more aware than I am of the importance of the question, and of the responsibility attaching to a Government which leaves that question open a day longer than is absolutely necessary.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he had risen at an earlier period to put a question to some Member of the Government, and had hoped that he might have the opportunity of doing it before the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke. The few remarks the right hon. Gentleman had made in his first speech had, to a certain extent, answered the question he (Mr. Stuart) had desired to put; but he was bound to say those remarks had filled him with astonishment and dismay. After the observations of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, however, in reply to an Irish Member, he felt emboldened to ask for a pledge on an English subject in which many of the supporters of the Government were deeply interested. Surely the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were aware of the pledges which had been made to London to the effect that some measure of relief would be brought in for it. No assistance had been given to the Metropolis in spite of the repeated promises made to its Representatives. There was a measure before them as uncontentious as any of those to be brought forward by the Government in the present Session—a measure passed without a dissentient voice, without a Division, at an earlier period of the Session. What steps did the Government intend to take with regard to this Bill—the Bill for the Equalisation of Rates in London? What did they intend to do with this Bill, or some other measure for the relief of the London ratepayer—to whom the Government were not only so deeply pledged, but so deeply indebted? He did not wish to occupy the time of the House unduly. The question was a very simple one. Many Private Bills dealing with London had been passed, but all that had done had been due to the exertions of London Members themselves. They had gained what they had gained because of the reasonableness of their demands. The measure for which they were now asking had received the sanction of the House in a Resolution which had been passed. The principle was not contested, and, under the circumstances, he urged on the Government, or some Member of it, to give an elucidation of what their action was to be. It had been intimated that in the Sittings that were to take place after the short Recess this, that, and the other measure were to be proceeded with. Well, he wanted to know what the Government intended to do as to the particular measure to which he had referred? He was a faithful supporter of the Government, but in this matter, speaking for hon. Members who sat around him—although he had had no opportunity of consulting them—and also speaking for the 3,500,000 ratepayers of London who were groaning under excessive rates, he urged the Government to bring in a Bill to rectify the grievance of these people. They had voted for the Government in the expectation that they would grant what he (Mr. Stuart) was now asking for. He could not doubt that some satisfactory assurance would be given from the Front Ministerial Bench on this matter. He and his friends were bound to stand true to their constituents, and it was because of that that he raised the question at this moment.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he could not help noticing the very different treatment meted out by the Government to the London Members and the Representatives from Ireland. When Irish Members got up hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench craned forward and put their hands to their ears to take in every syllable that fell from their masters. But when an important London Member like the hon. Member who had just sat down, and who certainly represented a great number of London Members, spoke, not a single Member on the Treasury Bench listened to a word that he said. ["Oh!"] Yes; he had watched them all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been talking the whole of the time to the Prime Minister.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There is no foundation whatever for that assertion.

MR. HANBURY: Except the evidence of his own eyes, and the eyes of everybody sitting there. That was quite good enough evidence for them. It was a remarkable thing that the Government to the last did not know their own minds. Even on this, the last important night of the Session previous to the Autumn Sitting, they continued their old line of action—changing their Resolution at the last moment. It had assumed an entirely different shape to that in which it was originally proposed, causing considerable confusion to the House. Even now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking on behalf of the Government, was unable to tell them the Bills it was proposed to bring forward before the Autumn holidays. The right hon. Gentleman said there were, perhaps, two or three non-controversial Bills they would bring forward, but he would not name those Bills, the selection not having been made. The right hon. Gentleman could not give a definite promise as to what Bills would not be brought forward.

Sir W. HARCOURT here rose.

MR. HANBURY said, he must refuse to give way to the right hon. Gentleman after the flat contradiction he had given him just now. He intended to pin the right hon. Gentleman to his own distinct declaration. The right hon. Gentleman would not run away from his own words. He had said that no controversial Bill would be introduced between now and the Autumn Sitzings, and the only interpretation to be put upon that was that the Government would not bring forward Bills which the Opposition had any objection to.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I must protest against the irascible tone adopted by the hon. Member who has just sat down. The matter is one on which both the Opposition and the Government have rights and opinions, and there has been a desire shown on both sides to arrive at a settlement. Up to the time when the hon. Gentleman rose the proposal of the Government seemed to be regarded as satisfactory to the House. The hon. Member said that no Member of the Government listened to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch (Mr. Stuart). I give that statement the most emphatic denial. As I had to reply it was my duty to listen to him, and I heard every word he said. The hon. Member finds fault with the alteration which has been made in the Resolution. Perhaps he would like the Government to go back to the original Resolution. The Resolution has been modified, having regard to the feeling which prevailed on that side of the House, and I do not think it is fair to taunt the Government for having adopted a modification in order to meet the views of those from whom they differ. The hon. Member asks us what we mean by "non-controversial." Surely the hon. Member is aware that that was the invariable term the late Mr. Smith used at this time of the year, and that he always declined to be drawn into a definition of what were and what were not non-controversial measures. We use the term in good faith. The main part of my right hon. Friend's statement remains unchallenged, and my right hon. Friend particularly mentioned that in a day or two he would mention the Bills which would come within his description of "non-controversial." As to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch, I agree with all he says respecting the importance of the equalisation of the rates of the Metropolis; and if the Bill on that subject could be placed in the category of non-controversial measures, there would be no difficulty in passing it during the present Session. The Prime Minister stated the principle on which the Government has proceeded. They think that the time of the House will be quite exhausted by the two Bills they have mentioned; and, therefore, they could not add any others to the list. I would, however, remind my hon. Friend of one consideration. We are now in September. The framework of the Equalisation of Rates Bill contemplated its coming into operation in September. That, of course, is impossible. It is a question whether the Bill might be altered so that the measure might come into operation next March. On that point I will express no opinion; but I do not think the position of the Bill will be in any way prejudiced by the action the Government have taken. Not only is the Government pledged to the principle of the Bill, but the House is unanimously pledged to it also. There may be differences of opinion as to the way in which that principle should be applied, but I do not think that when the proper time arrives much difficulty will be found. There are many Members opposite who are anxious to see the Bill passed into law; and if any arrangement were made so that the Bill might be treated as non-controversial, the Government would be pleased to see it pass during the present Sittings. If, on the other hand, it is treated as controversial, we must reserve it for the future, at the same time renewing the pledge that we shall carry it at the earliest opportunity.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he was by no means satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's reply. Assurances had been given again and again that the Equalisation of Rates Bill would be carried during the present Session. Although the matter might not be absolutely non-contentious, it had reached its present stage with the assent of all Parties; and as the Bill consisted of only one clause, there could not be a very long Debate upon it. It seemed to him that those who differed respecting its provisions might very well settle their differences after an hour or two's Debate. He asked that an opportunity should be given for such a Debate. The private Member was now being snuffed out altogether, and the arrangements made with private Members respecting Bills in which they took an interest were not attempted to be carried out. Unless an attempt were made to pass this London Bill the Government would discover their mistake when the General Election took place. Many of the London Members had been in the House night after night supporting the Government, when other Members had been dining. The House now saw the result. He asked the Irish Members, and Members generally, to remember that the whole Session had been given up to the Home Rule Bill. The London Members now asked that a constituency almost as large as the whole of Ireland should receive some little attention on the part of the Government. The London Liberal Members had very little to thank the Government for, and when they were fighting the late Government they very seldom received much support from gentlemen occupying seats on the Front Bench. Unless London was going to throw overboard its claims, and to send Members to the House of Commons to be the absolute slaves of the Government in power, it was necessary for the London Members to make some stand. Though there might be some differences of opinion with regard to the details of the Bill, he felt persuaded that hon. Gentlemen opposite would recognise that, looking to the probable poverty of the coming winter, and to the thousands of men who were out of work, some consideration should be shown to the poorer residents of the Metropolis, and the least that could be done would be to lessen the rates in some of the overburdened parishes. He did not think the Government were treating the London Members fairly in throwing this Bill over, and he should feel himself at liberty to take his own course with regard to all their other measures unless they passed this Bill.

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, it must be a great consolation to the Government to know that the threat which had just been made came after they had passed through the House the only Bill they wished to pass. Unfortunately, the independence of the hon. Member and his friends had come a little late. The Government had known it would come, and they had therefore arranged for the Monday after the Home Rule Bill had been sent up to the Lords to give the London Members their opportunity. The Government had been told by some of their supporters that if they did not pass the Equalisation of Rates Bill this Session, they would discover their mistake at the next Election. That clearly meant that the people of London cared a great deal more about equalisation of rates than they did about Home Rule. The Government knew perfectly well that no one could describe the measure as non-controversial. It was to the interest of some parishes in London to get the Bill passed, and to the interest of others to get it altered. Personally, he was most anxious to see it passed very much as it stood. He had received Petitions from various parts of London, which showed him that there were a great many other people who would like to see it altered. However, the Bill was not only more controversial than the Parish Councils Bill, but was rather smaller, and his complaint was that it had not been put in the place of the Parish Councils Bill. He did not know how the Parish Councils Bill, if it were to pass to-morrow, would do anything like the good the Equalisation of Rates Bill would do. It was more important, if the Government could be got to believe it, to equalise the rates of London than to pass what they themselves called the Parish Councils Bill. If the Government had really been in earnest in their desire to do anything whatever for London they would have chosen the front place in the programme of the Autumn Session for the Equalisation of Rates Bill, and would have taken for it the place allotted to the Parish Councils Bill. This, he believed, would have satisfied every single London Member. But what was the consolation they got? They were told that the Government were pledged to introduce this Bill next year. How did they know where the Government would be next year? Again, they were told that they should not be prejudiced, and that the Government would turn the measure about so as to come into operation next March instead of in September. Yes, but in his constituency they would pay, for six months more, unequal rates. But this was not all. The Government had given a pledge to go on with a much more controversial measure than this Bill could possibly be, and which would take more time. They were pledged to go on with the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales; they were pledged to do something for the people who did not pay their rents, and, of course, they would neglect those who did pay their rates. He recognised that the people from whom the Government derived the most support had a far greater claim on their sympathies. With a Bill for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales, and with a Bill to satisfy the ever insatiable tenants in Ireland, what earthly hope was there that any Bill whatever for the good of the overburdened ratepayers of London would receive any attention from the Government in the next Session? He contended that the Government ought to have given proof of their righteous intention towards the ratepayers of London by selecting their Bill for precedence instead of the Parish Councils Bill.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them plainly that the Autumn Session was to be limited to two particular measures, and that the Government would not allow any portion of the time of the House to be allotted to other measures than their own. He could not help thinking the Government had been utterly wanting in feelings of compassion for private Members of this House. They had all been called upon to make sacrifices during this Session. He believed the private Member had been the most self-sacrificing. He had never been so active as during this Session in the production of legislative measures, and never had he been so unfortunate in the progress—or rather no-progress—that had been made. What he wished to do was to call the attention of the Government to the fact that there were two or three measures of private Members that had advanced so far, that a very little time would suffice to place them on the Statute Book. He would name two. The first of these was the Places of Worship (Sites) Bill. After seven years' continuous effort, that Bill had passed through both Houses of Parliament, and at this moment the only point left undetermined was whether this House should, or should not, disagree with a particular Amendment introduced into the Bill by the House of Lords. He submitted it would be a great pity and a disappointment to a large section of the community if some fragments of time were not found for the completion of that measure. The other measure was the Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill, which had been read a second time, and which had passed the Grand Committee. Under existing arrangements no progress could be made with those measures. He asked the Government not to close the door of hope against private Members, but at least to leave it open to consideration whether it might not be possible during the Autumn Session to find that little time for the completion of these two measures; which would afford some consolation to those who had been disappointed in finding opportunity for submitting other measures to the House.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, the Motion the Prime Minister had made upon this occasion differed from the Motions of a more or less similar character which had been made in past Sessions, because usually they were made at the fag-end of Supply, when it was not unfair to suspend the ordinary Rules of the House. But this year they were dealing with the substance of Supply. They had got, practically, all the Civil Service Supply to do, and it would have been much fairer if the Prime Minister had consented to alter his Motion so as not to take away the power of moving the Adjournment of the House or Committee after 12 o'clock. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was necessary the Government should have more power over the proceedings of the House; but that ought to be given by regular Rules, and he hoped the House would set its face against the abominable encroachment of the Government on the time of the House by endowing themselves with exceptional powers to use in the way that seemed best to them at the moment. Let these powers, as they must be given, be given under the regular Standing Orders. With regard to the Parish Councils Bill which he understood that the Government had decided to introduce, he fancied that Bill was a much bigger business than a good many gentlemen seemed to think. Personally, he wanted to see a Bill of this character passed; but the Bill of the Government, if it was to be satisfactory, would have in some respects to be largely amplified, and in other respects to be largely contracted. He regretted very much they should not be able to undertake the Parish Councils Bill when the House was fresh, and when there was plenty of time for its consideration. He was afraid that in the Autumn Session they should be obliged to have their Debates very much limited, or else this important Bill would be thrown aside or not properly discussed. Considering this reform, so far as they knew, was to last, humanly speaking, for all time, it was a thousand pities that a reform so admirable in principle would have to be hurried through or else not passed. He wished the President of the Local Government Board could persuade the Government to postpone that Bill until they were quite certain they had plenty of time to give it the consideration its importance demanded.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, with regard to the Bill to which the hon. Member for Shoreditch had referred, there could be no question that on the principle of it there was no difference of opinion amongst London Members. They were all agreed, he believed, that the rates should be equalised. He was not quite sure that they all thought it could not be done in a more satisfactory manner than that proposed in the Government Bill. He did not believe that the question need be considered from the point of view of the threats of hon. Members. His hon. Friend had told them that if this Bill were not passed, he would no longer give an independent support to the Government on any Bill. It struck him that these threats of independence of hon. Members, when too late to vindicate their principles, were rather absurd than anything else. The principle laid down by the Government in their Resolution was eminently unsatisfactory, because it curtailed the right of all Members of the House without altering the Rules of the House. He remembered the time when they used to sit to 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, and there was constant complaint made with regard to the burden thrown on Members of the House, and it was by unanimous consent that the principle of 12 o'clock was adopted in order to limit that burden. But now day after day the Prime Minister or some other Member rose to propose the abrogation of the Twelve o'Clock Rule. He thought this was a great hardship to be inflicted upon them. If the principle was right it ought to be observed, and if it was not right it ought to be altered; but to infringe it day after day, without permanently affecting the Rules of the House, was a great mistake. Moreover, they were now going to apply the principle which used to have regard solely to Supply also to other measures. He knew they had had Saturday Sittings over and over again late in the Session for Supply; but he did not remember ever taking an Autumn Session with Saturday Sittings in order to pass a Bill. It seemed to him that was an entirely new principle, and ought not to be accepted without considerable discussion. He thought it was a great hardship to Members who had other duties to perform in London and the country to be tied so many months continuously to the House of Commons without having that opportunity of doing their duty to their constituents elsewhere which, he was quite sure, most Members of the House desired to have. The principle of making the House sit for ten months in the course of the year was an entirely new one, and very unsatisfactory to the great majority of Members. It was certain that business was not conducted best by working the whole time at high pressure. It used to be said that all complaints in that House could be ventilated before Supply was granted. Now, however, they were going to be told that the Government had set out the time not only for Bills, but also for Supply. It reminded him of a schoolmaster who set a task to children, which had to be performed in a certain number of hours. The Government were now going to be taskmasters and the House their pupils, who, in a given time, would have to accomplish a given task. That was a new principle, which infringed largely on the ancient privileges of

Sir J. Goldsmid

Members, which altered the whole system of Parliamentary government, and which certainly did not improve it. They had been told that this was the Mother of Parliaments. In his opinion the Mother of Parliaments had, of late, been setting a bad example to other Parliaments. The principle of bullying which had been applied to the Mother of Parliaments was not a good one, and it had induced one gentleman, at any rate, to threaten to be independent, a thing which appeared to be so novel that he felt it his duty to call attention to it. If a few more hon. Members would show their independence he was inclined to think business would be much better conducted.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not propose to continue the discussion with regard to the principle of the Resolution, but rather to endeavour to state what we conceive to be—having now arrived at this point—the general arrangement for carrying out the pledges of the Government, because I am sure right hon. Gentlemen, as well as anyone, will be anxious there should be no misunderstanding with regard to any point raised. In the first instance, we understand that no controversial business is to be taken during this Session—before the Autumn Holidays; and I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or else the President of the Local Government Board, to say that Mr. Smith had generally refused to define the word “controversial,” but that it was left, on the whole, to the good faith of the Government to interpret. I wish to be perfectly clear on this point—that Bills are not only controversial if they are objected to on this side of the House as against Members on that side of the House; but Bills would be regarded as controversial at this time of the Session which are full of detail, and would require a considerable amount of discussion. I should like to know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite accept that proposition? For instance, I see a Bill down here in which I take myself considerable interest—the Building Societies Bill. That would not be controversial from the point of view of Conservatives or Liberals either supporting it or objecting to it; but still it is full of a great deal of important matter upon which controversy may arise between Members of the same Party. The point is that Bills of great importance—to which a particular class attach particular importance, and as to which there may be differences of opinion even in the same Party—would be considered controversial, even though not matters of Party. That I understood to be admitted in the sense that no Bills would be urged this Session which would be likely to take any considerable amount of time. I understand we are all agreed upon that. The next point on which I would like to say a word is the question of dilatory Motions. There I think that the Government have taken into their hands a very great power, and one which ought to be most sparingly exercised, and only upon an emergency. Then I wish the Government would give us to understand that we should not be made to feel the absence of this weapon in our discussions on Supply. Frequently, in past times, when this legitimate weapon was in the hands of the majority, when the Minister in charge was not in his place, or if there was any matter to be complained of on the part of the minority, they moved to report Progress, in order to give the Minister an opportunity of attending in his place if absent, or of giving reasonable answers if they were present. When we are parting with this power, I trust we may rely on the Government to consider we have parted with a considerable weapon, and that they will use in their discussion of Supply that spirit of moderation and temper which would be the only excuse for not leaving us this power. The minority is more or less at the mercy of the Government as to its treatment when it parts with this power, and I have simply indicated it in order to establish a claim upon the consideration of the Government during the Debates on Supply. Thirdly, I wish once more to emphasise the question of Saturday Sittings, and to express the hope that the Government may see their way to meet the Opposition so far as not to extend the Saturday Sittings beyond the Sittings before the Autumn. If the power of taking Saturday Sittings is to be rarely exercised, would it not be better for the Government to withdraw that part of their Resolution subject to the power which the Government always have of making the Motion if they find it necessary when the Autumn Sittings begin? Precedents, as the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) has said, are always dangerous, and the Government are setting up a new precedent—they are taking Saturdays not only for Supply at the end of one part of a Session, but for the passing of Bills in another part, and without any limit whatever. I appeal to the Government not to extend this precedent to taking Saturdays, which might be really unnecessary, and which would be a precedent which might react in future. I do not think it will give such additional power to the Government as to make it worth while to set a precedent so dangerous and inconvenient. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see I have urged this in the most conciliatory manner, and not in the slightest degree from any point of Party advantage one way or the other. It is to the interests of the House generally that this part of the plan should be abandoned. It would not promote the passage of Bills. I really hope that, having gone so far as they have, the Government may see fit to make this further concession which the Opposition and so many of their own supporters desire.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) thought it was somewhat artful on the part of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the speech he had just delivered, to omit all reference to the subject of the London Bill, although he was a London Member. He thought London Members on that side of the House would recognise that in the complaints they had received no sympathy from London Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House? The hon. and learned Member for Deptford had expressed great affection for the Equalisation of Rates Bill; but when a definite offer was made by the President of the Local Government Board to treat it as a non-contentious measure, and it was not accepted by hon. Members opposite, if the measure was not passed before the Adjournment on their shoulders must rest the blame. He thought that most Members would recognise that the two Bills chosen for consideration in the Autumn were of the widest and most general interest, while they were also of a non-Party character. Scotch Members recognised the fact that the Employers' Liability Bill was looked upon with great interest in Scotland; but they had no immediate interest in the Parish Councils Bill. He hoped, however, that they might get an assurance from the Government that the passing of the English Bill would be only a prelude to the passing of a Scotch Bill in a subsequent Session. The Scotch Members were prepared to admit there were no large measures of a contentious character or of first importance affecting Scotland that they could expect the Government to press forward this Session, but amongst the minor Bills on the Paper that evening there were two affecting Scotland which everyone would admit to be of a non-contentious character—namely, the Fatal Accidents Inquiry Bill, and the Sea Fisheries Bill. Neither of these Bills was a Party measure. The Accidents Bill was non-contentious, and no special Division had been taken upon it, so that it might be taken as outside Party lines.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): Hear, hear!

MR. BUCHANAN said, with regard to the Sea Fisheries Bill, it embodied the recommendations of the Commission that dealt with the subject, and was supported by hon. Members who represented fishing constituencies, to whatever quarter of the House they belonged. He hoped it, therefore, would meet with approval, and pass the House as a non-contentious measure. If they had a promise from the Secretary for Scotland that he would meet those Members, half-an-hour or an hour would suffice to discuss and settle the Amendments on the Paper relating to the Bill, and it could be passed with very little discussion. He most earnestly hoped the Government would view this Bill with particular favour, because it would be productive of much good to an industry with which this House had great sympathy.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he had no intention of finding fault with the Government for producing general legislation, but he would like to call attention to the extraordinary flexibility of adaptation and change of front exhibited by the Prime Minister in proposing the abolition during the present Session of the Twelve o'Clock Rule.

Mr. Buchanan

Hon. Members were aware that great agricultural depression existed in England. Well, there had been during the last nine months two agricultural Debates, which he thought had occupied about three hours, and he, as an humble agricultural item, had asked the Prime Minister whether he would suspend the Twelve o'Clock Rule during the course of those Debates? The right hon. Gentleman gave him to understand that the suspension of the Rule with regard to agricultural distress was absolutely outside the horizon of practical politics. And now the right hon. Gentleman came down, and with a light heart proposed to abolish the Twelve o'Clock Rule in order that the Committee might discuss matters about which no one connected with the land—the farmer, the labourer, and the landlord—cared a brass farthing! He should like to have from the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. Dilke) some indication of the newspaper in which the offer of compromise to which he had referred was contained. He should like to know whether it was The Sun, The Star, or The Police Gazette? If the right hon. Baronet would tell them that, the information would be received with satisfaction by the House.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he was about to propose an Amendment, but he did not understand that it would preclude the discussion of the general question if the Amendment were put and debated upon.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley), on a point of Order, asked whether they could return to the general question if the Amendment were moved?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will decide that when I hear the Amendment.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he proposed by his Amendment to add after "Saturday Sitting" the words "before the Adjournment for the Autumn holiday," and submitted that the moving of the Amendment would not preclude the discussion of the general question if anyone desired to discuss it.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is so.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, everybody in the House disliked Saturday Sittings. The feeling was not confined to one Party, but was spread over all. When Members came down to the House and worked on Saturdays scores of other people—officials and others—were compelled to work here also, and Members themselves, after five days of work, were in no humour for working on Saturdays as a general rule. He admitted that at the close of a Session such Sittings were usual; but they were held for specific purposes, such as to wind up Supply, or to pass a stage of the Appropriation Bill, or even to pass some special non-controversial Bill. The Resolution of the Government, however, was to take Saturday Sittings not for any of these special purposes, but for general purposes, and for any Bills the Government might propose to take during the Autumn Session. That was an unprecedented course. As had been pointed out, there were only 37 days available for the two Bills. These Bills had to be passed in another place. Was there to be no discussion in the House of Lords, or did the Government think that Assembly was going to record their demands in the same way as the majority in this House were prepared to do? The House would find that these Bills would take a certain time to discuss, and that Ministers, with the power of holding Saturday Sittings, would use it, with the result that hon. Members would be brought down here every Saturday. The Amendment which he now begged to move would limit these Sittings to the month of September, during which the Government proposed to deal with Supply. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the Amendment seconded?

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he would second the Amendment. He would second anything that was calculated to diminish or curb the tyranny of the Government Bench. He came down to the House to-day with fear and trembling, because he thought the proposal of the Prime Minister might curtail the undoubted right of the House to discuss Supply; but he was relieved to find that the Government had for once realised their duty to the House, and had afforded considerable opportunity for discussing Supply. Up to this time there had been 25 Sittings in Committee of Supply, and 64 Votes had been obtained; at the same rate of despatch the remaining 121 Votes would require 47 days—that was equal to eight weeks, including Saturdays, which would take them to the 30th of October. If the House met on the 2nd of November, that would leave the holiday to consist of three days—Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. It would be better to begin a new Session. Three days would not be enough. He did not think an Autumn Session was required at all. Ministerial Members were all at variance as to the Bills to be taken, and would have to give up their own Bills in favour of the Government Bills, which were highly contentious. The Parish Councils Bill—which they were told was for the purpose of extending local government in the villages—would not have that effect. On the contrary, it would diminish the power of parishes with a population of less than 300, while the Employers' Liability Bill was one of the most monstrous inventions that ever proceeded from Radical brain.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot discuss those Bills now. He must confine himself to the Question before the House.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he did not know that hon. Members quite realised that the Government proposed to take Saturday Sittings, which implied that the Government asked for every minute of the week from Thursday at 3 o'clock to the succeeding Wednesday at 5.30 p.m. Why should they ask that they could take Saturday Sittings without debate upon such a proposal? Why should Ministers ask for the extension of privileges that were great enough already? To his mind, it was suspicious when Ministers and ex-Ministers exchanged compliments across the Table; it meant that the liberties of other Members were to be suppressed. He did not look with satisfaction upon what had been said from the Front Opposition Bench, and he hoped the independent spirit of many Members would assert itself in the Division. Who were the Government? They were only 36 placemen drawing £78,391 10s. a year—that was all that differentiated them from other Members. There was no difference, except that the Government filled the places and took the salaries. They were told this Resolution would be the Resolution of the House. By the House, he supposed, was meant the majority of a quorum of the House, consisting of 40—36 placemen and 4 unprejudiced Members. This 40 did not represent the House. They should adopt the American theory—

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. Gentleman is wandering from the point.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, they were told on the Home Rule Bill that Saturday Sittings were not necessary. If that were so, how were they necessary now? It was said they were necessary to get through Supply. But if the Government would abandon an Autumn Session, eight weeks, without Saturdays, would be sufficient for the discussion of Supply, which was of more importance than any Bills. There was no discussion of Supply last year. There had been none this year—it could not be said they had had any—the Government bringing forward nothing but the Home Rule Bill, and, therefore, they were entitled to say that they ought to have Supply discussed. It was surely of more importance than any Bill that they should look after the taxation of the country, or that they should be concerned as to the treatment of the miserable remnant of a Newcastle Programme. There was no demand for these measures—for which the Government had sacrificed, not eight or nine months, but the whole 12 months of the year. Ministers had done enough. They had kept their places this year. They might thank Providence for that. He thought they were now entitled to give time for the discussion of the Estimates, and then let them return to their constituents and take a verdict on the policy of the Government. He begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, after the words "Saturday Sitting," to insert the words "before the Adjournment for the Autumn holidays."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) was moved in a serious speech, but the arguments used were more against it than in favour of it. The hon. Member pointed out the limited number of days before the Autumn Session, and also the complicated and contentious nature of the Bills; and he argued that it was undesirable and unnecessary to use Saturdays.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL said, his Amendment did not preclude Saturday Sittings; they could be had in the usual way if they were wanted.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, they quite understood that; but that was where the fallacy lay. The usual way involved obtaining the assent of the House, and, as experience showed, the spending of a Friday to secure a Saturday; and the object of the Resolution was to obviate this loss of time by which they would be deprived of the beneficial use of the Saturday. The Resolution did away with that. It did not take the Saturdays; all it did was to enable the Government to propose that there should be a Sitting on any Saturday without incurring loss of time in a Debate. So that the House would still have it in its power to express its opinion; but the Government would obviate the risk of losing a whole Sitting by the making of a Motion. They were not prepared to act in that way now—they did not wish to oppress anybody. They thought it was not an unreasonable privilege for them to seek. The Autumn Sittings were arranged for a definite purpose, and not for the pleasure of either the Government or other Members of the House—for the purpose of passing certain Bills into law, so far as this House was concerned at all events, which was all they could control; and for this purpose it was desirable that they should have this very minute power. It did not interfere with anybody. The only effect it would have was to avert what might be a most dangerous and a most useless waste of time, when there was legislation to be carried which had been accepted generally by both sides of the House this afternoon.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it would be convenient to dispose of, as soon as possible, the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone, so that anybody who desires may again take up the general discussion raised by the Resolution. As the House will gather from the speech which I made before, I look with favour on the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The Prime Minister, in dealing with this question early in the day, told us that though the power of taking Saturday Sittings was given to the Government, the Government would use it with great reserve, if they used it at all, and we all looked upon that declaration with great satisfaction. If difficulties were to arise in dealing with Public Business, beyond question the Government would be entitled to take exceptional means for dealing with those difficulties; but it is not according to precedent for the Government to possess themselves of powers for dealing with difficulties that do not now arise, and which may never arise. What we ask of them, therefore, is to reserve action until the necessity does arise. It is true that, if they are not now given these powers, either of two courses are open to them. They can either move for a Saturday Sitting on the Friday previous, or they can move at the opening of the Autumn Session a general Resolution taking the Saturdays of the Session. We ask them to wait before taking action until we are in the Autumn Session, and not now set a precedent which may be a great danger in the future, for the purpose merely of averting difficulties which, for all we know, may not arise at all. It must be borne in mind that there is, under our modern system, no chance of wasting time on a Motion to take a Saturday Sitting.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is modern instance for an entire Friday having been wasted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : There must have been exceptional circumstances in that instance. Of this I am sure—that any attempt to unduly prolong the Debate on a Motion for a Saturday Sitting proposed by the responsible Government of the day, under circumstances which justified it, would certainly, after reasonable discussion, be closed by the action of the Speaker. I, therefore, ask the Government to wait until the Autumn Session comes, and when the necessity which the desire to provide against is obvious, imminent, and inevitable. The harmony which has reigned over our proceedings to-day has been very creditable to us all, especially to those of us who oppose the policy of the Government; and I think that harmony would be still further maintained if the Government grant the request of my hon. Friend opposite.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I would willingly, if I could, settle this matter without a Division. It is not a matter of the most consummate importance, and it is one, I think, which we ought to settle without further Debate. I will state briefly why the Government must ask the House to take a Division on this matter. I have a very acute recollection of an attempt we made to get a Saturday Sitting, occupying us the whole of Friday. Then there is another matter. If we were to postpone this proposal till the beginning of the Autumn Session, we would have just such a similar discussion as we have had to-day, and we would bring back for the opening day of the Session Members who may wish to extend their holidays. I hope the House will now pronounce an opinion on the matter, and then go on with the Resolution.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 122 ;
Noes 168.—(Division List, No. 286.)

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he had heard the figures of the Division with great pleasure, because he had voted to give the Government the opportunity of taking the time they asked for; and he was now going to ask them to devote some of that time to the cause of London. He was one of those who thought the House should sit as long as it was necessary to get through the business of the country. He believed that they were there to pass measures which they considered useful and for the welfare of the community; and it was because he held that opinion strongly that he now urged on the Government to deal with that which London wanted. Since the President of the Local Government Board had spoken early in the evening, they had had speeches from Members representing every section in the House, and there was not one of them that had not said that the principle of the Equalisation of Rates Bill was good. The Bill was not a controversial Bill according to the definition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square. The right hon. Gentleman had said that a Bill might not be controversial in principle, and yet might be laden with details which might give rise to a large amount of controversy. But the Equalisation of Rates Bill, which had been supported from all sides of the House, was not a large Bill teeming with details. The main thing in it was its principle, which had been adopted by the House, and then came one clause which contained all the details of the Bill. No one would say that the claims of London were too greatly attended to in the House. It could not be said that the 4,500,000 of London had taken up much of the time of the House; and he, therefore, appealed to the Government to grant to the London Members that small modicum of time they asked for the consideration of the Bill in which they were interested. He spoke with some amount of freedom upon this question, because he did not represent a constituency that would receive a very large amount of relief from the Bill. He supported the Bill because he believed it was necessary to give an amount of relief to the poor struggling districts of London, and he thought the Bill ought to be taken up before the House adjourned for the holidays, let alone before the Autumn Session terminated.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, it was really quite refreshing to hear some of the speeches to which the House had been treated that afternoon. He thought the Debate would stand out in the annals of the Session as showing that there was at last some sort of awakening amongst the hitherto inarticulate supporters of the Government, who felt that, after all, they had been neglecting their duties. The hon. Member who had last spoken, and others, had talked about poor suffering London. They had told the Government in bold and big tones that they would not stand the neglect of London any longer. The hon. Member for Leeds, in a speech at a dinner about March, 1892, had said the Liberals were going to have two Sessions of Home Rule. The first was to be Home Rule for Ireland, and the other was to be Home Rule for London. The London Members ventured to think that London was as important as Ireland; it was as populous as Ireland, and yet it had been utterly neglected. It was a remarkable thing that the Prime Minister did not tell the London Members of his intentions before Friday. The right hon. Gentleman did not dare to let the cat out of the bag till he had got the Third Reading of the Home Rule Bill, lest he should lose the support of those Members who now protested with such a show of independence on behalf of the suffering poor of London. The hon. Member for Shore-ditch had said the people of London had voted for the Government, expecting what they would get. The people of London now knew what they had to expect from the Government. The Unionist Members for London had told the people in 1892 that these measures were only put forward till the Home Rule Bill was read a third time, and that they would then be dropped. When he asked, last week, whether the Government intended to go on with the Local Veto Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with one of those outbursts of satire for which he was so famous, said it would depend altogether on him (Mr. Bartley). Had he (Mr. Bartley) anything to do with the plan the Government had now set before the House? Why did not the Government put down the Local Veto Bill for the Autumn Session? Because they dare not do it. They knew that half of the Front Bench men would vote against it, and, therefore, that measure, which had been put forward to catch the votes of the teetotalers for Home Rule, would never be heard of again. In fact, a large number of measures had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech simply and solely to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and catch votes for the Home Rule Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer took the rôle of Leader of the House now that the Prime Minister had left them, and he thought it was a very strong order for the Prime Minister to leave Parliament the moment the Estimates were being discussed. [Cries of "Order!" and "Question!"] He knew it was the fashion to say because the right hon. Gentleman was very old and very distinguished that he should not be here; but he took it that it was not a proper thing, and was not in accordance with the constitution of the country that Parliament should be sitting without the Prime Minister being present in that House. If they were sitting too long for the Prime Minister,

they were sitting too long for other Members as well. [Cries of "Oh!" and interruption.] He failed to catch the inarticulate observation of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said we had been six years without a Prime Minister in this House.

MR. BARTLEY said, they had not been six years without the Leader of the House; and even when the Leader of their side was very ill indeed he attended the House, and he thought they were entitled to remonstrate at Parliament being left without the Leader of the House. ["Question!"] It was the question; it was the question of the administration of the House, and the system by which it was being affected by the Government, which was a matter of serious importance to them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was unreasonable in the Opposition to refer to their changing the Resolution. They did not object to their changing the Resolution, but they objected to the general system by which Government put down double what they intended to ask for in the hope of getting a little more than they expected to get. The Resolution was so revolutionary that he believed some of the supporters of the Government resisted it; but it appeared to him that the main point had been forgotten, and it was this: What was the Government going to do, in addition to the Estimates, before they broke up for the holiday? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they would take no contentious matter except a few Bills he referred to; but, in spite of his hon. Friend's request, the right hon. Gentleman would not state what those Bills were. The Government ought to state distinctly what Bills they were going to take. He thought he should not be out of Order in referring to the mass of Bills that were on the Paper for this very night; and if this Resolution were passed the Government would be able to take any one of those measures to-night. There were the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill; Building Societies Bill; Public Authorities Protection Bill; Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill; Fatal Accidents Inquiry (Scotland) Bill; Labour Disputes (Arbitration) Bill; Merchant Shipping Bill; Notice of Accidents Bill; Savings Banks Bill; Supreme Court of Judicature Bill; Bills of Sale Bill; Sale of Goods (re-committed) Bill; Copyhold (Consolidation) Bill; Trustee (Consolidation) Bill; Madras and Bombay Armies Bill; Statute Law Revision (No. 2) Bill; Pistols Bill; Naval Defence Amendment Bill; Light Railways (Ireland) Bill; Law of Commons Amendment Bill; Expiring Laws Continuance Bill; Conspiracy and Breach of the Peace Bill; London (Equalisation of Rates) Bill; and the Vaccination Bill. This was a string of Bills all down for this evening, many of which would require a considerable amount of discussion; but if they passed the Resolution as it stood, the Government would be able, whether the Opposition liked it or not, to pass any of those measures without giving any opportunity of even considering them. That was an unfair position in which to place Members, and, in order to meet it, he would move to insert after the words "That Government business" the words "of Supply." If those words were put in, this Resolution would only apply to Supply, and Bills would have to be considered under the ordinary Rules. If the Government were in earnest, and meant what they said, they could not object to those words being introduced, because it would apply to Supply, and all non-contentious Bills would go through in the ordinary course. If the Government would accept the Amendment it would not be necessary to trouble the House with any further observations. He thought it was a very odd position to see hon. Members on the other side now clamouring for their political rights. They had been pent up in a sort of political Noah's Ark since the commencement of the Session; they found things were going wrong, and were beginning to be restive. The only thing he could conceive like it was the day when Noah let the animals out of the Ark; it must have been difficult for him to keep the tiger from eating up the lamb, and it seemed to him (Mr. Bartley) that the Government were in danger of having the political Ark capsized by the Members who had been pent up in the Ark so long, and who could hardly be prevented from eating one another at the present time, now that they were to be given a little liberty. He therefore ventured to move, in the fifth line, after "business," to insert "of Supply."

If these words were introduced it would meet all the requirements of the case.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The proper way would be for the hon. Member to move to leave out the word "Government," and insert the word "Financial."

MR. BARTLEY said, that would suit him, and he would, therefore, move it in that form.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the Amendment seconded?

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he rose with great pleasure to second it, and he agreed with every observation that had been made, even with those made by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He was not like the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles), who came down to the House with fear and trembling; he came filled with wrath and in full fighting trim. He was glad, however, that the Government had somewhat disarmed him, taken away his wrath, and made him somewhat more amiable than when he entered the House. He did not think half enough had been said in opposition to an Autumn Session on its merits. Why were they called upon to have an Autumn Session at all? He hated it, and no one wanted it—[Cries of "Order!"] Very well, the Amendment covered what he wanted to say, and he would not strain the point; none of them wanted Autumn Sittings, and he did not think it was necessary for the Government to bring forward the Resolution at all. Why were they brought to this? Simply by the action of the Government, who had consumed the whole time of the House for other Business, and they were now all jaded and wanted rest.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Amendment is to leave out the word "Government," in order to insert "Financial," and the Question is that the word "Government" stand part of the Motion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is wandering both from the Resolution and the Amendment.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet), on the point of Order, said, his hon. Friend was seconding the Amendment, and he apprehended he was in Order in his remarks until the Amendment had been moved.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Amendment has been moved and the hon. Member is seconding it.

Mr. Bartley

MR. J. LOWTHER: But it has not been put from the Chair.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) presumed, when the Amendment was disposed of by a Division or otherwise, the discussion on the general question could be carried on?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Certainly; that would be so.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, in speaking of financial business, he presumed he might also speak of other business that might be proposed in lieu of the financial business, and show their reasons for preferring financial business for all other kinds of business. In looking to the other side he was reminded of the old proverb, and found that it was very likely to prove true. He did not quote the proverb offensively; but there was an old proverb that said—"When rogues fall out honest men get their just rights." He objected to any other business but financial business being dealt with; and in support of his contention that only financial business should be disposed of, he would quote a very high authority—namely, a writer in The Lancet, who pointed out they were all worn out and unfit for the Parliamentary duties they were called upon to discharge. It was apparent, on seeing Members anywhere, that they had a more than usually jaded and worn-out appearance, and the writer said that the work they had been called upon to do must act injuriously upon legislation in the future unless they were able to recover, not only their political weakness, but their disordered brains. Therefore, he (Admiral Field) ventured to say they ought to confine themselves to financial business. A month's rest was not enough to recoup their wasted energies. If they had not been able to do other business it was not their fault; the gentleman responsible for that sat upon the Treasury Bench. He strongly objected to any other than financial business being dealt with during the remainder of the Sitting before the holidays, on the ground, among others, that as much time as possible should be given to the discussion of the Estimates, the supervision of which was of supreme importance to the country.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Government," and insert the word "Financial."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Government' stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I do not think it is necessary for us to discuss this Amendment at any length, in view of the assurances of the Government, given earlier in the evening and accepted by the Leader of the Opposition and the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, that no controversial business would be brought forward before the Autumn. Then I am asked to specify those particular Bills the Government propose to proceed with, though it was agreed on the Front Bench opposite that it was enough to make the statement which is generally made on these occasions, that no controversial measures would be taken by the Government. The Government intend to adhere to that in good faith. My right hon. Friend below the Gangway alluded to a particular measure—that is to say, the Bill with reference to the command of India. That is a non-controversial measure. If hon. Gentlemen opposite choose to regard the Equalisation of Rates Bill as a non-controversial measure we should be glad to take that, but it will depend upon hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it is so regarded. The hon. Member who moved this Amendment said, reading out the list on the Paper—"You may take these Bills at any hour." I can assure him there is no such intention. In a day or two, I hope, we may be able to state to the House what Bills will not be taken, and we shall then discharge those Orders. That is the usual course taken when the Government have asked for special facilities of this kind; and, in the meanwhile, I ask the House to accept what has been accepted by the Leader of the Opposition—namely, the statement of the Government that they will not take any controversial measures before the Autumn Session.

MR. HENFAGE (Great Grimsby): Now that we have a definite pledge from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in addition to that made before—namely, that the Government will not take any controversial measures; and, secondly, that in the course of a day or two he will state the Bills they will not take, I think the House ought to be satisfied. That has been our difficulty so far; there are a certain number of Bills down which it is clear the Government will not take; and what we wanted to have was a statement of the Bills the Government would not take. I am interested in the Building Societies Bill, and I cannot imagine that will be taken. I cannot help thinking that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made his statement earlier in the evening much time might have been saved.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) said, he had been anxiously watching the discussion, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker mouth (Sir W. Lawson) moving uncomfortably about from place to place; and he thought the hon. Baronet must be preparing to go into mourning for the Temperance Party at the attitude taken by the Government in regard to the Direct Veto Bill. Temperance men at the General Election were deluded by promises held out by the Liberal Party as to the immediate action to be taken in favour of temperance if only the Liberals were returned to power. During the hot days of June and July a great demonstration was held in Hyde Park in favour of the Local Veto Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was present, and had the greatest possible difficulty in dodging his dupes. He trusted that as the great temperance reformer of the day the right hon. Gentleman would be able to induce the Government to take up the Local Veto Bill during the Autumn Session. As there was now an Amendment before the House he was afraid he was a little trespassing, and he would not pursue the matter further than to ask the Government for a Temperance Saturday, which might, perhaps, be permitted to run into a Temperance Sunday.

*MR. FISHER (Fulham) said, he would not have intervened but for the demands made by the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. Buchanan) with regard to the attitude of the Conservative Members for London on the subject of the Equalisation of Rates Bill for the Metropolis.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must point out that the Amendment before the House is that the word "Government" stand part of the Resolution.

MR. FISHER, on the point of Order, asked if he might not reply to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to their position in regard to the equalisation of London rates?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: At present the hon. Member must keep to the Amendment.

*MR. FISHER said, in that case he felt bound to oppose the Amendment. If the Resolution stood unamended in the direction of the words of the hon. Member for Islington, Her Majesty's Government might have some time to give to the passing of the Equalisation of Rates Bill. The President of the Local Government Board stated that if that measure were treated as non-controversial Her Majesty's Government might find time for it.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Would.

MR. FISHER: Would find time for it; and the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Buchanan) thereupon asked—"Why do not you accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman?" That was an utterly absurd question, because although the great majority of Conservative Members were in favour of the measure, it must in the very nature of things be controversial. It would result in the raising of the rates over a portion of the Metropolis, and the diminution of rates over another portion, and it was only natural that the Representatives of the constituencies whose rates would be increased would desire to discuss the Bill. The Employers' Liability Bill and the Equalisation of Rates Bill would have been a very useful programme for the Autumn Sitting, but the Government cared nothing for London; they said—"Ireland we know. Wales we know; but you Londoners, who are ye?"

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, that last February he moved a Resolution in favour of the equalisation of rates in London; and since then he had only heard of one district which was getting up an opposition to it. He did not understand why the President of the Local Government Board shirked the question; he said that advisedly, because an unconditional promise was made on the subject, and to his mind the action of the right hon. Gentleman showed a want of courage. The present position of the right hon.

Mr. Fisher

Gentleman on the subject was not at all on all-fours with that he took up when he accepted without reservation the unanimous Resolution of the House last February. Since that Resolution was adopted the right hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill of one clause, in which he foreshadowed the taxation of the richer parts of London to the extent of £850,000 a year, which was to go to the relief of the poorer districts of the Metropolis. Did he now think the poorer districts were going to stand by and see the question indefinitely postponed? This was not a question of sentiment, for it resolved itself into hundreds and thousands of pounds being saved to a certain proportion of London ratepayers. The voters of London would receive the announcements of the Government generally, and the announcement of the President of the Local Government Board specifically, with nothing short of dismay; and if a General Election were to arrive, it would mean disaster for the Liberal Party in London. The London Liberal candidates put London Home Rule as their second plank to Irish Home Rule. They had stood loyally by the Government, and now they were anxious to fulfil their pledges to their constituents. Were the Government going to back them? The Tory Members opposite were pronouncing in favour of this Bill; and what were the Government going to do for their own supporters, who had been most ardent in their desires for the passage of this measure? If the Government did not change their attitude on this question the Tory Members in London would take credit with their constituents for desiring to bring about the equalisation of rates in London, whilst they would say the Government were against it. Of course, he was not suggesting that was true; but that was the way the case would be put. He appealed to the President of the Local Government Board to consider where he was on this subject, and whether he was not placing the Liberal Members for the London constituencies in a false position?

MR. ASQUITH: I desire only to say two or three sentences on this question which has formed the subject of the last two speeches. I should sympathise to the full—and I am sure every Member of the Government would —in the disappointment to which the hon. Member for Bermondsey has just given expression, if I thought that the decision we were asking the House to come to would necessarily involve the fate of the Equalisation of Rates Bill. It does not involve anything of the kind. My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board said at an earlier stage of the evening, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated just now, that, under the Resolution as it at present stands, it is open to the Government not only to take Supply, but to take non-controversial Bills. [An hon. MEMBER: What is a non-controversial Bill?] Without giving an exhaustive definition, for this purpose a non-controversial Bill is a Bill in which nine-tenths of the persons interested in the question are agreed. If my hon. Friend is right in his facts—as I hope and believe he is, so far as the London Members are concerned, the only Members of the House who are directly interested in this Bill—there are only two or three who are opposed to the principle of the Bill. That being so, I venture to say this is a non-controversial measure. [Opposition cries of “No, no!”] I say that, if it is not treated as a non-controversial Bill, or if, in other words, the Government are debarred from doing what they are most anxious—namely, of bringing in the Bill, or carrying it through before the adjournment to the Autumn, then the responsibility will lie with those hon. Gentlemen opposite who oppose this course. That, Sir, is our answer to the appeal of my hon. Friend.

MR. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby): Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has laid down a principle which is as novel as it is extraordinary. He has invented for himself a definition of the term “non-controversial.” He has told the House—what must have astonished hon. Gentlemen opposite as much as hon. Gentlemen on this side—that a non-controversial measure is a measure upon which nine-tenths of those who are interested are agreed in principle. [Sir W. HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is now the Leader of the House, cheer the notion that a measure is agreed upon because in principle it is approved? Does he suggest that the Committee and Report stages of a Bill are of no value? I hear the Home Secretary say the Bill is a Bill of only one clause. What the House has agreed upon is that the House shall pass some measure in order to amend the principle on which the rates of London are paid and the burden of the rates is borne. But that the House is agreed on the Bill as it stands word for word, or with this method proposed in the Bill, is a totally different question; and I submit there has been no indication of opinion, from any quarter of the House, that this is a Bill which can pass under the ordinary definition of the term “non-controversial.” I contend, Sir, that if the Government are going, at the last moment, to claim that this Bill is to be dealt with as one which is non-controversial, they will be departing from the spirit of the arrangement which they made earlier in the evening. It is idle for me to suggest that I can speak for those who are interested in this question; but I know, from the communications that have passed between myself and those who have the honour of being the Leaders of the Party on this side of the House, that this was a measure in particular which was regarded as one which did not come within the definition and description of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I know it was contended that this was a measure on which different opinions were held, and which could not, therefore, be regarded as a non-controversial measure. The Home Secretary now tries to make cheap capital out of the attitude of hon. Members on this side of the House; and finding himself, the Government, and his Party in stress and difficulty, he endeavours to shift on our shoulders the responsibility he and his friends ought to be strong enough to bear. It is not acting fairly by the House and by the Opposition, at the last moment—past 8 o'clock in the evening, when he is supported by his right hon. Friends, and when this (the Front Opposition) Bench is practically empty—suddenly to spring upon us the notion that this measure is held by the Government to be among those which are non-controversial, and is to be one of the measures which are to be taken. Now, Sir, the House will understand why it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier in the evening could not name those little Bills which might be added to the two he named. Now we understand his lapse of memory. He could not remember at that moment—he was not in possession of—the name of the little Bill that might be added to those already named. We find now that the Equalisation of Rates Bill is one of them, and this is to be held up as a non-controversial measure! But, Sir, the Debate which took place on the Motion upon which this Bill is founded is within the recollection of Members of this House. It was initiated by the hon. Member for Hoxton, and I think that Debate proved that the principle of dealing with the question of rates in London was agreed upon in all quarters of the House, but the exact way in which it is to be dealt with is a totally different thing. I think, myself, this Bill is an honest attempt on the part of the President of the Local Government Board to deal with a very difficult question; but the President of the Local Government Board himself will, I am sure, agree with me that this is a most difficult question, and that it is extremely hard fairly to apportion the burdens of payment on the shoulders of the different people in London in proportion to the benefit they receive for the work done. The President of the Local Government Board, I believe, has done his best to arrive at a method, but I think there is a good deal to be said upon it, and I confess it amazed me—at the last moment in September, when we have been led by the Government to-night to believe that the labours of the Session are practically ended, and that we have to devote ourselves to Supply, and that only Bills were to be taken which were of a non-controversial character—to hear the Home Secretary get up and chide the Opposition, and tell them if they dare to regard this Bill as anything but a non-controversial measure the responsibility and blame would be theirs, and that they would take upon themselves the risk of losing the measure. I am bound to say I think it is an extraordinary proceeding on the part of a Minister of the Crown who occupies the high position that the Home Secretary does, and a very novel proceeding at this stage of our business. I venture to say that the only construction that can possibly be placed by men accustomed to the ways and methods and Rules of the House of Commons upon the word “non-controversial” is that it would mean a measure upon which everybody in the House was agreed, not merely in principle, but upon which any discussion would be of the most limited and almost perfunctory character. [Laughter.] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh, and may endeavour if they choose, by discussion amongst themselves, to interrupt the remarks which, I admit, I am most insufficiently delivering on behalf of those who would be here if they had known this proposal was to be made to-night. I only wish my right hon. Friend the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had been present to hear the proposal made by the Home Secretary, because I can safely say he did not understand the position put by the Home Secretary, and certainly no one on this side of the House understood it. I am prepared to say that at this period of the evening, and after what has fallen from the Leaders of the Government to-night, it is not acting fairly and honestly by the House of Commons to regard a measure of this character, which is of first-rate importance, of very great complexity, and which will have a considerable effect on the ratepayers of London, as a non-controversial measure, and allow it to be passed at the end of the Session, when more than half the House has gone, and when many of those who, though they may not be London Members or London ratepayers, are entitled to have their voices heard on questions of this kind, and entitled to ask that it shall not be dealt with in a moment or a hurry, and without the proper time for consideration which ought to be devoted to it.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) wished to point out to the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that the strictures he had endeavoured to bring upon the action of the Government were entirely out of place. The measure was under full discussion when the hon. Gentleman's friends on the Front Opposition Bench chose to leave the House; and not only was that so, but this measure was shown before they left to be obviously in a different position to other measures under consideration. The principle of this measure had been unanimously adopted by the House. That was not denied.

Mr. Long

MR. LONG: I must interrupt the hon. Gentleman. He says the principle of the measure was unanimously adopted by the House. That is perfectly true. The principle that there should be an alteration of the method by which rates in London are dealt with was agreed to; but the way in which that principle is to be applied is the most important part of all, and upon that a great variety of opinions was expressed in different parts of the House when the Motion was discussed.

MR. J. STUART had listened to the hon. Gentleman's interruption and explanation. The principle which this House assented to was a great deal more heroic, and went a great deal further than that there should be some alteration in the rates of London. It went to this—that there should be an alteration of the rates in London with a view to relieving the poorer districts of London. That was the principle to which the House assented, and which was embodied in the Equalisation of Rates Bill. There was no doubt it went further than the very formal outline which the hon. Gentleman had spoken of. Again, the measure was not a complicated one, but the simplest possible application that could be made of that general principle the House had assented to, and he was really very glad to have heard the Home Secretary say that the Government were willing to consider this measure among the list of measures it would be possible to deal with. He thought it would be well if the Government would give an opportunity to the other side of the House and see if they would not let him have the Second Reading of this measure before they went away. All the London Members on that (the Liberal) side of the House had supported the measure; it was down on the Paper for that night, and he would suggest that it should be taken, as he did not believe the London Representatives on the other side of the House wished to oppose it. He believed those hon. Members opposite had just as great a wish and desire to put the rates of London right as the Liberal Members had. This measure did not go beyond London; the whole money collected was restricted to London, and he would suggest that Members, like the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, who were not London Members, should stand aside in this matter. Why should they interfere in this question, which affected London alone? Let them leave the matter to be settled by the London Members, and let them see if they could not get the Second Reading that night. That was the suggestion he had to make to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Long), who, he believed, understood the question, and who had, it seemed to him, got up at this stage of the Debate merely to try to make political capital out of it by endeavouring to put the Government in the wrong. He hoped before the Debate was finished the Government would see their way to make some definite decision with regard to this Bill. They must see that it was a matter of the deepest importance, not only to the London Members, but to the Government themselves. He urged them to make some more definite announcement, although he admitted that what they had said amounted to an admission that this was one of the Bills which it would be in their power to deal with.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the hon. Member who addressed the House last had said that the Bill dealing with the question of London rates was of a non-controversial character, and might, therefore, be passed through the House. The Government had taken up the whole time of the Session; and if this Bill was one upon which such stress was laid, he thought hon. Members interested in it should not allow the Government to take up time in that way—at any rate, they ought to have insisted upon the measure being brought forward. They could not deny that the matter with which such a Bill would deal was one in which London Members were interested. It was one, however, that was sure to give rise to discussion. He was glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, because there was some controversy between the right hon. Gentleman and himself early in the evening. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to mention the Bill that was considered to be non-controversial; and now they had a distinct statement from the Home Secretary that this Equalisation of Rates Bill was one of them. He would like to have a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whether he agreed with the Home Secretary that this was a non-controversial Bill, which should be pressed upon the House before the Adjournment? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House the Bill was a non-controversial one, then he had nothing more to say. But if the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed with the Home Secretary, then he thought he had not treated the House in the kindest way; for, when the Motion was introduced, he ought to have told them candidly that that was one of the measures the Government intended to bring before the House. The phrase "non-controversial" was, no doubt, very vague, and he thought they were entitled to some expression of opinion justifying this strange interpretation of the term. There seemed to be some difference of opinion as to what the Home Secretary did say; but they on that (the Opposition) side understood him to say that nine-tenths of those interested in the Bill were agreed, though the President of the Local Government Board seemed to think that the Home Secretary referred to nine-tenths of the House. There was a difference of opinion regarding that. The Home Secretary, however, was understood to refer to nine-tenths of those interested in the principle of the Bill. That might cover almost everything. How could they arrive at a calculation with regard to those who were interested? He (Mr. Hanbury) always thought they were all equally interested in the measures brought before the House. At all events, they were all equally interested in any London Bill. The Members of the House had to live in London for six months—or, as this year, for nearly the whole 12 months—every year, and they were all, therefore, interested in legislation in regard to London. So that they would see legislation of this character affected them all, as well as the London Members. He protested against the policy which the Government had adopted of parcelling the House into sections, and saying that a particular section should have an advantage of this kind. This was the policy in the case of Ireland. Now a majority of the Welsh Members wanted Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, and the same policy was to be adopted. And, again, they had it in the case of the London Members. He was under the impression that they were sent there—the London Members and the rest of them—for the purpose of dealing with matters not only affecting each his own particular constituency, but relating to general questions as well as to the term "non-controversial." He would point out that they might well agree to the principle of the London Bill on, say, Second Reading; but once they got down to details there might be a division of opinion. When they got into Committee, it might be—as in the case of the Home Rule Bill—that the Government themselves would have to introduce Amendments; that, as in that case, they would have changed their minds. Even if they were all agreed on the principle, points might arise demanding consideration and long discussion in the House. For that reason this was not a step which they wished to discourage. What was meant by nine-tenths of those interested? Were they to count heads? Was it to be laid down as a principle that if nine-tenths of the Members agreed to a certain measure that measure became at once non-controversial? They knew the struggle going on between Members from Ireland, Members from London, and Members from Wales and Scotland for precedence for their Bills. The struggle was a keen one. Scotland complained that her interests were neglected, and claimed precedence for her Bills; Welsh Members objected, and said that their measures must have priority; then the London Members came forward with the same claim. Well, in reply to the demands of the London Members, the Home Secretary had enunciated a principle which applied more strongly to Welsh Disestablishment than to equalisation of rates in London. No doubt nine-tenths of the Welsh Members were in favour of that Bill; and if the Government backed up the Home Secretary's definition of a non-controversial measure, there was no guarantee whatever that the Welsh Disestablishment Bill and the Evicted Tenants Bill would not be brought on before the adjournment for the holidays. If the London Bill was treated as a non-controversial Bill, the Welsh Members, if they were true to the interests of the Principality, would insist upon having their Bill dealt with in the same way. The House was too jaded to deal with any but absolutely non-controversial Bills. What they had to guard against was bad work, and to avoid that they must avoid overtaxing the energies of Members. But if the principle laid down by the Home Secretary were to prevail, they would have a large number of Bills dealt with, and the Members would be at work until the commencement of the Sittings in November. They had in Supply alone—and they should certainly discuss the principal Votes—sufficient work to occupy their attention till the end of September. That being so, the Government, in their own interest, ought not to seek to protract the Sitting. The Leader of the House had already retired from the scene. The only excuse he could plead was his age. His conduct ought not to form a precedent, and they ought to take note of the fact that the man who passed stringent measures of this kind himself ran away and took his holidays. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been in the House much during the Debates on the Home Rule Bill, and he could now come in in comparative freshness to lead the House. The right hon. Gentleman had purposely abstained from the discussions of the Home Rule Bill, while the whole of the Opposition had been engaged conscientiously discharging their duties. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would throw over the Home Secretary, and would refuse to support the strange and utterly unconstitutional view propounded by the right hon. Gentleman, but would tell the House that in making his former statement it was not his intention to include the Equalisation of Rates Bill among the non-controversial measures.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think it necessary to take any notice of the offensive personalities of the hon. Member. [Cries of "Oh!"] If he thinks it of advantage to the House or to the country to talk of the Prime Minister running away—[Cries of "Oh!"—I must leave the House and the country to follow their own judgment of the good taste of the hon. Member. The House is accustomed to violations of good taste on the part of the hon. Member. [Cries of "Order!"] Well, that is my opinion, and I speak it quite freely. With regard to the question before the House, the Prime Minister made it quite clear what would be regarded as controversial business and dealt with before the Adjournment, and to that the Government adhere in absolute good faith. As to the remarks of the Home Secretary, I will remind the House how they were called forth. The London Members on this side of the House appealed to the Government to bring on the Equalisation of Rates Bill. That appeal was supported by London Members on the other side of the House, who declared that there was no opposition to the Bill. Well, the Home Secretary stated that if the measure was accepted by those concerned the Government would feel themselves at liberty, and would be perfectly ready, to treat it as a non-controversial Bill. He did not undertake to determine whether a question was controversial or not. I am not going to take it from the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) whether a measure is controversial or not, and I am not going to adopt the hon. Member's courteous invitation and "throw over" the Home Secretary. The good taste of that remark was in keeping with that of the hon. Member's whole speech. I intend to support the Home Secretary; and I say that if a Bill is found to be a controversial one, then the Government will not proceed with it. If the responsible Leaders of the Opposition state that any particular measure is controversial the Government will feel bound not to proceed with it. That was the principle on which the late Mr. Smith acted in regard to the question of the Mombasa Railway, when I thought it necessary to press upon the Government of the day that the matter was controversial. I will take an early opportunity of stating what Bills shall be proceeded with—probably some day this week—what Bills may be looked on as doubtful, and which ones cannot be proceeded with. The responsibility will then rest with the Leaders of the Opposition to take objection to Bills that they consider doubtful.

MR. GOSCHEN: I gather from the right hon. Gentleman that he considers it right that the view of the Opposition as to what is or is not controversial matter should be considered as of vital importance in deciding what measures shall be proceeded with. I would remind the House of the statement of the Home Secretary, that a certain measure affecting London would be proceeded with as a non-controversial measure.

SIR W. HARCOURT: He did not say that.

MR. GOSCHEN: He said he did not regard it as a controversial measure.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What the Home Secretary said was that if the Bill was treated by the Opposition as a non-controversial measure the Government would be able to go on with it. ["No, no!"] Yes; he said nothing but that. He asked the Opposition to state whether or not they consider it a controversial measure? But it is no use carrying on a controversy on this point. I have made a statement with regard to the intentions of the Government, and to that we adhere.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Home Secretary, as I understand, laid down a definition to the effect that if nine-tenths of those interested in the question were in favour of the Bill, it would be considered non-controversial. That appears to us on this side of the House to be an entirely new definition of what a non-controversial Bill should be. I had the honour of addressing the House previously, and I endeavoured to elicit from the Government whether they accepted the point I attempted to put—namely, that a measure was not controversial if both sides of the House agreed to its principle, but a number of important questions were contained in it raising controversy, which would require full discussion. I do not wish to impute motives to the Home Secretary or the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I must say it appears to me that an attempt is being made to put on the Opposition the responsibility for the loss of this measure, and that the Government and their friends behind them are "fishing" for a declaration from the Opposition side that this Bill is controversial. If we on this side held the Bill to be controversial the Government would say—"We cannot proceed with it; it is on the Opposition, and not on the arrangements of the Government, that responsibility must rest for the non-success of the Bill."

An hon. MEMBER: The Bill is not controversial on our part.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN: No; but several parties are necessary to a controversy. In this case, neither the Government nor the Opposition are parties to a controversy; but there are a number of different and clashing interests to be consulted, and they require that the Bill shall be examined with considerable care, in order that all the various parishes affected shall be able to bring forward arguments and evidence as to the fairness and equity of their case. In time past I have taken a very considerable share in the equalisation of the rates of the Metropolis. I am not fond of speaking of my past, but I am not sure whether there is any hon. Member in the House who has taken so distinct a step in advance in the equalisation of rates as I have done in former years; therefore, I cannot be under suspicion as to my view of the principle of the Bill. What I say is that this Bill is controversial in the sense of raising a number of controversies in various parts of the Metropolis, not in the least from the Conservative, or Radical, or Moderate, or Progressive point of view, but of being fair to all interests concerned; and though we might consent en masse to the view that the Bill should be passed or might be taken in hand during the remainder of the Session, surely our constituents would be entitled to say—"You have sacrificed our interests." At all events, we wish that the case of our constituents should be put at necessary length before the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Fisher) assents to the principle of the Bill; but he pointed out distinctly that there were parishes which would claim to be heard, and he instanced one particular parish. Well, under the circumstances, considering the date at which we have arrived, and that Supply has still to be got through, I am inclined myself to say that the House did not expect, and could not expect, after the declarations of the Government, that a Bill of this importance, containing so much detail, would be proceeded with during the remainder of this Session. I venture to think that the Government share this view themselves. We may have some sympathy for them. They have been very hard pressed by their supporters in regard to this Bill; but in making their general arrangements for the work of the Session they ought to have taken the probability of being hard pressed by their London supporters into account. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will think it impossible to proceed with the measure, looking at its importance and the interest taken in it in the Metropolis; but I hold that the responsibility for not dealing with it does not rest with the Opposition, but with the distinct claims of the parishes concerned not to have the Bill passed without an opportunity of being heard. If hon. Gentlemen opposite will look at the Debates which have taken place in past times on Bills of this description, they will see that they have always required careful examination. When the proper time comes we on this side of the House shall be prepared to give the Bill every attention. We did not oppose it on Second Reading; but the President of the Local Government Board will admit that there are questions of principle involved in it. It is too much to ask us to discuss it at the period of the Session we have reached. I noticed that the Chief Secretary for Ireland promised that the Irish Bill to which his attention was called should be one of the first measures dealt with next Session. Well, if the Government are anxious to pass this measure dealing with equalisation of rates in London, why do not they give a similar promise with regard to it?

SIR W. HARCOURT: We do.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not heard the declaration that you will put it in the forefront of your legislation next Session.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We have said so.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did not gather that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I repeat it now.

MR. GOSCHEN: Then, let hon. Members from London be content with that. When the time comes for considering the Bill I am sure there will not be the slightest desire on the part of anyone on this side of the House to delay it. I may say I hope now hon. Gentlemen opposite will see that ratepayers' questions are not those of owners of property—as they contended they were when holding me up to odium for relieving the rates. The Government seem to have been educated by the London Members into a knowledge of the fact that the rating question in London is really a question for the rate-payers. We on this side of the House have every sympathy with the rate-payers of London; and when the proper time comes we shall be ready to assist the Government in bringing this rating question to a reasonable conclusion.

MR. J. S. WALLACE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said that, as a London Member, he was glad to hear that this Bill would be placed in the forefront of the programme next Session. Being in close touch with the ratepayers of London, he could assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, though they were delighted with the passage of the Home Rule Bill through the House, great dissatisfaction would be felt amongst them if this great claim of theirs was postponed indefinitely. Probably when the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed sympathy for an Equalisation of Rates Bill he was not Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, for that was one of the parishes which would have to pay largely towards the assistance of the poorer parishes. He was sorry that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite did not see their way to treat this measure as non-controversial. The hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Barrow) would be able to point out to his constituents the reason why the Bill had not been passed before the holidays.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, the present discussion raised the question of the preference for financial business over various measures of legislation. Amongst those measures was the Madras and Bombay Army Bill, which, earlier in the evening, had had the special honour of being mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Bill was strenuously opposed by two hon. Members—namely, the right hon. Member for North-East Manchester (Sir J. Fergusson) and himself. No doubt, if they had an opportunity it would be fully discussed; therefore, he submitted, with all respect to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that this measure could not be considered as non-controversial. It must be placed in the category of highly contentious measures. The hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) had said that this question of the equalisation of rates in the Metropolis should be left to the Metropolitan Members solely ; but that was a claim in which many Members could not acquiesce. For instance, he (Sir R. Temple) was not a Metropolitan Member ; but a large portion of his time was devoted to the service of the rate-payers of London, and he claimed an absolute right to discuss the Bill.

SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he remembered the occasion referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when that right hon. Gentleman, on the ground that the question was contentious, objected to the discussion of the subject of the Mombasa Railway. He did not think the whole history of Parliament disclosed a case in which a right hon. Gentleman, who had himself held Office, had taken a more severe advantage of a pledge given by a Government. He (Sir F. S. Powell) had deeply regretted the right hon. Gentleman's course at that time, as he had considered it opposed to the interests of humanity. What had happened since that unhappy evening fully proved that the proposal of the then Government was conceived in the interest of freedom, and of the liberty of the slave, and that the course adopted favoured bondage. He therefore felt, with this example before them, that they were entitled to keep the Government most strictly to their pledge. He hoped the Government would make an effort to pass the Bill dealing with Statute Law Revision. It was only objected to in a form which he did not think commended itself to the House, and which he did not believe to be in accordance with the Rules of the House. He trusted that the Government would overbear that opposition, and would take such steps as would bring about a reprint of the Statutes, so as to bring down the revision to the latest possible date. With regard to the Bill for equalising the rates in the Metropolis, he had been for more than 30 years a ratepayer in London, and for eight years he had been an active member of the Paddington Vestry. He agreed with the Bill in principle, but not with all its details ; and he held that other Members from the Provinces, with himself, were fully entitled to speak on the subject. It was a matter full of difficulties and complexities, as had been exemplified in the case of Liverpool. That town, which was divided into many parishes, had attempted the equalisation of rates, but it had utterly failed up to the present. One figure in the Bill would show how difficult was the problem. A rate of 6d. in the £1 produced an enormous sum—no less than—

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : The hon. Baronet is clearly not entitled to enter into the details of the Bill.

SIR F. S. POWELL said, he was aware of the Rules of the House, but he was endeavouring to show that the Bill was complex, and could not be regarded as non-contentious. He wished to give one or two details to show—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : The hon. Member can refer to the Bill in the ordinary way, but he cannot go into details.

SIR F. S. POWELL said, that without mentioning figures—[“Oh !”] He would not be extinguished in his remarks by hon. Members opposite, however virulent and bitter they might be in opposition to him. The measure bristled with details. A small addition to the rates amounted to an enormous figure and as different views were held upon many of the details, the Bill could not be considered non-contentious. According to the text of the Bill, it was to come into operation on the 30th September, 1893. Clearly that would be before the consideration of the Bill could be completed. This circumstance proved that the Bill could not be regarded as non-contentious, because some discussion constantly arose as to the commencement of a Bill.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said, the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had said the London Members had neglected the interests of London ; and the hon. Member for South St. Pancras had adopted the same tone when he taunted them with giving a steady support to the Government during the progress of the Home Rule Bill. Well, in giving that support to the Government the London Members had only redeemed the pledges they had given to their constituents. They were now, in turn, asking the Government to redeem the pledges they had given to the London Members. It was significant that the only London Member who had raised any objection to proceeding with this Bill was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square

(Mr. Goschen), a district in the West where the rates were only about half as much as those paid by the constituency he (Mr. Pickersgill) had the honour to represent in the East End. The district the right hon. Gentleman represented would no doubt be hard hit by the Bill—

An hon. MEMBER: Then it is controversial.

MR. PICKERSGILL: There was some difference of opinion as to what the Home Secretary had said. Well, he (Mr. Pickersgill) had been present all the evening listening attentively, and he had certainly understood the Home Secretary to say that if nine-tenths of the persons interested were agreed on a Bill, he should not regard it as controversial. That declaration, of course, was made with regard to this particular Bill. There were some measures which, although only concerning one portion of the country, would be very far-reaching in effect—the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, for instance, which had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Preston. But obviously the Welsh Disestablishment Bill did not rest on the same footing as the Equalisation of Rates Bill. The latter began and ended in London. Many Provincial Members might be personally interested in the Rating Bill through living in London; but hon. Members did not come there to press their own individual interests on the attention of the country. All the Members who represented London, save the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, were in favour of the Bill. ["No, no!"] Well, everyone who had spoken supported it. If there were London Members present who were opposed to the measure, he challenged them to get up in their places and say so. If they were not in favour of the Bill, at any rate the constituents who had sent them there were in favour of it. The Bill, as he had said, affected London only. Certain districts were paying towards common sanitary objects which equally concerned all the districts.

MR. TOMLINSON asked if the hon. Member was not out of Order in going into the details of the Bill?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is going too much into detail.

MR. PICKERSGILL said, he would merely point out that the object of the Bill was to equalise all over the Metropolis burdens which now fell with crushing weight on the East End. The character of the Bill distinguished it from every other measure before the House this Session. It was a Resolution of the House passed nemine contradicente. Moreover, it stood on the Order Book unopposed. Nobody—not even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's—had a word to say against the principle of the measure. Why on earth, then, could it not be read a second time to-night? This was not a subject which should be made a matter of arrangement between the two Front Benches. London Members on both sides of the House were deeply interested in the question. Most of them were not satisfied with the promise made for next Session. The pledge given by the Government was for this Session. London Members had been charged with neglecting the interests of London; but why had they quietly lain by? It was because they relied on the pledge they had from the Government that they would, at any rate, take the judgment of the House upon it this Session. If the Government would make a strenuous effort to pass the Bill, or if they would carry it even to a Second Reading, it would go a great way towards redeeming the pledges they had given. It was desirable to see who were the friends of the Bill and who were its enemies. Let them, therefore, take the Second Reading to-night.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, that a short time ago the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) had expressed great regret that the Local Veto Bill was not included in the programme for the Autumn Sitting. He (Sir W. Lawson) was very glad to hear that, for he attended a meeting with the hon. Member some months ago, when he said he would vote against the Bill unless it were extended to Ireland. He was glad to find that the hon. Gentleman was now more enthusiastic in favour of the measure; and he was sure many persons outside the House would be much more grieved than the hon. Member when they read to-morrow that the Bill was not to be included in the Government programme. He thought it might very well have been included. They had been discussing for the last hour or two the meaning of the word "controversial," and he thought he might claim that the Local Veto Bill was a non-contentious measure. [Cries of "No, no!"] He meant that it was a simple Bill to carry out the policy of our present law. As everyone knew, we had rules and regulations of a very elaborate kind for protecting people from the liquor traffic; and this Bill was nothing more nor less than a measure for making efficient the present system. No simpler, no more just Bill had ever been introduced in that House. Why did he say the Government ought to have gone on with it? The hon. Member who had just spoken talked about a Resolution of the House on which the Equalisation of Rates Bill was based. One Resolution! Why, he (Sir W. Lawson) had got three. Thrice had that House, in former Parliaments, passed a Resolution that the policy embodied in the Local Veto Bill ought to be carried out; and the last time, nearly 10 years ago, the House declared that it was urgent. Another reason why the Government should have gone on with the Bill was the fact that they won the General Election much by that cry. [An hon. MEMBER: Home Rule!] Somebody said "Home Rule"; but the Local Veto Bill was just as good, and the Government would find that out by-and-bye. Let them look at the claims of the Bill. It was brought in on the 27th of February, and it excited more interest throughout the length and breadth of the land than many a Bill in the Government programme. [Cheers.] He was glad to hear the cheers of hon. Gentlemen opposite, for it showed that they had begun to understand this question at last. They talked about Petitions, but what Petitions had there been for any other Government Bill as compared with this? Very nearly 10,000 had been presented. [An hon. MEMBER: Home Rule!] Home Rule! There were no Petitions at all for Home Rule. Ten thousand Petitions were presented for the Veto Bill, and somewhere about half that number were signed officially on behalf of Public Bodies representing large numbers of people. They had just heard shrieks for London; but the London County Council signed a Petition in favour of this very Bill, and, therefore, it was just as pressing for London as the Equalisation of Rates Bill. Local Bodies throughout the country, Boards of Guardians, and so forth, had petitioned for the Bill; and the hon. Member for South Belfast was quite right when he mentioned the wonderful demonstration in London. People laughed at demonstrations, but they were of some value; and everybody admitted—at any rate the police admitted—that never in the history of London had there been such a demonstration as was held in favour of the Local Veto Bill. He maintained that he had made out a case of urgency for the measure. In what way was the Bill met when the right hon. Gentleman brought it in? There was not much argument against it, for Members could not allege that the people had not a right to say whether they wanted public-houses or not. The whole cry against the Bill was that it was brought in as a sham, and was not intended to pass. [Cheers.] He heard cheers from hon. Members opposite, and, no doubt, they had their little triumph. It was better to be frank. He admitted that they had a very plausible case for saying that. After the defeat they had met with this Session, it was well, perhaps, that they should have something to cheer at. But he did not echo the charge at all—he only said it looked like it. He did not say that Her Majesty's Government brought in the Bill with the intention of deluding the people. He did not wish to revile on this occasion, because he did not see any good in reviling people. He had done what he could with the Government. He had warned them over and over again, and his conscience was clear. Of course, he quite admitted that they had honestly and truly set themselves to see which measures it was most desirable, under the circumstances, to put forward, and they naturally thought that one Bill was more likely to be carried than another, so that the exigencies of time threw them in the course which they had taken. Still, he thought that they had made a great mistake. The House spent its time in legislating for many matters which were of much less importance than others which they never discussed at all. He often recollected an expression used by their Chaplain, when in one of his sermons he remarked that politicians were in the habit of pursuing the infinitely little, while with the great misery, crime, and wretchedness surging around they made no attempt to deal. He could not let this occasion pass without expressing on behalf of hundreds and thousands of people out-of-doors the great regret which they would experience when they heard of the postponement of this measure. He told his right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench honestly that they had taken a step which would considerably shake the confidence of the country in them. Yet he believed they had been driven to this course solely against their will. [Laughter.] It was all very well to laugh, but why did they bring in the Bill? They brought in the Bill at the demand of public opinion, and that was what Governments existed for. All Governments existed in this country to carry out the dictates of public opinion. The Government attempted to do so in this case, and, as he had said, he was quite sure they had only been driven into this course because time was against them. He hoped, however, that before the Debate closed they would say that they were resolved that early next Session they would bring in the Bill again, and he hoped that they would do so with more satisfactory results than had been attained this Session.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he thought the hon. Baronet had correctly summed up what was the result of the Session—that it was an absolute and complete disappointment. He was grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his later interpretation, and he thought it would be more satisfactory to hon. Members on that side of the House; but he would also beg the right hon. Gentleman to consider that the question of what Bills were to be taken by the Government during the period before the Adjournment for the holidays was not a question that ought to be decided by negotiations between a group of Members sitting on one side of the House and the Government, but a question on which the Government ought to be frank with the House as a body; and no Government should be more frank than the present Government, considering the position they occupied at the present moment. The Government were asking

Members to come back for an Autumn Sitting after a protracted Summer Session, in order to carry a programme which, owing to their own indiscretion, they had utterly failed in during the present Session. And, further than that, the Government now proposed a most stringent Resolution under which the Business of the country—that was to say, the Business of Supply—was to be discussed by hon. Gentlemen who were sent here for the purpose. Under these circumstances, the Government should take into consideration the wishes of the House at large, and not commit themselves to any knot of hon. Members who might be specially interested in one measure as against other measures in the House. He listened with a great deal of sympathy to the bitter cry that came from the London Members. He could recollect a very important speech made by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, in which he told his audience that when Home Rule for Ireland was disposed of Home Rule for London would be proceeded with; and he understood that the hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) and the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Barrow) felt themselves in a precarious situation; but because the seats of these hon. Gentlemen were unsafe, that was no reason why other hon. Members were to be kept there longer than was absolutely necessary to complete the Supply necessary for the service of the country. He would ask the Government to maintain a firm position on this question, and resist the appeals made to them by the various disorganised sections of their own followers; because if they yielded to one section they would inevitably be torn to pieces by the irritated followers of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) or hon. Members from Wales, who had not shown any great consideration of late for the Government. Therefore, in the interests of the preservation of the Government itself, it seemed to be extremely important at the present moment to resist the appeals of the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Barrow) and the hon. Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson).

MR. LITTLE (Whitehaven) said, he thought that if the Government were considering how best to prolong their existence, they were hardly likely to look for advice to the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Macartney), who had been so free with his advice, and who said it was only the continued existence of the Government that he desired. To-night the Government had had the most remarkable testimony to the Newcastle Programme that it was possible for any Administration to desire. They had had one Member after another getting up, taking one item or another from the Newcastle Programme, and pressing that on the Administration as being the one desire of his constituents. When discussing the Home Rule Bill they heard that the country was not in favour of it, and they were told by the Opposition that it was carried simply by the other items of the Newcastle Programme. What was the position now? For the present, at any rate, that House had done with Home Rule, and they were about to attack the Newcastle Programme. That being so, the contention of the Conservative Party was correct, that the country wanted the Newcastle Programme; and, as they all desired to carry out the will of the country, they ought to assist the Government in making the best selection from the Newcastle Programme. If the Liberal majority was due to the promise of the Local Veto Bill, why should not the hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth press it upon the Government? Why should not London Members press the Equalisation of Rates Bill? Personally, in various parts of the country he had spoken in favour of the London Programme. [Laughter.] Yes; the principle of the Liberal Party was to deal with these topics one by one. He confessed that, having observed what had been going on to-night, he had been led to the conclusion that what the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) said in one of his recent speeches was true, and it was this—that though the Government might get an Autumn Session, the Conservative Party would not allow them to pass any of their measures. He had a suspicion that it was not a question of what measure came first, but that there was not an item in the Newcastle Programme that the Conservative Party would not attack and be glad to defeat; therefore they were under the impression they had been spending a considerable number of hours upon a discussion that did not seem to be of such vital importance that it would be necessary to take all the time and prevent them getting on with Supply. He believed there was a general feeling that the time had come when some of them should have a little holiday. [Cries of "No; no holiday!"] If hon. Members wished to sit on for a month or two, he should not be discontented. He would stay with them, because he found London exceedingly enjoyable during the summer months. But he would suggest that they had pretty well threshed out the Motion before the House; and as he could see that the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) and the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) were yearning to get to the Estimates, he hoped they might now come to a decision.

SIR M. STEWART (Kircudbright) said, it appeared to him that his own country of Scotland had been severely neglected. Although many promises were made, not only at the General Election, but long before and since, nothing had been done for Scotland. On that side of the House they were not in favour of drastic measures; but there were certain measures they thought it desirable to pass into law, as they were useful. Some of them thought that the Fisheries Bill, which was not really contested, would have been proceeded with at an earlier stage of the Session and carried into law; and, speaking for that part of Scotland from which he came and represented, he said there were several Amendments promised to be introduced into the Bill relating to the Solway Firth, which would have given satisfaction to many of the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman. But Scotland had been denied the very smallest amount of legislation; they had had nothing passed; and all that had been done had been an endeavour to keep together a homogeneous Party in order to satisfy them that the Government were in earnest about something. He supposed next Session would possibly be a Scots tin Session. He did not know matters which would have Home Rule importance.

never discussed VANS (Glamorgan, Mid): collected an ar. Is the hon. Member in Order in referring to next Session as a Scotch Session?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I cannot say he is out of Order in referring to the wishes of Scotland, and suggesting that a Scotch Bill should be included. The Amendment has relation to Financial Business, and the hon. Member must confine himself to that.

SIR M. STEWART said that Wales had also been neglected, and he dared say the Welsh Members would try their hands on the Government; and he hoped they liked and appreciated the letters the Prime Minister sent them from time to time. If his constituents had been so treated they would not have been so subservient. They had passed through a most extraordinary period of doing nothing, and they were now to be kept there some time longer, and then to come back again in November. If the hon. Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) had insisted on his fair quota in this year's proceedings, no doubt he could have squeezed something out of the Government; but the hon. Member and his friends, though they made such great talk in the country, came there and sat dumb on their Benches. If the great Temperance Party were satisfied with their Leaders in that House they might as well ignore the matter. There were many questions bearing on the social condition of the people which might and ought to have been brought in and discussed some months ago. The Employers' Liability Bill ought to have been discussed and carried some months earlier; and the Parish Councils Bill did not affect the people in the North at all; and yet hon. Members were to be brought back in November and December to discuss those measures merely to please the caprice of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues. The London Programme did not concern everybody equally; but if some London Members were so anxious for it, why had they not brought it on before? Instead of that they sat dumb, being squared by the Government, and nothing was done. The country was thoroughly dissatisfied with what had already taken place this Session, and they would be more dissatisfied when they heard the result of this Debate. The great friends and allies of the Government were not there to-night. They had gone to Ireland; and would they come back for the Autumn Sitting? Were they squared—

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment at all?

SIR M. STEWART said, he would bow to the ruling of the Chair, having expressed some of the things he felt deeply upon.

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, before the Division was taken on this Amendment he desired to offer his respectful sympathy to the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cockermouth Division (Sir W. Lawson), who took his place among other persons who had been deluded and tricked and taken in by Her Majesty's Government. It was painful to him to witness and to listen to the pathetic speech of the hon. Baronet, who alluded to the magnificent demonstration that was got up in London by himself and others in favour of the Direct Veto Bill; but, notwithstanding that demonstration, he was afraid that many people would go about London saying that the Direct Veto Bill was never meant to be anything but a sham, which had amply justified its right hon. author. He himself had received and presented to that House many Petitions in favour of that Bill, and with every one of them he had received a request that he would in this Session vote for that remarkable measure. To each of these applications he had always replied that having made a strict—

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member must keep to the Amendment.

*MR. DARLING said, he admitted that he had fallen—and he was indebted to the Chair for pointing it out—into a slight error. He was regarding this Bill as Government Business, and he admitted it was nothing of the kind. The Amendment distinguished between what was Government Business and what was not; and he reluctantly had to admit this Bill did not come within one-half of the category. He was further misled by following the remarks that were permitted to be made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson), who was allowed to allude to every topic on which he (Mr. Darling) was addressing the House.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : I must call the hon. and learned Gentleman to Order.

MR. DARLING again rose, when—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. HANBURY : On a point of Order, can that Motion be put by the Deputy Speaker ?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : Undoubtedly it can.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided :—Ayes 159 ; Noes 92.—(Division List, No. 287.)

Main Question put accordingly.

The House divided :—Ayes 162 ; Noes 95.—(Division List, No. 288.)

Resolved, That for the remainder of the Session (unless the House otherwise order) the House do meet on Friday at Three of the clock. That Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to every day of the week, and that the Question on any Motion appointing a Saturday Sitting be put forthwith.

That, until the adjournment for the Autumn holidays, Government Business, and the appointment thereof, may be entered upon at any hour though opposed, and be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House, except on Wednesday, and that, before One o'clock a.m., no dilatory Motion be moved thereon except by a Minister of the Crown.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS I.

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER in the Chair.]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £139,238, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for Rates and Contributions in lieu of Rates, &c., in respect of Government Property, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Rating of Government Property Department."

MR. GOSCHEN : I wish now to ask the Government whether they really intend to proceed with the Votes to-night ? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware we did not intend to oppose the final Motion ; but there are certain Amendments we wish to move.

*THE CHAIRMAN : I am afraid it will not be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to refer to what has already taken place this evening, or on former occasions.

MR. GOSCHEN : With the indulgence of the House, I wish to make this appeal to the Government. We cannot explain, before the Vote is taken, what attitude we propose to take. [Cries of "Order!"] I appeal to the Government to give me a little licence.

*THE CHAIRMAN : I am sorry to have to intervene. I do not think this is a matter in which Her Majesty's Government can give any licence. We are bound by the strict Rules of the House, and according to these strict Rules it would be out of Order for the right hon. Gentleman to refer to the incidents of this evening, and especially to the incidents which relate to the Motion the House has just passed.

*MR. BARTLEY moved to reduce Sub-head A. of the Vote by £100. There were several remarkable points about the Vote. He believed it was only in modern days that rates on Government property had been paid at all. In olden days Government property was largely exempt from rating ; but now rates were paid in the locality in which the property was situate. There was one very important exception ? The Mercantile Marine Fund, administered by the Board of Trade, paid no rates on its property. For that state of things a more complete reason ought to be given than was given earlier in the Session by the Secretary to the Treasury. But there was one matter which required more direct consideration, and that was the enormous sums for salaries included in this Vote. According to the Estimate the salary of the Treasury Valuer and Inspector of Rates was £600 a year, rising £20 a year to £700 ; but the gentleman who now occupied that position received £1,000 last year, which had been increased to £1,200 this year. Why was this official receiving double the salary he ought properly to receive ? There was another matter which required some explanation. A note to the Estimate stated that the Post Office paid £1,900 a year and the Telegraphs £3,990 a year towards this Vote. He would like to know why these Departments paid these sums, and in what way these items were brought into the account at all? As to the valuer, the Secretary to the Treasury had said a short time ago that the whole of the work of valuing had been completed. That work was chiefly confined to London, and if it was finished it seemed strange that the valuer should be retained. With a view to obtain some elucidation of the matter from the Government, he begged to move the reduction of Item A, which dealt with salaries, by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Bartley.)

MR. HANBURY said, that on the last occasion the Estimates were before the Committee the Secretary to the Treasury had asked the Committee to allow this Vote to pass sub silentio, because, according to the right hon. Gentleman, it had been the rule not to discuss it, and there was nothing new in it. That was no good reason why the Vote should not be discussed now. On the contrary, it was a reason above all others why the Committee should discuss it. This question of the rating of Government property was of the utmost importance. It was in a very unsettled state at present, for even the lawyers were not agreed what property ought to be and what property ought not to be rated. Ambassadors' houses were, he thought, to be rated for the first time, and also the apartments of private individuals in Royal Palaces. For instance, the occupants of Hampton Palace had rates placed upon them for the first time. He thought the Committee were entitled to a clear and distinct statement from the Secretary to the Treasury in respect of the salary of the Treasury Valuer and Inspector of Rates. Of course, it might be said that this salary was only of those salaries so often distinguished on the Votes by an asterisk, and the note "Personal to the present holder." He objected to all salaries personal to the present holders. If a salary was good enough for one holder it was good enough for all. The Vote should not be allowed to pass unless a clear and sufficient reason were given by the Secretary to the Treasury why this gentleman should be treated in this exceptional manner. At any rate, the fact that he was to draw this year a salary nearly double that of the maximum salary of the office entitled them to a declaration as to the work he was doing. How long had he ceased to draw his legitimate salary? He wanted to know upon what rule the Treasury put down salaries of this kind. It was wholly irregular, for the Treasury had no power to grant such salaries. There was no power, so far as he knew, for a Civil servant to draw more than the standard salary fixed for his office. Was this gentleman doing extra work? What was the special work he had to do. He had at least a Second Division clerk and a copyist, and, in addition, he drew travelling expenses of £60 a year. His position was practically a sinecure, inasmuch as when the assessments were once fixed they did not vary very much. He wished to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury would grant a Return similar to that of 1877, which would enable the Committee to form an opinion as to whether the rates on Government property were fairly assessed; and how far the principle was enunciated by this House under the Telegraphs and Fortifications Acts—namely, that Government property should pay the ordinary rates levied upon property belonging to private persons—had been carried out? Although Parliament distinctly laid down that rule, the matter was taken before the Courts of Law, the Government having refused to pay certain rates, and the Court decided that there was no power to force the Government to pay the rates, and the Government did not pay them. This was not fair to the owners of private property. The Government did not pay rates on the same scale as private owners, and this was a matter that he thought should be put right. If an Act was passed that the Government should pay rates, it was only right and fair that the Government should carry out the Acts, both in the letter and spirit. Unless the Committee had a satisfactory answer on these points, he hoped his hon. Friend who raised the discussion would go to a Division.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he was glad that hon. Gentlemen opposite had at the eleventh hour come to view this question in its proper light, although when he had over and over again called attention to it when the late Government was in power he had received no assistance from those hon. Members. He was sorry the hon. Member had not moved to reduce the Vote by £500, as he would have been very pleased to "tell" with him. They had had no explanation whatever upon the point. As he understood, the Government fixed the value themselves; there was no appeal against that, and they fixed it much lower than other people in a parish had to pay. Those in the parish always considered that the Government in these matters never paid a fair share of the local rates.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT pointed out that the observations of the hon. Member had nothing to do with this Vote.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that what he contended was that the work done by this gentleman was only done in a haphazard manner. He received £700 a year for what was done by some second-class clerk, who got nothing for doing the work. It was quite true that the Government never paid their fair share of the local rates, and he would have great pleasure in voting for the reduction.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, without intending any offence, he thought it was clear that the hon. Member for Peterborough knew very little about the matter. In his opinion the Treasury had power to increase the salary of the Treasury Valuer as well as of other officials. The present Treasury Valuer was the best man for the post in the whole of the United Kingdom, and he had the whole assessment of Government property placed in his hands. In 1869 he was transferred, as Inspector of Rates, from the Poor Law Office to the Office of Works, and the whole assessment of Government property was placed in his hands. At that time he was paid £500 per annum and an extra allowance of £200. When the Government purchased the telegraphs in 1872, owing to the increased work he had to do the salary was raised to £700. Since that time he had been in personal communication with the Local Authorities throughout the country. In 1883, owing to his long service and skill, his salary was raised to something like £1,200, and that was the whole history of his salary. One thing that could be said in this gentleman's favour was this—that at the present moment the Treasury had not a single dispute with any Local Authority.

MR. A. C. MORTON: They cannot dispute it.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that if they were to look into the valuations they would find that they were in accordance with the valuations passed by the different Assessment Committees. At the Treasury they had had no complaints from the Assessment Committees. He ventured to say that anyone looking into the valuations would find that they compared very favourably with the valuations of private property.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had heard cases of this sort, that when anything was said about having an increase the answer was that it was an act of grace that it was given to them at all, and, therefore, they could not go behind it.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would be glad to consider whether a new Return could not be issued. He saw no reason why the Committee and the country should not have full information on a matter of this kind. He hoped that his hon. Friend who raised this discussion would now be satisfied that this gentleman, although he was in receipt of a considerable salary, was not paid more than his deserts. He was specially adapted for the work, and if he retired the whole staff would have to be rearranged, though it was not a very large one. On the grounds he had specified he hoped his hon. Friend would be satisfied as to this question.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) could not, of course, say anything against the salary which was given to the Treasury Valuer, because it was given by the late Government; but he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the present holder of the Office fully deserved the salary paid to him. He was quite willing to admit that this practice of paying a personal salary was a very bad one, and he should be glad if any way could be discussed in which officers of exceptional merit could have that exceptional merit recognised without this rather objectionable practice of paying personal salaries beyond that which Parliament had sanctioned as the proper remuneration for the particular work performed. In connection with this salary there was one point which the right hon. Gentleman did not notice. The hon. Member for North Islington had asked why that salary had been increased £200 since last year, and for that very substantial increase the right hon. Gentleman did not give any reason whatever.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The salary was increased to £1,200 in the year 1882.

SIR J. GORST said, if that were so, then the Estimates were very wrongly prepared. For the year 1892-3 the salary was put down at £1,000, and in 1893-4 at £1,200. So that, according to the Estimates, the increase had been made in the past year. With reference to the rating of the offices of the Mercantile Marine, the right hon. Gentleman said that they were not rated because the rates would have to be paid out of the Mercantile Marine Fund, which he led the Committee to suppose was contributed by poor seamen, and, therefore, ought not to be touched for such a purpose. As a matter of fact, more than half of that fund; or something like £40,000 a year, was voted by the House of Commons to that fund; and, therefore, there was no reason why Parliament should not contribute a trifle more for the rates of the offices.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, if they were really to understand that the £1,000 which appeared in the Estimates for 1892-3 was an inaccurate figure it threw a terrible doubt on the whole of the volume of Estimates hon. Members had before them. How were they to discuss the Estimates if the very first item was found to be inaccurate?

MR. A. C. MORTON thought that unless some explanation was given on this matter the Government ought to postpone the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman had practically told the Committee that the Estimates were wrong, and they ought to know who was to blame. With all respect to his right hon. Friend, he was not at all satisfied with his reply. This was not a personal matter, but a question of principle as to the salary. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to explain about the extraordinary duties this gentleman had got to perform. All he could say was that he had to communicate with the Local Authorities. That simply meant sending a communication intimating that the Government would pay so much; they would not listen to anything else, and there was no use protesting. Protests had been tried, but the answer of the Department was—"This is an act of grace; the Government are not obliged to give you anything, and you must take what they offer or nothing." The Local Authorities, therefore, took what they could get. The right hon. Gentleman said that upon the retirement of the present Treasury Valuer the next gentleman who was appointed would have to commence at £600 and would go to a maximum of £700. But the new gentleman would have to write to the Local Authorities as well as the present valuer, therefore the reason for the increase would be as applicable to the new man as to the present one. The right hon. Gentleman had given no reason for this personal salary. He had not told them this gentleman had been to Egypt or anywhere else, or that he had done any extraordinary thing which entitled him to more than the fair salary of this office. He thought himself that £700 as a maximum was a very high salary, and this system of rushing up salaries from a maximum of £700 to £1,200 on personal grounds was a bad system and one which ought to be put a stop to. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he (Mr. Morton) was looking after the rates and not the taxes. The right hon. Gentleman was utterly wrong. He was looking after this £500 wrenched out of the pockets of the taxpayers, not of the ratepayers. He knew the ratepayers complained that the Government did not assess their property up to the fair value, and did not have it re-assessed every five years like other owners of property. He was entitled to look after that £500 of the taxpayers' money, and he should be doing wrong if he allowed either a Liberal or a Tory Government to plunder the taxpayers of this country to the tune of £500 a year. He hoped, therefore, he should have an opportunity of going to a Division on the question.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the right hon. Gentleman had told them that this increase of salary was made in 1882.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT explained that owing to bad eyesight he had read 1882 instead of 1892 as the year in which the valuer's salary was increased to £1,200.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the only thing the right hon. Gentleman had not told them was why this valuer was necessary at all. He himself had no valuer, and he did not suppose any gentleman present had, but they all paid the rates which were assessed by the properly constituted authorities.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The properly constituted authorities employ a valuer.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that if it was alleged there was any economy in employing a Government Valuer he would point out that this official cost 1 per cent. of the total amount of rates paid by the Government. He said that such a state of affairs was perfectly monstrous. He did not know how this gentleman's salary had crept up from £500 to £1,200 a year. The assertion that this was in consequence of extra duties which had been put upon him would go to prove he had not enough to do before. As far as he could see this gentleman must have been some favourite. [Sir J. T. HIBBERT: He has 30 years' service]. He expected the gentleman must be an auctioneer from the insidious way in which the salary had crept up from £500 to £700 and then from £700 to £1,200 a year. This official had three assistants, and the Government paid 1 per cent. on their rates of valuation. He (Mr. Gibson Bowles) would do it for 1-8th per cent. Possibly somebody more reasonable would do it for 1-16th per cent. [Mr. A. C. MORTON: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Peterborough would do it for 1-20th per cent. In fact, it did not require any doing at all. The Government ought to submit to a valuation made by the proper authority and then pay the amount so assessed. It did not require any person to oversee their cheques. These four gentlemen were taking £2,028 a year for what ought to be done by a third-class or fourth-class Treasury clerk. He did not say this was a job, but it was an abuse which had grown up, and one which could be reasonably knocked off. If they cut off the whole of these four gentlemen as regarded salary, and discharged them into the world with a pension to earn an honest livelihood in some other way, the Public Service would be in no way prejudiced.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) observed that the reason Government property was not valued in the same way as other property was because the Government did not pay rates, but made a contribution in lieu of rates. He held the opinion that the Government ought to pay rates the same as other people. They ought to submit to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Assessment Committee, with the right to appeal and have their property fairly valued the same as other people. As a matter of fact, the Government had buildings to a considerable extent erected at Government works, and the Treasury would not have them valued for years after they were erected, and until very considerable additions were made, whereas if a private owner were to put an additional storey to a building he would be at once pounced upon by the Local Authorities. Having the power entirely in their own hands, it was a voluntary matter with the Government so far as to what the value should be. There was no appeal against the Government valuation. He thought, however, that a better official than the gentleman who filled the post of Treasury Valuer could not be obtained, for not only did he make an extremely favourable valuation for the Government, but he persuaded the Assessment Committee that the Government valuation was a fair one. He hoped the time would come when the present system would be abolished, and the Government would allow their property to be rated in the ordinary way.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) was a great economist, but he could assure that hon. Gentleman that if all these officers were disestablished and disendowed, and the assessment of Government properties handed over to the Assessment Committees, although the salaries of these four officers would be saved, the charge upon the Exchequer would be much bigger. The Secretary to the Treasury said that, in his judgment, the public were entitled to the fullest information with regard to the valuation of Government properties. He was glad to hear that, because he had been in communication with the right hon. Gentleman in order to procure a Return of the nature indicated by one hon. Gentleman opposite. A slight difference, however, had arisen between himself and the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the form. The Secretary to the Treasury was willing in this Return to give in a lump sum the total valuation for all Government property in each parish. That was obviously not sufficient. It would not enable them accurately to gauge whether any particular piece of property was properly valued or not. What he wanted was that each particular property which was separately assessed should be separately entered in the Return, and it was only in this way the public could have that full information which the right hon. Gentleman said he desired to give. He was willing to make a deal with the right hon. Gentleman. If he would give the Return in the form in which it had been asked, he should have pleasure in voting for him; if he declined, he was afraid he must vote against him.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, the question really was whether the sum of £250,000 was properly sufficient in discharge of the debt which the nation owed to the various Local Authorities of the United Kingdom, who were already over-burdened with rates for their local improvements. He knew it was not possible for a private Member to move that a Vote be increased in amount, but he was entitled to press upon the Government whether that amount was fair and just as between the general Treasury and the various local treasuries which had to bear so many public burdens. That was a matter of principle. The Secretary to the Treasury, if he understood him rightly, said that the amount upon the Government buildings all over the country was assessed upon the same principle as the various private properties. But the fact was the Government were not paying rates exactly the same as the owners of private properties. They were compounding and paying a composition for the rates which were due by them to the various Local Authorities. The question really was how this amount was ascertained?

It was ascertained by an official valuation made by an official valuer. But was not the Government here acting as the judge in its own case? The Government owned the property, paid the composition for the rates, and yet had the value on which these rates were fixed assessed by its own valuer. Was it not clear that this amount ought to be assessed, not by a Treasury Valuer, but by an independent valuer, by somebody entirely independent both of the Government and the Local Authority, and who should act as judge or assessor between the two parties—that was to say, between the Treasury who was to pay and the Local Authorities who were to receive payment? He submitted that the question was not one as to whether this Vote should be smaller or larger, but one as to what was just as between the Treasury and the Local Authorities. He did not want to enter into whether it was a local or an Imperial question; but he could speak on the subject from his experience in connection with Education Boards, and he thought that such authorities as made the quinquennial valuation or the London valuation, amounting to £33,500,000 annually, would judge properly between the Treasury and the various Vestries that made the rates. The authorities who valued the entire land and houses in London for the Metropolitan rates could estimate the rateable value of the Government buildings within that area in the most trustworthy and independent manner. If so, they did not want a Treasury Valuer at all. They were trustees for the taxpayers, but they were bound to see that justice was done to the Local Authorities also, and it was on this ground that he ventured to trouble the House.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he would like to know whether rates were paid in Ireland upon both military and police barracks, and whether any distinction was drawn when barracks were unoccupied or temporarily occupied? He would also ask, was it the same person who valued both for England and Ireland? He hoped these questions would be answered.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) blamed hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House because they did not sur-that question before. If they did not support him it was his own fault. He had listened to the hon. Member, and he was bound to say that he did not think he previously understood the matter properly. Now, however, the matter had been explained.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, no!

MR. MACARTNEY said, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would allow him to finish what he was about to say. He was bound to say that, having heard the matter explained, he would vote upon the particular merits of the question, and not against the Government itself. The Secretary to the Treasury had shown that the salary now being paid to the valuer was a salary to which he was fully entitled. The hon. Baronet who had just spoken had referred to the transfer of the rate question to the Local Authorities. He (Mr. Macartney) did not think anything could be more foolish. He did not believe that the Local Authorities could be trusted to make the assessments on Government buildings. They would be inclined to throw as heavy a burden as they could upon the Government, and lighten the charge upon the ratepayers at the expense of the general taxpayers of the Kingdom. He objected to any Government yielding to that suggestion.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, he did not recommend that it should be made over to the Local Authorities, but that the Local Authorities should be independent of the Government.

MR. MACARTNEY said, yes—if such authority could be discovered. He did not think it could. As between the local and the general taxpayer, the former was entitled to consideration; but they should be prepared to allow some preference in the case of the general taxpayer of the Kingdom. With regard to special salaries, they ought to be carefully scrutinised, but not abolished—he would treat the salaries generally as such salaries might be treated by a private firm. A charge of a grave character had been made with regard to the assessments, and he did not think it should have been made, as there was no evidence to support it.

MR. MORTON said, he did not expect to try to vote with him; he did not think they would have sufficient courage this way. He maintained, notwithstanding what the hon. Member (Mr. Macartney) had said, that these properties were purposely undervalued. He hoped they would allow the Local Authorities to value them. He thought a fair case had been made out for the consideration of the question, so that Local Authorities might be fairly treated. The present system was not fair. They had not a fair explanation in the Paper before them, and it was but right that they should have.

THE CHAIRMAN was about to put the question.

COLONEL NOLAN said his question had not been answered.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he had only to say that the same system was adopted in Ireland as existed in England and Wales. Dissatisfaction had been expressed in the House with the method of valuing this class of property, but he understood that no complaints had been received from the country.

MR. A. C. MORTON: It is no good complaining.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, objection had been taken under various Governments; but each Government refused to allow Government property to be dealt with in the same way as other property. They gave contributions to Local Authorities; and, so long as the rating was fair and equal, he did not think they could do anything.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 147.—(Division List, No. 289.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £142,176, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Erection, Repairs, and Maintenance of Public Buildings in Ireland, for the Maintenance of certain Parks and Public Works, and for Drainage Works on the Rivers Shannon and Suck.”

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,” put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LABOUR DISPUTES (ARBITRATION)
BILL.—(No. 308.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) was understood to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to make any statement with regard to the progress of this Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to reply that he would on Thursday.

Second Reading deferred till Monday, 18th September.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he hoped the House would allow the Second Reading to be taken, leaving over discussion until a later stage.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir J. T. Hibbert.)

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, the Financial Secretary had promised to give them an opportunity of discussing this Bill. There were questions which would have to be discussed in Committee, such, for instance, as the Endowed Schools Act; and if the Bill were read a second time the Government ought to bring on the Committee Stage at a reasonable hour. The House was aware that the Government was taking an entirely new departure, and they had a right to expect that Ministers would afford facilities for the discussion of the schools question. It involved a complete reversal of the policy of the Government when they passed the Act. Particular words were discussed and struck out of the Bill, and the Government had proceeded as if they remained. Under the circumstances, whatever time of night it came on, the Bill would have to be discussed. It was a matter of great importance, and the Government should allow ample opportunity for discussion.

SIR T. LEA said that if the Bill were proceeded with to-night the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury must undertake to allow time for discussion on the Committee stage.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, there would have to be a good deal of discussion in connection with the Ballot Act. No doubt there was plenty of time to deal with the question; but he wished to give notice to the Government that this question would have to be discussed, whether in the daytime or in the small hours of the morning.

MR. BARTLEY said that under the new arrangement Supply could go on to any hour, and if these Bills were to be taken after these subjects had been disposed of, the House would find itself dealing with them at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. He thought they should have a pledge from the Government that if the Second Reading of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill were allowed to be taken, the Committee stage should be commenced before midnight.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he could not give any pledge at the moment as to the time at which the Bill would be brought on in Committee; but he would suggest that any hon. Member who took objection to any particular measure proposed to be continued should give notice of his objection by putting down Amendments on the Paper. It had been laid down that no Amendment could be moved to the clauses of measures contained in this Bill. The only Amendment which could be moved would be to omit a measure from the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) said, the Intermediate Education Act passed by the late Government was now being interpreted in a manner dissimilar to the view taken of the measure at the time of its passing. The bulk of that Act was permanent, there being only some few clauses contained in the present Bill, and it was to those clauses that objection was taken. Those who objected were not masters of the time of the House. They were at the mercy of the Government; but sufficient had transpired to-night to induce them to believe that on both sides of the House there was a desire to render the proceedings of the House for the rest of the Session as little controversial as possible. If, therefore, the Government wished the friendly feeling which prevailed on these matters to continue, they must meet hon. Members as far as possible. It would be difficult to deal with the Intermediate Education Act if it were not commenced until 1 o'clock in the morning. He would appeal to the Government to break off Supply at an early hour some day, so as to enable the Act to which he referred to be entered upon at a reasonable time. If the Secretary to the Treasury wished hon. Members to give notice of their Amendments he must allow them a fair opportunity for doing so.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he thought that ample notice of the intention to take the Committee stage should be given, in order that hon. Members might put down Amendments, particularly to the Ballot Act, and that the Government might give effect to such as they thought reasonable. In cases where only parts of Acts were contained in the Bill surely it would be competent for the Government to withdraw some of those parts.

SIR F. S. POWELL said, he thought the time had come when the Ballot Act should no longer be continued from year to year, but should be made a permanent Statute in form as it was in fact. He hope the Government would take this matter seriously into consideration; and while making it permanent, he hoped they would take into view the case of the illiterate voter. Now that they had single-Member constituencies, there was no reason why the voter should not be supposed to be literate enough to give his vote for one or even two Members on a list.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that if the Bill were read a second time he would put the Committee stage down for that day week.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LONDON (EQUALISATION OF RATES) BILL.—(No. 332.)

SECOND READING.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred till Monday, 18th September."

MR. J. STUART asked why the Government were not prepared to read the Bill a second time to-night? The Chancellor of the Exchequer and every

Mr. Talbot

Member who had spoken on the Ministerial and on the Opposition side of the House were in favour of the Bill. Why, therefore, should not they proceed with the Second Reading to-night? The proposal to defer the measure until the 18th instant was an extraordinary one, for it would then be impossible to deal with it. The Home Secretary had assured them that the Bill came within the list of those which could be reasonably dealt with before the close of the Session; and certainly the conditions he had laid down as entitling the Bill to be considered non-controversial were satisfied so far as this Bill and the London Members were concerned. He asked the Home Secretary to bring what influence he could to bear upon the other Members of the Government to induce them to read this Bill a second time to-night.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire): The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at an early period, said he would proceed with no Government Bills to-night. The last Bill was only dealt with by the general assent of the House, and it was essentially a non-controversial measure. The right hon. Gentleman said that on Thursday he would make a statement as to the Bills to be proceeded with this Session; therefore, I think it would only be fair to put the Bill down for that day.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (SWINE FEVER) BILL.

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered and agreed to.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT (PLUMSTEAD AND HACKNEY) (re-committed) BILL.—(No. 432.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL [Lords].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 457.]

House adjourned at five minutes before One o'clock.

PETITIONS

As to whether there were any means of bringing up the question of contempt of Parliament by forging Petitions, the Speaker said that that was a matter for the opinion of the House. If the Member brought it before the House, it would be for the House to take notice of it. It ought to be brought forward at the commencement of Business. It appertained to the privileges of the House. The Chairman of the Committee, or any Member of the Committee, might bring it forward. In the first instance it was left to the Committee ; but it was open to any other gentleman, on a Report being presented to the House, to take any action he might think proper. It was entirely within the discretion of the Committee whether they took any action. As it affected the privileges and the right of petitioning the House the Speaker thought the matter might be brought up at any time Aug 30, 1531

QUESTIONS

The Member spoke to the Speaker about the question ; and the Speaker said that if what was stated in the question was a statement of fact, and had been made on Oath, he could not prevent it being put in the question. And the Speaker thought that the Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) was fully entitled to make any personal explanation he wished after the question had been put Aug 25, 1084

It was a question relating to some local religious squabble, and was not a proper matter to be brought before the House Aug 25, 1098

It was out of Order to ask why the Government had dealt unjustly with a certain class of workmen Aug 25, 1104

Hypothetical questions were out of Order Sept 1, 1732

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE*New Clauses and Amendts.—Consideration as Amended, Government of Ireland Bill

The question of Boundary Commissioners had been considered. Something had passed between the Member who moved the clause and the Government, and the Government had expressed their intention of bringing up an Amendt. later on. But, in any case, the Member could not bring forward the question of Boundary Commissioners at that stage. The Speaker invited the Government to state what they proposed to do. It was not in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to discuss the question of the Schedule, but he could say that there would be a period of the Bill when he would introduce an Amendt. to carry out the principle of single - Member constituencies. That would be the time to consider the matter, as against the Schedule, as it stood at present. Everything beyond that was out of Order. As to the questions on what part of the Bill could the scheme be introduced, and how could the clause embodying such scheme be introduced at a later stage of the Bill when the Member who moved it then was out of Order, the Speaker said : If he ruled the Member out of Order in discussing the question then, he would have to give the same ruling in regard to the Boundary Commission which the Government indicated that they might propose to the House. The difficulty might be got over by re-committing the Bill for the purpose of dealing with the Boundary Commissioners. Unless it were shown that the possible scheme of the Government would differ from the boundary scheme in the Member's clause, the Speaker would have to rule it out of Order.

The distinction was very fine between appointing Boundary Commissioners under the Bill and proceeding by Order in Council, because the Commissioners would be named by Order in Council in any case. The point was one as to which the Speaker would not like to commit himself to a final opinion without further consideration.

A Member suggested a course which would take the Boundary Commissioners out of the appointment of the House, and the Speaker thought such a course might be adopted.

The discussion was irregular, but the Speaker thought it his duty to permit it for the sake of convenience. There would be plenty of time to put down Amendts. upon the clause, and before the time arrived the Government might say what they would do Aug 11, 33, 35, 36, 37

The Member might state on the clause (Imperial Officers) what he desired to have done; that was, the appointment of military officers for the purpose of dealing in Ireland with billeting, the balloting for the Militia, the impressment of carriages, and so on. But the policy of maintaining the Army in Ireland was quite another matter, and the Member was not in Order in dealing with it Aug 11, 76

The clause could be properly moved as a separate clause, and not simply as an Amendt. to a clause Aug 11, 92

The New Clause (Elections not to be held on Sunday) was out of Order, as Sunday elections had been excluded in the Ballot Act. But the matter might be raised on the Sixth Schedule Aug 14, 190

It was not quite relevant to the clause to go into matters of bygone history Aug 14, 193

The Clause was out of Order; the objections to it were that it was ipso facto legislation—that it was a disqualifying section sought to be introduced into a Bill which contained no other disqualification, and that it would require an Instruction to make it in Order Aug 15, 257

The Speaker did not think the clause was out of Order, or that it would require an Instruction Aug 15, 285

On Report the whole Bill was open to review; but a Second Reading discussion extended the limits of discussion to an unusual degree. The discussion should be confined to those parts of the Bill which were not discussed in Committee. The Member was within his right in discussing the Preamble, but if the whole Bill were considered it would be a violation of the Standing Order, No. 40, which said that when a Bill was brought up on Report the House proceeded at once to consider the clauses of the Bill without general discussion of the Bill as a whole. The Preamble was, to all intents and purposes, a clause, and should be considered as such, and the discussion upon it should be as much confined to it as discussion on a clause. The Member, therefore, was only in Order in discussing the Preamble as if it were a clause of the Bill Aug 15, 293, 294, 295, 297

The point before the House was the question of a Second Chamber, and the Member would not be in Order in discussing the qualification of the electors, or the sufficiency of their numbers. The Speaker had no cognisance of the Debate which took place in Committee; the only restriction he could lay down was that the Member should confine himself to the erection of a Second Chamber Aug 15, 322

—cont.

The words could not be moved then, as they would come before the Amendt. already before the House. An Amendt. could only be withdrawn with the consent of the House Aug 23, 902, 908

The practice was not to refer to previous Debates on other subjects in the same Session; but it was in Order to refer to previous Debates on the same subject. It was a question of degree Aug 17, 445

It was not relevant to the matter before the House what the electors understood when they elected a Member Aug 23, 898

A Member gave for his reason for supporting the Motion for the rejection of the scheme the exclusion of Lampeter College; therefore, the Speaker could not stop the Member from referring to that point Aug 29, 1451

A Member gave notice that on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill in Committee he would move to leave out certain clauses, but the Speaker entertained grave doubts as to the regularity of such a course Aug 31, 1586
